The Southern University.

THE Collegiate Department will be opened on the 1st of October, 1859.

FACULTY.—Rev. W. M. Wightman, D. D., LL. D., President. Rev. Edward Wadsworth, A. M., D. D., Professor of Moral Philosophy. O. F. Casey, A. M., Professor of Ancient Languages. J. C. Willis, A. M., Professor of Mathematics. N. T. Lupton, A. M., Professor of Chemistry.

The Faculty will be increased so soon as the patronage shall demand it.

We also give the Course of Studies. The course of studies in the Collegiate Department embraces:

FRESHMAN CLASS.—First Term.—Livy; Latin Prose Composition; Herodotus; Greek Prose Composition; Greek and Roman Antiquities; Algebra; Ancient History; Greek Testament continued throughout the course.

Second Term.—Horace, (Odes and Epodes); Homer's Iliad, (six books); Latin and Greek Prose Composition; Ancient Geography and Mythology; Geometry; Ancient History.

SOPHOMORE CLASS.—First Term.—Horace, (Satires and Epistles); Demosthenes or Æschines; Latin and Greek Prose Composition; Plane Trigonometry and its Applications; Ancient History.

Second Term.—Tacitus; Terence or Plautus (one Play); Euripides; Latin and Greek Exercises; Spherical Trigonometry; Surveying; Analytical Geometry; History; Rhetoric.

JUNIOR CLASS.—First Term.—Cicero de Oratore; Thucydides, or one of Plato's Dialogues; Greek and Roman Antiquities; Calculus; Chemistry; Logic.

Second Term.—Juvenal and Persius; Æschylus; Chemistry; Political Economy; Natural Philosophy.

SENIOR CLASS.—First Term.—Moral Philosophy; Evidences of Christianity; Natural Philosophy; Constitution of the United States; Elements of Criticism; French; History.

Second Term.—Mental Philosophy; Evidences of Christianity; Astronomy; Geology; History; Elements of Criticism; French.

Composition and Declamation are required throughout the course. Original speeches are delivered by the Senior Class. Instruction will be given in the department of Biblical Literature, by the President.

FOR ADMISSION INTO THE FRESHMAN CLASS Candidates will be examined in Arithmetic and Algebra through Simple Equations; Cæsar's Commentaries, four books; Virgil's Æneid, six books; Cicero's Orations; Sallust; Jacob's Greek Reader; Xenophon's Anabasis, four books.

Tuition per Term, payable in advance, $25 00; Contingent fee $2 00; Boarding in Greensboro' can be had at $150 per session, including room and furniture, or fuel.

A daily stage connects with Selma and Marion Railroad, also with Columbus and Aberdeen, Miss. There are tri-weekly lines running to Tuscaloosa and to Scooba on the Mobile and Ohio Railroad, thus connecting with Jackson, Miss.

THE HOME CIRCLE FOR 1860.

Important Announcement.

DETERMINED to place the HOME CIRCLE in such a position that it shall stand without a rival in its line, and command the suffrages of every member of the M. E. Church, South, the Publisher takes this method of announcing that it will be issued January 1st, 1860, with several ENTIRELY NEW AND ATTRACTIVE FEATURES.

The magazine will contain, as heretofore, 64 pp., royal octavo, and will be printed in the very first style, upon fine paper, with a new and elegant engraved cover; but it is intended, by liberal expenditure and judicious arrangements, to make it far more worthy of patronage than ever before.

Foremost among the attractions to be presented will be an original series of PORTRAITS OF DISTINGUISHED MEMBERS OF THE M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH, both male and female, embracing representatives from EVERY CONFERENCE IN THE CONNECTION, engraved expressly for the purpose. In addition to this, each number will be embellished with a steel-plate engraving, constituting a series which it is intended shall embrace eventually all the principal points of beauty or interest in the Southern States, and comprising Mountains and Valleys, Hills and Dales, Lakes, Rivers and Cataracts, Town and Country Public Buildings, Schools and Colleges, Churches and Private Villas; the whole constituting an entirely unique feature in works of this class, and presenting a claim upon the patronage of the members of the M. E. Church, South, and upon all lovers of the beautiful, such as has never before been offered.

It is needless to say that the execution of this design involves a very heavy outlay of money, amounting to thousands of dollars; but, believing that a vastly enlarged subscription-list will amply reward the enterprise, and resolved to merit that increase, the Publisher has determined upon adding still another and important feature to those already named: consequently, besides the above, every number will contain two magnificent Woodcut Illustrations of incidents in the life of the great Reformer, Martin Luther, engraved in the very highest style of the art. These engravings (fifty in number) will be accompanied by four pages of descriptive letter-press, printed in beautiful style; the whole constituting a series which will run through twenty-six consecutive numbers. These pages will be printed so as to fold by themselves, and may be separated from the rest of the number and bound together; and thus, at the expiration of the series, each subscriber will be possessed, without cost, of one of the most elegant volumes, ever published, "THE LIFE OF MARTIN LUTHER, IN FIFTY PICTURES."

But the Publisher will aware that pictorial illustration constitutes only a portion of the claims of any magazine to favor and support, has made ample arrangements to enhance the interest and value of the Literary Department. The Editor, the Rev. L. D. Huston, D. D., will continue to spread his monthly "feast of fat things" for the delectation of his readers; and his energies will kindle, and his pen sparkle, in proportion to the number of kindly faces he finds around his editorial table. The assistance, too, of a numerous CORPS OF GIFTED CONTRIBUTORS has been secured.

Great as are the improvements thus announced, and the additional expense involved, the Publisher wishes it distinctly understood that he does not intend to relax in his efforts still further to improve and embellish the magazine, and to make it what it ought to be—and what he—the best magazine of its class in the United States.

It is in contemplation to add, at no distant day, a MUSICAL DEPARTMENT, under the supervision of an eminent Professor of Music; and as an enlarged subscription-list shall justify, still other important additions, useful and ornamental, will be made to the present list of claims upon patronage.

TERMS.—The subscription-price will remain as heretofore, $2,00 per annum, strictly in advance, in par funds.

All orders for the Home Circle, and all letters on business, must be addressed to J. B. M'FERRIN, AGENT, Nashville, Tenn.

Communications having reference to the Literary Department will be addressed to the Rev. L. D. HUSTON, D. D. Nashville, Tennessee.

INDUCEMENTS TO AGENTS.

Every travelling preacher or other agent is entitled to retain 20 per cent. (10 cents) on each subscription forwarded in per funds to the Publisher. In addition to this liberal discount, every agent forwarding the money for Twenty Subscribers, or upwards, shall receive, at the end of the year, free per mail, a copy of the Home Circle, handsomely bound.

☞ Agents should be early in the field, and subscriptions should be sent in as soon as possible, that all demands may be promptly met.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

SEPTEMBER 7, 1850.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

REVIEW OF THE BUSINESS OF THE YEAR, FROM 1849 TO SEPT. 1849.

We copy the following interesting remarks from the New Orleans [illegible] Current of Sept. 1, 1850. The reliability and care with [illegible] statements are prepared makes them of great value.

The [illegible] promise for abundant crops, the world at peace and confidence restored, the season opened with high hopes and flattering prospects, and these have, in the main, been realized. It is true that in the very flood of apparently prosperous progress the world was startled by a few words from the lips of the Emperor of the French, the meaning of which has since been practically interpreted on the bloody fields of Italy. Skepticism in many were in regard to the actual breaking out of a [illegible] war, but few, we think, were prepared for so prompt an adjustment of a treaty of peace. This startling episode has been to some extent [illegible] a disturbing element in the commercial and financial [illegible] and its introduction has not been unattended with [illegible] and disaster in some communities. Our leading [illegible], felt most its depressing influences, but, nevertheless, [illegible] part of the season's operations in this article, taken [illegible] aggregate, should, we think, be highly satisfactory, at least to the planting interest; for we find by our calculations [illegible] the crop of the year just closed has exceeded the [illegible] previously preceding it in the large amount of upwards [illegible] 000 bales, and the average price obtained for it is a fraction [illegible] in favor of the large crop, while the aggregate increase in [illegible], for the total crop received at the ports, exceeds thirty-four millions of dollars.

The total value of our products received from the interior, [illegible] former annual valuation table, sums up $173,983,894, [illegible] $7,555,548; showing an increase over last year of [illegible], and over 1841—42, a period of seventeen years, of $107,236,619, or over 300 per cent. This exhibits a very fair [illegible] progress for our city, but it would doubtless have been materially exceeded had earlier, more energetic and more liberal enterprise been directed to the development of the rich and varied resources of our vastly extended interior. Within a few years, however, movements but too long delayed have been made, to penetrate the interior by railroads, and the leading one, made to penetrate the interior by railroads, and the leading one, [illegible] Northern, has made such progress that before the lapse of many months such connections will be made as will put New Orleans in quick communication with nearly all parts of the country North, West and East of us; a consummation that cannot fail to be highly advantageous to the enterprise itself and to the general trade of our city. In another direction the New-Orleans, Opelousas and Great Western road is seeking to develope and draw to us the rich resources of our own State and of our sister State Texas, and we are pleased to notice that arrangements are making for a vigorous onward progress. Another enterprise, in the success of which we conceive our city to be largely interested, is the Tehuantepec Transit Route. Already such progress has been made as to demonstrate the great advantages it will possess over any other route, when properly improved, and we sincerely hope that all obstacles to its prompt completion will be speedily removed.

We have, on several previous occasions, adverted to the great [illegible] advantages that would accrue to our trade from the establishment of line of Steam Propellers between our port and the leading Northern cities, New-York and Boston, [illegible] that the matter is awakening such attention as will, we trust, soon attain a practical fruition, and demonstrate the mutual advantage of such communication, to the South and the North, and also to the West, which section, when thus assured of speed and punctuality in the transportation of freight, will doubtless contribute largely to the success of the enterprise.

According to the Custom House Records the total value of Exports to Foreign Countries, of Produce and Merchandise of the growth and manufacture of the United States, and of Foreign Merchandise, for the fiscal year ended June 30th, 1850, was $181,634,927, against $96,927,438 last year; showing an increase of $17,252,514. Of the value of Exports Coastwise the Custom House has kept no record since 1807, but an estimate which we have made from our sales enables us to state that the amount is about $32,000,000; thus making the total value of our Exports Foreign and Coastwise $17,252,962. The value of Foreign Merchandise and Specie imported in the same period was $14,349,576, against $19,396,013 last year; showing a decrease of $1,326,497. There is no record of the value of the enormous cargoes of Domestic and Foreign Merchandise and Produce received Coastwise, but its amounts would count by tens of millions.

The Annual Statement of the United States Branch Mint in our city shows a material falling off in its operations as compared with last year, especially in the Deposit Department. The total Deposits of Gold and Silver, for the year ended July 31st, were $3,345,890, against $4,776,669 last year; showing a decrease of $1,430,789. The Coinage during the same time has been of Gold 29,250 pieces, of the value of $[illegible],000, and of Silver 6,496,000 pieces, of the value of $2,669,-[illegible] and Silver Bars, of the value of $324,996; making the total Coinage $3,571,996, against $4,412,000 last year; or a decrease of $840,004.

Looking forward to the prospects for the commercial year just ushered upon, they would seem to be generally of a favorable character, so far, at least, as legitimate commercial interests are concerned; and if there are any apprehensions they are attributable solely to possible political complications, which may again introduce disturbing elements into the channels of trade, engendering distrust and rendering more and more uncertain the results of mercantile adventure. Our crops, some abundant and others fair, in their present promise, are likely to furnish the basis of an extensive trade, and should peace be maintained in Europe our leading export staples will doubtless find a ready and favorable market.

COTTON.—In entering upon a review of the past season's operations in this important staple it may be proper for us to state that the quotations which we use are for a classification assimilating to that of Liverpool. The classifications of France, the Continental ports, Spain, the North, etc., call for higher rates, and these usually command prices an ⅛ to ¼ cent above our figures.

The first arrival of new crop was on the 25th July, when two bales were received from Texas, but it was not until the 4th August, that the first bale was received from the Mississippi Valley. These first arrivals of the new crop were three weeks earlier than those of the previous year, and the amount received up to 1st September was 4834 bales, against 23 bales to same date the year previous. The year commenced with a stock, including all on shipboard, of 30,230 bales, of which it was estimated that about 12,000 bales remained unsold in factors' hands. Two bales of the new crop were sold at 15 and 15½ cents, but these were fancy prices, the opening quotations for Middling being 11¼ to 12 cents. With some fluctuations the month of September closed at 12 to 12¼ cents for Middling, and the average of the month was 11⅞ to 12¼ cents, with reported sales of 90,306 bales. October passed without any marked fluctuations, the highest quotations for Middling being 12¼ to 12⅝, the lowest 11⅛ to 11¾, and the average of the month 11⅞ to 12 cents, with reported sales of 190,300 bales. In November there was a very good extent of business transacted, the reported sales running up 244,500 bales, but unusually free receipts and unfavorable advices from Europe tended to a depression of prices. The quotations for Middling being 11¼ to 11⅝, the lowest 11 to 11¼, and the average of the month 11⅛ to 11⅜ cents. December opened with an increase in receipts at this port of 201,457 bales, as compared with the previous year at the same date, and an increase in stock of 169,938 bales. December opened with no active demand, and throughout the month a good enquiry prevailed for clean Middlings, but the supply of these descriptions was not equal to the demand, and being held very firmly the business of the month fell off to 207,000 bales, with a slight improvement in prices, the highest quotations for Middling being 11⅞ to 12⅛, the lowest 11¼ to 11⅝ and the average of the month 11⅝ to 11¾ cents. In the month of January there was a heavy pressure of the accumulated stock of the lower grades, which led for a long time continued comparatively neglected and nominal, but clean bright Cottons were early enquired for and maintained remarkable steadiness of prices, quotations for Middling throughout the entire month being 11¾ to 11⅞ cents, with reported sales of 237,200 bales. In February the news of political affairs in Europe, tending to [illegible] of a war in Italy, began to exercise a more marked influence on the European markets, and that influence was brought to act here at a period of heavy receipts and accumulation of stock beyond all precedent, the amount, including all on shipboard, having reached 534,380 bales. Our receipts at this port had reached about 1,475,000 bales, against 1,154,000 bales at same time the year previous, and our receipts [illegible] showed an increase in the receipts at all the ports of 1,049,000 bales. Under these circumstances the market for all qualities gave way, but the heavy weight of stock consisted of low running mixed lots, embracing an unusual proportion of dusty and sandy Cottons, which were wholly unsaleable. The reported sales of the month summed up 212,000 bales, the highest quotations for Middling being 11¼ to 11⅝, the lowest 10¾ to 11, and the average of the month 10⅞ to 11⅛. March opened with a heavy general stock, and the month proved the most [illegible] in the season, reported sales summing up 278,000 bales, with a considerable improvement in prices, the highest quotations for Middling being 11⅛ to 11⅜, the lowest 10⅞ to 11⅛, and the average of the month 11⅛ to 11¼ cents. In this month occurred the largest day's sales of the season, (37,500) and also the largest week's sales (68,500 bales.) In April considerable fluctuations took place, but with favorable exchanges and low rates of freight the highest point of the season was reached. The reported sales of the month summed up 190,200 bales the highest quotation for Middling being 12¼ to 12⅜, the lowest 11¾ to 12, and the average of the month 11⅞ to 12¼ cents. May open under considerable depression, but holders generally manifested a good degree of firmness, and were not inclined to yield materially until it was announced, early in the month, that Austria had opened the war in Italy by marching an army into Piedmont. This intelligence totally paralyzed our market, and after several days, when business was resumed to some extent, the rates showed a decline of fully one cent per pound, though this was soon partly recovered. The reported sales of the month were only 89,500 bales, the highest quotations for Middling being 11⅞ to 12, the lowest 10¾ to 11, and the average of the month 11 to 11¼ cents. June opened with adverse accounts from Europe, and again prices receded to 10⅞ to 11 cents for Middling; with a low stock, the rates for Middling soon receded to 11¼ to 11½ cents, the average of the month being 11 to 11⅛ cents, and the reported sales 58,900 bales. In the early part of July, and during the greater portion of the month, excessive dullness prevailed, there being but few buyers, and the small stock not being generally of a character suited to their wants, which were mostly for the Middling grades, while the great bulk of the supply consisted of low-running mixed and dusty lots. Near the close of the month, however, the unlooked-for news of peace gave some impulse to the demand, and produced some enhancement of prices, though the entire sales of the month amounted up only 81,300 bales, the highest quotations for Middling being 11⅛ to 11⅜, the lowest 11¼ to 11½, and the average of the month 11¼ to 11⅜ cents. In the month of August, passed off dull, but with steadiness in prices, the range for old crop Middling being 11⅛ to 11⅜ cents, and the sales of the month summing up barely 19,200 bales. The total reported sales of the year sum up 1,823,-150 bales, and the season closed with a stock on hand, including all the shipboard, of 36,823 bales, of which it is estimated that about 11,000 bales remain in factors' hands unsold. Of this amount about 9000 bales are old crop, consisting mostly of low-running mixed and dusty lots, which are unsaleable.

We have thus passed rapidly in review the season's operations in our leading staple; a season which has not been marked by any very violent fluctuations, notwithstanding the introduction of no formidable disturbing cause as the war in Italy, with possible, and even probable complications that might have included all Continental Europe. Fortunately for our home interests, however, the intelligence of actual hostilities came at a period of the season when the great bulk of the crop had been disposed of, and there has since been no heavy weight of stock to press prices down below a fair remunerating range. Indeed the season has, considering all the circumstances, maintained a remarkable degree of steadiness as the extreme prices for Middling differ but a fraction in the entire season, only 1⅞ cent, the quotations being 12¼ cents in April, at which point the respect of European affairs checked the ardent upward tendency, and the lowest being 10⅜ to 11 cents, under a stock of upward of 500,000 bales, and when the receipts of all the ports showed an excess over the previous year of more than 1,000,000 bales. The same figures were reached in May and June, under advices of actual war, with [illegible] and [illegible] interest, under such circumstances [illegible] very emphatically the favorable stability and ample [illegible] of our factors, and the planting interest, we conceive, [illegible] to be satisfied with the general results of the season's [illegible].

Among the difficulties and perplexities which the [illegible] called upon to encounter is one which we have repeatedly called attention to in our columns, but thus far with little or no effect, it would seem, for the past season has found it more formidable than ever. We allude to the increased proportion of sandy and dusty Cotton sent to market; a description that can hardly ever be disposed of except under the excitement of an indiscriminate speculative demand, and punishing which is found by every merchantable, to be got rid of only under the anathemas of unmerchantable, to be got rid of only under the anathemas of [illegible]'s hamper. This evil has attained to such magnitude that it behoves planters to apply some remedy, as the complaints from abroad of the unsalableness of such descriptions leads to the probability that they will be almost wholly repudiated in the coming season's operations. Those who pack Cotton falsely, by introducing sand or trash into the body of the bale, (and accordingly to certificates from manufacturers, both abroad and at home, there must be many such) should, if by possibility they can be traced, be summarily dealt with, in order that so important a branch of trade may be purged of such a damaging evil, involving as it does, to some extent, the good faith of the planting interest generally.

The average price of the season, for all quotations, we find to be 11½ cents per pound, against 11¼ cents last year and 12¼ cents the year previous, and the average weight of the bales we have ascertained to be 458 pounds, against 460 pounds last year. On this basis the aggregate weight of the Cotton received at this port would be 812,629,484 pounds.

The total receipts at this port since 1st September last, from all sources, are 1,774,298 bales. This amount includes 101,484 bales received from Mobile, Florida and Texas by sea; and this being deducted our receipts proper, including 13,540 bales received direct from Montgomery, Wetumpka, etc., are shown to be 1,673,814 bales; being an increase as compared with last year of 199,405 bales. The total exports since 1st September are 1,777,171 bales, of which 994,686 bales were shipped to Great Britain, 256,447 to France, 329,438 to the North and South of Europe and 196,590 to United States ports. The total receipts at all the Atlantic and Gulf ports, up to the latest dates received, as shown by our General Cotton Table, are 2,721,870 bales; but the actual crop, when made up to the 1st September by the New York Shipping and Commercial List, with the difference of stocks at Augusta and Hamburg, receipts overland, etc., will not be far from 3,800,000 bales; being much the largest crop ever produced, and exceeding that of last year in the amount of 986,038 bales.

With respect to the coming crop, we have briefly to state that we do not remember any previous season when so little complaint has been heard from the planters in the interior; and it appears to be the general impression that no previous season has presented a more favorable general promise. With some exceptions of early planting in favorable positions the crop is said to be not quite as forward as that at last year; but the growth has been steady and healthy, producing a plant vigorous and fruit-bearing to an unusual degree. With the past few weeks, however, complaints of excessive rains have come from some sections, but we trust that no extensive damage will result from them, or from any other cause. Should this be the case, and the picking season prove a long and favorable one, there cannot be a doubt that, with partial crops on overflowed lands, which last year produced nothing, the general crop will be the largest ever known. Large as it may be, however, the experience of the past season, we think, demonstrates that it cannot exceed the wants of the world; and with peace maintained the largest possible yield will be assured of amply remunerating prices.

The first receipt of the new crop was three bales from Texas on the 25th July, and on the 1st August the first bale received from the Valley of the Mississippi. Last year the first receipt from Texas was on the 25th July, and the first from the Valley of the Mississippi on the 5th August. The first two or three bales sold at the fancy prices of 13½ to 13¾ cents for Strict Middling, but the market opened at 12 to 12½ cents for Middling to Good Middling, giving way under more free receipts and closing at the quotations given below. The total receipts of new crop to date are 9608 bales, against 4834 bales last year. In quality the receipts thus far do not compare favorably with the early receipts of last year, as they embrace parcels of very [illegible], stained and even dusty cottons, indicating exposure to heavy rains. The weather has been generally fine for the past two weeks, however, and doubtless an improvement in quality will soon be apparent.

New Orleans Classification.

Inferior, old crop, 6 to 7c.; Ordinary, old crop, 8 to 9; Good Ordinary, old crop, 9½ to 10; Low Middling, new crop, 11 to 11¼; Middling, new crop, 11¼ to 11⅜; Good Middling, new crop, 12 to 12½; Middling Fair, new crop, 12½ to 12¾; Fair, nominal; Good Fair, nominal; Good and Fine, nominal.

SUGAR.—The Annual Statement of Mr. P. A. Champomier makes the total crop 362,296 hhds. of 1150 pounds each, or an aggregate of 414,790,000 pounds. Of this quantity 208,471 hhds were Brown Sugar, made by the old process, and 53,825 hhds Refined, Clarified, etc., including Cistern-Bottoms, and the whole was the product of 1294 Sugar Houses, of which 987 were worked by steam and 211 by horse power. Had it not been for the loss by crevasses and overflows, which is estimated at about 52,000 hhds, the crop would have reached 415,000 hhds, or nearly to the extent of the great crop of 1853, since which time there has been a material curtailment of the culture in the upper parishes. There is no doubt, also, that the frosts of the 9th and 10th November, which greatly alarmed planters and induced many to cut and windrow their cane, caused some considerable diminution of the product.

The first receipt of the new crop was three hhds, from the Parish of Iberville, on the 26th September, which was nine days earlier than the first receipt from the same Parish last year, and nearly a month and a half earlier than the first receipt in the previous short crop year; thus indicating a favorable growing season and an early maturity. The three hhds were dry, and of good color and grain, and brought 9 cents per pound. The supply continued light until the latter part of October, when free arrivals caused a rapid decline, November opening with the following quotations:

Inferior and Refining, 3 to 4c.; Common to Good Common, 4½ to 5; Fair to Fully Fair, 5¼ to 5½; Prime to Choice, 6¼ to 6⅝; Centrifugal and Clarified, 6⅞ to 7¼.

There was soon a slight improvement, however, and although the arrivals were considerably more than double those to the same period in the previous year, there was not so great a depression of prices, the prevailing range throughout the month being 5⅞ to 6 cents per pound for Fair to Fully Fair. The lowest point was about the middle of December, when, under a heavy accumulation of stock, Fair to Fully Fair was quoted at 5¾ to 5⅞ cents. Prices materially improved, however, in January and February, reaching 6⅞ to 7 cents in the latter month, but from this point, with some fluctuations, there was a gradual decline up to the latter part of June, when Fair to Fully Fair was quoted at 6¼ to 6⅜ cents per pound. With a reduced stock prices began to improve again from this point, but fell off again in August, and the closing quotations are for Fair to Fully Fair 6 to 6¼ cents.

The first sale noticed on plantation was in the early part of January, and some 10,000 hhds were reported within the month, the prices for crops being 5¼, 6, 6¼, 6¼ and 6¾ cents per pound. In February fully 20,000 hhds were taken, at 6¼, 6, 6¼, 6¾, 6¼, 6⅞, 6⅞ and 7, and one favorite crop of 445 hhds at 7¼ cents per pound. This was the most active and the highest point of the season, and since then only occasional crops have been noticed, at about the rates prevailing in the city. According to our calculations the entire crop has averaged about 6 cents per pound, which is a fraction more than the average realized for the smaller crop of 1857—58. On this basis, and taking Mr. Champomier's estimate of 1150 pounds per hhd, the aggregate product of the crop of 362,296 hhds is $24,998,424 against $17,900,608, the product of 370,697 hhds last year; or an increase of $7,097,816. The receipts at the levee since 1st September have been 257,225 hhds and 5241 tierces and barrels, against 203,783 hhds and 6020 tierces and barrels last year.

The estimated stock on hand at the close of last season was 2000 hhds, and this amount added to the crop—362,296 hhds—would make a supply of 364,296 hhds.

According to a statement annually made up by the New York Shipping and Commercial List the total import of Foreign Sugar into the United States, for the year ended December 31st, 1858, was 256,100 tons, (equal to 473,185 hhds of 1200 pounds each,) against 269,180 tons, or 502,469 hhds in 1857; and the quantity of this description taken for consumption in 1858 was 244,758 tons, against 241,765 tons in 1857; or an increase of 1¼ per cent. The consumption of both Foreign and Domestic Cane Sugar in 1858 was 388,402 tons, against 280,765 tons in 1857; or an increase in the total consumption of 38 per cent. Besides the above it is estimated that there entered into the consumption 11,160 tons of Sugar made from Foreign and Domestic Molasses, and 24,000 tons of Maple Sugar, which, with the consumption of California and Oregon, estimated at 7500 tons, would give a grand total for the consumption of the United States in 1858 of 431,152 tons, against 332,065 tons in 1857. This amount is equal to 965,770,480 pounds, or 804,808 hhds of 1200 pounds each, and is much the largest quantity ever consumed in one year in the United States, giving an average (estimating the whole population at 30,000,000) of 32 pounds to each man, women and child, including slaves.

With respect to the growing crop, we have to remark that the general promise appears to be less flattering than at the same period last year. The spring was unusually rainy, and unfavorable for ploughing and planting, and thus the plant cane is backward, while the ratoons are said not to present favorable promise. There has been some damage by overflow, though much less than last year; but even with this advantage, and assuming that the season henceforth will be of a favorable character for maturing and gathering the cane, it seems to be the general impression that the crop is not likely to reach the extent of the one just disposed of.

Touching the market prospects for the coming crop, we may remark that it will have an unusually large stocks in the North, and a low range of prices for second width, and also a better supply in the Western markets than last year opened upon. The Great West, however, is understood to be favored with abundant crops, and thus with more ample means to purchase these may be such a further increase of consumption as will insure on average return equal to that of last year.

MOLASSES.—Mr. P. A. Champomier, in his Annual Statement, estimates the product of Molasses from the last year's cane crop at 60 gallons for each 1000 pounds of Sugar, against 70 gallons last year, or as aggregate of 24,887,700 gallons, against 19,578,790 gallons the year previous; showing an increase of 5,308,970 gallons. With a good demand, however, and an extended consumption, this increased supply has been quite readily absorbed, and a higher range of prices than was realized for the smaller aggregate of the previous year, the average of the season being 26 cents against 23½ cents per gallon. The arrivals at the levee during the past season have been 253,715 barrels, against 239,343 barrels last year, or an increase of 13,372 barrels.

The prices realized for crops on plantation have been largely in excess of those obtained last year, when the bulk of the sales ranged from 15 to 16c. per gal. in the cisterns. This year our market opened in November at 25c. per gal. but the bulk of the business was done in December and January, within which two months we reported, as a part of the transactions, some 2,000,000 gallons, mostly at 25 and 26c. per gal. in the cisterns, but including some crops on Bayou Lafourche at 24c. and also some few on the coast in the latter part of January at 27 and 28c per gal. In February planters put up their price to 30c. and some few crops were disposed of at this rate, but subsequently the prices fell back to 28c. at which rate we noticed sales of about 100,000 gallons at the close of April.

The quantity shipped to Atlantic ports is equal to about 4,500,000 gallons last year, and this amount being deducted from the whole crop of 24,887,700 gallons last year, there would be left, for the consumption of the South and West, 20,340,560 gallons, against 15,914,790 gallons last year.

The total value of the product, estimated at an average of 26c. per gallon, sums up $6,470,817, against $4,601,015 last year—showing an increase of $1,869,802.

TOBACCO.—This year opened with a stock on hand September 1st, including all on shipboard, of 28,418 hhds. of which amount there were estimated as remaining unsold about 9000 hhds; the total receipts at this port since, are 75,925 against 67,141 hhds. last year, and this amount includes 11,000 strips and 2050 hhds stems, the quantity inspected during the same period being 56,466 Hhds., of which 2087 hhds. were Mason county. The year closes with a stock on hand, including all on shipboard of 23,369 hhds. two-thirds of which quality consists of Interior and Common Refused.

The crop, as received at this port, has presented a low average of quality, there having been an unusually meagre proportions of the heavy, rich or fat descriptions, and also of the enting qualities, while a much larger proportion than usual proved of a nondescript and comparatively unsaleable character, having been cut before maturity. This deficiency in quality has had much to do with the marked falling off in the average price of the season, as compared with last year.

With respect to the growing crop our advices lead to the impression that in no event is it likely to reach the amount produced last year. We hope, however, that every care will be taken to make it better in quality. To this end thorough maturity is the first requisite, and the next curing with care, and with as little fire as possible.

WESTERN PRODUCE.—With but a moderate export demand for the leading articles of Western production comprised under this head, the actual sales in our market during the past year have been on a less extensive scale than in the one which preceded it, though reduced receipts of many of the most important commodities have tended to the maintenance of a very full indiscriminate speculative demand, and punchiu which is found [illegible] ly unmerchantable, to be got rid of only under the anathemas of [illegible]'s hamper. This evil has attained to such magnitude that it behoves planters to apply some remedy, as the complaints from abroad of the unsalableness of such descriptions leads to the probability that they will be almost wholly repudiated in the coming season's operations. Those who pack Cotton falsely, by introducing sand or trash into the body of the bale, (and accordingly to certificates from manufacturers, both abroad and at home, there must be many such) should, if by possibility they can be traced, be summarily dealt with, in order that so important a branch of trade may be purged of such a damaging evil, involving as it does, to some extent, the good faith of the planting interest generally.

The average price of the season, for all quotations, we find to be 11¼ cents per pound, against 11¼ cents last year and 12¼ to be 11½ cents per pound, against 11¼ cents last year and 12¼ cents the year previous, and the average weight of the bales we have ascertained to be 458 pounds, against 460 pounds last year. On this basis the aggregate weight of the Cotton received at this port would be 812,629,484 pounds.

The total receipts at this port since 1st September last, from all sources, are 1,774,298 bales. This amount includes 101,484 bales received from Mobile, Florida and Texas by sea; and this being deducted our receipts proper, including 13,540 bales received direct from Montgomery, Wetumpka, etc., are shown to be 1,673,814 bales; being an increase as compared with last year of 199,405 bales. The total exports since 1st September are 1,777,171 bales, of which 994,686 bales were shipped to Great Britain, 256,447 to France, 329,438 to the North and South of Europe and 196,590 to United States ports. The total receipts at all the Atlantic and Gulf ports, up to the latest dates received, as shown by our General Cotton Table, are 2,721,870 bales; but the actual crop, when made up to the 1st September by the New York Shipping and Commercial List, with the difference of stocks at Augusta and Hamburg, receipts overland, etc., will not be far from 3,800,000 bales; being much the largest crop ever produced, and exceeding that of last year in the amount of 986,038 bales.

With respect to the coming crop, we have briefly to state that we do not remember any previous season when so little complaint has been heard from the planters in the interior; and it appears to be the general impression that no previous season has presented a more favorable general promise. With some exceptions of early planting in favorable positions the crop is said to be not quite as forward as that at last year; but the growth has been steady and healthy, producing a plant vigorous and fruit-bearing to an unusual degree. With the past few weeks, however, complaints of excessive rains have come from some sections, but we trust that no extensive damage will result from them, or from any other cause. Should this be the case, and the picking season prove a long and favorable one, there cannot be a doubt that, with partial crops on overflowed lands, which last year produced nothing, the general crop will be the largest ever known. Large as it may be, however, the experience of the past season, we think, demonstrates that it cannot exceed the wants of the world; and with peace maintained the largest possible yield will be assured of amply remunerating prices.

The first receipt of the new crop was three bales from Texas on the 25th July, and on the 1st August the first bale received from the Valley of the Mississippi. Last year the first receipt from Texas was on the 25th July, and the first from the Valley of the Mississippi on the 5th August. The first two or three bales sold at the fancy prices of 13½ to 13¾ cents for Strict Middling, but the market opened at 12 to 12½ cents for Middling to Good Middling, giving way under more free receipts and closing at the quotations given below. The total receipts of new crop to date are 9608 bales, against 4834 bales last year. In quality the receipts thus far do not compare favorably with the early receipts of last year, as they embrace parcels of very [illegible], stained and even dusty cottons, indicating exposure to heavy rains. The weather has been generally fine for the past two weeks, however, and doubtless an improvement in quality will soon be apparent.

SUGAR.—The Annual Statement of Mr. P. A. Champomier makes the total crop 362,296 hhds. of 1150 pounds each, or an aggregate of 414,790,000 pounds. Of this quantity 208,471 hhds were Brown Sugar, made by the old process, and 53,825 hhds Refined, Clarified, etc., including Cistern-Bottoms, and the whole was the product of 1294 Sugar Houses, of which 987 were worked by steam and 211 by horse power. Had it not been for the loss by crevasses and overflows, which is estimated at about 52,000 hhds, the crop would have reached 415,000 hhds, or nearly to the extent of the great crop of 1853, since which time there has been a material curtailment of the culture in the upper parishes. There is no doubt, also, that the frosts of the 9th and 10th November, which greatly alarmed planters and induced many to cut and windrow their cane, caused some considerable diminution of the product.

The first receipt of the new crop was three hhds, from the Parish of Iberville, on the 26th September, which was nine days earlier than the first receipt from the same Parish last year, and nearly a month and a half earlier than the first receipt in the previous short crop year; thus indicating a favorable growing season and an early maturity. The three hhds were dry, and of good color and grain, and brought 9 cents per pound. The supply continued light until the latter part of October, when free arrivals caused a rapid decline, November opening with the following quotations:

Inferior and Refining, 3 to 4c.; Common to Good Common, 4½ to 5; Fair to Fully Fair, 5¼ to 5½; Prime to Choice, 6¼ to 6⅝; Centrifugal and Clarified, 6⅞ to 7¼.

There was soon a slight improvement, however, and although the arrivals were considerably more than double those to the same period in the previous year, there was not so great a depression of prices, the prevailing range throughout the month being 5⅞ to 6 cents per pound for Fair to Fully Fair. The lowest point was about the middle of December, when, under a heavy accumulation of stock, Fair to Fully Fair was quoted at 5¾ to 5⅞ cents. Prices materially improved, however, in January and February, reaching 6⅞ to 7 cents in the latter month, but from this point, with some fluctuations, there was a gradual decline up to the latter part of June, when Fair to Fully Fair was quoted at 6¼ to 6¾ cents per pound. With a reduced stock prices began to improve again from this point, but fell off again in August, and the closing quotations are for Fair to Fully Fair 6 to 6¼ cents.

The first sale noticed on plantation was in the early part of January, and some 10,000 hhds were reported within the month, the prices for crops being 5¼, 6, 6¼, 6¼ and 6¾ cents per pound. In February fully 20,000 hhds were taken, at 6¼, 6, 6¼, 6¾, 6¼, 6⅞, 6⅞ and 7, and one favorite crop of 445 hhds at 7¼ cents per pound. This was the most active and the highest point of the season, and since then only occasional crops have been noticed, at about the rates prevailing in the city. According to our calculations the entire crop has averaged about 6 cents per pound, which is a fraction more than the average realized for the smaller crop of 1857—58. On this basis, and taking Mr. Champomier's estimate of 1150 pounds per hhd, the aggregate product of the crop of 362,296 hhds is $24,998,424 against $17,900,608, the product of 370,697 hhds last year; or an increase of $7,097,816. The receipts at the levee since 1st September have been 257,225 hhds and 5241 tierces and barrels, against 203,783 hhds and 6020 tierces and barrels last year.

The estimated stock on hand at the close of last season was 2000 hhds, and this amount added to the crop—362,296 hhds—would make a supply of 364,296 hhds.

According to a statement annually made up by the New York Shipping and Commercial List the total import of Foreign Sugar into the United States, for the year ended December 31st, 1858, was 256,100 tons, (equal to 473,185 hhds of 1200 pounds each,) against 269,180 tons, or 502,469 hhds in 1857; and the quantity of this description taken for consumption in 1858 was 244,758 tons, against 241,765 tons in 1857; or an increase of 1¼ per cent. The consumption of both Foreign and Domestic Cane Sugar in 1858 was 388,402 tons, against 280,765 tons in 1857; or an increase in the total consumption of 38 per cent. Besides the above it is estimated that there entered into the consumption 11,160 tons of Sugar made from Foreign and Domestic Molasses, and 24,000 tons of Maple Sugar, which, with the consumption of California and Oregon, estimated at 7500 tons, would give a grand total for the consumption of the United States in 1858 of 431,152 tons, against 332,065 tons in 1857. This amount is equal to 965,770,480 pounds, or 804,808 hhds of 1200 pounds each, and is much the largest quantity ever consumed in one year in the United States, giving an average (estimating the whole population at 30,000,000) of 32 pounds to each man, women and child, including slaves.

NANCY ELIZA OWEN, daughter of T. H. and Malissa H. Owen, of Jefferson county, Ala., departed this life, 12th June last, in the Institute at Summerfield, Ala. She was born in Jones Valley, Jefferson county, September 14, 1842, and embraced religion when she was about ten years old. She lived a consistent life, having been initiated into the M. E. Church by the ordinance of Baptism when but an infant. She was an honor to her parents, and to the Church, by her Godly walk. Her father says he has seldom known her lie down to sleep at night, from the time she professed Religion till her death, without first kneeling down at her bedside and saying her prayers. She was sent to the Summerfield School by her father and kind stepmother, to finish her education, and was numbered among those who composed the class that graduated. But, a few days previous to the examination, God called her to enjoy higher felicity, in joining the one hundred and forty and four thousand that John saw; and, in a more glorious concert than the one she was a member of in Summerfield. She said, just before her departure, she much desired to see her father and elder brother; but, as they were already Christians, she could do them no good. More especially did she desire to see her other brother, that she might ask him to meet her in Heaven. We learn that one dear Elize was a favorite with the Faculty, and beloved of all the School; and, using the President's words, "she never did wrong." Her relatives wear a badge of mourning, betokening their great loss, while she, no doubt, wears a crown of Glory, and with a Palm marches beside her dear mother, who left her a little child. "In the fair fields of Eden they rest forevermore." O, may the surviving relatives meet her in Heaven.

WE LEFT Howard spring after breakfast, and pursued our journey through the day without any special incident by the way. The country is poor, dry and rocky. The only growth is a dwarfish mezquit and a species of palmetto with a long serrated leaf, commonly called in S. E. Georgia—"saw-palmetto."

We met several government trains, a herd or two of horses in transit from Mexico to the interior of Texas—mere scrubstock, not of much value anywhere.

In the afternoon we saw a great many antelopes, in different squads among the hills; but, as usual, they were too shy either for close inspection or successful shooting.

The mountains continue—seem to grow higher—and, if possible, more wild and bleak.

The views are panoramic—perpetually shifting—yet always desolate. We have here uniformity of change—monotony of variety—hill, mountain, vale, cave, gorge, canon, precipice—all alike in loneliness and sterility—the very nakedness of ruin.

Finally, after ascending a mountain, we enter upon the southern extremity of the Llano Estacado or "the Staked Plains," and, on looking back, a very remarkable change appears. The mountains, through which we had been toiling, are seen no more—the innumerable summits seem blended, the points and crags and inequalities are lost, and there lies before the gaze almost a perfect plain: the change is most marvellous; it is however only the magic of elevation.

These letters are likely to grow tedious. I must therefore limit details of night-encampments, description of scenery, and the every day events of this long toilsome trip. Selecting from the mass materials enough for a few letters, I will sum up in a closing epistle my views of the country, its wants and prospects.

Fort Lancaster, the next point of interest, was reached about noon the 26th of May. After crossing the plain it came suddenly upon the most frightful descent upon the whole route. The road has been cut out of the mountain side, and runs along upon the brink of a precipice of awful depth. To go down in safety requires all the help and precautions for such cases made and provided.

The Fort is upon the valley below, and consists of adobe houses, mainly, neatly arranged, and constituting the retreats from the almost intolerable heat of this region. The thermometer I think was 104 on the day of our arrival. The wind, confined by the mountains, was pouring like a torrent through the vale; and yet, in passing over deserts of sand and rock, had become so dry and hot as hardly to effect the temperature at all. Nevertheless, to one in the shade, it was very refreshing.

Here we dined, changed teams, and set out afresh. In a few miles crossed the Pecos river—a deep, muddy, brackish stream—and traveled late at night in order to find a place open enough for a camp. In this region the Indians are very troublesome, and the traveler must needs be wary. The mules were tied fast—some to the wheels and some to the wheels; a double guard was stationed, and the rest of the company went to rest. Fortunately we were not disturbed.

Very early we were up and off. The poor mules were supperless, needed water, and a few miles ahead was a famous spring and plenty of grass. The spring is called Escondido, which means hidden.

At the foot of a mountainous pile of volcanic rock, the waters break out; but are so concealed by bulrushes and flags as to be invisible, until by a circuitous path you reach the very rock from under which they flow. When you have found it, before you drink, you will have to settle a serious controversy between sight and smell. The sulphurous odors which come up from the muddy bed right below, will sicken you and tempt you to turn away; but the bright water, clear and cool, looks so inviting, you will conclude that, although in bad company, it must itself be good and pure. Sight supported by long thirst will carry the day; you dip and drink and then find that the argument is on the side of smell. The nose is a better judge than the eye. Alas!—in this world of delusions—good-looking things are not always pleasant. "All is not gold that glitters."

In the evening we reached the other stage, encamped and waiting for us. While waiting for us, the driver had killed a fine buck, and after camping together that night—we had a feast of fat things in the morning: venison steak, after feeding a day or two on jerked beef, is savoury—very.

The mountains are changed in form, and constitute a remarkable feature of this region. They are circular, conical, smooth, oblong ridges with abrupt terminations, now undulating like the waves of the ocean—yonder towers one gray and venerable; while around, in a group, are several others of various attitudes and dimensions, all of one family—making you think of an old man and his household. There is one like a centre-table in a parlor, yonder is another, solitary and alone—he seems to have fallen out with him, and set up for himself—and presently you may see long smooth stretches of monotainous like a fortification with a grand old gateway in the centre opening to some feudal stronghold beyond; while, on every hand, there are towers, temples and domes—tumuli, pyramids, and monumental piles—you feel at last as if you were among the grand old relics of some primeval world.

On the 27th we reached Camp Stockton, better known, however, as "Comancho Springs." This is a new military post, located in an open plain, and as yet has the most extemporaneous arrangement for the accommodation of the soldiers. "Shanty" is the term employed in the East to express the lowest style of a human dwelling; but the stick affairs here are of a lower grade still—too low to be described. For the present, the place is called a camp. The men were busy, however, erecting houses—a sort of concrete, a cross between a stone building and an adobe. Water is abundant and very good; but the supply for fuel is a little curious, consisting almost entirely of the roots of the mezquit bushes. Strange to tell, these little dwarfish bushes have immense roots—exceeding in size and number those of many large trees.

The kindness of Lieuteonant Sherman and Mrs. S. I shall not soon forget. We dined with them, and in view of long abstinence, felt most pleasantly recruited.

Here we dropped some of our passengers; and, as the number left was too small for two stages, we were crowded into one. Six mules were hitched, and eight more were driven a-head. We had two out-riders—one to drive the loose train, and another to ride by the one in harness; the last was armed with a large whip, with which he kept the team excited. His blows were hearty and frequent. We traveled two hours, eight or ten miles an hour—stopped, and rested; changed teams, and proceeded in the same order.

At night we camped in as bleak a place as could well be found. The winds were fierce and cold. The nights contrast strangely with the days. The sun is tropically hot; but, when you lie down to sleep at night, an overcoat and two good blankets are no incumbrance.

We stopped at Barilla Springs for breakfast. Found there a large train of emigrants. Two ladies came down to the stage to talk with Mrs. P. The oldest said she was moving simply to follow her daughter; the daughter said she was following her husband. I inquired into their history a little. They had moved from Tennessee to Mississippi; then to Texas, now to California.

I said, "I suppose you will go next to the Sandwich Islands."

The young one replied, with some spirit, "If I ever get to California, you may bet your bottom dollar that I 'll never move again."

The emigration from Texas to California is very heavy. The Atlantic States yield thousands to Texas; and Texas, in her turn, sends them to the Pacific; and, to my astonishment, I find scores here about to come back to Texas. An American humanity is a restless one; most commonly, one move unsettles a man for life.

The mountains along here are wild and grand. I suspect they abound in iron ore. They will make you think of Balbec, Thebes, Palmyra or Tadmor in the wilderness—the silence, solitude and desolation of antiquity seem to brood over the scene. Fallen columns, demolished temples, towers in ruin, patches of old fortifications, palaces deserted, remnants of architectural grandeur still mouldering in sad decay. A thousand similitudes like these force themselves upon your fancy as you look out upon the fantastic shapes about you. The stillness is sepulchral. Solemnity steals over the mind. The rattling of the coach-wheels has an irreverent sound, which jars upon the feelings like laughter in a graveyard. All around is rugged, bleak desolation. Vegetation is dead, as if nature sympathized with the ruin of ages, and meant to add her spoils to the mournful pile.

Finally, we reached a spring called "Lympia," around it was a little verdure; and here, for the first time for a long while, we saw some deer and antelope. They had doubtless travelled to find water.

Here we enter into "Grand Pass," the only outlet through the rocky barriers of this melancholy region.

We got through as the sun was setting; and, on the right was a long broken ridge of mountains, with sharp rocks, shooting up like steeples and spires—and above were clouds, rolling and tossing with the wind—the reflected light likened them to smoke and flame, ascending from a city on fire. We thought of Moscow and the Kremlin. Thunder bellowed from the darkening sky—lightnings flashed—the wind blew a gale—and we thought a storm of rain was coming. A few random drops fell, and all but the wind was still. That raged on. We had reached Fort Davis, where we camped.

From Camp Stockton to Fort Davis is one hundred and twenty-five miles. The road is generally very fine, and the scenery grand. We passed a place called "Barrel Springs," and stopped to dine on a rocky hill, where the only fuel to be found was the trunk of a decayed cabbage-tree, otherwise known as Spanish Bayonet.

In the afternoon, we came to "Dead Man's Hole," a most revolting name for a spring of the best water on the route.

The mountains along here are lovely—live-oaks abound, and resemble an apple orchard in the order of their growth. Some of the mountains are naked, others are covered with dead grass, very yellow in the sunlight; others, spotted all over with these orchard-like trees. The vallies are poor generally, and naked. In them are to be found those curiosities of the West—"Dog-towns."

The prairie dog is a marvel in natural history. These little animals live in communities. They burrow in the ground, and a pile of dirt marks the mouth of every habitation. Some of them are mere villages, others may be classed as towns, and others as cities. Nothing but population, however, marks the difference. The architecture is all of one pattern.

The dog is about as large as a "fice" nine days old. To see one of them curl his tail over on his back and run for his hole, makes one think of "Tom Thumb" in regimentals. Bold and brave as he affects to be, he never barks till he gets home and feels secure of his retreat below. The sound of an intruding footstep brings every inhabitant to the door, and the chorus of barks is wonderful. A litter of a thousand hungry pups would resemble it very much. The towns in which they dwell are not laid off in lines, yet I noticed that their holes were about equi-distant every way. I presume they live on grass, at any rate where they are numerous no grass is left. The earth is naked as a highway.

The most remarkable fact about them remains to be stated. The rattle-snake, and a species of owl, (very much like the common screech-owl) dwell with the dogs. These all live together in peace and friendship. Of this there is no doubt—I saw the owls go in and come out; the snakes were lying by; neither seemed afraid of the other, and those who had dug down and made thorough examination—assured me that every house contained some of each.

One night we stopped to camp close by one of these towns—the passengers were spreading their blankets—when Bro. Simmons, whose legs are long, and served him well that time, leaped up and backwards, and cried out, "look there!" A rattlesnake in coil rung out his peculiar defiance and stood ready for battle. No sticks were near; a pistol was the only chance—it was too dark to "draw a bead" on him—but the second shot finished the campaign.

PUNSHON AND BARNUM.

It seems that Barnum has been making an offer to Punshon, the celebrated Wesleyan preacher in England. Referring to it the English correspondent of the Southern Advocate says:

"Strange as it may appear, your American Barnum has made Mr. Punshon a serious offer of £2000 a-year to accompany him to America, and to give lectures under Barnum's supervision. No one but Barnum would have had the impudence to have made an approach to Mr. Punshon of such an unhallowed kind. Mr. Punshon's reply consisted simply in writing Acts, xiii. 10, and sending it to Barnum. As some of our readers do not get time to read the Bible, we quote the passage: "'O, full of all subtlety and all mischief, thou child of the devil, thou enemy of all righteousness, wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord?'"

SLAVE MARRIAGES.

A VERY interesting report has just been submitted by the convention of the South Carolina Episcopal Church, in respect to the marriage of slaves. The following is the substance of the decision arrived at by the committee. The relation of husband and wife is declared to be of divine institution and to be equally binding on the slave as on the master. The injunction of the Saviour, forbidding the separation of husband and wife, is obligatory on the master, and every master should so regulate the disposal of the slave as not to infringe the divine injonction. Voluntary abandonment on the part of a married slave ought to come within the same rule as in the case of a free person; but when the abandonment is involuntary, and caused by circumstances without the control of the parties, the refusal to allow a second marriage would often produce much evil and hardship. The report makes the remarkable statement that there is no instance in South Carolina of a legal divorce.

LETTERS FROM THE ISLAND CITY. No. I.

Sick in New Orleans—Friends—Yellow Fever, figuratively Speaking—A Beautiful Vision of New Orleans Washed—"Missionary Matters"—French Negroes—Alligators—Spaniards and Frenchmen—The Future—Happy Mules—Railroad Traveling—In the Wrong Pew—Texian Conversation—Jay Cometh in the Morning.

ABOUT the 15th August I was in New Orleans; but, ill prepared to enjoy the beauties of that city, whatever they may be. The "harp of a thousand strings" seemed to have been jarred out of tune. I was altogether drooping. An uncomfortable fever was creeping over me. I make it a matter of principle to discourage all such acquaintances; but, though you may shake off a chill, a fever clings to you with the pertinacity of an Italian beggar; so, in spite of my wandering about the streets, going into shops—taking an ice-cream as if I were well—rambling among the ever-greens of Jackson Square, gazing upon the old hero doffing his cap with the politeness of a Frenchman, and upon his horse apparently frantic from the din of battle; in spite of my saying to my troublesome companion at every turn: "now you may go!" the hot hand was still upon my heart, and my limbs were aching from the grasp of the invisible spirit.

Not caring to keep up this "street fight" any longer, I retreated to my boarding-house, and went fairly to bed. Fortunately I was accompanied by a friend whose skill in nursing has always been to me an admiration and a wonder; so while she bathed my brow, as I lay in a large airy room looking out upon the waving green of the trees of La Fayette Square, I thought, "even if I should grow worse and die here, there are pleasant things about me."

Miss H.——— proposed that I should send for a physician; but as "a good physician," according to Jean Paul, "does not save one from death, but only from a bad physician," I declined, and in place thereof, sent a message to the Editor of the New Orleans Christian Advocate. It was not the first time that the thought had occurred to me: "how agreeable it would be to meet this Editor!" No second word was necessary. One may "conceal love or hate or ought" else, but the chivalry of the heart is sure to impress itself by action. In a few minutes the above named personage entered the room, accompanied by President Miller, of whom it may be said, as was said of Washington, that "his modesty equals his ability."

The Editor was introduced, and I perceived at once that I knew him, not then, only, but my acquaintance ran quite back to his boyhood, and it would have seemed untrue if one had said—"a moment ago, you were strangers." It is said of Zschokke that he possessed the power of looking into the faces of certain persons, and reading their whole past lives. This is the case, more or less, with all of us. There are certain persons with whom an acquaintance never seems to begin—it has always been. There are others to whom we may be introduced a thousand times, and yet we never get beyond the bare fact that that is Mr. Smith, or Mrs. Jones.

Well, I and this friend of mine talked somewhat. I fancy it can seldom be said of either of us, that "the lord of speech has been stricken silent within the ivory walls of his palace." In the meantime, what had become of the fever? It was gradually sneaking off—blushing.

In the evening, more bathing with German cologne, Bay rum, etc. etc., and a second kind visit from the Editor, who brought several Southern and New Orleans Advocates, quite routed the foe, from whom nothing has been heard from that time. If this case is considered of any importance to the science of medicine, the Medical Journal is quite at liberty to use it.

Early the next morning we left New Orleans for Berwick's Bay. As I had stood in the marshy grounds that surround Mobile, I had fancied the yellow fever as an immense behemoth, laving his sides in the oozy mud, until the fierce heat of summer drives him up, when he traverses the city, trampling under foot his terrified victims. There, in New Orleans, it presented itself under another form, and when I looked upon the dirty streets and gutters, and inhaled the morning air laden with the offensive odor, I imagined it a great serpent, crawling from the slime, and unfolding the city like a second Laocoon.

Carlyle says: "Every man cannot pray, but every man can wash," and seems to think that the outside purity would strike in. Perhaps if New Orleans were washed, and scoured, and rinsed, we should not hear so many distressing oaths upon the wharf. While we sat waiting for our baggage to be checked, it was most painful to listen to the conversation around us. Oaths that are wrung from the soul by overmastering passion are terrible; but to hear blasphemies glide from the tongue with a levity that betrays their habitual and daily use, fills the soul with emotions at once of horror and pity. I looked around me and thought: "what a work here for a missionary! How these poor souls, who perhaps seldom or never enter a Church, are crying from the midst of darkness for 'a light to spring up.'" I do not suppose that this feature of vice and ignorance is at all peculiar to New Orleans. It is found in every city. It appears as if great masses of human life always heat and vivify the eggs of the cockatrice that are hidden beneath. While we are striving by feeble and spasmodic efforts to recover heathendom to Christianity, immense land-slides from Christendom are engulfed. Another thing that we heard upon the wharf was more entertaining—little negro boys talking alternately French and English, and I could not help looking upon these young black-a-moors as very accomplished African gentlemen.

After a while we were crossing the river to the famous town of Algiers; and then we were rolling along the railroad, looking down into inaccessible swamps, imagining the myriads of living creatures by which they are inhabited, thinking of Stephens cutting his way through the forests of Central America to the wondrous ruins concealed within; and wondering if the Lady in Comus, herself, would not find some difficulty in making her way through these alligators and rattle-snakes. I tried very hard to accustom myself to the sight of the alligators. I counted nineteen and saw others that I did not count, but it requires an educated eye to enjoy them. The soil of these swamps, already so marvellously fruitful, will still be further enriched by the blood of these alligators, at least by their decaying bodies. I do most earnestly hope, however, that they will lay no claim to the land, hereafter, on that score. One can imagine the grave old Spaniards roving through these great American forests, suffering themselves, or inflicting torture, with equal immobility; with the same fanatical power confessing their sins, and applying fire and faggot to convince the Indian of the truth and beauty of the Christian religion; but it is a curious and irreconcilable thought—the Frenchman, so far from his dear Paris, rowing along these bayous, wading through these pools, muddying his dainty boots, soiling his delicate hands, shooting "one grand monster—horrible! very!" with no intense passion for gold, nor gloomy nor elevated feeling of devotion such as sustains the Spaniard. This is true; but the reckless gayety and levity of his nature keeps him floating, and the sight of a pretty Indian squaw, or a bird-supper, which he knows particularly well how to cook, is an immense consolation to him. The admiration, too, which excites among the savages, goes for something.

These dreamings were excited by the French and Spanish names that one occasionally meets with in going from New Orleans to Brashear city. From the past I turned my thoughts to the future, and I imagined the whole country cleared, the swamps drained, the race of alligators extinct, the various interesting tribes of snakes passed away, and the sugar cane waving all over the landscape as it now waves in occasional fields, towns spreading over the plain, and white cottages peeping from the midst of fruit-trees. Some spots of cultivation here and there, prophesy what its future will be. I was amused as we passed one field to see the air of complacence with which some fat mules were grazing. As they looked carelessly at us they seemed to say by their manner: "Go on with your rail-roads! so much the better for us!"

This rail-road traveling was delightful, but "the end lay over in my thought"—the glassy rolling waves, the tossing boat, the giddy horrible sickness that makes you doubt your own identity and feel as if you were a miserable somebody else. But the end of the road must come; and come it did. I was very much disinclined to get out, and inquired if there was no possibility of going further, but a lady politely informed me that that was the absolute terminus; so we left the cars. We had taken in New Orleans through tickets to Galveston, and as we were directed to walk straight forward to the steamship, we rushed on, looking neither to the right nor the left until we found ourselves in the cabin of a steamer. I turned to a servant and said: "Our rooms are thirty-one and thirty-two—where shall we find them?" He replied, "you are mistaken Madam; I suppose you go on the steamship to Galveston?" "Certainly!" "Well this is not it, this goes———." I waited no further. If like John Gilpin we had "got up in haste" we "soon got down again," and then we rushed still more earnestly toward the steamship. We were in very good time. And now of what interest can a voyage without incident be to you? If we had met with an accident such as overtook the unfortunate steamer some two years since, and we had been kept floating in the water to the very last point of exhaustion, doing some wonderful feat, or saving two or three lives that would have been lost without us, that would have been something; but then, on the other hand, if we had been drowned, you would have had no letter, and our drowning, although it might have been a little matter to the world, "would have been a sair loss to us." So let us be content to glide along, and in the meantime, we will make some overtures toward an acquaintance with some Texians whom we see on board. I make some remarks to the ladies, which I do not consider either very striking or original; and they seem quite to agree with me in this estimate of my conversational talent, as displayed on this occasion. We relapse into silence, or rather there is a non-intercourse law established between the two parties. They, the Texians, talk among themselves in a very sprightly social fashion. Their manners are free, unconventional, independent; they seem to say to you: "If I find it agreeable I will cultivate your acquaintance; and if not, I shall give myself no concern about you. From their conversation you gather that "you are going to the very finest country in the world—if you appreciate it, well, if not, go back whence you came."

"On the smooth surface of a summer sea;"

I listened attentively to their conversation, as I wished to gather what facts I could respecting Texas. I learned that they had frequent droughts—but what of that? an overcrop was as bad as two small a crop. I learned that they found more vegetables and fruits and perhaps more conveniences in the Eastern States than in Texas, but what was that compared to health? I learned that each individual person, though residing in different portions of Texas, lived in the very best part of the finest State in the Union. I learned that people living in Texas would not live any where else, if a home were given to them; and that a man convicted of acting meanly in Texas was forthwith ordered off the premises, and drive clear beyond the influence of the light of "the lone star." All this was highly satisfactory and gratifying.

One very pleasant looking gentleman was finding fault decidedly with the St. Nicholas in New York, as not chiming with his Texian notions, and I could very well sympathize with him. He said: "They give you but one thing at a time, and if you don't choose to eat that, still you must wait until those have eaten it who do choose it; and if you lay down your knife and fork a single second, one of those fellows steps up and grabs it, taking it for granted you have done; and at whatever time you may finish a meal you are obliged to wait till every body else finishes—why, one day, they kept me eating dinner there three hours!" Rather a fearful undertaking!

I must have been remarkably stupid, for I soon sent Miss H. to her berth with a headache. Then I sat alone and silent looking at the sea. After awhile one of the ladies took pity upon me, and with my little girl as a medium, we soon entered into conversation. I found her very agreeable, and not that only, but I learned that she was a relation of a friend of mine. The sea grew a little rougher, we took tea, went to our rooms and lay all night,

"Rocked on the billows of the rolling deep."

But it is morning; we are at the Island city; Mr. Cross is saying "how are you;" so Mr. Editor, you will please excuse me, I will take my leave. Kindly.

JANE T. H. CROSS.

LETTER FROM SHANGHAI, CHINA.

MR. EDITOR: After a delay of some six weeks I again pen a few lines to you. You may not find anything in my communications that would be at all interesting, having to speak so often of the same thing; yet it is, as much as anything else, to let you, our dear brethren, know, that we are still alive and enjoying the mercies and loving kindness of our God, and kind benefactor.

I have recovered from the severe illness of last fall, and it has pleased my kind Heavenly Father to permit me again to engage in active labor for my Master. How deeply humble such unspeakably great mercies should make us. I do feel, since passing through such trials, that I could love God more, and consecrate myself more unreservedly to Him and to His service. Not only that I myself was restored to wonted health, but my dear little babe, whom we nursed for days and nights, expecting to see her breath her last, has been given back to us in perfect health.

No one but a father or mother can know the anguish and deep sorrow of that hour. We both felt resigned to the will of God. We give our children to God, and daily pray that they may be made instruments in His hand in doing good unto others.

Our hearts are greatly cheered by the prospect of having a re-inforcement. May the Lord be with them on the great deep, and bring them in safety to this place. May the Lord put it into the hearts of others to come. We need many good, zealous and holy men, to preach the gospel to the Chinese. It must be proven by our example as well as our preaching that the religion we possess is a holy one. The Chinese are close, very close observers, and always judge by the actions and lips of a man, and not by the doctrine he preaches. It would be advisable for all our missionary brethren, before coming to China, to be well vaccinated. Though one has been in youth, it is best to be sure that it was not spurious. We are subject to this terrible disease, small-pox, every day more or less while we remain in China. One of our dear missionary brethren, of the Presbyterian Mission, died in Ningpo, and one here not many days since, of that disease.

The glorious work of God, still goes on. We are encouraged on every hand by the reports reaching us from our missionary brethren at Ningpo, Fen-chau and Canton. We are greatly encouraged in Shanghai. Our congregations are good and very attentive; but what encourages us most is, to see our native members being revived and feeling a deep interest in the salvation of souls, and the coming of Christ's kingdom on earth. The moving seems to be simultaneous with the moving of other places; and they go forth among their fellowmen more boldly, and preach unto them the unsearchable riches of the gospel. It is certainly a cause of rejoicing and devout thanksgiving to God. And let us pray God that this state of things may continue.

I have been into the country a number of times, preaching, and at several places I have the promise of houses in which to preach, as soon as the treaty goes into effect in the latter part of this month.

The three foreign treaty powers leave Shanghai to-day, for Peking. The English have some fifteen or twenty men-of-war. Some have already sailed for the Gulf of Pichili, and will rendezvous near the mouth of Pei-ho. The English have two hundred Coolies, to bear their cannon overland to the metropolis, if necessary. The American Minister, Ward, has two men-of-war at his service.

The Chinese are reported to be very busy, building new forts all along the river Pei-ho, every four miles, up to the capital.

Mr. Harris, our Consul to Japan, is now at Shanghai; and will proceed to Japan in a few days, in the steamer Mississippi. The treaty is to be ratified by the Emperor of Japan, and is to take effect from the fourth day of July. They are very suspicious of foreigners. But one good trait in their character is, they are very fond of the arts and sciences; and many are engaged in learning the English language. J. W. LAMBUTH.

A CHINESE TRACT.

AN EXHORTATION NOT TO KILL CATTLE.

The Yung-Tsuk-Vung, or the Good Precept Book says: All persons who do not eat the flesh of cattle and dogs, can escape prison and pestilence. The Kung-kukor or Book of Merits and Demerits, says: exhort one man not to eat the ox, and he shall be rewarded tenfold; exhort a family at all times not to eat the flesh of the ox, and he shall be rewarded an hundred-fold; exhort a whole village not to eat the flesh of the ox, and he shall be rewarded without measure. Therefore, all butchers are exhorted to repent of their wrong and to follow a new business, like other shop-keepers: they shall thereby escape all calamity, and happiness and age shall be added unto him. Those who thus repent shall have their sins wiped away—it shall be remembered as a great merit.

This is written, to pray you, good and holy men, continually to exhort each other to cast off this vice; you can thus also escape calamity—and thus adopt a good and holy precept.

I. I take these words, and exhort all villagers and people not to lead cattle to the place where they are sold and butchered. Weary of cultivating the soil, his strength is gone. Why should you, when he is old and diseased, butcher him?

II. I take the words, and exhort all villagers and people. Cattle generate and bring great gain to you. How heart-reading it is to butcher a cow, when she is greatly distressed and miserable even to the shedding of tears.

III. I take these words, and exhort all villagers and people: that the ox bears your burden, by pulling the water-carriage night and morning—thus he suffers; and yearly performs the same task, until the rice cometh to perfection.

IV. I use these words to exhort all villagers and people: the ox beareth the burden of man in cultivating the earth, and is miserable; having used him to plow the fields you also wish to eat his flesh. Let me ask you how you can lift up your heart to the firmament above.

V. I use these words to exhort all villagers and people: that you should not take the flesh of the ox, and say it is good food; do not say that it adds to your strength. If you make the heart bad, your entrails will soon be destroyed.

VI. I use these words to exhort all villagers and people: if you still will persist in eating the flesh of the ox that cultivates the soil, you violate the law. What kind of man are you, and what happiness do you possess, that you dare take the offering made to holy men and to heaven?

VII. I use these words, and exhort you, villagers and people: pestilence will come upon every one, and you cannot prevent it; only those who repent of killing and eating cattle shall escape misery and pestilence.

VIII. I use these words to exhort all villagers and people to be merciful and kind, that you may receive a great reward. Be true to the Emperor; honor thy father and mother; love everything; eat not the ox which cultivates the earth, and you will bring protection and peace to your family.

This is a Chinese Tract, which I received yesterday from a Chinaman, who preaches daily the doctrine of the sages of China. He is supported by the government. It is in opposition to the doctrine we preach. I know the man well. He was once a teacher in Mrs. Lambuth's school; and did at one time apply for membership into the Church. But for his opium-smoking, more notice would have been taken of him. He is verily convinced of the truth of Christianity, but poverty and opium-smoking brought him where he is.

LETTER FROM CATARACT-HOUSE, NIAGARA FALLS.

Lake Champlain—Green Mountains—St. Lawrence—Thousand Islands—Lake Ontario—Toronto—Suspension bridge—Gen. Rock—The Falls—Devil's-hole—Table Rock-house—Maid of the Mist—Cave of the Winds.

MR. EDITOR: Leaving the White Mountains we proceeded by stage and sails and boat to Ogdensburgh, N. Y. On the route we had a fine view of Lake Champlain, the Green Mountains, and the cities of Montpelier and Burlington, Vt. Ogdensburgh is situated on that grandest of all Northern rivers, the St. Lawrence. At this point we took a boat for Niagara Falls. We passed the celebrated "Thousand Islands" by day light, and were fascinated with their variegated scenery. They are pearls upon the necklace of the St. Lawrence, and seem to have been dropped upon the bosom of its placid waters by the Almighty to command the admiration of his creatures and thereby to furnish them with a high entertainment. The emerald, the bespangled banks, the shade and the sunlight, the rich odors from a million flowers, and the soft zephyrs from the lake—all conspire to make one's fancy regard them more like paradisiacal isles—the home of angels or fairies, than anything native to this fallen sphere of ours.

About sunset we reached the head of the St. Lawrence, and Lake Ontario lay like a sheet of silver before us. The night was passed in quiet slumber upon the lake.

Soon after breakfast we reached Toronto, a city of 50,000 inhabitants—the Capital of the Canadas.

It is a beautiful place, and no mean jewel in Albion's crown. The Parliament House, Osgood Hall, three college edifices, and a Crystal Palace—are all handsome structures. Here we first saw the formalities of a custom-house officer inspecting the baggage of those who landed.

Leaving Toronto, we reached the mouth of Niagara river about noon. Fort Niagara commands the mouth on the American side, and Fort Massasanga on the Canada side. A short distance above are the ruins of Fort George, which was captured by the Americans in 1813—which the British afterwards destroyed.

At Lewiston we disembarked and proceeded to the Falls by rail-road. There is a suspension bridge, in length 1045 feet, supported by ten wire cables.

Opposite Lewiston is Queenstown, memorable for the battle of 1812, fought upon the contiguous heights. On the heights stands, in solitary grandeur, Brock's monument—surmounted by a statue of the gallant general, whose chivalry it commemorates.

Sir Isaac Brock fell in the bloody battle fought on the heights on the 13th of October, 1812. His remains sleep beneath this noble column. The monument is of freestone, and is a fluted Corinthian column, 185 feet high.

Passing from Lewiston to the falls, the cars run along the edge of the frightful precipice of Niagara river. Soon, however, we were safely ensconced at that prince of hotels, the "Cataract House."

In the afternoon we took a stroll to Iris Island, which lies defiantly between the Horse-shoe and American Falls. It was a lovely Sabbath evening. What better place than this for reverential meditations upon Him who bade

"The flood to chronicle the ages back,
And notch the centuries in the eternal rocks!"

Here one hears the grandest oratorio on the omnipotence of God, chanted by "the sound of many waters." Here he learns of the infinite research of that Almighty mind that hath hung Niagara with a thousand wonders of the sublime and beautiful.

We stood upon the tower that commands a view of the Canada falls; the sun was shining most brilliantly, and the whole mass of falling water seemed like one vast shower of massive gems. Three gorgeous rainbows spanned the awful front—and the whole of the dashing spray was as variegated as mother-of-pearl. A Milton's imagery only befits such a scene. We dare not trust our pen upon its grandeur.

The sun had set when we walked slowly back to the Cataract House, awed and subdued by the matchless wonder upon which we had just gazed.

On Monday we took a carriage and visited, alternately, the "Devil's-hole," "the Whirlpool," the "Suspension-bridge," "Lundy's-lane," "Bloodin's rope," "the Burning-springs"—which compose the surroundings of Niagara.

The Devil's-hole is a gloomy chasm in the bank of the river, and has a historical interest from the fact that over this dark precipice the Seneca Indians, under the pay of the French, in 1763, drove a detachment, 100 strong, of the British army. But two men escaped.

The whirlpool is caused by an abrupt turn in the river, which gives the dashing waters a rotary motion.

The Suspension-bridge is the grandest structure of the kind in the world. The story that has been going the rounds of the papers—affirming its instability, is a fabrication.

The length of this bridge is 800 feet; width, 24 feet; height above the river, 250 feet. There are four massive wire cables of about 10 inches in diameter, which contain 4000 miles of wire; and the aggregate capacity of the whole structure is 12,500 tons. The heaviest freight-trains pass over it without producing any vibration; and the structure is regarded as entirely safe for the purposes for which it is used. Under the rail-road track is a double carriage-way and foot-walk. Crossing this bridge we proceeded to the "Table-Rock house," from the observatory of which the best view is obtained of the falls. At one glance the eye takes in the rushing rapids, the American, Middle and Horse-shoe falls, the boiling cauldrons beneath, and the dancing little steamer ——"Maid of the Mist." The whole scene is not to be surpassed; and he must be phlegmatic indeed who can look upon it without a full soul of admiration.

After feasting our vision on the grandeur of this unequalled view, we drove to Lundy's-lane, where the great battle between the Americans and British was fought on the 25th of July, 1814. It was in this engagement that General Scott received a wound, and won laurels for himself which he wears proudly to this day.

The Burning-spring is a curiosity. The water is charged with sulphureted hydrogen gas, and when a taper is applied, burns for a short time with a pale, bluish flame. It is, however, hardly worth a visit.

Having returned to the hotel—we afterwards made a trip on the "Maid of the Mist," and from the deck of this fairy steamer gazed once more on the awful cataract. She plunges into the depths of the mist and spray, rises upon the turbid waters of the cauldron, and, after a sublime baptism, emerges from the turmoil, and "walks the waters like a thing of life"—back to her pier.

We made an excursion into the "Cave of the Winds." It is under the middle fall, between Goat and Luna Islands. It is 100 feet wide, 150 high, and 33 feet deep. The front is hung with the ever-varying drapery of a curtain of falling water. Here is the only place in the world where it is known that the rainbow describes a complete circle.

In consequence of the pressure on the atmosphere, caused by the plunging water, the cavern is ever the home of the storm, which perpetually shrieks like a million of lost spirits.

There are many things to interest a visitor to the falls—and no one who has a spark of appreciation of the sublime in nature, can go there and come away with a feeling of disappointment.

We had intended to write something with regard to the geology of the Falls, with which we were considerably interested, but the letter is already long—so we close.

NG THE PREACHERS.

FIRST PAPER.

WILLIAM ARCHER BUTLER.

Thanks to the press for this table-full of blessings—the best of blessings in the best of books—good Sermons!

And now, as we scan that exclamatory sentence, looking as if it befitted the mouth of some speaker rather better than the pen of an after-dinner writer, we wonder if there is not a spice of intrusive affectation in the honest utterance. People who write or speak much are pretty sure to indulge at times in a little affectation, and, all unaware to themselves, fall into the private luxury of over-stating their thoughts, so, perchance, as to give them the ring rhetorical. But after a glance-review, we re-assert our introductory; and, indeed, if we were speaking it, doubtless, assurance being now confirmed, we should open our mouths still wider and give a more emphatic delivery to our honest thankfulness.

Thanks, then, for this table-full of blessings! Here are William Archer Butler, Dr. Guthrie, Dean Trench, Dr. Arnold, Dr. Wayland, Krummacher and Thoinck, Robertson, and others. We have heard feasts described as spread on tables that groaned beneath their loads. And we have known of groaning on the part of persons after leaving such tables; but our table never groans with books, nor do we ever make sounds unmusical after a repast on their dainties.

The next best thing to a Sermon from the Pulpit is a Sermon from the Press—provided it is verily a Sermon. And in many instances we are debtors to the Press far more than to the Pulpit, seeing that preachers, whom we have never seen or heard—never can see or hear—are thus brought to our houses, and gently deliver sweet and ... or stern and solemn messages to our listening souls. "Gently deliver;" yes, in our quiet library, or beneath summer trees, when the leaves rustle an accompaniment to the musical march of words, how serenely these printed orators glide into our open hearts! "Listening souls;" exactly so—they are better than listening ears, for depth of growth and profound meditation.

WILLIAM ARCHER BUTLER died when he was but thirty-four years of age. But he left several volumes to prolong his existence, and in them he will outlive Methuselah. And what a pleasant way this is to live? All the blessedness of living, without one of its hardships or struggles or sorrows—no grey hairs—no wrinkled skin—no hungry ... to provide for—no spectacles to rub. Instead thereof, the perpetual bliss of fresh and free young manhood—honors secure—preaching on and ever without the labors of preparation and the sore travail of thought. Books are not the urns in which the ashes of dead brains are gathered, but books are a translated life: lifting the burdened spirit above the encumbrances of dull matter and yielding to it the first installment of immortal prerogatives.

But, back to W. A. Butler. A noble young man he was, possessing all the keen insight of genius, and therewith, too, its broad outward range of eye, that so promptly, so easily, detects the shadows of great truths lurking in the facts and forms of visible nature. His was a poetic mind—God's rare gift, and if consecrated, one of His best gifts. His, too, was a philosophic mind, capable of minute analysis, and delighting in that abstraction which disentangles truth from accident or circumstance to give it freedom. Butler was learned for his years, especially in Philosophy, but his erudition blended with his nature, and only served to give a steady action to its ... faculties. The acquirements of scholars often suggest the idea of a heavy burden they are bearing, and you sometimes wish that they were lightened of their load for the sake of more elastic motions. But Butler was "vital in every part." Muscle and nerve were full of electric fire, and learning fused and flowed in that reducing heat. The native dignity of his intellect never turns a cold and repulsive side toward you—never retreats to remote heights for distant admiration—but keeps in close companionship and shares a friendly hour most socially with your sympathies. A broad, generous, catholic thinker, he never reminds you of the intellectual bigot, who recognizes no facts but his facts, no ... but his selfishness, no paradise but his flower-garden. The open world, where others walk and breathe—the open heavens of God, great enough for thousands of orbs to revolve in and yet keep aloof from collision—the open spaces of an open universe—are his gladdest realm, and amid its wonders, signs, and glories, he has the unrestrained movement of one born to a freeman's privilege of thought and utterance, and too lofty to abate this privilege in others.

We like Mr. Butler greatly, very greatly. He writes well of Bacon. He writes still better of Plato. The ingenious and comprehensive spirit of Philosophy animates and permeates his discourses and lectures. At times, he is somewhat circuitous. But he generally manages to reach the centre of his subject in due time, and to afford you the marrow of thought before he releases his grasp. The best attributes of his great intellect appear in his sermons—where, of course, preacher as he was, they ought to appear.

The distinctive merit of these sermons is, that, abounding with noble thoughts, striking illustrations, and bold points, they yet read as if they were preached to you. They have a certain ease and strength of movement, a finest freedom, an unencumbered sweep, that come home to you with a speaking grace most welcome and vividly refreshing. To keep a written sermon on its own ground, to separate it from the associations of the essay and the discussion, is no facile task. But Mr. Butler succeeds in it better than usual, for his sermons have much of the speaking spirit in them. They are peculiarly characterized by manliness, by decision of view and directness of purpose, by a soldier-like force that impresses us with the presence of earnestness and aim. Then, too, they are spiritual and devotional. The import of the Gospel is never lost sight of, and Mr. Butler's own sense of the transcendent solemnity of these doctrines—his own heart-felt convictions of their awful reality—are never wanting to lend impressiveness to the utterance.

We select many things from the discourses to ... remarks, but we have space only for a few instances, is finely said:

... desert the homely familiarities of life, it ... into cataclysm; persons of warm fancies ... by doing so; and we know how such perils ... is ... maintained as long as the ... of daily ... forgotten; but one ... of the natural world destroys all the ..., preserves the wings of fancy; it is—to use a ... metaphor—the jet of cold water, ... condenses all the evaporation. But the Apostles, in their hours of brightest thought, are at home among the minutest concerns of common life; they accompany us into every recess of domestic duty; their 'bread of life' is daily bread;' and perhaps they are never more truly elevated than when they discourse of the humblest topics of the Christian's household. The lark, when half hidden in the clouds, can discern the minutest speck among the grass and flowers; the spirit of Paul and John could look forth from its place of repose in heaven to see only the more distinctly every affection and duty and relationship that belongs to the lowliest earthly state."

Very charming is that train of thought, even as forcible rhetoric, but there is soul-speakingness in every word. To carry high sentiments into the dusty arena of life—to come down from our lofty elevations and yet retain the purity and etherialness of that upper region—this is no child's play—no holyday task. Jesus descended from the Mount of Transfiguration, went about his daily work, and was Jesus still. But we—alas for the sudden fall!

Speaking of "harsh and unpractical controversies" about certain passages of Scripture, he remarks: "these are as insects, that ever select the ripest fruit in the Eden of God to fasten on and to corrode." Here, too, is a strong thought: "Mysterious as is the oneness of the Father and the Son, it is not one whit more mysterious than the oneness of the regenerate spirit of man with the same God in Christ Jesus." Here is also something for study: "As there is no other channel to God but Christ Jesus, so there is no other beginning or termination to the work of Christ Jesus but God. * * * It would appear that, as regards the work of grace, God sees nothing from His Throne but Christ Jesus alone and altogether; as if all else was covered with clouds and darkness impenetrable to the eye of divine love." Farther on in the same sermon, we have this: "The mercies, whatever they be, that stretch beyond the Church in the scheme of grace, are but the diffusive blessings that spread around this mystical Body, even as the hem of His garment had healing virtue of old; they are still given to glorify Him and as appendages of His royalty." We like the matter and manner of this: "All this is mysterious, indeed; of course, it is: who is he that will believe God made one with man, and have the union wrought without mystery? Children of the living God! ye walk in mystery. Your spiritual birth is a mystery—your fellowship with Christ is a mystery—your daily graces are a mystery—your triumph and death are a mystery—your resurrection to glory will be but the consummation of mystery. Mystery there must be wherever an infinite Creator and his finite creature embrace; and it is, therefore, your glory, that you are thus robed and shrouded in mystery. Trust no one who would draw you forth from it; it is the awful shadow which eternity casts across time."

A critical reader cannot fail to discover in these selections, made half at random, so as to give an average specimen of thought and style, those minor indications of genius, which, in all the works of master minds, meet us unexpectedly at every turn. Felicitous forms of language, sudden glimpses into vistas of beauty, new uses of old images, constantly occur in these sermons, and they afford us perhaps a better view of the habitual strength of the author's mind than the more elaborate efforts. It is characteristic of genius to show its seeing eye, its susceptible heart, in familiar things. A word, a phrase, an original collocation of terms, the picturesque force of a single epithet, often reveals the most striking power. Thus Ruskin, describing the fall of Schaffhausen: "Watch how the vault of water first bends unbroken in pure, polished velocity." The adjective "polished" is a description in itself. Mr. Butler abounds in these verbal pictures. And they add great impressiveness to his style. For if it is the office of genius to lift up those grander forms of thought, that like mountain ranges mark off the boundaries of the province of mind, it is equally its office to disclose the beauty that might otherwise lie concealed in humble objects.

We have annexed a short sermon in a paragraph: "Men from deep places can see the stars at noon-day; and from the utter depths of her self-abasement, the Syro-Phœnician woman catches the whole blessed mystery of Heaven; like St. Paul's Christian," "in having nothing, she possesses all things." No humility is perfect and proportioned but that which makes us hate ourselves as corrupt, but respect ourselves as immortal; the humility that kneels in the dust, but gazes on the skies."

When we consider that these discourses were mainly written before Mr. Butler was twenty-eight years of age; when we take into the account that his time was much occupied with his duties as professor of moral philosophy in the University of Dublin; when, above all, we remember how devoted he was to pastoral work, finding his chosen pleasures in the cottages of the poor, and amid services that men of scholarship and taste are too prone to dislike and neglect; we confess to the enjoyment of no ordinary gratification in the study of these earnest and eloquent memorials of a life alike noble in thought and action, alike elevated in lowly duties and in the higher walks of contemplation. A genuine Christian man, who takes a just view of his position and accountability, will hold genius, if endowed with its sublime attributes, as he holds all other talents, simply and sacredly as a means with which to glorify God, in any and every way that God can be glorified. Books will not absorb his time. Literature will never engross his faculties. Intellect will subserve spirituality, and both will be agencies of usefulness. How admirably Wordsworth expresses this sentiment in his Sonnet on Milton:

"Thou hadst a voice whose sound was like the sea;
Pure as the naked heaven, majestic, free;
Yet didst thou travel on life's common way
In cheerful godliness; and yet thy heart
The lowliest duties on herself did lay."

PARSONAGE-BUILDING.

PARSONAGE BUILDING is becoming the fashion among the Methodists of the South. From all parts of our circulation, and through the other Advocates, we hear of new parsonages going up. The Methodists of Montgomery, Alabama, have just completed and furnished an elegant and commodious brick parsonage. There are two fine ones in Mobile. "So mote it be Amen,!" Let this repentance and reformation be thorough and general. Not only are parsonages being built, of the usual style, but houses suitable for the homes of ladies and gentlemen. This is a good "sign of the times" as to the personal and social estimation in which Methodists begin to hold their ministers and their families.

There is a great change in the style of the architecture of parsonages. We have recently heard of the "Municipal" style, as applied to public buildings, erected at the public expense, by official contractors—proverbially economical of the "people's money!" As to the old style of architecture of Methodist parsonages, we hardly know how to christen it. We hardly know whether to call it the Itinerant or the Connectional, the Procrustean or the Pickwickian, the Praise God-Bare-Bones or the Piney-Woods style. As most comprehensively suggestive, and as most touchingly true to history, however, whether considered peculiarly, circumstantially, psychologically, religiously, or experimentally, we conclude to designate it as the Hard-Times style.

Venerable old style! It has many touching memories and associations. The dear old decaying clap-boards and shingles and eaves, and venerable mouldy floors, and humbly locliving fences, and mournfully complaining gates; and one-armed and half-bottomed chairs, and second hand sofas, and tables, and bureaus, and beds, and crockery, and carpets; with a Committee of sisters of Charity to make inquisition for "the things that remain," just before an affectionate farewell to the retiring preacher and his wife; piously mistaking the tears of the latter, wrung from hurt sensibility, for tears of grief at parting. Farewell, dear old style! "There's a better day a-coming."

WORKING IN THE "NEW-GROUND."

IN A PREVIOUS issue, we called attention to the fact that it was the duty of the Church, in view of her extending opportunities of usefulness, to train her members to consecrate their property to God. We consider this one of her greatest and most solemn offices at the present period, the more so because the moral power of this doctrine, viz.: the consecration of business to God is not now sufficiently recognized and felt to raise the membership of the Church to its proper position as the spiritual body of Christ; nor is it adequate, as now believed, and practiced to furnish the material means for the Church to do her work. To arouse the conscience of her people in this particular, and indeed to form a conscience as to this peculiar duty, this is emphatically the most important thing which the Church has just now to effect. If our members would live to God in their business; if amid the ceaseless outgoings of their energies and enterprise there were the same earnest outgoings of prayer and praise; if men would acquire and use their property to glorify Christ in their families and then in the Church; surely, there would be such an increase of vital power in the Church as has not yet been witnessed. The triumph of the Church, in this respect, has come. Wealth is enriching her membership. Unprecedented prosperity is attending their exertions; and it remains to be seen whether the spiritual feelings of the Church, quickened and developed to meet this new order of events, will equal the claims of the day or sink still more deeply into the abyss of selfishness and worldly ambition. One of these results must follow. The amazing prosperity of our brethren in their earthly affairs must either augment the spiritual efficiency of the Church, or it must impair its usefulness and darken its glory. Hence, we urge that the work of the Church is to cultivate the conscience of her members in respect to the vital truth, that property belongs to God and cannot be religiously used except to glorify Him in the advancement of his work.

But the Church is also called to another task of vast moment, viz: the formation of a right sentiment as to her influence in literature and education. Her members are to be instructed in the truth, that Providence has strangely set this open door before her and called her to enter earnestly on this work. The time has come for Christianity to assert its sovereignty over the thought, the taste, the culture of the world; and we have reached that point in civilization at which art and science must become instruments of powerful service to the Church, or a serious injury to its progress and influence. But if Christianity is to permeate literature and education, it is not an abstract and intangible Christianity, but Christianity in the Church. In brief, the agency of Christianity will be felt and only felt through the medium of the Church. The only hope of Christianizing literature and education is by means of the Church; and hence, if the Church fail, all must fail.

Now we know that this is ground which some will not accept. Good men are sometimes found who have dim and misty ideas about the influence of Christianity as an influence distinct and separate from the Church. And in a certain sense, they are right. Many opinions are developed, many sentiments are sent abroad, many modes of influence are generated and kept in living activity, that operate outside of the Church, and never assume Church-aspects. Nevertheless, the Church is their source, or rather, the medium of their development, for through her Christianity has brought them to act on society. What we contend for is this, viz: the true formative power of all public opinion on moral and religious interests is lodged in the Church. And therefore we insist, that if literature and education are christianized, it must be accomplished through the intelligence and zeal of Christ's Church.

To this special activity God is now directing the hearts of His people. A wide-spread feeling is awaking, that the Church cannot fulfill her destiny in the pulpit—cannot preach the gospel—cannot save souls—as that destiny in the pulpit ought to be fulfilled, as that gospel ought to be preached and souls to be saved—unless she come into closer and dearer relations to the intellect and heart of the world. Literature and education, sanctified by the presence of religious truth and life, are often God's chosen means to convert and save. But if they were not, they certainly put the human mind in a much better position, where they are properly used, for the gospel to reach its judgment and nonscience. Nothing is more certain to us than that at every advance on this field, the Church augments her spirituality. The reflex influence on her own intellect and sensibilities is most apparent, while the positive good effected in external forms is too obvious to need any argument.

Here then, is another work for the Church, viz: to train the mind of her membership to estimate their solemn responsibilities as holding in trust for God the intellect of the world. Never before has the Church had such an opportunity to organize her immense energies in behalf of this work. All that is wanting is the spirit to see God's tokens—to read His signs—and to come bravely up to the measure and meaning of the occasion. And let us be assured that the more we effect for literature and education, the more clearly we shall realize the hand of God in our exertions. Doing is essential to perfect believing. If we will not do God's work, we shall not know it as God's work. But if we enter humbly and trustfully on its duties, we shall soon have a brighter and broader light; and in the work, Christ will commune with our souls and reveal to us the most ravishing blessedness of His presence and peace.

EDITORIAL MEMORIES.

CARROLLTON, Carroll county, Ga., as we learn by private correspondence, is considerably stirred by the prospect of being the crossing-point of two railroads—one from Atlanta, Ga., to Talladega, Ala., another from Griffin, Ga., to Decatur, Ala.

So be it. Blessings on "old Carroll!" It was the home of our infancy and youth. Before the county had a name—when it was the "Creek Indian Nation"—with but a few scattering white families, and hundreds upon hundreds of Indians—the present writer, a "wee toddling" boy of four or five years, with his father's family and others, crossed the Chattahoochee river in a canoe, and took up a home in the wilderness. The father of our present correspondent was then also but a child. The country was wild, as wild as the region of Plymouth Rock or Jamestown when first settled. The danger of the tomahawk and scalping-knife was a matter of daily contemplation and nightly dream.

While brave and hardy men went forth to fell the grand old forests and to plough the virgin soil, tender and trusting women kept their children within the rude log-cabin doors, fearing danger, and cooked the homely meal, or made music in the deep solitudes by plying the "Georgia Piana" of those days—the dear old spinning wheel. The sound rings in our ears yet. Many a substantial "suit" have we worn, fabricated from the raw cotton—carded, spun, woven, cut, and made at home, before "factory thread" was ever heard of in those primitive regions.

O the memories of those days! Little as is thought of it, there is an incalculable value in the culture received from an early life spent in the backwoods and on the frontier. Nature, in all her primeval proportions and pristine freshness, unmarred and unpoisoned, leaves pictures upon the memory and influences upon the character, which time can never destroy. Broad and brawny shoulders, frank and generous natures, strong and brave wills, are developed in the wilds and woods. There are disadvantages in an early life thus circumstanced, but, in God's grand economy of compensations, there are many and precious advantages.

A better and more profitable class of men and women were never seen upon the soil of this country, than the hardy and virtuous pioneers of Western Georgia and Eastern Alabama. Many of the gray-headed sires and matrons of those old frontier families still live in a green and happy old age. The first Christian missionary that ever penetrated those wilds, and lifted up his voice for God to the scattered dwellers in those forest solitudes, (Rev. Willis D. Matthews,) is now Presiding Elder of the Talladega district, Alabama Conference. And many other preachers of that day still remain among us.

But most of the men and women of those rude days and countries now sleep in graves made in the wilderness. Their children and children's children, are scattered from Georgia to Texas. Many of them were faithful to God, and shall stand in their lot at the end of the days. The memory of their piety, and of their ringing hymns, and vniceful prayers, and glad shouts, is pleasant and precious. What grand sermons, and glorious music, under hush-shelters, from preachers and singers in home-spun clothes, which the great world of the present day has not heard surpassed! Many of those texts, and "points," and hymns, we still, and shall always, remember.

HYMNS IN THE FAMILY.

THE celebrated Snethen, one of the greatest and best of men, whom Bishop Asbury used to designate as the "Silver Trumpet," once remarked to a friend of ours, that Methodists learned much of their Scriptural Theology by means of Hymns.

Speaking of the first great revival which Methodism effected in this country, he was accustomed to call it the "Singing Revival." The power of Hymns in promoting the spirituality of congregations was a favorite topic with him, for he clearly saw that it was a great auxiliary to the work of the pulpit, while at the same time it was an invaluable instrumentality in developing depth and tenderness of sympathy among Christians in their fellowship with one another. The philosophy of Mr. Snethen was true, and happy would it be for us if we all felt the truth and made use of this means of religious culture in a manner worthy of its importance.

Religious poetry does a far greater work than cultivate the imagination and discipline the taste. It is much more than an inspirer of the feelings, a quickener of the heart. Religious poetry is admirably adapted to educate our nature in those sentiments that purify and exalt, for it is the language of the soul in its most solemn, earnest moods. It is the language of penitence—feeling the heavy burden of sin unforgiven and longing for the light of God's countenance. It is the language of prayer and praise, where prayer and praise spring from the depths of spiritual emotion. The human mind has never uttered itself—its profoundest instincts, its bitterest agonies, its most impassioned yearnings—as it has uttered them in such poetry. And hence, so far from regarding religious poetry as a mere musical recreation, or viewing it as a brilliant creation of genius, we ought to appreciate it as one of God's best helps to aid us in the growth and enlargement of spiritual life. Such poetry is the expression of our holiest affections. Truth, in human utterance is never sublimer than in this form, and therefore we ought to enter into its spirit, to study its meaning, and to yield our hearts to its blessed influence.

We have rarely known a deeply devotional person whose soul was not full of spiritual Hymns. And often have we been impressed with the fact—common alike to preaching, to class-room exercises, and to praying—that whenever the heart is warm with religious sensibility, the language of Hymns is employed to express love and hope. But we cannot dwell on these interesting points. The end we have in view, is to urge attention to this branch of family devotion. In the days of our fathers, it was all but universal to sing at family prayers. If such Hymns as, "A charge to keep I have," etc., were omitted, it was hardly religious service. But the good old usage has been largely discontinued, except in those families that have more or less musical training. Now, if you cannot sing, try this plan, viz: read a hymn at every service, and get your household to repeat it after you. Observe it regularly—make it a habit—and you will find much good to result from it. We know one family in which this custom was adopted with very happy effects. All the children learned the grand Hymns of the Wesleys, and had their hearts penetrated with the hallowed spirit of genius and piety breathing through those precious strains.

A beautiful religious poem is a blessing to the heart that holds its sentiments. How many lonely moments it can cheer! How many quiet thoughts can it bring! What sudden strength it imparts, as it cheers and animates to duty, to struggle, to endurance, to heroism! And then, too, in the family-circle, what more refreshing than to repeat a Hymn in concert—what sweeter fellowship than genius gives, where genius puts on its "singing-robes" and leads us forth in high thanksgivings to God?

"OUR HOUSES."

IN THE September number of that greatest of Magazines, Harper's Monthly, there is a capital article entitled, "Our Houses." While the article is quite Magazinish, it is yet characterized by such sterling good common-sense, and makes its points with such decided force, that it ought to be classed rather among the household homilies than among the attractions of fugitive literature. We are glad to see such a sound and earnest protest against false and ruinous modes of house-building—the more so, as the whole country just now is run half-mad with expensive nonsense and dazzling nothingness in the way of domestic architecture.

By all means let us have good houses. If a man is able to build himself a home, let him thank providence for so sweet a privilege; and then let him use the best of sense and the wisest of skill in doing the best and wisest thing possible. A home of one's own, tastefully constructed and neatly furnished, is a power in one's life; and a very heartless soul must that be which cannot find help in such a home to serve God and man better. Let it be something more than a place to feed in, to sleep in; and therefore, let it be a home to refresh the spirit, and send it forth from amid the presence and peace of agreeable and ennobling things, to do its work all the more truly and well in the restless and bustling world.

The writer shows that neither the Grecian nor the Gothic style of building suits domestic life; and, because of this want of adaptation, they are not models for us to adopt. And he is right. The better style of old English house is greatly more becoming. Every dwelling ought to express the ruling idea of domesticity—that is, it ought to be a seat and scene for Home-Life, and hence, it should embody the ideas, tastes and objects specifically characteristic of our domestic being. A palace is simply an ambitious folly. A gaudy house is a big toy. A gloger-bread house, thick with flash ornaments, is just in architecture what an Indian's heads and feathers are in respect of decent dressing. But a beautiful, simple, convenient home—consulting proper ease and mindful of quiet dignity—is something that makes us better for the sight; and if it is your good fortune to enjoy such a home, you surely ought to be a happier and nobler man for the possession.

Here is a word well said; "not only should the cost of the edifice be calculated, but also the cost of living in it; and here many a man makes a sad mistake." Exactly; we could string on that peg a column of illustrative examples. Many a man forgets what he has to do after building an expensive and showy house. The outlay is only begun when the edifice is finished, and then follows a perpetual extravagance, that ruins temper, peace of mind and private fortune. If then you are about to build, consult Downing or Vaux. They are full of good sense and good taste in such matters. But do not forget also to consult another authority, that, although it has not written such books as Ruskin's, is yet an infallible guide where money is to be expended. And that authority is known among men who fear God and work righteousness, by the name of—Conscience.

UNIVERSITY OF MISSISSIPPI

Magnificent Endowment—Apparatus, Laboratory, Cabinet, Observatory, etc.—Judge Longstreet—"Georgia Scenes"—Dr. Barnard—Dr. Carter—Faculty—Religious Relations.

This state institution, with a landed donation from the general government of nearly a million of dollars, went into operation in 1848. This munificent endowment was committed, as a trust-fund, to the Legislature, which has ever pursued towards it a most enlarged and liberal policy. Four years ago, for instance, that body made an appropriation of $100,000 (one hundred thousand) for placing Mississippi's literary foster-child upon an equal footing with the most favored of the land; and, as if by magic, there has sprung up at Oxford a wealth and profusion of apparatus, and other means and appliances of education, that leave old Yale and Harvard in the far distance. The laboratory is superb. The cabinet is a perfect gem. The observatory, when completed, will be unsurpassed. The philosophical instruments are the admiration of all visitors. Among the 'notabilities' in the philosophical lecture-room, is a Remontoir electric clock, a tasteful and beautiful monument of the inventive genius of the distinguished and learned President, Dr. BARNARD. The principal electrical machine has two circular glass plates, each six feet in diameter. It was constructed expressly for the University, at a cost of $3,000 (three thousand), and is said to be the largest in the world.

The unparalleled success of the college is not due to these superior advantages alone. Something is ascribable to its healthfulness and accessibility; something to the home-pride and self-respect of the students; but more than all, to the character of the men who have controlled its destinies. Wherever a Board of Trustees are wise enough to place such men as Judge LONGSTREET and Dr. WARREN, there will be reared a splendid institution. No president was ever more beloved by his colleagues, or more revered by his pupils, than "the Judge." Early in life he let off that inimitable fun-bundle, the "Georgia Scenes." He afterwards sat upon the supreme court bench in that State. He gave up a lucrative practice to join the itinerancy. He had presided over several colleges before coming to Mississippi. So youthful in his feelings and cheerful in the social circle, with a rich store of humor ever at command, a fine musician, a mild but firm disciplinarian, and with an unimpeachable record in the past—who could help admiring and loving him? Few men have more thoroughly sounded the depths of the human heart; and, as for student-nature, he has it all at his fingers' ends. He has carefully threaded all the mazy labyrinths of college ethics, college logic, and college trickery. Where shall we find a nobler examplar for the youth of the country? Though possessed of an ample fortune, and at an age when most men are disposed to court the blandishments of ease, this veteran educator and servant of God is still in the harness, still ready to do, bravely and cheerily, the Master's bidding till the close of life.

The present Faculty, both in the law department and school of arts, is a most zealous and able corps. Alliance has already been made to the honored President, the Rev. F. A. P. BARNARD, LL. D., an experienced teacher, who gives instruction in Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Civil Engineering.

Your readers are already somewhat familiar with the name of the Rev. G. W. CARTER, D. D., Professor of Ethics, Metaphysics, Political Economy, and International Law. He has a peculiar fitness for all these subjects. Whether we consider his great natural genius, so sweetly attuned and attempered with grace divine, or the varied range of his acquisitions; the elevated conceptions of his mind, or the noble impulses of his heart, big with the issues of humanity, all throbbing and palpitating with burning desires for the good of his fellow man; we must accord to him a most exalted position. Nor is he more remarkable for his intellectuality and for his power in the pulpit and class-room, than for his sweet-spirited disposition, his tender sympathies, and his free-handed charities. I speak it with love and reverence, when I say that he oft reminds me of the Apostle JOHN. Would the world were full of such great and good men as GEORGE CARTER! What has been Virginia's loss, has been the great gain of Mississippi and of the Memphis Conference.

Want of space forbids more than a passing reference at present to the gifted and accomplished Dr. STEARNS, the popular professor of Law and Governmental Science; Professor WHITEHORNE, a finished Hellenist, who went over to Oxford, England, to complete his classical education; Prof. BOYNTON, of Chemistry, Mineralogy, and Geology, a West Point graduate and Professor, whose rooms are models of elegant taste and beautiful arrangement; Rev. Prof. MOORE, of the chair of English literature, a native of the Old Dominion, a versatile scholar and ardent devotee of science, who has, for years past, been doing honorable service in Oakland College; Professor RICHARDSON, of Alabama, who was fitted in Rome, Paris, and Berlin for the department of Latin and Modern Languages; Prof. PHIPPS, of Tennessee, Pure Mathematics, a fine mathematician; and Mr. CARR, of Mississippi, the capable Assistant in Natural Philosophy, a Methodist, and like Mr. Phipps, a graduate of the University.

The board of Trustees is composed of some of the most prominent and useful citizens of the State. It has ever been their aim to favor no particular sect, and to exclude none. In the presidency and full professorships the ministerial representation of the four dominant churches has been as follows:—Methodists 2, Baptists 2; Presbyterians 2; Episcopalians 1 (the actual President). By appointment of the Faculty, the Commencement sermon has been preached by ministers of all those denominations. Among others well remembered are Bishop PAINE and Dr. PALMER. There are sixteen young heralds of the cross among the Alumni alone, including WILLIAM LAMBUTH, Methodist missionary to China for the last five years, and two other young Methodist preachers who have the Japan mission in view. No tuition fee is required of any candidate for the Christian ministry, nor indeed of any one who is unable to pay. It would seem, then, that the Oxonians are neither an anti-religious nor an aristocratic set of people:—"BY THEIR FRUITS YE SHALL KNOW THEM."

A MISSISSIPPIAN.

THE CALVINISTIC CONTROVERSY.

THE Memphis Christian Advocate, and the Presbyterian Sentinel, are having a pretty sharp contest as to the truth or falsehood of Calvinism. Our brother Watson acquits himself well, and so does his puissant contributor, Rev. Doyel Pearson. But—what is the use? When any thing is self-evident, it ought to be taken for granted. If you attempt to prove it, you weaken your position. The truth of Arminianism, or rather its leading principle—the possibility of the salvation of all men—is just as self-evident as is the existence of God. It is as easy to believe that there is no God, as to believe that God created a large portion of our sinful and sorrowing fellow-men on purpose to edify the universe by the spectacle of their damnation. Nobody does believe it; nobody who is sane can believe it. Even Calvinists do not believe it. Yet Calvinism teaches it. The Christian Church does not believe it. The world will never believe it. The progress of Arminianism is parallel with the progress of truth, and of Christian civilization; resulting from the same divine forces, governed by the same providential laws, and having the same heavenly ends.

THE SOUTHERN UNIVERSITY.

THIS Institution, located at Greensboro, Alabama, will be opened on the first of October next, under the Presidency of Rev. William M. Wightman, D.D., LL. D., assisted by a full and able faculty. The buildings are completed, all the facilities have been provided, a goodly number of students is expected, and the endowment fund is already above $300,000. They intend to rise it to half a million. We understand that they are to open with imposing ceremonies. The friends and patrons are expected in large numbers, many ministers will be present, and Dr. Wightman will preach an Inaugural Sermon.

The Lectures connected with the Chair of Biblical Literature will commence with the opening of the University, by Dr. Wightman. Board is one hundred and fifty dollars a year; and Tuition fifty dollars.

EAST ALABAMA MALE COLLEGE.

WE ARE in receipt of a pamphlet, containing the officers, regulations, statutes, etc., of this institution, located at Auburn, Ala., and in connection with the Alabama Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. The advertisement, setting forth the faculty, course of study, and terms, is to be found in fifth column, third page, of this paper. Board is from $10 to $12.50 per month. The College is accessible from all quarters by railroad. The College building is one of the largest and finest in the Southern States. The endowment already reaches to nearly one hundred thousand dollars, and the indefatigable Agent is still at work. The College will be opened, for the first time, on the first Wednesday in October next.

Rev. William J. Sasnett, D. D., the President, is one of the most original, independent, thorough thinkers in the country, of long training and experience. A large number of students, it is expected, will greet him, and his able Faculty, on the opening of the College.

THE AURORA BOREALIS.

LAST SUNDAY night was two weeks ago, being then on Chunnonuggee Ridge, Alabama, about nine o'clock we observed, through the tree-tops, what was supposed to be the light of a great fire in the east. But we soon found this to be a mistake. The heavens, in that quarter, were as red as blood. The young folks thought it the sign of the immediate coming of the day of judgment, and some of them were painfully alarmed. Ah!—thought we—human dependence upon God is manifest in every age. Nothing but the faith of Christ will remove the sting of death, and "assure our hearts before God" "in that day." We learn that on the Thursday night afterwards, the heavens were much more brilliantly illuminated. Many letters have been written to us, describing the solemn and silent beauty of the scene in various States. It seems to have been general throughout the country.

At Boston, on the night of 1st inst., the Aurora Borealis was so brilliant after midnight that ordinary print could be read by its light. It considerably impeded the working of telegraph lines, and its effects were continued up to noon of the 2d. The auroral current from east to west was so regular that operators on the Eastern lines could send messages to Boston without the usual batteries being applied. The same extraordinary effect was apparent on the telegraph wire between Philadelphia and Pittsburg.

ROMANISM AND THE BIBLE.

ROMANISM is of the past. Why, then, does it exist to-day in the old world? Because the Past yet rules those nations from its urn. When those old nations apprehend the living present, and are quickened by it, their first step of progress will leave Romanism behind. But why does it exist in this country? We answer; as a means of transition for our foreign emigration. Americans, as such, do not need it; but they recognize its use, in its modified form, as a half-lighted gallery between the total darkness of the crypt and the perfect light of day. The unity of Protestantism is, the Divine authority of the Bible; its diversity is the right of private interpretation. Now, if one of these be given up, then there is no revelation from God; if the other be ignored, then individual development is arrested. Denying the authority of the Bible, we go back to philosophy; denying the right of private interpretation, we go back to Romanism. But holding both, we have a centre powerful enough to prevent chaotic divergence, and to admit the full play of the planetary powers. Texas Advocate.

THE SABBATH QUESTION is exciting deep interest in many parts of the United States. In Philadelphia and St. Louis Sabbath observance has been a test in the recent elections. The question before the people has been this: Shall people be forced by law to observe the Sabbath?" Is this the real Sabbath question? Is this the chosen form in which the Christians and Christian Ministers of this country wish to present the question to the people? The Sabbath question is a Christian question, among Christian men. Is not the following therefore the better form: "Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord we persuade men to observe the Sabbath?" Or, perhaps, the following would be better still, at least for Christian Ministers: "Now, then, as ambassadors of Christ, we pray you, in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God, in the observance of the Sabbath?" A priori, these are the forms we prefer. And we have been led to consider them from the fact that we find many who are sincerely devoted to the cause of Sabbath observance, who persistently resist every attempt to force such observance by law.

NORTHERN METHODISM on this coast must come to the Southern Methodist platform on the subject of slavery or it cannot live. The people are opposed to all agitation of the slavery question in the Church;—so much so, that the most rabid of their preachers have taken the hint and are becoming silent, finding they do no good and only injure themselves by "agitation." This sober second thought is a good omen. May the reform go on, until American Methodism, purged from the disorganizing leaven which has disembarked and disgraced her, shall be restored to harmony and realize the efficiency of union and love! Great interests depend upon the maintenance of Southern Methodism in California. Such a conservative influence on what is called "free soil" cannot be dispensed with—with a due regard for the interests of Christianity and the preservation of the country. At least, such is the fixed and increasing conviction of your correspondent.—Cor. Southern Advocate.

THE WEEKLY VISITOR is the title of a new weekly paper published in St. Louis, with which we are pleased to exchange. It professes to be a religious paper, as well as a miscellaneous and news paper. At the same time it professes to be devoted to no creed. We should like to know, however, whether the editors are Christians or not—that is, pious members of the Christian Church. Religion out of the Church of Christ is unscriptural, and of evil tendency. And, if they are members of the Christian Church, to which wing of it do they belong? The New Orleans Christian Advocate is an anti-sectarian paper, though a Methodist paper. In what sense can the Weekly Visitor, or any other paper of similar position, be truly Christian—truly "devoted to religion"—and yet be more anti-sectarian than the New Orleans Christian Advocate, or any similar paper? We hope the Visitor will enlighten us.

BROOKHAVEN FEMALE COLLEGE.—Rev. Messrs. Whitworth and Harris write us as follows: "Please say that the new building for Brookhaven College will not be in readiness by the 15th inst; but arrangements are made for opening the School at that time, under the direction of President Lee, with competent assistance, in buildings temporarily provided."

An English Correspondent of the Southern Advocate [illegible] speaking of the Presidency of the next British Conference: "But for the whimsical prejudice against [illegible] there is one man who would most unanimously command an overwhelming majority—the Rev. William Arthur, author of The Tongue of Fire. Mr. Arthur, however, has only been in the Ministry 21 years, and is not yet more than 45 years old; and it is almost unpardonable offence among us to speak of a man for the Presidential Chair, until he has attained the age of sixty. Dr. Bunting is the only instance on record in the annals of British Methodism of a President elected in the vigour of middle life: this eminent man had only exceeded 21 years when first made President of our Conference in the year 1820; but Mr. Arthur, in some respects, is a greater man than Dr. Bunting, and there can be no sufficient reason why he should not receive the highest honours his brethren have it in their power to bestow even now."

Rev. Jefferson Hamilton, D. D.—In a recent trip to Alabama, we spent a day or two in Montgomery, in company with our old friends, Drs. Hamilton and Tyrell. Dr. M. has a fine church and congregation, and his ministry is popular and productive. Dr. Hamilton is visiting different parts of the State, preaching with great usefulness, and succeeding well in the enterprise of raising, in connection with Dr. Neely, $100,000 for the Publishing House and Mobile Depository. But we were sorry to find the Doctor suffering severely from chills. A change of climate is necessary, and determined upon. We trust it may be the means of his restoration to health, and also of his still great usefulness.

Bishop Pierce has been in California about a month. His labors have thus far been confined principally to San Francisco. We have had no preacher among us whose labors have excited so general admirntion, or produced so deep an impression upon the people. He is not of the style of our modern preachers, however. He preaches the pure Gospel, and nothing else—Christ and the Cross. The Bostonians after hearing him preach to an immense audience in the largest Presbyterian Church in San Francisco, were discussing the merits of the discourse. "It was a grand sermon—the best I ever heard," said one. "I didn't like it much," replied the other; "It had not a bit of history or philosophy in it." "History and philosophy are not the gospel," was the sensible reply.

Pacific Methodist.

Ministerial Orthography is one of the "signs of the times." Is it the wish of our ministerial correspondents that we should publish their communications according to their own orthography? We think of pausing for a reply, in some cases. Of course, a preacher, who knows how to spell. For men who do not, if they wish to save their credit, generally write with a dictionary by them. Editors are kind in keeping awkward secrets. It should be appreciated. "A word to the wise," etc. Careless writing, to a newspaper, is "a rod and a shume." Has a man common sense who will use abbroviations to a printer, who knows nothing about it? What does a printer, born in Ireland, know about "Con. Col.," for Conference Collection?

A writer in the Columbus, (Ga.) Times recommends for this post, no the successor of Rev. Dr. Church, Hon. [illegible] W. Hilliard LL. D., of Montgomery, Ala. He says: "Dr. Hilliard possesses in an eminent degree those qualifications which fit him for the position. He is one of the most accomplished scholars and finished orators in the Union, and is besides a Christian gentleman, and an able and admirable administrative qualities. His appointment would, in my opinion, give general satisfaction, and command the undivided confidence of the Southern people. I have heard no intimation which warrants the belief that Dr. Hilliard would accept the position, but, as a friend of the University, I should be exceedingly gratified to see him fill it."

The Mississippi Baptist takes strong ground against "Union meetings." Really, the more we see of this subject the more we are pleased with it. Union meetings are nearly always humbugs—fruits of religious demagogery. We always cheerfully assist at a Baptist, Presbyterian, or Episcopal meeting, if asked. But it is understood that we are working for them—that is, for the cause of Christ as represented by them. But a "Union meeting"—well, we do not know who we are working for. There is no programme—no definite rights, control, or purpose. Union meetings are full of hypocrisy, and of the seeds of dissension. They are mostly mere tricks of the bitterest sectarians.

The Californsia Christian Advocate, M. E. Church, North, has published Bishop Janes' letter in relation to the disturbance and dispersion of his Conference by the people of Fannin county, Texas. Will the same paper publish Judge Roberts' reply? Courage and candour demand it. We have published both. We wait to hear from our cotemporary. Then he will have an occasion to indite another long editorial on the subject. Judge Roberts shows Bishop Janes to have been lamentably mendid. Let both sides, at least, be heard on the Pacific. Our friend seems much dissatisfied that Bishop Pierce should be preaching on the coast. Very natural, but very amusing, and very pitiful.

Mrs. Cross.—Our "letter from the Island City," on the outside, is in fulfilment of the promise made some weeks since. We are glad to learn, through the Texas Christian Advocate, that Mrs. Cross has determined to establish in Galveston a Female Collegiate Institute. She expects, we understand, to devote the rest of her life (may it be long) to the cause of education. No lady in the country is better qualified, not only to teach, but educate—not only to impart knowledge, but to develop mind, heart, character, in harmonious and beautiful proportions—to make of her pupils useful and excellent women, and tastefully cultivated ladies.

The Columbus (Ga.) Enquirer copies, evidently from the New Orleans Christian Advocate, the story entitled "Premonition—A Tale of the South," and introduces it as follows: "We find the following singular story in a Methodist paper, which did not seem to doubt its truth, although we are much inclined to do so." In reply, we have to say that the story was originally written by Hon. Joseph W. Taylor, of Eutaw, for the Home Journal, and that Rev. R. M. Saunders, to whom he refers, is now a valuable and worthy member of the Alabama Conference. The Enquirer need "doubt no more."

The History of Southern Colleges is the title of a work proposed to be issued by Chas. H. Snead, Marion Alabama. It is to be ready for distribution in March, 1860, if practicable. The design is, to bring to light the resources of the South in the way of educational institutions, and, if well executed, will be of great advantage both to the institutions and the public. The history of each institution is to be furnished by its President or Principal. Each one, for the advertising advantages thus derived, is to pay the small sum of ten dollars.

Appointments of the British Conference. The Rev. S. D. Waddy to be President of the next Irish Conference; the Rev. John Eglestone President of the next Australian Conference; the Rev. Dr. Richey President of the next Eastern British American Conference; the Rev. P. Lucas President of the next French Conference; the Rev. Dr Stinson President of the next Canada Conference. It was also resolved that an affectionate address be prepared and forwarded to the next General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal, Church, North, of the United States.

Mrs. Thomas Butter King is dead.

Rev. D. C. B. Connerly recently visited Montgomery, Alabama, in behalf of the Ministerial Education Society of the Alabama Conference. Thirty young men, aroused to the importance of the work, asked the privilege of giving ten dollars each per annum, to prepare one young preacher for college, at Centenary Institute, and also to send him through the University at Greensboro. That Ministerial Education Society is a noble institution, and this is a noble movement in its behalf. Let us have such in connection with all our Male Colleges.

Invitations to Camp meetings, and to other meetings, pour in upon us from every side. We should be rejoiced to attend them all. But duty forbids. For the last two months the Editor has been absent most of the time. Domestic and official duties demand that he should stay at home now, until called away to the Conferences. Even these necessary absences are to be deprecated. An editor of a newspaper ought to be at home all the time. To these kind invitations we would gladly respond, if we could.

Maj. James H. Smith died recently at Tuskegee, Ala., the place of his residence. He was formerly a citizen of North Carolina, and a gentleman of the best class of that State. He was a member of the Methodist Church. There were few better men. He was a friend, affectionately remembered, of the writer of this. He was in the prime of life, and his death is a great loss to his interesting family, and to the Church and community at Tuskegee.

Rufus Choate, when starting for Europe, which tour was prevented by his death, put up the following books for his use while traveling: Daily Food; Bible; Patrick and Lowth's Commentaries; Owen's Commentary on Mark; Luther on the Psalms; Hengstenburg on the Psalms; Lewis' Six Days of Creation; Homer's Iliad; Greek Lexicon; Georgics of Virgil; Bacon's Advancement of Learning; Shakspeare's Tempest.

Rev. Dr. Cross, we learn, contemplates opening in Galveston a Male School of high grade, in a few months, or as soon as the necessary arrangements can be made. There is no better point in the State for educational institutions than the beautiful Island City. Dr. and Mrs. Cross will be mutual helps.

The Rev. Josephus Anderson, of Quincy, Fla., has so far failed in health that he is compelled to leave his work and retire for rest. If he becomes able to labor again, he expects to return to Florida. His Post-office for the present is Old Church, Hanover co., Va.

Dr. Etheridge, it is stated, who has so successfully accomplished his task of writing Dr. Adam Clarke's Life is now hard at work on a similiar labour of love with respect to Dr. Coke.

The Rev. Tracy R. Walsh, former President of the Carolina Female College, has been tendered the Presidency of Homer College, La. We understand that Mr. W. declines.

The Rev. E. W. Speer, the pastor of the Methodist E. Church, at Athens, Ga., as we learn, received the degree of Doctor of Divinity at the late commencement of Franklin College.

Albert Taylor Bledsoe, who needs no recommendation besides the mere mention that he is the author of "Theodicy," and "Liberty and Slavery," has been elected President of the State University of Missouri.

Our Pro. Tem. has our thanks, and deserves those of our readers, for the handsome papers he has "got out" during our frequent absences this summer.

LINES

Dedinated to my friends in Spartanburg, S. C.
BY JANE T. H. CROSS.

Ye groves of pine and oak that stand around,
Whose foliage trembles to the plaintive sound
Of melting dove-note on the ear that falls,
And unto silence, as a sister, calls:—
(So falls the strain as if the Cenel fair
Were pouring forth her wallings on the air—
How aft my soul has floated on that stream,
While all the shimmering midnight was a dream!)
Ye many-colored flowers that deck the wood,
Ye gushing streams that cheer the solitude,
And cow bell, tinkling wheresoe'er wa roam—
A pleasant and perpetual sound of home:
Ye skies, whose canopy of red and gold
Falls round the earth in many a gorgeous fold,
While trooping stars come like the angel-train
By Jacob seen on Bethel's shinlug plain:
Ye towers of Wofford, that serenely rise—
That culminate this heart and cheer the eyes
Where Piety in shining robes commands,
And Science, "made a little lower," stands:
Ye scenes, upon whose back-ground, dark with pain,
The golden pictures of the heart remain,
Portraying how, beneath the strokes of wo,
The streams of friendship but the faster flow:
And you, ye friends—alas! no skill can lend
Sufficient magic to depict a friend:
What you have been, and are, exceeds my art,
Yet "all these things I ponder in the heart:"
To you—farewell! With not uncheerful heart
I speak; we separate, but do not part;
You journey with me still from spot to spot;
In leaving you, dear friends, I lose you not.

NEWS FROM OUR HOME WORK.

"To spread Scriptural Holiness over these Lands."

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Blountsville Circuit.—Rev. N. H. Self writes: "The Lord is still reviving his work upon this Circuit. At our Camp-meeting, three miles north of Blountsville, which closed a few days ago, about one hundred persons professed to find peace in believing; sixty-nine joined the Church—which, added to the number reported in Quarterly Conference, amounts to one hundred accessions this season. The Church is greatly improved from the effects of this and other meetings. At the Camp-meeting on Sabbath, our P. E., Rev. W. I. Powers, made a missionary talk—concluding with an appeal to the audience for help; the result was $114, by subscription and cash. On Monday we took up a collection for the support of the circuit; and the result was $255 75, by cash and subscription. These collections, though they may appear rather small to you, Bro. G., are quite an improvement in these mountains. Some say it is because we have such a good hand to ask the people for their money. Well, we confess that he appears to be gifted in that way."

Talladega Circuit.—Rev. J. N. Dupree writes: "The Lord is doing great things for us in the Talladega Circuit. We have just closed a meeting of fourteen days at Bethlehem Church, during which time some twenty-five souls found peace in believing in Jesus, and twenty-three joined the M. E. Church. The membership were most wonderfully blest. Our beloved brother, E. J. Hamil, was with us a few days; he, with several of our local brethren, did efficient service. I think I see the buddings of a revival all round the Circuit. I believe we shall have it. Brethren, pray for us. We are progressing very much to my notion with our Missionary and Conference collections, and I think we shall be able to meet all demands against Talladega Circuit. The Circuit is honored with some men that are ornaments to society and a blessing to mankind."

Blountsville District.—Rev. W. J. Pawens writes: "The Church is prospering in the bounds of the Blountsville District, I believe, on every Circuit and Mission.

On the Asheville Circuit the prospect is good for a general revival.

The Murphrics Valley Circuit has had a revival at some points. The camp meeting was very good.

The Blountsville Circuit has had a gracious revival—about one hundred conversions.

The Jasper Circuit is in a prosperous condition, and has been blessed with a revival.

The Moscoto Circuit deserves special attention. They have had some gracious revivals, and by the note from Brother Thompson, you see that in other matters Moscow is improving.

Mount Zion Circuit is one of the best of Circuits—remarkable for its Sunday schools, class meetings, zealous local preachers, and members of deep piety. It is refreshing to preach to such people. The Church is doing well there.

The Pikeville Mission has been reported by the Missionary as in a prosperous condition. It is doing well.

The Wargine Mission is served by J. C. Sibert. The Mission has been blessed with some revivals this year.

The Winston Mission, served by P. J. Walker, is improving. Brother Walker is doing a good work for Methodism there.

I have been able to be at all of the quarterly meetings on my work this year; but, I tell you, the railroad Presiding Elders would come poor speed going round the Blountsville District.

This District will raise its Missionary assessment, and, I think I may say, the Conference collection also. The Church needs more than double the present number of preachers on this District.

Jefferson.—Rev. L. M. Wilson writes: "We have recently closed a meeting at Spring Hill, of two weeks continuance: sixteen whites were converted and eighteen joined the Church; the number among the colored people not known—but the work was extensive and thorough—sixty joined the Church. The missionary collection taken up on the second Sunday of the meeting amounted to about $300. I am thinking of having the banner circuit again—ought not to have it, however, if others would manifest zeal in this noble work."

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

North Warren Circuit.—Rev. J. D. Newsom writes: "We have just closed a camp meeting on North Warren Circuit, with most glorious results. As near as we could estimate, forty souls were converted to God, a number of backsliders were reclaimed, some professed sanctification. Thirty persons were added to the Church, and the Church was wonderfully built up. Saturday night and Sunday night were the most gracious times with us. Some of the oldest persons present thought they had never seen such a season."

OTAPASA CAMP MEETING.

Mr. Editor: I don't like to trouble you so much about a small matter, yet circumstances require it. I sent you a notice in regard to the time of camp meeting at Otapasa Camp Ground, and you published it; after which Brother Campbell, our P. E., sent one, and gave the wrong time. I will give you the time correctly.

The tent-holders are to move in on Friday night before the second Sabbath in October, and there will be preaching on the camp ground that night, and the meeting will close the Wednesday following. This is the arrangement made at the close of the camp meeting last year. I wish you would so publish.

There is no prospect of several new tents this year, and also a German tent; and we are making arrangements to have two stands for preaching, so that the Germ ins can be preached to.

There is quite a religious interest manifested through this country, such as has not been for a long time. Brother Bowen, of the Holmesville Circuit, and myself have been engaged together for two months holding protracted meetings—alternating from one of our Circuits to the other; and most of our meetings are crowned with great success. Many are joining the Church—many are getting religion and professing perfect love. We have several more meetings to hold, and look for blessed times.

A. B. Nicholson.

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

Calcasieu Circuit.—Rev. W. H. Stayton writes: "Our third quarterly meeting came off at Sugartown, the 27th and 28th of August. We protracted till Wednesday night following, and closed with sixteen conversions and thirteen accessions to the Church. The Church greatly revived. Glory to God for converting and sanctifying power. O, Lord, revive thy work on Calcasieu circuit!"

☞ Our Camp-meeting at Robe's Camp-ground will commence the 20th October. The friends of Zion are all invited to attend, especially the friends of the Gospel.

W. D. Stayton.

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

Affairs in Italy.

A defensive league has been formed between Tuscany, Bologna and Modena, the object of which is to prevent the restoration of the fallen governments, and to lay down a basis for assimilating their institutions more in conformity with each other.

The National Assembly of Modena has confirmed Farina as Dictator of the Duchy, and empowered him to borrow five millions of money for the purpose of restoring to liberty the political prisoners carried away by Francis I.

A number of distinguished citizens of Venetia have sent representatives to the various foreign powers, and issued an address to them, declaring that the conduct of the Austrian authorities in Venetia has not changed for the better since the conclusion of peace and asking their influence in ameliorating their condition, and inducing Austria to inaugurate a more liberal policy and introduce a less tyrannical system of government in the Venetian kingdom.

Sardinia Rejects the Duchies.

Deputations from the Duchies of Tuscany and Modena, which had unanimously asked to be annexed to the Kingdom of Sardinia, had waited upon the King at Turin.

It is stated thence that the King replied to the deputations, that he would not accept, even providentially, the annexation of any of the Duchies to his dominions without consulting France and the other great powers of Europe.

General Position of Italy.

As to the Italians, generally, they continue to maintain an attitude of the greatest firmness in regard to their national independence. Order, however, generally prevailed, especially in the Duchies, where the hostility to the return of the Austrian Archdukes continued unabated.

The Peace Conference.

More favorable reports from the Peace Conference, in session at Zurich, had been received. It is now believed that it would come to a satisfactory agreement on all contested points.

As respects the order of proceedings, it is stated that the conference is held alternately in the apartments of the Austrian and French Ministers, and that the strictest secrecy is at all times preserved. Not even the secretaries of the different embassies are admitted to the sittings. The embassadors themselves draw up minutes of the proceedings, which are afterwards simply transcribed by the secretaries.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

Commerce of Charleston.

From the Annual Commercial Statement of the Charleston Mercury, we gather the following facts:

The total number of bales of cotton received in the last twelve months, inclusive of the stock on hand at the commencement of the season, is 28,462 Sea Island and 483,742 Uplands—an increase of 1821 bales Sea Island and 80,469 Uplands over the last previous season. In the same period, 159,590 barrels of rice have been received, being an increase of 9,280 barrels.

The exports for the season have been 27,019 bales Sea Island and 457,546 bales Upland cottons, 135,213 barrels rice, 12,380,080 feet lumber, 70,329 bushels wheat, 60,188 barrels flour, and 39,461 bbls naval stores. This is an increased exportation of 1356 bales Sea Island and 75,836 bales Upland cottou, 6867 bbls rice, and 39,461 bbls naval stores. There has been a decreased exportation of 2,932,042 feet of lumber, 354,173 bushels wheat and 24,567 bbls flour.

In consideration of the terrible drawback of the epidemic at the commencement, we regard the exhibit of the year as very favorable and creditable to our business men.

Trade of Western Texas.

The Indianola Courier, of the 3d inst., says: "The cattle shipping business is fast increasing, from this port to New Orleans. All the steamships in the trade are engaged for months ahead, and the demand is sufficient for as many more. The steamers now in the trade, between this port and New Orleans, are the Charles Morgan, Suwanee, Magnolia, Orizaba, Matagorda, Fashion, Arizona and Robert Watermun. The Texas and Mexico are temporarily withdrawn for repairs. The Arizona extends her trips to Brazos Santiago, and the Waterman to Lavaca. The others stop at Indianola—the commercial interest of Western Texas. When the rail trade has fairly opened, the above steamers will not be sufficient for the increased business. The probability is that there will be over 50,000 bales of cotton to ship this season, and a corresponding increase in the number of beef cattle—not to mention the increase of wool, hides, pecans, etc. A propeller for the cattle shipping and other business is expected to make a trip from Aransas Bay by the 1st of November next."

Indian Southern Apples.

A Georgia correspondent of the Southern Cultivator gives a list of Indian names for several varieties of apples indigenous to the South. They strike us as quite picturesque, and, like the aboriginal names for rivers and mountains, should be preserved—and double the apples are: Tullopaik, "big fruit," still growing on a fine old tree, near Franklin, N. C; Tocoa, "beautiful," a delicious, high-flavored August apple, found in the orchard of G. Taylor, an old revolutionary soldier, living near the celebrated Toccoa Falls, in Habersham, Ga; Callasajah, "sweet-water," or "sugar water," a very aromatic, early winter apple, a seedling from the horse apple, raised by Miss Ann Bryson, living on the Chattahoga fork of the Tennessee river, in Macon county, N. C.; Yakoola, meaning unknown; a fine winter apple, found growing on the banks of an old gold pit, near Yahoola Creek, in Lumpkin county, Ga; Chrelee, "rabbit's head," from its resemblance to that part of the rabbit's body.

COMMERCIAL.

Monday Evening September 12, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New Orleans Price-Current, ending on the 10th instant:

Our last issue was upon the opening of a New Commercial year, and since then the operations in our market have been on a limited scale in most departments, though our leading staple, Cotton, which has come in tolerably freely, has begun to move with some activity. There is a scarcity of shipping at the moment, however, and advanced freights and declining exchanges have tended to depress prices.

Advices by the Cunard steamer Europa have been received, reporting the week's sales of Cotton at Liverpool, to have been 40,000 bales, the market closing dull, and some authorities reporting a decline of 1-16 to 1d. though the quotations given were still 8d. for Fair Orleans and 7d. for Middling do. The total stock at Liverpool was stated at 650,000 bales, of which 582,000 were American.

The advices from Manchester were more favorable, the demand for goods and yarns having somewhat improved, while prices were somewhat firmer.

At Havre the Cotton market was dull at 113f. for tres ordinaire and 106f. for bas, with sales for the week of 4,500 bales.

COTTON.—Our last report closed with the commercial year, and upon quotations of 11¼ to 12½c. for Middling of the new crop. Since then there have been tolerably free arrivals, and advancing freights and declining exchanges have tended to depress prices from day to day. The sales since the 31st ultimo, eight business days, sum up about 27,800 bales; the receipts in the same time to 31,376 bales. Cleared since 31st ult. 2802; and the stock remaining in presses and on shipboard, not cleared on the 9th inst. 54,590 bales. Our closing quotations show a decline of fully ⅛ per pound, with an irregular market.

The receipts of new crop, though somewhat improving in quality generally, still embrace parcels containing more or less dust, which are disposed of with difficulty.

There remain on hand unsold some 7 to 8000 bales of the old crop, consisting mostly of the low grades, which are wholly neglected, and for which we can give no quotations at present.

The receipts of new crop since 31st ult. are 25,717 and the total receipts to date this season are 35,415 bales, against 13,880 bales to same period last year.

GREENSBORO HIGH SCHOOL—REV. J. W. N. Mears, A.M. M.D.
The exercises of the third session of this school will commence on the first day of September next.
The session comprises nine months—including the usual holidays—and is divided into three terms of three months each.
French will be taught for a small extra fee.
The Principal will take a very few boys under his immediate supervision in rooms adjoining his own. The amusement and labors of such boys out of school will be under the direction of the Principal.
Those parents who have sons to board out, will, it is thought, at once recognize the advantage of such an arrangement.
The play-grounds are ample and pleasant, and the house commodious and furnished most neatly and comfortably.
Young men can prepare to enter the Junior class in any of our Colleges.
Miss E. D. Mears takes a limited number of young ladies on whose education she bestows particular care. All the branches essential to a polished education are taught.
The attention of parents is especially invited to this Department.

"Woman in the Nineteenth Century," "At home and abroad," "Papers on Literature and Art," explain much of the mind of Margaret Fuller. But her wonderful power of conversation lives in memory alone. It is said that there has been no woman like her in this respect since Madame de Stael. But while Margaret Fuller's conversation, in eloquence and effect, in sparkle and flow, was fully equal to that of the gifted French woman, it had superadded a merit, which the latter could not claim. There is hardly on record one with her power to draw out others. She not only talked surprisingly herself, but she made others do so. While talking with her they seemed to make discoveries of themselves, to wonder at their own thoughts, and to admire the force and aspiration of their character—hitherto latent, even to their own consciousness. She made those who talked with her forget to admire in wondering at themselves.

"Over his millions death has lawful power
But over thee, brave Ossoli! none, none!
After a long struggle, in a fight
Worthy of Italy, to youth restored,
Thou, far from home, art sunk beneath the surge
Of the Atlantic; on its shore; in reach
Of help; in trust of refuge; sunk with all
Precious on earth to thee—a child, a wife!
Proud as thou wert of her, America
Is prouder, showing to her sons how high
Swell's woman's courage in a virtuous breast.
She would not leave behind her those she loved;
Such solitary safety might become Others—not her; not her who stood beside
The pallet of the wounded, when the worst
Of France and Perfidy assailed the walls
Unsuspicious Rome. Rest, glorious soul,
Enraptured for strength of genius, Margaret!
Rest with the twain, too dear! My words are few,
And shortly none will hear my failing voice,
But the same language with more full appeal
... hail thee. Many are the sons of song
Whom thou hast heard upon thy native plains,
Worthy to sing of thee; the hour has come;
Take we our seats and let the dirge begin."

The following is the terse and eloquent inscription on the Ossoli monument—

In Memory of Margaret Fuller Ossoli, Born in Cambridge, Massachusetts, May 23, 1810.

"By birth a child of New England, by adoption a citizen of Rome, by genius belonging to the world. In youth an insatiate student, seeking the highest culture. In riper years, Teacher, Writer, Critic of Literature and Art. In mature age, companion and helper of many eminent ... in America and Europe.

The Mother's Desire.

It was the opening day of Miss Leighton's school. A ring of the door-bell announced an arrival. Almost immediately a lady, leading by her hand two little daughters, entered the room where Miss Leighton received her scholars. The two children looked up half timidly at the face of their new teacher, while the affectionateness of her manner at once dispelled all their fears.

The lady was a Christian mother. In giving up her children for a time to the charge of another, she had thought much and anxiously. She desired not only that their minds might be cultivated, but that they might be guided in their early youth to the Saviour. For this purpose she had chosen a school whose head should be a Christian woman. As with anxious care she intrusted the little ones given to her to another's charge, their spiritual good was sought for most.

"I commit my children to you," she said, "not only to be benefited in health and in intellect, but to be taught to follow you as you follow Christ, to have the good seed of the kingdom sown in the spring-time; and may God bless your labors!"

A THRILLING INCIDENT IN THE LIFE OF A LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEER.

In returning from Philadelphia about the middle of August, 1856, the cars were very much crowded, and my companion in the same seat with me, I found out to be a locomotive engineer, and in the course of our conversation, he made the remark he hoped he had run his last trip upon a locomotive.

Upon making bold to ask him his reasons, he gave me the following story, and since then I have found it to be strictly true:

"Five years since I was runing upon the New York Central Railroad. My run was from B—— to R——. It was the lightning express train, and it was what its name denotes, for it was fast—a very fast run, and if I do say it, the old Tornado could go. I have seen her throw her six foot driver so as to be almost invisible to the eye. And let me here remark, it is supposed by many that railroad engineers are a hard-hearted set of men; their lives are hard, 'tis true, but I do claim to have as fine feelings, and a heart that can sympathise with the unfortunate, as any man that breathes. But to my story.

"About half a mile from the village of B——, there is a nice little cottage but a few feet from the track. At that time a young married couple lived there. They had one child, a little boy about four years old, a bright, black-eyed, curly-headed little chap, as you ever saw. I had taken a great deal of interest in the little fellow, and had thrown candy and oranges from the train, and I was sure to see him peeping through the fence when my train passed.

"One fine, sunny afternoon, we were behind time, and runing fast, and did not stop at B——, as I was to make up one hour before reaching R——. We came up at a tremendeous speed, and when sweeping around the curve, my eye following the track, not over two hundred feet ahead sat the little fellow, with a kitten, which he held in his lap. At the sound of our approach, he looked and laughed, clapping his hands in high glee at the affrighted kitten, as it ran from the track. Quicker than the lightning that blasts the tall pine upon the mountain top, I whistled "down brakes," and reversed my engine, but knew it was impossible to stop. Nobly did the old engine try to save him. The awful straining and writhing of its iron drivers told me but too plainly of the terrific velocity we had attained. I was out of the cab window, and down on the cow-catcher in a flash. The little fellow stood still. I motioned him off, and shouted; his black eyes opened wide with astonishment, and a merry laugh was upon his lips. I held my breath as we rushed upon him, made a desperate attempt to catch him, but missed, as his little body passed, I heard the feeble cry of 'Mother,' and the forward trucks crushed his body to atoms.

"O God! that moment! I may live, sir, to be an old man, but the agony of that moment can never be erased from my memory. The cars stopped some rods from the spot, and I ran back as soon as possible. His mother saw the train stopped, and a fearful foreboding flashed upon her at once. She came rushing frantically to where we stood. Never shall I forget the look she gave me, as she beheld her first-born a shapeless mass. I would have given my whole existence to have avoided that moment! I have seen death in all its forms upon railroads; I have seen men, women, and children mangled and killed—I have seen all this, but that poor little innocent boy as he looked up in my face, and was killed almost in my arms, unnerved me, and from that day, I made a solemn vow never to run a locomotive more. That young mother is now in the Utica Lunatic Asylum, from the hour her boy was killed, reason had left its throne."

COUNT PULASKI.

A writer in the Savannah News gives a brief sketch of the life of Count Casimer Pulaski, from which we extract the following: Pulaski was 5 feet 8 or 10 inches high, very well built, and strongly framed—particularly his chest and arms bore witness to the extraordinary strength he was possessed of. He was very severe and rigorous in service, indomitable in battle, very kind, obliging and gentlemanly in intercourse, quick and impulsive in action, firm and unshaken in his purpose. Had blue eyes, brown hair, wore a small moustache in Polish fashion, a very fine, rosy complexion, and in his face he bore unmistakable evidence of undaunted courage, boldness and high perceptions mingled with kindess, affability and firmness. He was scarcely 31 years old when he fell.

He was possessed of an extraordinary strength in his arms, and had a sabre of enormous weight and power, which could be wielded only by a few men. In battle he used to be always the first in charge and the last in retreat.

There is a peculiar tradition about his mode of death, in this country. It is said that he led on the charge upon a British battery, and having sprung with his horse over the ditch, he sabred the artillerymen, and and while turning to his men to bid them advance, an artilleryman, who was hidden under one of the cannons, fired his piece upon him, shattering him and his horse to pieces.

There is also a very original tradition about Germantown, Pa., showing his burly strength and daring. It is said that on the day of a battle, Washington was looking at the British lines, and remarked that there was a new regiment of cavalry, and uttering the wish to see how they looked. Pulaski hearing this, gave the spur to his famous black charger, went in the direction of the new regiment with his sabre flashing. Coming close to the line, he took by the collar the first man on the left he could lay his hands on, and amidst a hail of bullets aimed at him, bore in his left hand that man to Gen. Washington, saying: "Here, General, you have a specimen of the new dragoon regiment." This was done in the view of both armies, and in the presence of the whole staff of American forces.

DESTRUCTION OF A CITY BY AN EARTHQUAKE.

The English papers received by the Ætna announce the destruction of the ancient city of Erzroom, in Turkey, by repeated shocks of an earthquake, within the last three months. The first earthquake occurred June 1st, and a letter from one of the missionaries of the American board gives a vivid description of the first great shock. He says:

The first shock, which was not very severe, was felt about 8 o'clock A. M., June 1, and at 10 o'clock A. M., the following day, came the fearful earthquake, which laid in ruins 2000 houses, nearly destroying 1500 more, and injuring 1200 others; leaving (according to the accounts of the Turkish officials) over 1300 houses unharmed; but I do not believe that there are 100 houses in Erzroom as sound as they were before the earthquake. The shock was not only felt throughout the city, but the villages on the plain, and even at Hassan-Kallah, twenty miles to the east.

"According to official returns, 380 dead bodies have been taken out from the ruins, about 200 wounded, and 60 are missing. The heavy shock, which did the mischief, is said to have continued about eight seconds, and it was followed by three others less severe, the same day. Shocks, more or less severe, were also felt at intervals during eight consecutive days, since which there has been perfect quiet, and the work of building and repairing is now going on as rapidly as possible.

It is a singular fact that the destruction was almost confined to the Moslem quarter of the city, and only twelve Christians lost their lives. None of our Protestant friends where injured, though several barely escaped with life. One woman, sister of our native preacher B. Hohannes, feeling the waving to and fro of the house, seized her two little children and escaped in time to see roof and wall come down with a crash where she had been sitting. Part of another house, adjoining ours, was crushed but no one was harmed. The two missionhouses were injured but not very seriously.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MR. JOHN MCTYEIRE, father to Rev. H. N. McTyeire, editor of the Nash. Christian Advocate, died, aged 67 years, on the 13th July last, at his residence in Russell county, Ala. Brother McTyeire moved from S. C. to this State in 1837, and settled in this county, about 25 miles from Columbus, Georgia, where he lived until he finished his earthly course, in the bosom of his family, in the midst of old friends, Christian brethren and neighbors who had known him long and well, and loved and esteemed him much for his sound Christian virtues. When Bro. McTyeire joined the M. E. Church I am not informed, but before he left the land of his nativity. I made Bro. McTyeire's acquaintance some fifteen years since; our acquaintance was formed soon after I was appointed Pastor of the Church to which he belonged—and in which he lived and died a worthy member. I knew Bro. McTyeire well, and I recognized in him a faithful, hearty and old-fashioned Wesleyan Methodist, a Christian not often met with in these days. Bro. McTyeire was one of those rare specimens of strict honesty and integrity of character, who attended amphatically to his own business, in a spiritual as well as temporal point of view, and who never injuriously intermeddled with that of others. In relation to his future prospects I would say, from what I knew of him in life and what I saw of him during his sickness immediately preceding his death—taken in connection with the information I received from his friends and family, who watched around his sick couch the few last days he remained on earth—but, especially, from the prompt and emphatic reply to the question of his class-leader, who asked him, if he felt ready to die? to whom he replied, in that emphatic manner peculiar to himself—"Yes, and anxious to go!" that long ere this, his emancipated spirit has entered that rest that remains for the people of God. Through a kind Providence he was permitted to enjoy the society and ministerial counsel of his son, the Rev. H. N. McTyeire. And, oh me, what a comfort I from such a source to a dying father. Few so highly favored—few so highly honored. JOHN C. CARTER.

MRS. MELISSA M. STREET, wife of William Street, in the thirty-sixth year of her age departed this life on the 3rd inst., at the residence of Rev. J. P. Street near Crystal Springs, in Copiah county, Miss. Sister Street was born November 25th, 1823; and, at the age of fifteen, professed religion and joined the M. E. Church, at Olive Branch Camp-meeting; and lived a consistent Christian. Her afflictions for the last three years were of the severest character. But Jesus was with her, and she was perfectly resigned. "She said she was not only willing—but, blessed be God—she was ready." She was very happy. When she was about leaving, she bade her weeping husband and children an affectionate farewell saying: "I am going to a home in heaven." Sister Street leaves an affectionate husband, and a number of dear children. The writer saw two of her daughters give themselves to the Church, and resolve, with their father, to join the deceased loved one in her heavenly home. J. M. TURNER.

SISTER E. S. LOCKE, wife of Dr. Wm. A. Locke, and daughter of brother and sister R. G. and E. D. Davis, was born in Baldwin county Alabama, 22d February, 1841, and died in Monroe county, Alabama, at the residence of Mrs. Locke, July 7th, 1859. Her accomplishments were such as to render her entirely agreeable to the circle in which she moved. Her character was of the most excellent kind. She was modest, benevolent, kind—perhaps, without an enemy. Sister Locke was trained up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. She could not bear to hear the cause of God, or his ministers, reproached. She delighted in the exercises of the Church. She was more than a month sick of typhoid fever. She seldom if ever murmured, but was patient and submissive. She has gone from this land of afflictions; but in that far off land, we hope to meet her again, for we sorrow not as those who are without hope. A. B. FARISH.

MRS. NANCY JANE McCRARY, wife of John W. McCrary, Jackson county, Fa., and daughter of William Harper, Barbour county, Ala., died in her 29th year, August 13, 1859. She was left when an infant without a mother; but, fortunately, fell into the hands of good people. In the year 1852 she was married to James M. Brown, and lived happy a few years; but, alas, he was removed by death. In 1858 she was married to John W. McCrary; they lived happily a few months, when her health became bad, and her husband started up the country with her: but all without success. She is gone. Her godly life is sufficient testimony that she died in the favor of God. She loved the Church—Class-meetings—Sabbath-schools—and her Bible. She was a kind and affectionate wife, a loving and tender mother; and, above all, she was a good Christian. Her friends mourn, but not without hope. WM. B. ADAMS.

JAMES COPELAND died in Blount county, Ala., on the 28th August, 1859. James Copeland had been for several years a member of the Methodist Church; and a portion of that time, a class-leader. His affliction was short but severe, he endured with Christian fortitude, frequently expressing a willingness to go. He has left a wife, several children and a large circle of friends and acquaintance, to mourn his loss; but their loss is his eternal gain, for they sorrow not as those that have no hope. N. H. ECLY.

LITTLE GEORGE IRVIN, only son of Dr. J. J. and Mrs. A. A. Hendrix, aged two years and ten days, died of scarlet fever, at Choctaw Corner, Clarke county, Ala., August 23, 1859. Little George was lovely, even in death. A FRIEND.

JAMES S. CALLIHAN died on the 6th inst., at the residence of B. Pipkin in the parish of St. Helena, aged 30 years.

PURIFIES THE BLOOD!

B. F. WILLIAMS' COMPOUND SYRUP OF SARSAparilla, and Iodide of Potassium. This medicine is offered as one of the best preparations of Sarsaparilla extant, and as a curative remedy has won great favor at Nashville, Tenn., and other Southern Cities. The medical faculty authorise its use (having been shown the recipe.) As a BLOOD PURIFIER there is no remedy equal to this compound, and for the cure of a numerous progeny that owe their origin and parentage to a strumous Diathesis or Scrofulous taint in the Constitution and in the blood, such as White Swelling, Chronic Ulcers of long standing, Obstinate Tetter, Ring Worms, Sore Eyes, Scald Head, Syphilitic Disorders, and other diseases of the skin and blood that resist the usual treatment. Its can substantiate by the very best evidence in our City, its efficacy in Nervous and General Debility, Indigestion or Dyspepsia, Inflammation of the kidneys, Rheumatism, etc. etc. It is confidently recommended in diseases peculiar to Females, such as Leucorrhœa or Whites, Suppressed Menstruation, Chlorosis or Green Sickness. Try it. You will be satisfied with the result. Read what Dr. Hudson says. He is a gentleman of high standing.

Charlotte, Tenn., Sept. 15, 1859.

MR. B. F. WILLIAMS: Instances are not rare where the attending physician fails to cure well confirmed Scrofula. The following memorandum is interesting:

SUBJECT.—A girl of 15 or 16 years of age, the attending physician had failed to cure. An anxious father had consulted me, and from my knowledge of your preparation, I was constrained to prescribe it. After taking six bottles she was considered well. She was cured of a deep-seated ulcer and a constant drain of milky matter from one or more sores under the ear. The entire lymphatic system was deeply involved. This case alone is well worth the attention of all—but when added to a long catalogue of cases of great obstinacy, cured by no Panacea, or Nostrum, nor Patent Medicine, in Secret, but an invaluable preparation of Sarsaparilla, Iodide of Potassa, etc., well gotten up by the Chemist, and made familiar to the intelligent physician, it very justly deserves a trial by all laboring under any of the numerous chronic diseases that afflict us. J. R. HUDSON, M. D.

Oakland College, Miss., Nov. 20, 1858.

MR. J. F. MCAVOY: With regard to your inquiry about the "Williams Sarsaparilla and Iodide of Potash," which I purchased of you, I have no hesitation in affirming that it acted magically. My sister was afflicted with a cutaneous eruption, which enveloped the head and a large surface of the body, and which resisted all medical treatment. I think that one bottle affected a permanent cure, though I continued the treatment until two bottles had been used. It has been eighteen months since, and as yet there has been no re-appearance of the disease. I have frequently expressed, and reiterate the opinion, that it is the best preparation of Sarsaparilla in use, and the addition of Iodide of Potash enhances its value tenfold. Very respectfully yours, C. M. STEVENS.

TRUTH OMNIPOTENT.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from J. W. Vesey, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, containing at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of North Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment upon—they tell the whole story, one that ought to go home to those in whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

CONSERVATIVE OFFICE,
Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858.
Messrs. Wright & Co.—As any testimonial in reference to your preparations may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following, published at my request, in the "Conservative" of the 21st inst.
Col. Vasser was formerly associate editor of the "Conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity. Respectfully, J. W. VESEY.

[For the Conservative.]
Communicated. ABERDEEN, Aug. 19th, 1858.
DEAR VESEY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untimely sorrow to many a happy household.
On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 15 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sovereign remedy against this terrible enemy of children, I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly, by the acquiescence of my family Physician.
On the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, save in quantity, being afraid to give the amount of prescription. I was unable to detect any impression occasioned by it until late in the afternoon of that day; and should not then, but for the discharge of some thirteen worms, varying in length from two and a half to six inches. This I thought a remarkable number for a nursing infant. But, to my great amazement, about one o'clock the next morning I was aroused from my slumber to witness the incredible number of one hundred and thirty-six from one evacuation.
Before breakfast of the same morning, (Sunday) but one small dose was administered, which was followed by the discharge of fifty during the day. The next day, (Monday) none was administered; but still several discharges occurred during the day, varying in size and quantity as described.
On Tuesday morning following, one more small dose was administered, making in all five doses of a quarter of a teaspoonful instead of a half as prescribed by the label of directions. In all, the little creature has discharged to this date, the rise of three hundred worms, a majority of which will average five or six inches in length; and is running along as usual, with returning evidences of good health and spirits.
Having met with such astonishing effects in the case of my infant, I was induced to use the Vermifuge on six other children under my protection, varying in age from two to ten years old, and in every case save one, (that of the oldest), the like happy results have been produced.—These facts are elicited, 1st, because of my antipathy heretofore to nostrums of every kind; and, 2nd, because my experience has convinced me that, in the experiment I have made with WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, it is due to suffering humanity, as well as the manufacturer of the medicine, to make public the results of my observation.
W. H. VASSER.

Read! Read! Read! "Ye afflicted read" the following Certificate of a cure of over 20 years' standing.
H. T. HENDRON—Dear Sir: I have been troubled with an affliction of the Bladder and Kidneys for over twenty years. I have tried Physicians in vain, and at last concluded to give your Genuine Preparation a trial, as I had heard it highly spoken of. It afforded me immediate relief. I have used three bottles, and I have obtained more relief from its effects and feel much better than I have for twenty years previous. I have the greatest faith in its virtues and curative powers, and shall do all in my power to make it known to the afflicted. Hoping this may prove advantageous to you in assisting you to introduce the medicine I am truly yours. M. MCCORMICK.

We Dont Want Any Other.
Such is the language of all who use WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, when they call for that and say other is offered them; they have tried it, and from experience know it to be superior to all others; therefore when they are in want of a medicine of the kind, they purchase that which they know to be good and can be depended on. As Agent who called on us a few days ago, said "I find it difficult to sell any other Vermifuge, since I have yours. I have had some in my store for a long time which I occasionally try to 'work off,' but so one will purchase it unless I warrant it as good as yours, this I cannot do." So it is, and so it will be, Winer's Vermifuge owes its unrivalled popularity to its owe intrinsic merits, on this alone it has a ways depended, and were it put to test that it is superior as a remedy for worms, it would or this have shared the unenviable fate of many other articles designed for similar purposes. To all who are in want of a medicine of this kind we say try it and judge for yourselves, we are confident that it will give entire satisfaction.

For two days before we reached the Rio Grande the same general features of country prevailed. All is parched, dry, and sad-looking. If I had no experience of this region, and were dropped down there, my first impression would be that no animal life could be sustained in it. This however would be a mistake. Antelopes live here and keep fat. Ox-teams innumerable pass through and, if not over-driven, improve. The explanation is this: whenever it rains, and this is at long intervals, the grass springs, and grows as long as the moisture lasts, and when the drought comes on dies before it reaches maturity. It is not therefore dead, decaying vegetation, but well-cured hay, and very nutritious. As no rains or dews fall in this country, it keeps from month to month. Stock of all kinds are very fond of it. Vast herds may be seen in some places, leaving the streams where there is some verdure, and resorting to the plains to feed on this dry grass. There had been no rain, I was told, for two years, and of course no decomposition. Nature provides the hay, and the beasts of the field do their own mowing. No need of storehouse or barn.

On the night of the 31st May we made our last encampment, and the next day, early in the forenoon, reached "Eagle Spring;" a name I had often noticed upon the maps, little thinking I should ever see the place. The spring is a mere hole in the ground, half full of milky-looking water, as unpalatable as it is ill-favored.

Eagle mountain, near-by, is awful in its grandeur—and the place is one of interest, as the scene of some Indian murders a year or two since. Three graves mark the spot where the emigrants were slain. It is a place in which to be sad; and when you look around and see the hiding-places from which the treacherous savage might wing his arrow or send his death-dealing bullet, you feel a little nervous.

Nevertheless we rested here an hour, and walked about in as much security as elsewhere. Bear grass, and a sort of mongrel palmetto, are the only products of this arid region. With their long naked stems and bushy tops, as you wbirl by them in the dark, they look like the out-posts of an army—sentinels over their sleeping comrades.

The road, after leaving the spring, lies for miles mainly in the bed of what in wet weather is a considerable stream. Rocks—rocks! above, below, around.

Finally we emerge from the desolation, and in the valley below we see the far-famed Rio Grande. Green trees line the banks—oh, how refreshing to the eye—weary of rocks, sand and vegetable death!

Under a wide-spreading cotton-wood the driver halted, and for a season we luxuriate in shade. We go down to the river—what a disappointment! I expected to see a bold, dashing stream of clear cool water—but, lo! a narrow, muddy, sluggish one—with scarce a perceptible current. I stooped to drink, and thought, as the river was swollen by the melting snows, that I should once more get a cooling draught; but no! it was warm as a Southern mill-pond in the month of June. This was the first river and the first impression. Our route lies up the river for eighty miles or more, and, perhaps, we shall see it to more advantage.

Five miles more, and we reach Fort Quitman. A few adobe houses and some rude stick tents, deep sand and broad sunshine, as hot as I ever felt, are among my recollections of the place. When we stopped to deliver the mail, a gentleman came up to inquire of a train behind. He seemed to long for its arrival, that he might hasten his escape from what he called "this God-forsaken country."

The river was rising and threatened to overflow the place. The people were full of fears, for their adobe houses were certain to cave in if the water reached them. I hope they escaped the dreaded calamity.

After dinner we started for El Paso, with the assurance that the road was bad, and that we must travel all night. We verified both declarations.

The sand was deep, and occasionally the rut was cut into holes of great depth, and the mere shaking of the vehicle was tortaring to tired limbs.

Just before sunset we saw an exciting chase—a wolf and a mule-rabbit; terror spurred one, appetite the other—each was doing his best; which won the race I do not know, for a turn in the road hid them from our view. I must skip till "morning light appears." Darkness and sleep both prevented me from seeing much.

Just before day the rising water compelled the driver to abandon the road, and hunt a new route through the sand-hills on the edge of the river bottom—and as, with the rest, I had to walk, my impressions are not very favorable. The only remarkable thing on the way is, here and there a human habitation. We had not seen one for five hundred miles.

In the morning we reached San Elezario, an old Mexican village—with a few Pueblo Indians scattered around. Some Americans, too, have found their way here.

We halted for breakfast, and fared very well. The host was an American and his wife a Mexican. Here, too, are gardens and orchards and fields. The sight was refreshing. For production, the sole dependence is irrigation. The soil is fine—a rich alluvial. Soon we came to another village, Socorro; and then to Islota—all of them old Catholic stations, where Mexicans and Indians are taught—alas, not Christianity, but Romanism.

On the Texas side, the valley of the Rio Grande is narrow, and not of much value.

We passed Fort Bliss in a cloud of dust, and soon came into El Paso. Alighted at the only hotel in the place, glad to escape the scorching sun and to rest for a while.

The stage from San Antonio runs no further than El Paso, and we had to wait two days for "the Overland," as it is called. Here my free ticket expired, and new arrangements had to be made. We had traveled seven hundred miles, and had thirteen hundred more to go, so that a little rest was not out of order.

El Paso, in Texas, is a very small town; but El Paso, Mexico, directly opposite, is a considerable place. It is a very old town, and like Mexican towns generally, is very irregular in shape. It has an air of antiquity about it that interests, and signs of dilapidation and decay—ancient which tell of revolution and bad government. During Santa Anna's last reign, windows were heavily taxed, and to evade the oppression, in many cases the sash was removed, and the opening walled up. I saw several habitations without a window, and only a single door.

The present contest between the Liberals and the Church party has driven many of the best citizens into exile; some are imprisoned—and the business and prosperity of the place are much damaged.

This valley of the Rio Grande is one of the richest and loveliest I ever saw. Here are the largest pear trees I ever beheld. Fruit trees in general are cultivated by every householder. The vineyards are large and carefully tended. Grape-culture and wine-making are the chief dependence, for money. It was too early for grapes, but I tasted the wine and found it excellent. Far superior, to my uncultivated taste, to most of the European brands. The vines are singularly managed. There is no frame for them to run on—no stake to uphold them. They are pruned very close every year, and the main stem becomes stout and strong, and looks like a stump—usually about two feet high. The young vines shoot out from this old stock, and are left to wave in the wind.

Wheat grows finely here. The fields are not enclosed. Irrigation is universal. There is one large canal, (we would term it—the Mexicans call it acequia—pronounced acokia,) with little trenches running in every direction, which form squares; in these, the water is allowed to stand till absorbed by the earth.

I was much interested in the style and instrument of ploughing. A long pole, with a natural or artificial prong—sometimes faced with iron—at one end; a pair of oxen, with the yoke lashed fast to the horns—one Mexican to hold the plough, another to drive the team—constitutes the arrangement. It is a scratching operation. Nebuchadnezzar, at the end of his grazing, could have done as well with his finger-nails. Strange to say, however, I was informed that the American settlers on the Rio Grande who ploughed deep, after the Eastern fashion, had been constrained to abandon their way and adopt the style of the country, as best adapted to production. I find the same theory of culture in California. If I were writing for an agricultural paper I would speculate a little—as it is, I forbear.

The Cathedral is a venerable building, said to be one hundred and fifty years old. It is an adobe structure, and looks like it might last another century. It is the chief building in the town—fronts the Plaza—and is conspicuous from many points of observation.

[By the way, is not that word "plaza" much prettier than our word "square?"]

When Congress modified the Gadsden treaty and left the valley of the Rio Grande to Mexico, a great mistake was made. Unless her silver mines should turn out to be an off-set, the whole of Arizona is not as valuable. But I must not anticipate.

At El Paso I found several pleasant acquaintances. Among them Judge Hart, whose kindness I can but commemorate. He was once an officer in the U. S. A., but resigned, married, and settled near El Paso, on the banks of the Rio Grande. His location is as barren as can be found in the Union, and yet he had the forecast to see that a fabulous fortune could be made just there. He built a mill for grinding wheat, and has a monopoly of the Far-west in the flour trade. Intelligent, refined and liberal, he has made a character as well as a fortune; and, in his adobe palace, he dispenses an elegant hospitality. His house is an oasis in a desert. His polite attention and exceeding kindness to me and mine will be long remembered. He is a Catholic by education and profession, but generously proposed to aid me in building a Southern Methodist Church, and in supporting a preacher.

God willing, I expect to provide for this place when the Conference meets at Golisd in November. There are several points to which the attention of the Church ought to be turned in this Western wilderness. There ought to be preaching at all the military posts, and wherever there is a nucleus of a settlement the gospel should be sent. It is my purpose to extend the appointments in the Pacific Conference Eastward, and of the Rio Grande, Westward; and I hope the policy will prevail till the lines are co-terminous.

I read in my boyhood, of "The vale of Avoca, where bright waters meet," and admired the poet's descriptive power. My hopes paint a lovelier scene, not far in the future, when two pioneer preachers shall shake hands at Tucson or Fort Yuma, and mutually say: "Now thanks be unto God that always causeth us to triumph in Christ, and maketh manifest the savor of his knowledge by us in every place."

To consummate this plan, the Church needs men of the type of those who signalized the heroic days of Methodism; men who can sleep without beds; live without dainties; eat beans and bacon; endure thirst and want; be strong in the faith, and keep happy in God; work without stint, and hold on to the end.

Where are they? Who will answer: "Here am I! Send me?" Heaven help us to do our duty.

LIFE OF DR. A. CLARKE BY ETHERIDGE.

A Work long needed—Qualifications of the Biographer—Adam Clarke, as a Child—Circumstances of his Youth—His Conversion—His early Ministry—Wants of Methodism at that day—Preparation of Clarke for his Work—His Works—Their Power in behalf of Arminian Methodism—Dr. Clarke's Honors—His Piety and Death.

FOR YEARS, a life of Dr. Clarke, written by some one viewing him from the Methodist stand-point, has been felt to be a desideratum in Europe and America. Every one acquainted with him personally, or through his writings, was convinced that a memoir worthy of him, and one that would perpetuate the wonderful impression which he made, had not been written. It is true that he had breathed his great spirit into his voluminous works, and had left in them the savour of his piety and learning. But the stalwart frame that had for half a century transported the rich treasures of his mind and heart from place to place, was now in the grave. Its itinerancy had ceased, and the multitudes could no longer treasure up the words of wisdom that usually fell from his lips. To them, the fountain of truth in the great Commentator had been closed by the hand of death. Comparatively, few have the leisure and learning necessary to a full appreciation and enjoyment of his works. A book was demanded which would, if possible, place the lucid expositor and evangelical preacher again before the masses of the people. To supply this want, and place the illustrious dead once more in a position to speak in his Master's name, was no easy task. To write the life of Dr. Clarke, and present him to the present generation of Methodists, as he grew and lived and acted in the past, was an undertaking that few would be willing to attempt. To accomplish such a work required peculiar gifts. It was conceded that his biographer, in taste and learning, should, in some degree, be the compeer of the great man whose character and influence he was to delineate. He must be able to follow him through the ponderous folios of Eastern learning; to examine with him the deep foundations of religious truth and faith; to stand with him upon the highest summit of revealed knowledge, and gaze upon the grand and infinite future of the Church; and then to bow beside him and worship at the same altar.

Fortunately for Methodism and for Christianity, these prerequisites, in a large degree, were possessed by Dr. Etheridge of the British Conference. This aptitude for the work, induced his brethren to request him to become the biographer of Dr. Clarke.

The volume before us shows the wisdom of the selection, and the taste and fidelity with which the writer has executed the task assigned him. As we open the book and begin to read, something in the plain features and honest face of the child arrests attention. In his thoughts, feelings and pastimes, he is a child. But his reverence for his father, the tender regard which he evinces for his mother, and the mingled emotions of hope and fear with which he contemplates the eternal Jehovah, show him to be no ordinary child. Samuel-like, he seems to have been called, almost from his mother's arms, to trust in God, and minister at his altar; and had his parents fully comprehended the treasure which the Lord had given them, in their tender-hearted and dutiful son, and given him the necessary counsel and encouragement, he would have "known the holy scriptures which were able to make him wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus," at a very early age. In view of the laborious and self-denying life for which he was designed as a Methodist preacher, the providence of God placed him at first in trying circumstances. He was obliged to assist his parents in making provision for their large household. He was compelled to divide his time between the privileges of the school-room and the arduous duties of the field. The directions which he read one day, in the Georgics of Virgil, on the next he could test in the actual experience of agricultural life. And the lessons of truth, studied under the supervision of his mother during the holy Sabbath, were confirmed and illustrated by the rich munificence of God, displayed in the grandeur and beauties of nature. This condition of poverty and trial, that would have disheartened a weaker nature, called out and exercised the resources of the youthful Clarke. It hardened and developed his body, accustomed his mind to grapple with difficulties, and drew away his heart from the sins which idleness and indulgence too often foster and encourage. While yet a youth, he had mastered himself, had obtained the key that unlocked to him, afterward, the store-houses of learning, and had formed habits of industry that distinguished him from his youthful companions.

These hopeful symptoms were noted by his parents, who were ever careful to give the mind and heart of their son the right direction. They rejoiced as they beheld the buddings of his intellect, and the increasing interest which he felt in the doctrines and requisitions of religion. It was about this time, says his biographer, that the first Methodist preacher visited Agherton, the parish in which the Clarkes lived. Young Adam attended the first meeting, and listened to the first sermon. Under the ministry of Mr. Brettell and Thomas Barker, he felt that he was a sinner, and sought and found the pearl of great price. His conviction was deep and pungent, and his conversion bright and clear. From this epoch in his life, he seems to have forced his way by divine aid into a new world. He began at once to lose his relish for the paltry honors, avocations and possessions of the world. The mysteries of revelation commenced to unfold themselves, the moral beauties of the Christian religion threw their powerful charm over his ardent nature, and the increasing conviction took possession of his soul that God had called him to a higher and holier work. "He conferred not with flesh and blood." His only cry was, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" And as his way was opened by Providence, and the light of inspiration showed him his duty, he shrank not from its toils and responsibilities. He became the priest of his father's family, and the angel of mercy to the morally destitute in his neighborhood. Wherever he went, the zealous rejoiced, the pious were comforted and strengthened, and the unregenerate "took knowledge of him that he had been with Jesus."

The young evangelist now began to see the nature of the work to which he had been called. He comprehended its dignity and difficulty, and he commenced in earnest to "study to show himself approved of God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth." It is truly interesting to contemplate this youthful preacher, as we see him in the descriptions of his biographer, going forth in his twenty-first year, to his first circuit. His manners are simple and child-like, his general deportment modest and becoming his years, and his countenance indicating that his mind and heart are probing "the deep things of God."

We involuntarily feel that there is power in that poorly clad young man, and that we shall hear from him again. Something whispers to us that he is a "chosen vessel," and that God intends to work through him. Expectation having been raised on tip-toe, we watch the young soldier of the cross as he advances to try his blade upon the angry foe. And as we look, he grows. He becomes a hero; he hurls the stones of truth from the gospel sling with unerring certainty. The ranks of the enemy melt away before him, and he stands the champion of the field. But his divine Master saw in him something more than the brave soldier. The Captain of his salvation recognized in him the able counselor and heroic leader. He was henceforth to occupy a conspicuous position.

The religious wants of the age were great and numerous and pressing. For centuries, the dogmas of men and the rubbish of ignorance and superstition had obscured the brightness and glory of true religion. The work of the Reformation had only partially recovered the health of the daughter of the Lord's people. The minds of men were in part illumined, but the veil was still upon their hearts. A moral darkness thick as night enveloped the people. The waters of life were still and stagnant. To change this melancholy condition of the Church and the world, God had put a new spirit in Wesley and his little band of zealous confederates. This defender of "the faith once delivered to the saints," was awake and alive to the true interests of society, but "When he first the work began,

Small and feeble was his day."

It is admitted that Methodism was turning the people from darkness unto light, and from the power of Satan unto God. Hundreds and thousands were assembling themselves together on Sabbath and week-days, to receive instruction and comfort from her pulpit. But she had then, little of her present power and influence. She was not one of the leading Protestant denominations. Hers was a "little flock," the earthly shepherds and sheep of which were equally despised. But small as this body of holy men and women was, the membership "feared God and worked righteousness," and the doctrines and usages of the society contained much of the simplicity, faith and purity of the first Christians. Fuel was wanting to feed this vestal flame, now burning upon Methodist altars, and kindling upon the hearts of Dissenters and Churchmen. And God was moving in a mysterious way to meet the emergency. It is true that the people and their new pastors had the Bible in their own language. This was the great reservoir, whence they drew the daily supplies of spiritual life and happiness. But to many of them, nay to all sober-minded Christians, the need of a rich Biblical Literature was greatly felt. Much had been written on the subject, by the wise and good, in every period of the Church. But these writings were in the mouldering tomb of the ancient languages. To resurrect them and send them forth, with fresh life and vigor, was felt to be the want of the Church and the age. If this could be done, and done too with the skill of a master, great results would follow. The minds of men would be moved. Learning and religion would be wedded. And wider influence, and mightier sweep would be given to the new evangelic movement. Adam Clarke was to lead in this noble work. While he had been disciplining the duties of his pastoral office, and meeting his obligations, as the head of a devoted and pious family, through desire, having separated himself, he sought and intermeddled with all wisdom. Had he been told what his Master's cause claimed at his hands, he might have trembled at the responsibility. But following the inclination of his own mind and heart, guided and illumined by the divine Spirit, he widened daily the foundation for his future usefulness. He did not seek curiously or presumptuously to lift the curtain from the secret things of God. Abraham-like, he moved forward, in obedience to God, not knowing whither he went. His motto seems to have been,

"Onward in faith, and leave the rest to heaven."

The well-instructed scribe now began to bring forth out of his treasury things new and old. His Translations, his Bibliographical Dictionary, his Commentary, and his heavier works, began to receive shape and form in his mind, and commenced their accretion, from the almost boundless stores of his biblical and lingual learning. With nearly every stroke of his pen, the Arminian Wesleyan theology increased and grew, until its colossal proportions became, in the consolations which they afforded to penitents and Christians, as "the shadow of a great rock in a weary land." Multitudes hastened to enjoy the rest and protection which it afforded. Methodism became one of the moral powers of the world, and shed its light and evangelism upon all the Churches of Christendom. Clergy and Bishops, and members of Parliament and Prelates, felt its strength, and magistrates and people bowed at its altars. Dr. Clarke was not alone in this struggle. He was aided in this moral revolution by others. Many of these, in some things, were his equals, perhaps his superiors. But in sacred learning and literature, he was the head and leader. As he grew in wisdom and influence, he grew also "in favor with God and men." Master of Arts, Doctor of Laws, and Fellow of the chief literary and scientific Institutions of the old world, were successively awarded to him as tokens of the universal admiration felt for his talents, piety and learning. His literary work was now finished, and a grateful Church, and an appreciating country, delighted to do him honor. As he went from place to place, in obedience to the calls of annual meetings and Christian festivals, held in behalf of mission, Bible, and philanthropic societies, he was every where greeted with an enthusiastic welcome. When Richard Watson merrily said to him, "we must make an Archbishop of you," he uttered a sentiment expressive of the reverence and love felt by all for Dr. Clarke. Each of his tours during the last few years of his life, was more like a triumphal procession than the ordinary journey of a Methodist preacher. How did the great man wear his honors? Did his heart grow vain, or his brain reel, as he stood in the highest places of the Church and the world? Never! His modesty, simplicity and piety never left him. Often did he leave the volumes of ancient lore, and the society of the wise and great, to enjoy the privileges of the class-room, and to mingle in the devotions of the prayer-meeting. But he was now old. His head was hoary with age, and his "garments white in the blood of the Lamb." The aged soldier, covered with glory, leaned upon his shield. The Methodist Elijah stood by Jordan, in expectation of the heavenly chariot. Suddenly it came, and on the night of the 26th of August, 1832, Adam Clarke left the toils of earth and the companionship of men for the rest of heaven and the society of angels.

Hoping, Mr. Editor, that this imperfect outline of the contents of the book may induce many to read the new Life of Dr. Clarke, I am yours, etc. A. S. ANDREWS.

AMERICAN SEAMEN'S FRIEND SOCIETY.—

OPPOSITION OF REV. T. P. CRYMES.

MR. EDITOR: In your paper, of 10th inst., I notice an article from the pen of Mr. Crymes, of Talladega, Alabama, the object of which seems to be unkind reflection upon myself, and injury, (so far as Mr. C. may be able to exert an influence in his denomination,) to the American Seamen's Friend Society, with which I am in any humble way co-operating.

I do not intend a reply at length to the letter alluded to, but simply a reference to one or two points. And first, why did Mr. Crymes write and publish his letter? When I called on him in Talladega, after some conversation upon the subject of my mission, he remarked that he was not satisfied as to the propriety of Methodist co-operation, and asked if I would have any objection to his addressing a letter of inquiry as to expediency, etc., to the editor of the N. O. Christian Advocate. My answer was, that I had no objection whatever.

But, does he write the letter of inquiry? Or of apology, (we claim no apology,) for his course? Neither—but to "exculpate himself in the judgment of the Alabama Conference." It is evident that he did not expect to be arraigned before his conference for refusing his sympathy to the sons of the ocean, that he should thus in advance defend himself. The object is too plain to be mistaken. But I pass on to notice with a word the following paragraph—

"And, moreover it appears that Mr. Law is the only Missionary to sailors in Alabama, employed by this Association. He is therefore nearly half his time lecturing and lifting collections from the wealthy congregations of all denominations to support himself the other half. If he has the success of other agents in Alabama engaged in laudable undertakings, I should think him handsomely suported; and he certainly does not collect funds to send elsewhere."

The first impression sought to be made here is, that the Seamen's Society in its looseness is unworthy of confidence; and the second, that I, in my love of "filthy lucre," will lift collections, without limitation, for my personal use.

I will state that I receive a stated salary for my services as missionary in Mobile Bay and traveling agent. My salary for last season was paid before I commenced my summer agency. We have in the port of Mobile two stations, costing annually $2500 or $3000 to support them, independently of our hospital expenses. Mobile gives $1000 or $1500 towards this amount, leaving $1500 or $2000 to be raised in the interior. And this, I believe, is more than all the churches, so far as called on, have ever done in the interior of Alabama in any one year. Besides, Mr. C. knows, if he knows anything about it, that the funds collected by the Am. Seamen's Fr. Society are used as much or more to support Methodist missionaries than Baptists. But enough about this. I will close by saying to Mr. Crymes that I might mention a number of others of the most intelligent and pious ministers of his church in the State who sympathize and co-operate with our efforts for the "conversion of the abundance of the sea." But it will be shorter to say that he, the Rev. Thomas P. Crymes, stands alone in his opposition, so far as my knowledge extends. Most truly yours, F. M. LAW.

Gainesville, Aug. 25, '59.

P. S. Mr. C. alludes to the "few sailors that come into Mobile." Before he writes again he would do well to inform himself as to the number of seamen coming annually into our Southern ports, and especially into the ports of Mobile and New Orleans. F. M. L.

THE Charleston Mercury learns that Hon. D. L. Yulee has purchased two steamboats for the route between Cedar Keys and New Orleans, on the proposed great through mail route of the seaboard, and that two iron steamboats have been contracted to be built for the route between Charleston and Fernandina.

ACROSS TEHUANTEPEC.

Coatzacoalcos River—Beauty of the Country—Minatitlan—Bungoes—Grand Night Scene—Tropical Morning—Madame Brewer's—Suchil—The Road—Tree of Death—Tehuantepec City—Ventosa—The Best Route—Tehuantepec a Glorious Country.

WE were three days at sea from New Orleans to the bar off the harbor, at the mouth of Coatzacoalcos river; here we were transferred aboard a steam lighter, that bore us into port and up the river as far as Minatitlan, a distance of twenty miles. The bar, I was informed, had uniformly about fourteen feet of water on it. The harbor is spacious, and capable of giving safe anchorage even to a fleet. To the right of the entrance, on a height, is a fortification, commanding the harbor and its entrance, of ancient and formidable appearance. The river presents a bold and majestic appearance, and is as wide as the Mississippi, and somewhat reminds one of it. The country on either hand, as far up as Minatitlan, and even for some miles above, is a vast delta, and subject to periodic inundations, with now and then points of elevation lifting above high water mark. Vast plains on either hand sweep away from the river, covered with green grass, flag and flowering plants, with here and there groups of feathery palm and cocoanut trees, with slender, graceful shafts, in picturesque and varied beauty. Now intervene dense green forests of all the torrid growth, the aged trees tagged with long pendants of grey moss and festooning parasites and climbering vines, which, in verdant wreaths, bind the locking boughs of the thorny forest, weaving all in impenetrable jungle.

Minatitlan is a village of perhaps fifteen hundred inhabitants. For the most part, its tenements are rude, such as are peculiar to the Indian of that country, built of reed and thatched with the palm leaf; others daubed with mud and roofed with tile. Some few American built frame houses of recent date contrast strangely with these primitive structures.

At this point, we were changed aboard a steamer of lighter draught, which bore us some thirty miles farther up, and grounding, a few of us managed to procure a couple of "bungoes" and an Indian crew to pole us up to Suchil, some sixty or seventy miles distant, ascertaining it impossible for the steamer to proceed further—she being of too heavy draught for the stage of water. The balance of the passengers we left behind to await the fleet of "bungoes" expected down from Suchil with the California passengers, with a bountiful supply of all that was needful. We pushed away from the steamer just as the greyish twilight was deepening into the blacker shades of night. Soon, separated from our companions of the other boat, we saw them on the river no more. As on we glided, one by one gleamed forth the glistening stars with silvery beam to light the murky night; ever and anon the fire-fly blazed in pallid glow from the dark forest or along the humid shore. Except the rippling waters, all was still, save that ominous voice that seems ever in tongues, strange and unknown, in torrid nights and wilds, to whisper. Our the bosom of a majestic stream like this, dimly gleaming in the uncertain starlight, with dense, dark jungle on either hand, vocal tongues and voices of insect, reptile, bird and beast, to more northern ears strange and unaccustomed, and over the water in strange sounds and voices joining those of the forest, how deep the solemn impressment and poetic effect of the scene! Like the thickening shades of twilight, gradually deepens to mysterious awe, and round the soul weaves its magic spell, blading the mind in dreamy reveries, mingling mystic hopes and fears, and vague undefined tidal flows of emotional pain and pleasure in dumb succession chase the tardy hours of night away; his thread of destiny one feels strangely interwoven in some mystic web of the fates, by rude concussions and rebounds, and the crew's no gentle imprecations break upon our ears, and ever and anon return him to tangible mortal reckoning. Thus were the night away till morning's lighted beam the curtains of night began to unfold and Nature's face to illume.—The solemn stillness was rudely broken by the chatter of armies of noisy monkeys, and droves of wild, screaming macaws, pheasants, parrots, parroquettes, and hosts of other queer looking birds and beasts of the noisy order, and now and then the silvery voice of some sweet warbler of the feathery tribe. Long, lazy alligators, and fat, waddling turtles by the hundred, sleep along the sandy flats; solemn, long-visaged herons, and graceful white cranes, aroused from seeming insanity, in droves through the air sluggishly fly; and ducks in great variety, from the over-grown muscovy to the tiny dapper, rise and circle, quacking through the air, and the beautiful, pink-plumaged flamingo in seeming intelligence of the high estimation in which is held its gay plumage by our fashionable world, rise in droves and fly, screaming timidly, to the distance. In the branches of the forest cooed mournfully the ring-dove, and a large-sized pigeon.

The dense forest of over-hanging trees, parasites and vines, crowning the watery margin, clad in rich sylvan honors, diffuse the balmy sweets of their many-hued flowers to the morning air;—these, each and all held in softened relievo by morn's misty entrails, make up a scene as full of animate freshness as did the night of solemn impressiveness.

As onward we now proceed, chains of hills lift along at intervals, giving picturesque beauty to the landscape, and making charmingly undulatory the banks of the river—oft transporting my mind in halcyon memories back to the fair stream on which I was born—the Alabama—matchless for beauty and picturesque variety. After two nights and nearly two days thus spent, we arrived at Madame Brewer's, (an American lady, and long a resident of this wild country,) sixteen miles below Suchil, whom we, after refreshing a couple of hours, procured horses, and, with guides, after five hours of further travel through wild forests, following a blind trail through almost inaccessible jungles, arrived at Suchil. Here we were kindly received and hospitably entertained by the agents of the company—furnished with good beds, and enjoyed a night of balmy slumber, and awoke in the morning refreshed from the fatigues of our travel.

Suchil is at the head of navigation on the Coatzacoalcos, and as yet consists of a few rudely constructed tenements for the occupancy of company employees, and the accommodation of passengers. From this point, the stages of the company are in operation to the Pacific; there being, however, no train ready here, we were posted on mules twelve miles out, when we found in waiting a light and convenient Concord wagon, in which we, with flying speed, rolled on our journey. The road from Suchil is up a gentle incline, and over gently undulating hills. The road is broad, capable of admitting two teams abreast, is in excellent repair, and leads through a dense woodland of wild and picturesque country, the wide-spreading bough often locking, and even at noonday shelter the traveler from the sun's vertical ray. Overhead, monkeys and bright-plumed birds maintained a noisy clamor. A musical cricket, in great numbers, sang along the road in melody strongly imitative of the hurdy-gurdy, only in better tune, softer, and discoursing much sweeter music. I was much struck with the beauties and peculiarities of a tree that grows in these wilds in great abundance known as the Tree of Death. It derives this significant name from its anomalous conformation into a tree. At first it crops an insignificant vine like the ivy, many of these clambering up from the earth, circle the giants of the forest, continuing to enlarge their own trunks, meet and unite, forming a covering completely casing over the sustaining tree in trunk and bough, which, from loss of circulation, dies and gradually decays, leaving the parasite hollow and heartless, a giant tree in its place. Some are of immense diameter and altitude. (Not inapropos this of others of the same genus in the more elevated orders of creation.) Our road as described (crossing a number of streams, rivulets and tributaries of the Coatzacoalcos mainly, all of them spanned by arching bridges,) continues from Suchil some forty miles, when it opens out on an elevated table land, but sparsely wooded, and covered with long, wavy grass, which seemed to afford the browsing herds grateful pasturage. The climate, which below was soft and balmy, now we found cool and bracing, being fanned by a sharp, constant breeze from the Pacific, much like the valleys and table-lands bordering the coast of California. When commences a gradual descent to the Pacific, the climate again softens, and a dense thorny woodland sets in of dwarfed growth, abounding in many varieties of pricking cactus—one of which, like fluted columns, rises thirty feet or more, spreading wide its antlered boughs, and of trunk several feet in diameter. The soil, which on the other side was a sandy loam, now evinces a strong alkaline base, and an impalpable dust, when stirred, filled the air. Nature here, too, abounds in many varieties of gay-plumed and clamorous birds, and sweet warblers; among the latter, is our own sweet minstrel, the mocker, here however of diminished proportions, but nevertheless sings the wild flooding lay of our own native bird. Thus continues the country to the Pacific. Approaching the vicinity of Tehuantepec City, little cactus or olive-hedged ranchos became frequent, which heretofore we found only at long intervals, the stands for the relay of horses being the only ones established since the opening of the route, prior to which time the country crossed by the transit road being an uninhabited wilderness.

Tehuantepec is a city of some twelve or fifteen thousand inhabitants, and for the most part Indian, but cheerful and fine looking. The extraordinary health of the city is evinced by the great number of children of all ages and sexes seen throughout its streets—more I am certain, than I never saw in any city of its size in the United States. Through it runs a river of limpid waters, of some fifty yards in width, but not navigable by reason of its rocks and shifting sands. The buildings here are mainly after the Indian style of architecture, as in Minatitlan, with, however, many creditable exceptions, showing preference for the more ornate, massive and comfortable style of the Spaniards.

Leaving Tehuantepec, after enjoying an excellent repast and a few hours of rest, our road leading down a gentle incline, in two hours arrived at Ventosa, the terminus of the Company's transit line on the Pacific.

Ventosa consists of only a few rude wooden tenements of the Company, and a hotel or two besides. The harbor here, though not so good as the Coatzacoalcos, yet is sufficient for all practical purposes of the Company; and should the wants of commerce demand it, a break-water can be built, making it excellent for all time to come, and at a comparatively small cost. We found no difficulty, by means of a surf boat, in being landed on the Oregon, which lay some hundreds of yards distant.

Ventosa is twelve miles from Tehuantepec, and one hundred and seven from Suchil, which distance we made in little over twenty-four hours, and the time from New Orleans to our landing on the steamer Oregon seven days, with all the delays on the river, which delays might easily be obviated by introducing light draught steamers, making the river navigable at all season's; which since my transit, I learn, has been done. If so, to Californians, desirous of a speedy voyage East, I can conceive of no comparison between this and any of the other routes, as it affords equal fare, and reduces to one half the time and the distance of travel. I arrived in California in eighteen days from New Orleans, and was delayed four or five days on the way; came up with passengers from New York and New Orleans, by way of Panama, who left eight or ten days before I did. This of itself shows sufficiently the advantage of the Tehuantepec route from California going East, there being no delay, the voyage is easily and commonly made in fourteen days. This route is but recently established: what may we expect in the fullness of its completion and perfection?

The Isthmus of Tehuantepec possesses no less fertility of soil than it has variety of climate, beauty and diversity of scenery. Free from those deadly malarious diseases peculiar to the torrid zone, it wastes not the energies of the white man as other far Southern climes—has within it all that can make a people comfortable, independent and happy, or a State rich, prosperous and powerful. Her valleys in greatest abundance will yield sugar cane, coffee, cotton, cocoa, cochineal, [illegible] yams and Indian corn, with all the fruits of the torrid zone, while its table lands will produce all the small grains equal to California; and having two rainy seasons, will mature two crops a year. The precious woods, such as mahogany, ebony, rosewood, logwood, and even the India rubber tree, she has an exhaustless supply of. She abounds in minerals of all kinds, particularly of gold and silver, and her mines sleep unworked and but few of them even with owners. No less rich is she in natural curiosities, such as vast caves, glowing in stalactite and stalagmite gems, and springs, hot and cold, possessing mineral properties miraculous in sanitary effect, and organic remains of orders of animal existence extinct in living species, to say nothing of those wonderful ruins of vast altars and temples left here, the only monuments of an extinct civilization. No record or tradition, nought but these speak of their ever having been; even to them the only mourners left by the cold unsparing reaper, death, are the hollow winds which in solemn dirge their requiem sigh. Time, the aged sexton, from dust of unknown, unrecorded, dim ages his tumuli over them high has raised, ere Nature, the good gardener, forgetful of such existence, in the fertile earth sowed the thrifty seed that over them for centuries unencumbered in aged trees heavenward their hoary heads have lifted.

In view of all the foregoing, is there on earth a land that to all classes of our countrymen so commends itself to their travel, emigration and enterprise as that of Tehuantepec? To the man of science, because it abounds in natural curiosities; to the lover of nature, for no where on earth is there greater profusion of the beautiful; to the tiller of the soil, for the fertility of the land promises him more than a hundred fold yield; to the artizan and laborer, for there is much in the land to do and but few to do it; and last, though not least, to the statesman and politician, who with an eye of destiny makes calculation of the influence a land thus conditioned, located and acclimated in time to come is to exercise upon the commerce and intercommunication of the nations of earth, who can see vast cities rising to her ont of the commerce of ocean, and toiling intellectual millions holding sway where anarchy and indolence are content to subsist on the soil's natural yield.

In view of the fact that Tehuantepec is the shortest line of communication between the widely-separated extremities of our country, reducing to one-half the usual time and distance of travel, without mentioning the commercial advantages springing from it, is it not sufficient argument to the General Government to take it under her own immediate patronage and give to it her protection and fostering care? Particularly does it behoove her to act promptly, now, regarding it, while Mexico is divided in intestine broils and powerless to deny, and the whole of Europe engaged in exhausting wars at home, unable to render aid and content to be let alone. And does not our government, in thus facilitating intercommunication and commerce, increase her wealth, make stronger her power, perpetuate the union and bind in fraternity her widely dissevered extremities?—*Cor. NOAH'S ARK AND THE GREAT EASTERN.

THE New York Courier and Enquirer, noticing the departure of this immense vessel from Liverpool and her arrival at Portland, makes the following interesting comparison between the Great Eastern and Noah's Ark:

It will be a brave sight—this floating furlong, careering in from the ocean depths. The monster would carry consternation, but luckily for the Yankees, she has been advertised. The Redskins of the Mississippi saw its first steamboat and lost there senses; they didn't take the papers. The Portlanders are forewarned, and are even now, we presume, keeping a sharp look-out for the electric light at the masthead; the six masts, the hundred furnaces, and the ten boilers, the 350 engineers and sailors, and the gallant captain, at his central post, raking fore and aft with his telescope. O nimis beati! those Portlanders. And woe is to us that our lot is so far away from the Baamchenungamook and the Moosetockmaguntic.

The Great Eastern differs from all ships which have been built before it in three respects—the chief of which is its excessive magnitude. Nothing like it has ever before floated. Ordinary steamers and ships are like cockboats by her side. Wn give the figures of her huge dimensions in another column, but those naked numerals convey but the vaguest idea. The immense steamships in the English and the American Navy hardly equal half her length or breadth, and yet such vessels as the Himalaya, the Persia, the Adriatic and the Niagara have hitherto been regarded as absolute prodigies in marine architecture. METHODIST QUARTERLY

...clesiastical patriotism, and appreciation of the ...ion periodical literature, which, at the last General Conference, saved the Quarterly Review from the reactionary ebb-tide of an ill-conned financial and literary utilitarianism, find increasing vindication in the character of each successive number. This is as true of the October number as of any of its predecessors. The Quarterly must be continued, until its general circulation and appreciation, among the great body of our preachers and people, shall be the best and most encouraging evidence of that devotion to study and religious culture, which is to be, in connection with the just growth of her original evangelical and spiritual power, the future glory of Methodism. When the Church Quarterly is as generally read as the popular newspaper, among our people, we may then begin to look for the realization of the best hopes of the consecrated thinkers among us—that literature and culture are becoming, what they ought to have been long ago, the eldest and most dutiful children in the family of Christianity—rays of the same central Sun from which emanate the light and warmth of the gospel of the grace of God. We boast much of the extent to which literature is made the handmaid of religion; but the limited range of the circulation of our periodicals is a test that dissipates the clouds of our exaggerated calculations. This is the true test. Our people advance in literary culture in precise accordance with the circulation of our periodicals. Any other ratio is fictitious and deceptive.

The first article in the present number is from the same elegant and skilful pen that is now picturing forth, in the columns of this paper, that series of pulpit-portraits headed, "Among the Preachers." The portrait of Dr. Arnold in the Quarterly is simply full-length and life-size, while those in the Advocate are ambrotypes ...only the head and bust. We extract some ... the Editor's pen about the present and next ... the Quarterly.

"OUR PRESENT NUMBER.—Some of our friends wish to know the names of all the contributors: we are not sure that we are authorized to give the names of any of them, this time, while some have laid us under a positive interdict. What must we do? We can help our readers to guess—if they need any help—who wrote the first article, ("The Rev. Thomas Arnold, D.D." P. 481,) one who resembles his subject in more respects than one, and who writes about him con amore—"L." cannot be hid. The second article, ("An attempt to preserve the Catholic faith in its purity," P. 508,) is from a legal gentleman from Tennessee: the reader will quite likely want to know more of him—so does the editor. The third article, ("The divine covenants," P. 528,) is from beyond the Gulf—no one will say "it leans too much towards Calvinism." The fourth article, ("Dr. Schaff's Church History," P. 543,) betrays its Teutonic origin—all may not agree with the worthy and erudite Professor in his high estimate of Dr. Schaff's History. The fifth article, ("Scientific import and value of the first chapter of Genesis," P. 547,) may cause a slight sensation. It is from the pen that wrote "The Unity of the Christian Church" in the number for October, 1858. We may not let his name transpire—we cannot endorse his theory. He writes as if he had no fear of geologists before his eyes—we challenge some of them to try a lance with him: the Quarterly shall be the arena for the tournament. Whatever may be said of the theory he proposes, it must be admitted that he takes hold of the subject with a vigorous grasp, and some will think deals demolishing blows on the theories which he opposes, e. g., that concerning the origin of coal. The editor can tolerate a little scientific heresy, however pertinacious he may be in regard to theological orthodoxy. The remaining articles must speak for themselves."

"OUR JANUARY NUMBER promises to be one of unusual interest. Bishop Soule has kindly allowed us to copy a portfolio of Wesleyan MSS. presented to him by Miss Tooth in 1842, when he was our representative to the British Conference: they consist of a fragment of a sermon by John Wesley's father; a letter of John Wesley to his sister Patty; a hymn of Charles Wesley's; a letter of Lady Huntington to Charles Wesley; letters from various members of the Wesley family, Benson, Clarke, Wilberforce, and Butterworth. The original documents are now before us. They are deeply interesting. Miss Tooth, who presented them to Bishop Soule, is a daughter of Samuel Tooth, a steward of City Road Chapel, who paid the salaries of the preachers.—"Evangelism"—"German Theology"—"A review of Mansel's Limits of Religious Thought," by a new contributor—A review of the Life of Milton, by "L."—a review of a certain popular work, by a new pen—and other papers of a high order, are either in esse or in posse for our next issue. Certain of our friends will be kind enough to forward their favors immediately. That theologico-legal article, and others that have been promised, must be forwarded soon, or they will not be in time for the January number.

"OUR NEXT VOLUME.—The friends of the Quarterly Review are aware of the circumstances under which its continued publication was secured at the last General Conference: they need not here be stated. It may suffice to say that on the credit basis it had failed by large annual amounts to support itself; and its discontinuance was seriously meditated. Hundreds of names on the subscription books were ascertained to be unavailable to the publisher, who found it expedient to cancel the entire list, and adopt the cash principle. By this policy, with the active support of many valuable agents, and the co-operation of a number of the most gifted writers in the South, we have been able to make the subscription list defray the expenses of the publication for the past year.

For reasons sufficiently obvious, the editor has not made the work correspond to his ideal of a Church Review; but he has done what he could, under the circumstances, to realize the wishes of those who demanded the continuation of the Quarterly; and he is repaid for his effort by the assurance that they have not been altogether disappointed in their expectations. The notes of approval and kind suggestions which reach us through the press, North and South, as well as by private communication, are duly appreciated and gratefully recognized. ...patronage for another volume, we have ... that the general character of the work as ... will be sustained. An effort will be ... greater prominence to Review matter pro... of our best and most judicious friends agree ... in preferring such, in a work of this ..., to mere essays, however valuable. We are happy ... some of the most gifted pens in the South ... are now employed in preparing articles of a high order for the next volume. We shall aim at a discreet mixture of theological, literary, and general articles, supplying, as we may be able, any want of variety in the favors of contributors, by our own Brief Reviews, Notes and Correspondence, and Repertory, thereby incorporating, as far as may be compatible with the staid character of a Quarterly Review, the popular element desiderated by a great many of our friends.

As the amount and character of the matter contained in the Quarterly must to some degree be graduated by the extent of patronage with which it is favored, we respectfully and earnestly request all the friends of an elevated periodical literature in our community to rally around the Review, and give it such a support as will enable us to put it side by side with any work of its class in any part of the world."

MR. MILBURN AND HIS NEW BOOK.*

WE READ this book through, without stopping, immediately upon its reception. And this, we feel assured, will be the case of most into whose hands it may fall. All criticism aside, it has that first of modern literary excellences—readableness. In this book-making age, when even literary men are compelled to select one in twenty books in order to keep up with the tide of current literature, (how appropriate that word "current!") it is no small demerit of value in a book, that it is readable.

The dedication to his wife is not only an honor justly due to an amiable woman and excellent wife, but peculiarly appropriate in a work of this kind—the record of his "preacher-life"—a history in which this trustful one has been a character and a power of far more importance than she ever imagined.

The history of the loss (almost total) of his sight, which Mr. Milburn here gives for the first time, publicly, will be of touching interest and satisfaction to thousands who have heard him preach, and have had their curiosity excited, as to how much he can see, how he chanced to be blind, and how he has overcome, in the prosecution of his studies, the difficulties consequent upon his infirmity. The correctness of Mr. Milburn's own opinion—a very natural one—that he is greatly damaged, as a public speaker, by his inability to see, we have always doubted. Indeed, knowing him well—bold and paradoxical as it may appear—our conviction is very decided that, all things considered, he would never have attained to his present remarkable power as a public speaker, had he not been partially blind. The disadvantages are more than counterbalanced by the compensations of his situation.

One of the most valuable characteristics of this book is its tendency to inspire the multitudes of this country, not favored with a regular education, with a love of books, and to awaken in them a sense of the value of reading. In this respect, it will be both a delight and a benefit to the great body of young Methodist preachers, not blessed with early educational advantages. Mr. Milburn, of all other Methodist preachers, has been thought, by many, to possess the least adaptation to the masses of the people. The contrary, however, is the truth, with his book. In this country, a man sprung from the ranks of the people, and attaining, without the higher scholastic advantages, to unmistakable success in literature, thought and pulpit ability, is at once, the best of all representatives of the inspiring culture common to both American Citizenship, and the Methodist Itinerancy. "Reading, meditation and prayer," is the Pauline "course of study;" it is the course of study which has blessed the world with that mighty race of preachers raised up by Methodism; it is the only course of study open to the masses of the American people; and, for the general good, it is worth more than all the collegiate courses of the world combined;—though, these also, are all-important, both intrinsically and relatively.

The book has many other elements of attraction. The sympathy with the character, manners, and significance of frontier life—of life among frontier Methodists and Methodist preachers—and, especially, of life in the Southern States—will be found to be deep and genuine.

Mr. Milburn's powers of generalizing, and character-painting, though the ideal rather unduly illumines the actual, are nevertheless remarkable. Shut up in almost total darkness, as he is, but few men of his age are better acquainted with the facts and philosophy of American life.

To Southern and Southern Methodist readers, there are three features in this book of special interest. The first is his frank avowal of the truth of the complaint against him while a member of the Alabama Conference—that his theological and spiritual soundness was seriously impaired by his devotion to German and English transcendental and pantheistic literature. His confessions on this point, are the "confessions" of a spiritual "opium-eater." But they are gratifying, nevertheless—very much so—as indicating the ultimately saving power of the evangelical principles in which he was originally instructed, and the extensive usefulness which is within his reach. It used to be said of him, that nothing but Summerfield's piety was wanting to give him Summerfield's usefulness. Though doubtless injured in the way he describes, Mr. Milburn, we imagine, was always, at heart, a sounder Methodist preacher than he now admits. His doctrinal danger, though great, is exaggerated in his own mind, we think, now that he has escaped as a bird out of the snare of the fowler. We thought then, and think yet, that his greatest danger was experimental rather than doctrinal—of the heart, rather than of the head. Spirituality is the conservator of orthodoxy, and heterodoxy is the legitimate fruit of spiritual declension.

But we had almost forgotten the other features alluded to. The second is, the justice done to Southern life and character, to which Mr. Milburn pays a tribute as noble and beautiful as it is justly deserved. Most of the "representative men" and women of the South whom he portrays we chance to know, and rejoice to recognize. The third feature, is the justice he does to Methodism, in the vindication of those peculiarities which constitute her greatest glorying, and the grounds of the greatest objections to her.

The style of the book throughout is simple, idiomatic, elegant, and philosophical. In the narrative parts, its variety, movement, and vivacity, keep up an unflagging interest in the mind of the reader.

There is one thing, in conclusion, to which we direct the attention of young Methodist preachers. In the preface, Mr. Milburn avows, as having been the principal aim of his entire course of culture, what he had often avowed to his Alabama friends in private intercourse, namely: "The acquisition of the power and habit of extemporaneous speech." This was, no doubt, partly suggested by his infirmity, which left this as the only course of successful and available development fully open to him, in which he could exert all his energies and avail himself of all possible culture.

But "the acquisition of the power and habit of extemporaneous speech" is not merely proper, as an expedient, to a man afflicted with blindness; it is the peculiar art of the Methodist preacher, and should be matter of constant, energetic, life-long study and practice. If there may be "arts of holy living," there should be the art of effective preaching. The acquisition of such an art does not either ignore or forfeit the "unction of the Holy One," but rather recognizes and secures it; and with the art added to the unction, the power of a preacher will be doubled, perhaps trebled or quadrupled. Mr. Milburn is a striking instance of the truth of this view.

*"TEN YEARS OF PREACHER-LIFE.—Chapters from an Autobiography, by William Henry Milburn, Author of "The Rifle, Axe and Saddle-Bags." New York, Derby & Jackson, 119 Nassau street, 1859.

THE COTTON CROP OF 1858-59 is ascertained to be 3,851,481 bales.

THE SUICIDE MANIA.

FIFTY-THREE SUICIDES, in the six weeks terminating with August, are reported by the N. Y. Daily Times, as having occurred in the United States. This, surely, has never been equalled by any country on the globe. "There is a screw loose," if not many of them, in the machinery of American civilization.

It is lamentable that trouble in the home, which should be the most heavenly place on earth, has been the cause in a majority of instances. Next in potency, has been "straightened circumstances and disappointments in love." Not one from religious mania.

Indeed, the lack of religion has been the real cause of all of them, philosophize, and sentimentalize, and poetize, as we may on the subject. A lonely, clouded, benighted, unfortunately circumstanced spirit, depending alone upon this world's help and comfort, which it is powerless to give, and which help and comfort, were they in reach, would be powerless for the cure of wounds and sorrows which heaven alone can heal, has mistaken "the path of life," and, in order to escape the gloom which increases at every step, plunges into the dark jungle of suicide, and is lost forever.

Men call them insane. The Scriptures better describe them: "Having no hope, and without God, in the world." A man lost in this dark world, without the sunshine of immortal hope, coming from God, and leading to Him, has no security that he will not fall into a life of crime and misery, and end it by suicide. A mind thoroughly acquainted with the divine, beautiful, and hopeful teachings of the Bible; a character founded upon its principles, and a life guided by its precepts; and a heart illumined, cheered and purified, by its firm faith and heartsome charity and hope; are the only reliable securities against the despair, which, like a mill-stone round the neck of the soul, sinks the victim into the dead sea of suicide.

The lack of religion, the root of all this evil, is seen in nearly all the features of American life. Full as our land is of Churches and Bibles and the externals of religion, American life is, to an increasingly large extent, projected upon a scale, the philosophy, calculations, and results of which are not only independent of the Bible, but in direct antagonism to its doctrines and commandments. "If thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light; but if thine eye be evil, thy whole body shall be full of darkness. If, therefore, the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness!" "He that will save his life (will take it out of the hands of God to save it) shall lose it; but he that will lose his life for my sake, shall find it." "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" is a law of life that is generally disregarded in this land; and yet it is the only law by which a grand, good, and happy life can be attained.

Men and women marry in contravention of this law; and the conscience having been disregarded, the heart is, by natural consequence, disregarded also. Marriage for money and convenience—from avarice, pride, vanity, pleasure—takes the place of the old-fashioned, godly, and goodly "marriage for love," and the result is an evil harvest of "domestic troubles"—a second "fall of man"—turning him out of the Eden of a happy home, and making the married life, which was intended to blossom, bud, and abound in domestic joys, to bring forth the "briers and thorns" of uncongeniality, hatred and misery.

Men, also, live for money, in all their business philosophy and practice, instead of living "unto him who died for them and rose again;" forgetting that "a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth." The blessing of God is not upon a business thus projected, and when failure ensues, there is nothing better, higher, diviner, to fall back upon. "All things work together for good to them that love God," is a consolution but seldom sought by unfortunate business men in this Christian country.

The Commercial Advertiser pertinently says: "The origin and frequency of the crime we believe to be twofold. First, the common under-valuing of human life. Almost every man who takes human life, every man-slayer, whether of malice and premeditation, or of sudden provocation, or from recklessness and carelessness, finds his numerous apologists and sympathisers. Where he has acted under the smart of injuries or even insult, he has not only escaped punishment but has been lauded and almost deified. The value of the life of the slain man, its importance to society, its necessity to his family, all these are counted as nothing. They do not enter into the estimate which society too often forms of the man-slayer or even of the deliberate murderer. Of course, this social sentiment must react upon individuals. The man soon learns to hold in light esteem that which society is constantly telling him is of little or no value, and life comes to be regarded as a thing that may be unceremoniously thrown away or destroyed so soon as it becomes irksome and intolerable.

Second, and really the basis of the social or popular sentiment to which we have just referred, is the fact that those upon whom depends the creation of a sound Christian judgment on this subject, have been unfaithful to the responsibilities resting upon them. The preacher and the parent have much to do with checking the prevalence of self-murder, and so have public teachers of every class. The criminality—the literally unpardonable criminality—of self-murder is rarely taught in our pulpits, in our presses, or in our families. The pulpit has, in fact, often been the apologist—nay, sometimes the eulogist—of the suicide, as will be within the memory of every reader. Self-murder is almost habitually spoken of only as a "rash act," and not as a crime and a cowardice. The parent too rarely if ever inculcates upon the minds of his children that to "rush unbidden into the presence of our Maker," is criminal as well as the act of a coward and a fool.

"One more unfortunate,

is the hardest term now-a-days applied to the self-murderer, the poetry being as false in philosophy as it is in true and genuine humanity. He is not humane or philanthropic who teaches that self-murder is no crime, but only rashness or misfortune. If we are to stay this horrifying prevalence of self-murder—fifty-three publicly recorded in six weeks, and who knows how many unrecorded?—public teachers of every class—preachers, parents, journalists, poets, etc.—must abandon this super-sentimentality, and call self-murder by its right name—a crime against God, against the individual, and against society.

THE FUTURE OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE NORTH.

Louis Napoleon is trying to out-general Europe, Douglas is trying to out general American politicians, and Abel Stevens is trying to out-general the radical abolitionists of the Northern Methodist Church. They all bring the batteries of the press to bear—Napoleon in the Moniteur, Douglas in Harper's Monthly, Abel Stevens in the Christian Advocate and Journal, assisted by his friends in Harper's Weekly. The last named journal contains the radically significant article below. The implied threat indicates a dire necessity. The abolitionists will be beaten, we suppose—frightened out of their zeal. But to the article:

"The elections of delegates to the General Conference of May, 1860, are proceeding, and the indications are that the ultra Northern party will succeed in obtaining more than a majority in the General Conference, which is to be held at Buffalo. The question to be decided by that body is of sufficient public interest to deserve some notice at the hands of the secular press.

"Those who are unfamiliar with the subject may need to be informed that a rule of the Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church excludes from membership all persons who engage in "the buying and selling of men, women, and children, with the intention to enslave them." This rule has always been so interpreted as to apply solely to persons who reduce free human beings into slavery; the mere act of slaveholding has not been considered as covered by the rule, and, until 1856, no attempt had been made to impugn the membership of any slaveholders who belonged to the Methodist Church North. Even those Northern men who, in 1844, took so active a part in denouncing the Southern bishop who had acquired slaves with his wife, did not, at that time, question the right of laymen to hold slaves without impairing their Church-membership. In the General Conference of 1856, however, the ground was taken by some members that the rule covered the mere act of holding slaves, as well as the act of reducing freemen into slavery; and that if the present phraseology of the rule was not plain enough on this point it ought to be made plainer. A vote was taken; the advocates of the new view were defeated, and the old interpretation of the rule was sustained.

"Ever since then the extreme Northern men have been actively organizing for a renewal of the struggle in 1860. One election has already been reported; the others which are to follow will, it is supposed, result in giving the ultra anti-slavery partisans a majority, which will secure the adoption of their rule by the General Conference, and its subsequent ratification by a majority of the Annual Conferences. The two Maryland Conferences, the Philadelphia Conference, the Conferences in New Jersey, and perhaps a few others, may oppose a resolute front to the innovators; but it is considered likely they will constitute a minority.

"Under the circumstances, the prospect is well calculated to provoke earnest, sober thought among the members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. There are, it is estimated, 30,000 slaves owned within the limits of the Northern division of the Church. In the event of the adoption of the proposed rule declaring slaveholding a sin, these and their owners would, of course, be at once driven out of the pale of the Church into some other denomination. Besides these there are, in all the large cities, and in several rural districts as well, large bodies of conservative laymen who may be expected to object to the wholesale denunciation of their slaveholding brethren. Many who submitted to the severance of the Church as an evil which, under the circumstances, it was difficult to prevent, may not prove as passive on this occasion, when they are requested to indorse a measure which is, at least, a barefaced affront to the entire laity of the Southern portion of the Church.

"It is quite likely that the partisans of the new opinion have contemplated this result, and are prepared to carry out the dictates of their "cooscience," even at the cost of one half the body of which they are members. The rules of the Methodist Episcopal Church do not grant to laymen any voice in the government of the Church, which is wholly in the hands of the clergy. The members of the Conference have, therefore, the power to carry out their views. What disposition is to be made of the property of the Church, in the event of a new division, remains, however, to be ascertained. Most of the Methodist Episcopal Churches in the North are at present mortgaged for large sums of money. The interest on these mortgages is paid out of the contributions of the laymen belonging to the Church. We understand that a careful inquiry establishes the fact that, in many sections, the bulk of the persons who contribute toward these payments are opposed to the enactment of the new rule; so strongly opposed to it, in fact, that should it be established they would, rather than become parties to a wholesale insult on their Southern brethren, decline to contribute any thing further toward the interest on the debt, and would suffer the churches to be sold under a foreclosure of the mortgages.

"It is not unlikely, moreover, that questions may arise with regard to the legal right of the Conference to enact an ex post facto rule affecting vested rights. Whatever conditions a Conference may impose on future applicants for membership in the Church, legal authorities doubt whether it be in the power of that body to invalidate membership already acquired and actually existing. In the somewhat analogous case of the naturalization dispute, it was admitted, even by the extreme American leaders, that no law of Congress could disturb acquired rights of citizenship. Why the rule will not apply equally to Church-membership the advocates of the change will doubtless be prepared to show us. They will do well, also, to come provided with arguments and authorities to prove that the vested rights of the Church-members in the property of the Church, as well as Church-membership, may be confiscated at the pleasure of the Conference.

"It is well that the ministers of the Methodist Episcopal body should bear these contingencies in mind. We do not, of course, presume to offer advice where there are so many and so much abler advisers in the ranks of the religious press. Possibly it may be for the advantage of most of the clergy of the Church to have a further split in the Northern body; we, a laymen, are not competent to judge of such matters. Nor should we presume to offer an opinion as to the probable effects on Methodism of a strife which should throw a number of its most eloquent men and able preachers into the arms of Episcopacy or Presbyterianism; this, too, is a matter of which secular writers must, of necessity, be imperfect judges. But if the adoption of the new rule is to lead to the sale at auction of the principal Methodist churches in the large cities, the event acquires a secular interest, and we rather think it will have an effect on the market for real estate."

EACH DAY.

EACH DAY is a divine gift. It is therefore a divine opportunity, sent as a gift from heaven, and like all such gifts, bringing something more than itself. The mercy of God comes in it, and for aught you know, its hours may contain special mercies for your heart. None can tell when Christ may appear to the soul with his gracious revelations, but each day we should be ready for those communications, lest they be lost for want of preparation to receive them. But of this we may be fully assured, that each day is commissioned to do its work for us. No one day is like any other day. It comes to disclose something not seen before. It is a new day born from above. And as such should it be accepted, remembering that each day is a royal visitor, laden with magnificent favors and eager to enrich us with bounty infinite.

Each Day we have a new world. It is the same heavens and earth, yet not the same. Look at that landscape in the light of this morning. It is beautiful, very beautiful, but it is not the beauty of yesterday. Another shade of color, another form of moving or still shadows, other sounds than those of yesterday, are all abroad. The clouds offer new views. The firmament bends nearer or retreats farther off. And thus it is with the moral world. Home is not precisely as it was, nor is business, nor is pleasure. Friends are more or less communicative and agreeable. Sympathy is not so free or freer. Wife and children are not as lovely or lovelier than on yesterday. Within our own hearts, too, are changes easily perceptible. Books have lost some of their pleasures or gained others. We read the Bible differently. We pray differently. We strike thought at a new angle. The moral atmosphere has changed and all things appear in other lights. A purpose we set on yesterday, a resolution formed, a plan adopted, are not quite as noble, as inspiring as before, and our zeal has sunk several degrees. Well—this is providential. Variable moods are good—are useful—if we have consistency of principle and simplicity of aim. A large part of our best training comes in this way, if we are properly exercised thereby. To-day often makes havoc with yesterday, but only with weak, imbecile souls. The law of change, in God's hands, is the law of unity, and to-day differs from other days, that we grow into greater completeness of character and become more true to ourselves as Christ's redeemed.

Each Day our work becomes more important, and we have less time for its performance. Each Day it is a more solemn thing to be a Christian and a more awful thing to be a sinner. Each Day we are nearer our destiny—nearer Heaven or Hell. If men were conscious of Time, how conscious would they be of Eternity.

AMONG THE PREACHERS.

SECOND PAPER.

DR. GUTHRIE.

ONE of the first copies, perhaps the first, of Dr. Guthrie's Sermons, from the press of the Blacks of Edinburgh, sent to this country, fell into our hands. From that day until now, we have numbered the Doctor among our household books—the elect books that we set aside for the special honors of hospitality among the book-guests of our home. For though we make it a point of reverence to treat all worthy books in the worthiest manner, so far as concerns their accommodation and care, yet some are dearer than others both to our purses and our hearts. Thinking with Milton, that a "good book is the precious life-blood of a master-spirit, embalmed and treasured up on purpose to a life beyond life," we never feel that such a book can be treated too considerately or loved too tenderly. We give to such books the best room in our house, and moreover, we give to them the best hours of our lives. How much angels have done for us, we cannot tell; but of this we are sure, that we have yet to see the man or the woman who has been to us such a blessing—aye, such "a shower of blessings"—as good books. And thereby a new article has crept into our creed, which is this, viz: that if a book has proved a light, a strength, a joy to our souls, we are in duty bound to make it known. On this account we took to criticism—not to parade our little reading, nor display our poor skill in finding either merits or faults—but to express a simple-hearted thankfulness for what we conceive one of the chief beatitudes of earth, a good book.

We have told the reader (assuming in the take-for-granted logic now so fashionable that we have one,) we have told this supposed friend, that Dr. Guthrie and ourselves are on good terms of fellowship. Now and then, the Doctor may drop a sentiment which we do not exactly approve, but our wife—best of women—does the same thing occasionally, and forsooth, we do it likewise. So there is no sense in a breach of loving confidence because of an infirmity to which we are all prone. And besides, as we grow older, the spirit of a man's thoughts takes precedence above the thoughts themselves, and despite of ourselves, we are inclined to lay our hand on his heart to see how that beats, rather than place it on his temples to see how they throb. Since this discovery of where the pulse of a man's soul really palpitated, we have been happier, wiser, humbler, better; and by virtue of ten years' experience, you may receive the testimony, that men have wonderfully grown in their power to serve and bless us.

Our first acquaintance with the Doctor began at the —— Deluge. How that happened may pique the reader's curiosity, but we give the fact and pass on. Here is the very scene itself—the brilliant description will charm you.

"The waters rise till rivers swell into lakes, and lakes into seas, and along fertile plains the sea stretches out her arms to seize their flying population. Still the waters rise; and now, mingled with beasts that terror has tamed, men climb to the mountain-tops, the flood roaring at their heels. Still the waters rise; and now each summit stands above them like a separate and sea-girt isle. Still the waters rise; and, crowding closer on the narrow spaces of their lessening tops, men and beasts fight for standing-room. Still the thunders roar and the waters rise, till the last survivor of the shrieking crowd is washed off, and the head of the highest Alp goes down beneath the wave. And now the waters rise no more; God's servant has done his work; he rests from his labours; and, all land drowned—all life destroyed—an awful silence reigning and a shoreless ocean rolling, Death for once has nothing to do but ride in triumph on the top of some giant billow, which, meeting no coast, no continent, no Alp, no Andes, to break upon, sweeps round and round the world."

Genuine sublimity that, a complete picture, capable of no bettering. The repetition of "still the waters rise"—the final intensification by "still the thunders roar and the waters rise"—the sea stretching "out her arms to seize their flying population"—the mountain-tops as islands after the continents are submerged—the descent into the watery gulf of alpine summits—and the climax of victorious and idle Death enthroned on "some giant billow," "that "sweeps round and round the world"—all combine to make this a paragraphic master-piece, not of rhetoric, but of stirring eloquence. This is genius, speeding right through with the scene—no side-dallying, no false-sight—but seizing the great points, and with a few strokes putting it, just as it is, most visibly before your eyes. Brief but bold, what a living reality it is!

Dr. Guthrie has a highly imaginative mind. Every one of his Sermons abounds with those illustrative forms of thought, that contribute so much to the force and beauty of instruction whether oral or written, and for which there is no substitute either in close and compact reasoning or in earnest passion. Imagination is essential to the highest order of communicative mind. A man cannot seize the whole aspect of truth and impart it to another, where this faculty is wanting. Nor, indeed, can he utter his own heart if imagination is absent. For it is emphatically the telling power—the power to which language is most subservient, and which, among all our mental attributes, is the readiest, freest and boldest to transmute its conceptions and images into the consciousness of others. Viewed in its true light, imagination is the expressional instinct of the intellect; and hence, wherever it exists in any marked degree, it yearns to embody itself for the benefit and joy of other minds. It naturally seeks utterance, and more than any other faculty, refuses to acquiesce in the restraints of silence, or to be content with the private pleasures of meditation. A man's thought may (so to speak) have a certain unconsciousness so long as it remains a mere fact or a didactic truth, but let the fire of imagination kindle within it, and instantly the impulse is awakened to communicate it to the world. And on this account it is a main element in all effective speaking, and especially in pulpit-oratory. A preacher destitute of imagination, must always labor under disadvantages, and although he may reach the conscience and move the sensibilities, yet he cannot equal the higher modes of usefulness.

There are several observable features in Dr. Guthrie's imagination as displayed in his Sermons. It is a constant element of activity, a habit of thought, that always attends the movements of his mind and gives a most living freshness to all his enforcements of divine truth. Every thing that comes under review wears some resemblance to another truth or fact, and ere you are aware, stands grouped in a connection that enlarges your conception of its meaning and intensifies its influence. Thus, one historical incident is connected with another, as the tears of Jesus over Jerusalem with Saul's return to Gibeah. Thus, too, he uses the discoveries of Geology and Astronomy to illustrate the works of grace. But he excels in that exercise of imagination which is distinctly figurative, and with marvellous facility appropriates the phenomena of material nature to set forth vividly the doctrines of religion. In one place (Sermons on the City: its Sins and Sorrows,) he is showing that "the highest piety is developed in cities," and turning to the forest, says: "you never yet saw a tall and tapering mast, which, catching the winds of heaven in its out-spread wings, impelled the gallant ship on through the sea and over the rolling billows, but its home had been the forest—there, with its foot planted upon the Norwegian rock, it grew amid neighbors, that drew up each other to the skies." The close of this figure, "grew amid neighbors, that drew up each other to the skies," binds the comparison and the thing compared most closely and strikingly together. Often these figures transcend their immediate use, and by virtue of their own distinct significance, become more than representative images. This aspect of Milton's figures has been noticed by Lord Kames and other critics. Not only do such figures illustrate the idea for which they are introduced, but beyond this, they have a detached beauty of their own, which a cultivated mind perceives and enjoys.

But this excellence in the use of figurative language must not be confounded with that error into which unregulated minds so often fall, of employing figures for their own sake, and without reference to the sentiments to be illustrated. The primary value of a figure is to render more vivid, more impressive, the thought wished to be conveyed. If figures fail here, they are cumbersome trinkets, unworthy of a speaker's use. When, however, this end has been attained, figures may reach beyond their direct application, and thus minister both to beauty and utility.

The most of Dr. Guthrie's similies grow out of the truths under notice, and in this sense their naturalness is very striking. Like all flowers, they suit the color of the leaves, the bark, the stem, where they are found. Now this is a great art in the use of figures. And particularly it is incumbent on the preacher not to dally with the imagination, not to allow its excitements to divert him from the true end of all preaching, viz: to affect the conscience and the heart. It is easy to commit a capital error at this point, by permitting the imagination to awaken false emotions, and to destroy all unity, depth and force of impression. The subject may suggest the illustration, or, whatever its merits as a masterpiece of rhetoric, it distracts the attention and annuls the genuine influence of a discourse.

Brilliant as these sermons are, they are not brilliant at the expense of solid and substantial qualities. The distinctive doctrines of the gospel are neither set aside nor concealed under a glare of rhetorical splendor. Moreover, Dr. Guthrie is not one of those preachers who select only such gospel topics as open a field for imaginative display. This is a pulpit-evil that cannot be too severely condemned. A man might almost as well preach classical mythology as simply to use such portions of Christ's gospel as admit of imaginative treatment. For in this way he commits a double wrong—fails to preach Christ crucified—and, in stead thereof, preaches himself. Perhaps there is nothing in which men are more easily captivated into sin—nothing at least in the pulpit—than by means of substituting their own oratory for the Spirit's power—their own activity for God's supreme agency—and delight in their own selfish mental operations for the true pleasure of God's service. The safeguard against this danger is a sincere love for the spirituality of the gospel as distinct from its mere intellectuality, a love for it as a religion instead of a taste for it as a system of ethics, or an admiration for it as a beautiful art. In this respect, Dr. Guthrie strikes us as a model of preaching. Sin and Holiness are great outstanding facts before him. The spiritual cure of souls seems to be constantly in his eye; and, although he sometimes treads too flowery a path to reach the sinner's heart, (such, at least, it appears to us,) yet the pervading spirit of the sermons is so earnest, so eager to grapple with the conscience, so fearless in its enunciations of God's convicting words, that we cannot disown a profound admiration for his many and varied excellences as a preacher. The attitude of his mind is essentially oratorical. He looks at spiritual truths with a reverence that cannot be mistaken; its sincerity is apparent; its singleness of aim commends the warmth and full-heartedness of the utterance to your deepest sympathies; and when you add to these facts the eloquent cast of his mind, that peculiar gift which, even among speakers, is so rare, and which distinguishes the "born" speaker just as it marks the "born" poet, you will unite with us in claiming a high distinction for him among the foremost preachers of the day.

For some time past, Dr. Guthrie has been esteemed one of Scotland's greatest living preachers. The published sermons, we think, sustain his great reputation. For originality of illustration; for images almost countless as dew-drops, and yet, like dew-drops, every one sparkling with light and loveliness from heaven; for delicate touches as well as broad and sturdy strength; for pictorialness to eye and fancy; for transparency of style; and for those other and scarcely to be defined charms that adept a speaker's mind to intercourse with your soul, and that compel you to linger on his words as Adam hung with answering ravishment on the discourse of Raphael; we know not anywhere Dr. Guthrie's superior among living pulpit-orators. He has often been compared with Dr. Chalmers. But such a comparison is out of place. Dr. Chalmers had not the fine musical ear, the minute perception of resemblances, the lyrical march of words, the poetic mould of thought, the affluent imagery, and the power of dealing with the common, the homely, the every-day staple of thought, like Dr. Guthrie. But this said—all is said. Dr. Guthrie cannot compare with Dr. Chalmers in that peculiar sublimity which marks the "Astronomical Discourses." Nor, like Chalmers, has he that billowy-flow—that long Pacific swell which commences at one continent and breaks on another—that insulate him from all other orators.

The catholicity of Dr. Guthrie's spirit is to us one of his most beautiful traits. His soul keeps open house for all God's children. It detects with sure and quick instinct, the presence of goodness and reality everywhere, and gives it at once, and with an emphasis, a hearty recognition. Thus, he says: "See what the first Methodists did! They changed the face of England." And, again speaking of self-renunciation, he remarks: "It were not easy to find a better example of this, than one which is recorded in the history of England's greatest apostle. When he lay on an expected death-bed, (though God spared him some years longer to the world and Church,) his attendants asked John Wesley, what were his hopes for eternity? And, something like this was his reply. For fifty years I have been traveling up and down this world, amid scorn and hardship, to preach Jesus Christ; and I have done what in me lay to serve my blessed Master. What he had done—how poor he lived—how hard he labored—with what holy fire his bosom burned—with what success he preached—how brilliantly he illustrated the character—"dying, and behold, we live; unknown, and yet well known; poor, yet making many rich; having nothing, yet possessing all things"—these things, his life and works attest. They are seen in his Church's history, and in the crown he wears in heaven so bright with a blaze of jewels—the saved through his agency. Yet thus he spake, "my hopes for eternity? My only hopes rest on Christ," and as the confession of his faith, he repeated these words:

"I the chief of sinners am,
But Jesus died for me."

"FREE LABOR," throughout the civilized world, is a "strike" for higher wages. Slave-Labor is well-clad, well-housed, well-fed, fat and sleek, with bright eyes, white teeth, happy face, associated with and cared for by the wealth, intelligence, and refinement of the land, secure as to the present and the future. The "Song of Labor" is no where else so voicefully joyous. No where else is sleep so sound, and care such a stranger. Slave-Labor is the only labor with which Capital has made friends, and formed a league, offensive and defensive. And best of all, color, character and condition all harmonize with the laws of providential destiny; which cannot be said of free-labor any where in the world.

DEATH OF LEIGH HUNT.

Leigh Hunt is dead. He had nearly reached seventy five years. His spirit was always young and joyous, insomuch that he was called the "Old Boy." Hunt, De Quincy, and Landor were, after Rogers, the only living representatives of that galaxy of names which has disappeared from the literary firmament, including Coleridge, Walter Scott, Hazlitt, Byron, Shelley, Keats, Wordsworth, Charles Lamb, Southey, and others. Now, only two remain. His nature was romantic; literature was his profession; taste, beauty, and ideality, where his characteristics. Unfortunate pecuniarily, imprisoned for his political writings, he was the soul of the society in which he moved, gifted in conversation, scattering sunshine everywhere. Not masterly in thought, nor grand in imagination, yet, "a thing of beauty is a joy forever," and his works will live, many of them, permanently. He was, however, loose, and of bad influence, in his religous opinions. A touch of his poetic genius is found in "ABOU BEN ADHEM AND THE ANGEL."

Abou Ben Adhem (may his tribe increase!)
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
And saw, within the moonlight in his room,
Making it rich, and like a lily in bloom,
An angel, writing in a book of gold;
Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold;
And to the presence in the room he said,
"What writest thou?" The vision raised its head,
And, with a look made of all sweet accord,
Answer'd, "The names of those who love the Lord."
"And is mine one?" said Abou. "Nay, not so;"
Replied the angel. Abou spoke more low,
But cheerily still, and said, "I pray thee, then,
Write me as one who loves his fellow-men."
The angel wrote and vanish'd. The next night
It came again, with a great waking light,
And show'd the names whom love of God had bless'd,
And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest.

WILLIAM H. CHAMBERS, Esq. of Eufaula, Ala., a representative from Barbour county, is spoken of for the Speakership of the House of Representatives of the coming Alabama Legislature. He is a gentleman whose character, culture, and courtesy, qualify him for almost any position.

TUSKEGEE FEMALE COLLEGE.—The next annual session of this institution will commence on Wednesday, September 28th. Rev. G. W. P. Price is President, assisted by Dr. Lipscomb, Prof. Darby, Prof. Price, and others. The full advertisement will appear in this paper next week.

AS WE learn from the Marshall Republican, The Southern Pacific Railroad, by a recent sale under execution, is withdrawal of the Texas State snit, and by the payment, by Dr. Fowlkes, President, of all liabilities, is now on a high tide of prosperity.

The Louisiana Courier, French and English, the oldest paper in New Orleans, but which has been suspended for a short time, has again made its appearance, enlarged, improved, with evidences of vigorous editorial management. It is a daily, democratic, anti-Douglas.

NO YELLOW FEVER in the city. Thousands—returning citizens from summer-tours, and others—pouring in daily, by every route of travel. Rents high, houses hardly to be had, notwithstanding the extensive building of the season.

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Barnbee Camp-Meeting—$ 3,915,55 raised for Missions and Publishing-House—A Feeling Argument:

Rev. W. C. HEARN writes: We have just closed our Camp-meeting at Noxubee Camp ground, held for Macon circuit and Station.

The services began on Friday night, (2nd) and we were greatly encouraged by a conversion thus early in the meeting. Saturday passed with good state of feeling; but no extraordinary interest. Sabbath came, and with it the multitude. The eight o'clock over, we assembled again for preaching, and to attend to the great missionary interest. After the appeal we proceeded in the usual way to take up the collection. The rain began to fall about that time and some confusion followed, but the response was noble nevertheless. In the afternoon Dr. Neely presented the claims of the Publishing-House and was encouraged.

You will see from the ammuing up below that our people are liberal with the means God has given them.

FOR MISSIONARY CAUSE.

For Publishing-House—twenty-six shares	2600,00
	$ 3,915,55

This money matter over, we began again in good earnest to work for the salvation of sinners. At night, the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper proved a time of refreshing.

We were permitted to attend service with our colored brethren at night after the whites had adjourned. On one occasion they had been for some time praying, rejoicing and singing, led by Dr. Neely, when it was proposed that the door of the Church should be opened. Isham proceaded to deliver an exhortation, in which he showed the difference between the roads traveled by christians and sinners. "Now," said he, "you sinners say dat Jordan am a hard road to trabel; I tell you, yourn is de hard one; for some of you been stealing since you come here and got your back whipped, and I shut my mouth slick. Sen dat now I you better quit your stealin, jine do Church, serve de Lord, and save your back and soul too." It struck me as a very feeling argument. The Lord continued His blessings upon us until the close of the meeting. Thirty-one conversions among the whites, and at least as many with the blacks.

On Wednesday morning we left for our homes thanking God and taking courage.

I may be permitted to state in addition to the foregoing that we recently had a revival on the Macon circuit resulting in twenty conversions.

Escatawpa Circuit.—REV. J. M. GANN writes: This has been a year of prosperity with us on this circuit. Our third Quarterly meeting, was held at Crossville—commenced the Saturday before the fifth Sunday in July, continued nine days—sixteen conversions, nineteen accessions to the Church, whites, and ten colored. Saturday before first Sunday in August, at Pleasant Grove, continued nine days, thirty-one conversions, all of whom joined the Church, of which number sixteen were young men, who promise much to the Church. Also fourteen colored were added to the Church.

The Saturday before the third Sunday in August, began at Mount Pleasant—continued nine days—forty conversions, twenty-three joined the Church, some half of these were young men of considerable promise.

At the last meeting, on the last day of the meeting, we held an experience meeting—a goodly number of the young men told their experience. I never saw clearer evidences of the power of God in conversion in my life. Those who have been living here for thirty years say they have not seen such manifestations of divine power in twenty-seven years. There are many incidents I would like to give connected with these revivals.

Mr. Editor, I need not inform you that we are making good Missionary collections. We have a parsonage on the way. I think there will be no difficulty in getting it.

The Presiding Elder was at the Quarterly meeting—preached with zeal and success. Some of the Local preachers attended occasionally, and rendered good service; but Rev. E. Williams was at the commencement and stayed till the close, and rendered great service. Revs. McGaughey and Odom were with us part of the time, and preached with power; these last mentioned ministers are C. P's.

Rev. Mr. Raseman, Presbyterian minister, was with us at Mount Pleasant, and did good work. Rev. H. Sheffer contributed to the interest of the meeting by prayer, song, and sermon.

Fayetteville Circuit.—Rev. M. G. TENNISON writes: The Lord is graciously reviving his work on Fayetteville circuit. I commenced a series of meetings on the fifth Sabbath in July, which have been continued up to the present, with gracious results. Our first meeting was held at Ebenezer; the Church was much revived, some conversions and some accessions.

We next held a meeting at Blue Springs, of five days continuance; five were happily converted and added to the Church. After leaving Blue Spring, we held a meeting of twelve days continuance at Rocky Mount. At the first service God's presance was manifested. Convicting and converting power was displayed in an unusual manner in almost every service till the close. The most remarkable feature of the meeting was, that gray-headed men were convicted and converted. Some of their children followed them to the altar and were happily converted. To see an altar, filled with parents and children, crying for mercy, is one of the most affecting scenes of a ministers life. Day and night till the close, the community came in crowds to the House of worship. The meeting resulted in between thirty and forty conversions, and forty-six accessions.

My colleague, Brother Selman, labored zealously and efficiently. We have had the aid of the Local brethren in the circuit.

I am now holding an interesting meeting at Fayetteville; last night a number of young men and young ladies were at the altar—one bright conversion. Brother G. W. Brown, from Columbiana Station, is aiding us in this meeting. I hope we shall have many conversions before we close.

Two Camp-Meetings.

MR. EDITOR: It is the opinion of many good men that Camp-meetings have had their day, and hence must die of neglect and exhaustion. I am happy to inform you that a large portion of the people of Macon county, Alabama, do not think so. We have just closed this Annual Festival at Warrior Stand. Some of the old tent-holders say, the best meeting ever held on that ground. There were about thirty tents, mostly large, and brimming with hospitality that reminded one almost of the days when the Christians had things in common. The pulpit was filled from time to time with such men as Revs. John Matthews, C. D. Oliver, Thos. L. Deusler, E. D. Pitts, Wm. H. Ellison, and others. And all seemed as perfectly to forget self, in the glory of the Cross of Christ, as I have ever known the same number to do on such an occasion. Each seemed to say, "we preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord; and ourselves your servants, for Jesus' sake."

Between thirty and forty professed to experience converting power; many had their backslidings healed; fourteen joined the Church.

In the main the vast assemblies behaved with marked propriety, and the whole value of the meeting, as a social, religious reunion, cannot be fully estimated.

The Bible Agent, Bro. Oliver, raised nearly two hundred dollars, for the good cause of Bible distribution.

The week previous we held the Texas Camp-meeting. At which we had fifteen tents—and were occupied by such men and women as sought so to diffuse creature comforts that none should lack or suffer hunger. This was a great and good meeting. Dr. J. Hamilton was with us, and preached four times—and such preaching as some men do not hear often in a lifetime. He did something in his agency. Bro. Oliver was also on hand, did us good service, and raised for the Bible cause $100. Other preachers present did us good service.

Twenty or more professed, and fifteen joined the Church.

And, while I am writing, the meeting on Chunnenuggee is going on, and I hope they will have a great time. This makes three in this county; and all the good thereof will be seen after many days. The evil, also—for God cannot hold those guiltless who can make such occasions the ill opportunities for vain display and foolish mockery of sacred things—to say nothing of his displeasure at those who commit graver sins. "Oh, that men were wise!" Some weeks previous, I held a meeting at Loachapaka, assisted by Bros. Linfield, Pitts and Oliver, at which we were favored by the Lord. Several conversions and twelve accessions to the Church.

Oh, that these revival influences would continue! and would, if professers of religion did not grieve the Holy Spirit by worldliness and sin.

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

Vicksburg District.—REV. D. M. WINANS, P. E. writes: Good times in my District, some glorious meetings. Sinners convicted, mourners converted, and the Church greatly edified.

Union Circuit.—REV. F. W. SHARBROUGH writes: "We are having some good meetings on the Union circuit. During the last few weeks I have taken about 30 into the Church—some by letter, but mostly on probation.

At Trenton and Stony River, we had pentecostal seasons, I have seldom seen better meetings. The Churches were revived and built up in the faith, backsliders brought back to the fold of Christ, and many added to the Lord, such as shall be saved Methodism on this circuit is improving, and growing rapidly. As an evidence of this let me show the increase of one Church, Stony River. Three years ago the Union circuit was a Mission, and, though it may be called a poor circuit yet, I expect to collect 75 or 100 dollars Missionary money. Three years ago Rev. M. D. Thompson preached the first Methodist sermon ever preached in the neighborhood where the Stony river Church now stands, and during the year organized with a few members; we now have a membership of sixty, all in good standing, and yielding the fruits of righteousness.

One morning, as I was going to Church, I fell in with a young man who had heard of the excitement, and was going to see the elephant. He told me he was going to hear his first Methodist sermon. We have several protracted meetings to come off. May the Lord be with us.

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

Pleasant Hill Camp-Meeting.—REV. S. B. SWAT writes: With a hoppy and grateful heart we give a report of this meeting. It began on Friday evening the 2nd inst., and closed this morning. The Lord worked there in great power. The backsliders felt and owned it; they were reclaimed. The Christians all were made happy. Greater power we never saw manifested than was in the grove on Monday evening, we felt it was like the prayer-meeting the early Christians held when the Holy Ghost shook the ground. We had effectual preaching from able ministers. The revival began with the meeting. The first hour's service was a good one—each one was attended with power from on High. The number of conversions approximate fifty. Accessions—on probation thirty-eight—by letter two—in all forty.

It is by far the best Camp-meeting we have attended West of the Mississippi. This is the best encampment we ever saw, and tenters are among the most noble and generous men and women. The meeting was marked with good behaviour the whole time; no bad conduct that we heard of. On Sabbath the Missionary collection was made; it is the largest we ever made amounting to five hundred dollars in subscriptions and cash. This collection was not wrung from the people; it flowed voluntarily. One hundred dollars of it was subscribed after the collection hour had passed. The people of Pleasant-hill have been as liberal to the cause of God as any we have ever seen They justly merit praise. God bless them. Thanks to our ministerial brethren.

LETTER FROM PARKERSBURG, VA.

SEPTEMBER 5, 1859.

Mr. Editor: The Western Virginia Conference commences its session here day after to-morrow. Bishop Andrew is on the way and is looked for here to-night. I left him in Kentucky.

This town is on the left bank of the Ohio, 300 miles above Cincinnati. Is a remarkably pleasant and handsome place of 3000 inhabitants, and is, or most certainly will be, on the great travel-route from Cincinnati to Baltimore. It is about 100 miles nearer than by Columbus and Wheeling. There is now a link of connection between the road in Ohio and that from this point north, of about nine miles. This will, however, be closed in a few weeks, so that the rail will be continuous from Cincinnati or Louisville to Baltimore and so on.

Most of the railroad offices in New York, and also in Cincinnati, affect to ignore this route entirely, because of their interest in the other road; and heretofore they have been able to do this, but the closing up of this small gap in Ohio, which, as I said, will soon be effected, will open the route to the notice and convenience of travelers.

Parkersburg is also famous as the centre of the border difficulties between the Northern and Southern Methodists, of several Conferences in the last ten years or so. It is here that the church North succeeded in undoing the church properly from the South. The decision which gave the church and parsonage to the North is, I believe, by all sober, conservative persons, regarded as most unjust and oppressive, to say the very least. However, so it was. The Southern Methodists had just built a neat and commodious residence for their pastor, and they took that too, and it all now belongs to the church North, and is occupied by them.

This is Item No. 1, in this category. Item No. 2 is, that the old church—the church edifice itself—exclusive of the parsonage, is not worth half as much as the cost of a fever county court, law suit. It is an old smoky, dilapidated thing, built when you and I were born. The lot is worth one thousand dollars.

Item No. 3 is, that when the Southern Methodists found themselves ejected from their property, and Brother Samuel Kelly, their pastor, whom you know very well, had to hustle, with his wife and little ones, and find a shelter somewhere else, they began to look round and see what to do next. They hired a house for Kelly and a warehouse for their large and increasing congregation, and set forthwith to build a house unto the Lord. The people had a mind to work, and the Lord had a mind to bless, and their new church was dedicated to the Lord on yesterday. The house is about sixty by ninety feet, with basement and class-rooms, most beautifully and tastefully finished, and finished at, that, and is very much like our church at Vicksburg, only superior in outside appearance. It is a most beautiful and commodious church, and would cost in Mississippi about $18,000.

On Saturday, day before yesterday, it was completed, to the very last item of furniture of every sort, and there was still due $2500. Yesterday Dr. Sehon, by previous appointment, preached the dedicatory sermon in the morning—and by the way, did his work well, very well. At the close of the sermon they "took up a collection," as they call it, to pay off the church debt, which collection amounted to $2670, about $170 more than the debt. So that in the providence of God, in about two years or more, they have met the great misfortune of being turned out of an old rickety, smoky thing of a house, and of being turned into an elegant and commodious church.

Yesterday morning, as I said, Brother Sehon preached. In the afternoon the pulpit was occupied by Brother Kelly, and at night by a member of the Mississippi Conference. At each time the house was crowded to its utmost capacity. Morning and night many could not obtain seats of any kind in the house.

The brief history of this church has a moral in it that is telling powerfully upon Northern and Southern Methodism in this region of country. Northernism is dwindling or dying out, while the church South, which is in reality nothing more or less than the Methodist church proper, is rising and gaining foothold every day.

God is with us.

Yours truly, &c.,
R. ABBEY.

CENTENARY COLLEGE OF LOUISIANA.

TO THE PUBLIC: The Board of Trustees and faculty of Centenary College of Louisiana, having long experienced the disadvantages incident to the great deficiency of good Preparatory and Academical School, throughout the section of country from which the College draws its patronage, have hitherto labored to make the Preparatory Department as perfect as possible. They have not wholly failed in their efforts. Last year this Department numbered 112 Pupils. To more fully effect this object, we are greatly enlarging our accommodations, and are refitting and reseating the rooms with the most improved style of school furniture. In addition to this, expecting a largely increased patronage, we have increased the corps of Teachers hitherto employed there, by securing the services of Prof. WM. H. PORTER and ROBERT D. NORSWORTHY. Prof. Potter has a State-wide reputation as a scholar and successful Teacher, having labored in connection with the School and College of the State for twenty-three consecutive years. Mr. Norsworthy has also had several years of successful labor as a Teacher, and has given himself to this profession. In this Department we now have ample accommodations for two hundred Pupils. We have also a large, competent, and experienced body of Teachers. Under these circumstances, we do, with increased confidence, commend this Department of The College to the patronizing public, as fully prepared to impart a thorough English and Academical education, and as specially adapted to the preparation of Young Men for College in the Classical or Scientific Courses of Study.

We assure our patrons that all Pupils committed to our care, will be carefully watched over, and no pains spared to secure their advancement intellectually, morally and socially. In this Department regular hours of Study and Recitation are observed under the immediate supervision of the Principal. In other respects the members of this department are subject to the same general regimen and requisitions as the College student. The studies in this Department are arranged and taught with special reference to a preparation for College. Public declamation monthly. An exhibition of select declaimers on Monday night before Commencement. In this Department, any student not intending to complete a full Collegiate course, may obtain a thorough English or Commercial Education.

The next term will open on the First Monday in October.

JOHN C. MILLER, President.

General and Political News.

Advices from Italy state that the popular elections in the Papal States had passed off quietly, and that they had resulted in an immense majority against the re-establishment of the temporal power of the Pope.

Advices from Africa announce the death of the Emperor of Morocco.

A serious affray is reported to have occurred at Ceuta between the Spaniards and Moors.

The English India mail steamer Indus was fired into from Tarifa, the cause of which is not stated.

The Emperor Napoleon, in reply to a communication from the Porte upon the subject of the Suez canal, has intimated that he will support the project for commercial purposes.

The Paris Bourse closed buoyant. The Three Per Cent Rentes had advanced ¼.

Taxes have been levied by the Turkish Government upon foreigners doing business at Smyrna.

The Australian mail steamer North America was lost on the 20th of August in the Read Sea. The mails and passengers were saved.

The Spanish Government has withdrawn has Consul from Tangiers, and intends to demand satisfaction from the Government of Fez and Morocco for the outrages committed at Ceuta.

The Zurich Conference.

Nothing of an official character had transpired respecting the proceedings of the Zurich Conference.

It is reported, however, that the important matter of the division of the Lombardo-Austrian debt has caused some spirited discussion between the Plenipotentiaries.

Austria insists upon Sardinia's taking the whole of the Lombardo provisional debt, (273,000,000 of liers) as well as a large portion of the national debt of Austria.

It is reported that Sardinia was willing to consent to this on condition that the fortresses of Mantua and Peschiera were given to her, which Austria declines to do.

It is said that Austria intends to discount a portion of the debt apportioned to Lombardy, and sell the public domain.

Sardinia, however, insists upon the cession of Mantua and Peschiera.

San Juan Difficulties. WASHINGTON, Sept. 17.

After several Cabinet meetings and consultations with Gen. Scott upon the subject of the military occupation of the Island of San Juan by the United States troops, the Administration has decided to send Gen. Scott with instructions for the settlement of the difficulty, and he will leave immediately for the Pacific.

The Election in Kansas.

ST. LOUIS, Sept. 17.—The Denver City Aurora newspaper states that the returns of the election in that section so far as heard from, show a majority of 5933 against the State Constitution, and in favor of the continuance of the Territorial organization.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING September 26, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New Orleans Price-Current, ending on the 10th instant: The past week has witnessed rather more movement in the general market, though prices generally are without marked change. Our leading staple, Cotton, has continued to move off quite freely, and at full rates, and Tobacco and Sugar have been in more request, but the operations in Western Produce are still mostly confined to limited parcels for home consumption.

On Sunday European advices were received by the steamer Ocean Queen, reporting a somewhat better demand in the Liverpool Cotton market, the sales for the three days being about 23,000 bales, and prices were slightly better, Middling Orleans being quoted at 7 1-16d. The advices from Manchester and the other manufacturing districts were favorable, goods and yarns being more active and prices firmer.

The city continues healthy. The river is over twelve feet below high-water mark.

COTTON.—Our last report left the Cotton market on Friday with but a moderate supply and a very fair inquiry, under which prices had acquired more steadiness and firmness. Since then the arrivals have found a ready demand, but buyers generally have been averse to paying any advance on the rates, and when higher prices have been insisted on they have checked the demand. The week's sales sum up about 17,900 bales, viz: 8500 on Saturday, 1500 on Monday, 600 on Tuesday, 2800 on Wednesday, 2600 on Thursday, and 1500 on Friday. The receipts during the week amount to 33,692 bales; cleared during the same period, 12,226; and the stock remaining in presses and on shipboard, not cleared on the 16th inst. 76,902 bales. Although the market with respect to prices, has exhibited considerable irregularity for some days past, yet the prevailing rates have been within the range of our quotations which we gave at the close of last week, and which we now repeat.

New Orleans Classification:

Inferior	—@—	Good Middling	11 @11¼
Ordinary	—@—	Middling Fair	—@12¼
Good Ordinary	—@—	Fair	—@—
Low Middling	10½@10¾	Good Fair	—@—
Middling	11 @11¼	Good and Fine	—@—

SUGAR.—The sales of the week amount to 1500 hhds. We quote for Inferior and Refining 3¾ to 4¾; Common to Good Common 5¼ to 5¾; Fair to Fully Fair 6 to 6¼; Prime to Choice 6¾ to 6¾; Centrifugal and Clarified 6¾ to 7½ cents per pound. The above quotations apply to round lots, but small orders of 5 hhds and under, could not be filled without paying a further advance of ¼ to ½c per pound.

MOLASSES.—The sales of the week are about 200 hhds. The quotations are: For Inferior and Fermenting 33 to 35; Prime to Choice and Refobiled 36 to 38 in hhds.; City-refinery rebolled 40 cents per gallon. 807 hhds and 157 tcs Cuba Muscovado have been taken for city refining.

TOBACCO.—Is quoted for Lugs—factory, —to —; planters 3¾ to 4¾; Leaf—inferior to common 5 to 5¾; fair 6 to 6¾; fine 7¼ to 8¾; choice, heavy and light, 8¾ to 9¾ and 10 cents per pound. The sales of the week sum up 1000 hhds.

FLOUR.—The sales have amounted to about 2000 bbls. The market continues its heavy and inactive appearance. We quote a range, from $4 75 to $5 00 for ordinary to superfine, $5 25 $5 50 for ordinary to good extra, and $5 75 to $7 00 and $7 50 per bbl. for choice extra brands. Parcels of unbranded were sold at $3 93½ to $4 00.

GRAIN.—The sales of Corn during the week amount to about 5,500 sacks—the extreme figures of the sales ranging from 70 to 75c. for mixed, yellow, etc. and 79 to 80c. for good to prime. On Friday 800 to 1100 bushels were disposed of at 75 to 80c for mixed and yellow and 82 to 85 for prime to choice white. Oats sell at 48 to 51c. per bushel for ordinary to prime St. Louis. Bran is quoted at $1 15 to $1 25 per 100 lbs. for good lots. Wheat, we quote 90c. to $1 05 per bushel.

PORK.—The sales of the week amount to about 2500 bbls Mess. We quote Mess at $14 75 to $15 00, and a lot of Mess ordinary was sold at $14 per barrel. Retail parcels are selling at $15.25 to 15 50.

BEEF.—We quote Prime Mess at $14 50 per bbl. for extra brands.

BACON.—Shoulders 8 to 9¼; Ribbed Sides 10¼ to 10¾; Clear Sides 9¾ to 10¾; Sugar-cured Hams 13 to 14¾ cents per pound. Dealers prices for retail lots.

LARD.—We quote 11¼ to 11½c for prime to choice prime, in tcs. and 12½c. for kegs.

BUTTER.—Western generally selling at 12 to 10 cents per pound, according to quality; and Cheese 9 to 10½c.

BAGGING AND BALE ROPE.—We quote Kentucky Bagging at 12 to 14 cents per yard; India Bagging, 12 cents. Bale Rope, hand spun, 6¾ to 7¾, and machine made, 7¾ to 8¼ cents per pound.

GUNNY BAGS—Limited parcels sell at 11¼ cents for light and 12¼ to 13c. to heavy and extra heavy bags.

COFFEE.—We quote fair at 11¼ to 12, and prime at 21½c. per pound. Stock in first and second hands is only about 4900 bags against 24,700 at same period last season.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Poetry.

For the New Orleans Christian Advocate.

—BY ELLEN E. WHITE.

Above the golden hangs of changeful clouds,
That hold upon this side their upper deep;
Where shall the spirit enter through?

The [illegible] not of [illegible] of my youthhood's dreams—
[illegible] is long abides,
[illegible] on my spirit fell
[illegible] in the misty clouds;
[illegible] in the hoary rocks
[illegible] between music made;
[illegible] twilight, weeping o'er the hills
[illegible] mournful maid of Inistore.

[illegible] way.
Still patiently we tread
[illegible] round of daily cares,
[illegible] that some kind hour shall cut the cords
[illegible] the spirit down on this low soil,
And earth's imprisoned wings shall gladly rise,
In Heaven's fair sunlight bathing—

How blest to be so clad
In [illegible] and clean, washed in the pure
[illegible] fountain of a Savior's blood,
[illegible] and soiled fingers cannot touch the hem
[illegible] hair robes, or pluck the smallest star
From golden settings in the diadems
Of the anointed.

Little Sue Douglas.

DEAR LITTLE FRIENDS: I want to tell you of a sweet little girl, whose name was Sue Douglas, daughter of Dr. R. C. and Mrs. Mary R. Hilliard, of the parish of St. Martin, who exchanged this dark and wicked world for the pure and bright world of light and joy above on the morning of Aug. 18th, 1859. She was born on the 19th of January, 1856, hence she was two years and eight months, or thirty-two months old.

She was sick a week with that appalling disease to children, inflamation of the brain. Though all was done for her that the best medical aid and the kindest and most solicitous nursing could do, yet she paid the debt which we all owe, just as the twilight of a new day began to dawn.

It is a pleasure and a blessing to visit the house of mourning, and mingle our tears of sympathy and condolence with those who are called upon to pass through so severe an ordeal. When I first saw little Sue she was clear in convulsions. She recognised me. I asked her who it was that had come to see her?

She said, "Brother White."

How kind mother trained her religiously—taught her to pray and sing, and much of the catechism, and of heavenly and divine things. To test the depth of the moral impression made, her weeping mother asked her just before she died: "Sue, my darling, who made you?"

She replied, "God."

"What did he make you for?" asked her mother.

Little Sue replied promptly, "For His glory."

Yes, thought I, truly "for His glory" on earth; and God took her to heaven "for His glory" there. "Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings Thou hast ordained praises."

Sue was a remarkably intelligent child, with a blithe, joyous heart, and the sunshine of love on her bright countenance. Indeed love seemed to be the ruling and predominant trait of her character. This pure and heavenly principle gushed warmly from her heart. And it is reasonable to suppose that one who loved so much could be loved. So it was, we all loved little Sue—love her memory now. She was lovely on earth and is far more so in heaven. She had a very tender, sensitive head. It was remarkable how she would sympathize with her mother when she was troubled. Another thing about sweet little Sue—she was very polite, even in the extremest sickness. Her replies were not only "Yes" or "No" but "Yes ma'm" and "No ma'm," &c., as long as she could speak.

She no longer sheds the light and fragrance of her love and heart on our pathway here, but she has gone to join the band for she often sang

"I want to be an angel, and with the angels stand,
A crown upon my forehead, a harp within my hand."

We could dry up the gushing tears of the disconsolate by pointing them to Jesus, who is "the resurrection and the life." That God may bless us who remain behind—help us to be good, and meet little Sue in heaven is the prayer of the PASTOR.

Dear Young Friend, Have you a Christian Mother?

Can you remember the time when she taught you to fold your hands and to pray to your Father in heaven? Like the mother of our story, very anxious care has your mother for you. She desires indeed that you may gain earthly wisdom and be prepared to fill well your station in earthly life. But far more she desires that you may be a child of God and an heir of heaven. Will you fulfill this her cherished wish for you?

Perhaps your mother has gone from you. Perhaps she has gone through the river of death and she is safe on the farther shore. If she could speak to you, might you not hear her saying, "My son, my daughter, be ready to join me here"? Will you make ready?

As you look around you in the spring-time, you see the earth growing green and beautiful. The flowers spring forth. The trees are covered with blossoms. The fruits which shall gladden summer and autumn are already beginning to be formed. You acknowledge the fitness of all this. You perceive the beauty of all.

The present is your spring-time. Now the flowers of piety should be springing up in your heart. Now should be seen the blossoms of good habits, of religious feelings and acts, which shall ripen in coming days to perfect fruit. Let the good seed of truth sink into your heart. Pray that the Holy Spirit may water it. Seek help from above that you may pluck out the evil weeds which would choke it. So, in the time when the harvests shall be gathered, shall you be found to bear fruit. So shall your youth have fulfilled its highest purpose. So shall a mother's petition for you be answered. So shall you be happiest and best, now and forever.

The Family Circle.

A LETTER FROM A TEACHER.

The one and only object of Sunday-school teaching is to lead the pupils to find and to walk in the road to heaven; and, as that way is very narrow, it requires the closest attention and the most correct and unequivocal directions to do it. There is only one guide-book, and that is the Bible, which is to be consulted and perused with all, and unfeigned diligence. A successful Teacher must be well acquainted with the scriptures themselves, and with the saving grace of God in their hearts, before they can effectively teach a class in the Sunday-school; they may hear a recitation or keep a class in order, but their teaching will need the unction that will set the word home to the heart, in the same manner that a preacher will find himself deficient, when he attempts to preach the gospel, without the love of God in his soul. There are many Teachers who have been converted, but who, wishing to make themselves popular with those who are unconverted, will assume a giddy, trifling air when they enter the Sunday-school, and a serious scholar who wished to find the way to salvation, would hardly dare to ask them about it. Such Teachers do a vast deal more harm than good. A teacher to do good must be serious. The subject is a serious one. The Lord's Day is not to be used for trifling; and the giddy, trifling teacher ought to tremble lest they bring the curse of the Almighty upon themselves, for breaking his Sabbath and profaning his Sanctuary. Above all, the successful Teacher will have to pray much; help alone can come from the Lord. And when we have studied his word, and gone into his sanctuary at the appointed hour and seriously taken our places, and taught the best in our power, we shall utterly fail to do any good, unless the Lord owns and blesses our labors. Let us pray therefore, earnestly and fervently, that the Lord may accompany our efforts with the unction of his Holy Spirit.

A TEACHER.

"THE PULPIT—A CERTAIN MR. KENNEDY."

MR. EDITOR: As you know, I had concluded to desist from further review of Dr. Lee's article on the Pulpit. First, because the weather was very warm, and I was very busy about other matters; second, because I could hardly find a man who had read Dr. Leo's article. Then, what is the use, I said to myself, of reviewing a thing that is not known to one in five hundred of the readers of the Advocate. It seems, however, that I am not to be let off so quietly, for "a certain Mr. Kennedy" is hugely offended and excited about what he finds in my article of June 15th. I have been variously exercised in mind, since I read his effusion in the paper of August 17th, to know which behest of Solomon to obey; for he says, "answer a fool according to his folly," and then "answer not a fool according to his folly." Now, as Brother Kennedy thinks himself wise—so wise that he no doubt longs to be the head of a training school for preachers—I will attempt to say a few things as kindly as though he had not treated me rudely at all, at all!

1. He is evidently offended because of the manner in which I speak of his labors in behalf of Theological Schools; and as he miserably garbles what I did say, and as I regard it among the cleverest things I did say on that subject, I beg to repeat here, that Brother K. especially may have a chance to "inwardly digest" and reconsider, all I said about him and his:

"P. S. A certain Mr. Kennedy, of East Tennessee, poured forth in the Nashville Advocate numbers to the amount of half dozen or more, in which he proved, to his own satisfaction, that the Christian Church did begin in the third century to establish Theological Schools, and that henceforth this was the order of things until the Reformation, and then the Protestants of every nation and sect had them until the days of Wesley. And his labored conclusion is, that the Methodists must have them too. Now if the truth of history warrants his facts, the same history shows that simultaneous with these human machines for preacher-making, heresies, backslidings, and all possible errors of irreligion, have crept into the church to work its disgrace and ruin. In other words, these schools have never preserved either the purity of doctrines or the morals of the church."

I did not dispute his facts, nomely: that these schools have existed for centuries. Does he dare dispute mioe, to-wit: that with them all possible errors have existed, yes, I will say, been fostered by these very schools? Then what is the brother voxed about? Is it because I say "a certain Mr. Kennedy?" Ah! gentle reader, that is the unkind cut, as my ons can see who reads his "rodomontade," in which he has so much to fling at "a certain Mr. Ferguson." My dear brother, that does not offend me at all. I am, and I glory in it, a CERTAIN Mr. Ferguson—so certain that, unawed by the great, the rich, the learned hoasters of this world, the voice of truth must be heard, and its claims to universal acceptation vindicated.

2. "On good terms with myself!" Yes, and in that I and brother Lee have meat to eat that I fear a certain Mr. K. has not tasted lately; for if any human has spoken favorably of his long-winded articles aforesaid, on Theological Schools, I have not seen it, and I read nearly all the Advocates. He could but see "love's labor lost," and therefore his displeasars at me for not because I did not praise his effort. It will be so, with young writers, sometimes; but, brother, do not get out of heart. As the editors say to correspondents, "try another subject."

I certainly did not intend to offend Mr. Kennedy. But can he say the same and tell the truth? I know, in his post script, he does say, "I entertain no ill-will towards him," (me.) Why then garble my words, and make me say things I never thought of, such as, Paul belonged to the Methodist clergy, and that the Protestants had theological schools until the Reformation; and more of the same sort of pretended quotations, evidently with the design to make those who did not know me believe I was both a fool and a knave.

I did not treat Bro. Lee in that way, but made long and exact extracts from his article, and commented on them as I thought was just. And yet Mr. K. asks if I call mine a review? I answer, yes, and shall not condescend to ask the Brother what a review is. Brother Lee and I have measured steel and stick before. I am sure he is not offended with me for my review.

But who called Brother Kenedy to fight the battles of Brother Lee? Not the Doctor, I am sure, for he is both able and willing to attend to his own affairs—then Brother K. has "meddled with strife that bolongeth not to him." Another offensive thing is where he makes me to estimate myself at "seventy-five per cent." of the ninety-five hundredths, &c. This is simply evil judging. And, reader, this is the man that rates me for "unchristianlike abuse, and perversion of Dr. Lee!"

Grinding Axes!

Why, Brother, I was raised to it—can both grind the axe, and use it after it is ground. In this country, however, we are not over careful to grind the axe with which to chop Tennessee meat; but we are careful always to salt it well, having learned that the cutting up is a mere circumstance in the matter of making bacon—the salting is everything! If this seems to you trifling, my answer is that there was so little in your paragraph about axes that I had to "condescend to men of low estate."

"The Illegant Anecdote of Paddy and the Stame Wagin!"

My dear Mr. K., I have never been on that "stame wagin," never intend to be—therefore can neither get off, nor be a left passenger; for if your anecdote means anything, it must mean that the theory and purpose of Theological Schools in the Methodist Episcopal Church South is the wagon, and all who do not get on this rushing train and stay on will be left behind! Now, as Bro. K. is good in figuration, will he please tell us two things? First, how many of these "stame wagins" have been rushing through these United States during the last one hundred and fifty years? And, then, secondly, how far ahead are those churches (which carry freight and passengers on such "machines") of the people called Methodists, who, about one hundred years ago, began to pioneer these same lands on foot and horseback as best they could? How far? Facts and figures are stubborn things!

The Challenge!

Brother K. dares me to debate with him the following proposition, and promises "Christian courtesy and gentlemanly candor," to-wit:

"Ought our church to educate young men who give satisfactory proof of a call to preach the gospel, but whose insufficient education disqualifies them for the work of the ministry?"

Called by whom? God? the Holy Ghost? Give satisfactory proof to whom? The church, of course. Does God call a man, and the church become entirely satisfied with the genuineness of that call—and yet the man wholly disqualified for the work of the ministry? But to the point. I answer yes, the church ought to educate its young preachers, just as Adam Clarke was educated, Thomas Walsh, Francis Asbury, Wm. McKendree, H. B. Bascom, and thousands of others. The debate is not about education, nor do I know a living Methodist preacher against an educated ministry; but the debate is about these "Theological Training Schools," as Brother Lee calls them. Are they a necessity? I say not, and dare re-affirm that ninety-five hundredths of the preachers and people are with me. How unkind then, not to say wicked, is it for those sticklers for such schools to write down every man a dolt who does not agree to their innovations!

Wesley and Others.

If Brother K. had waited to see my second article in review of Dr. Lee he would have been enlightened, I guess. Wesley did raise the question of a school for laborers in his first and second conferences, but never revived them during a subsequent life of nearly a half century. They, the Wesleyans of England, in 1833, inaugurated a school of this order forty years after Wesley's death! Benson dead! Clarke, and, in a word, all the first race of mighty Methodist preachers. So the Northern Church, some ten or twelve years ago, established a "Biblical Institute," and, forsooth, some of our Southern savans write now about these English and Yankee schools as though they had existed by Divine right, "beyond the time that memory of man runneth." Moreover, if the "New York correspondent" of the Nashville Advocate and the English of the Southern are to be believed, these said schools "are bargains not worth thanking God for"—see, especially the latter, of June 16th, '59. I forbear to say more, only I do hope hereafter that men can be opposed to these "training schools" and yet be the true friends of education.

Yours truly, F. G. FERGUSON.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

EDWARD HALLORAN died August 24th, 1859, of consumption, in the 30th year of his age. The subject of this sketch was a native of Ireland, and born in the year 1829. When of few years of age he came, with his parents and a large family of brothers and sisters, to New Orleans—where he lived until he death. Bro. Halloran was educated in the public schools of the city, and was the first graduate of the High-school of the First District. His education was more liberal than might be inferred from the curriculum of the school. He was a hard and apt student, and n discriminating but extensive reader. His attainments as a linguist, in the ancient and several of the modern languages, were more than respectable. He was thoroughly read in the law, and, though admitted to the bar, never appeared as an advocate, choosing in preference to follow teaching as a profession. His acquaintance with medicine would have entitled him to a diploma, had he been desirous of obtaining it. We have known few minds possessed of more natural vigor; very few of his age so richly stored with various learning and general information. The old English classics were his special delight, and his ready and tenacious memory could furnish the rarest passages at a moment's notice. Teaching was the profession to which his mature life was dedicated, and in which the last seven or eight years were spent. He was Principal of the Boy's High-School of the Fourth District, at the time of his death. With him teaching was not only appreciated as one of the noblest and most useful callings, but it had become a science of the most thorough classification and system. Had he lived he would have contributed much to the improvement of text-books, and the advancement of teaching as a profession. His labors in the public schools of New Orleans will not be forgotten, nor will their results terminate with his life. Bro. Halloran was a member of the M. E. Church from his childhood, and was raised in the Sunday-school. The precise time of his conversion was never known even to himself. He lived like a Christian from his earliest youth, and discharged all the duties of a consistent member of the Church of God. Scrupulously conscientious in every thing, it is doubtful if he ever violated what he considered the law of principle. A good conscience is what he uniformly had. The graces of the Spirit were eventually implanted, and his whole life exhibited them; but, for the most part, he was a stranger to religious joy. In his last hours his faith was clear, strong, unclouded, but no joy. There was nothing emotional or demonstrative in his religious experience. Whether this idiosyncracy was owing to temperament or mental peculiarities, we do not know. Of his salvation, we have no doubt. He had none. The last years of his life were darkened by the heaviest earthly afflictions. The wife of his youth became bereft of reason, and was in a distant Asylum at the time of his death. How sorely this preyed upon him we know not, for his brave heart never uttered a complaint: but it probably aggravated, if it did not induce the consumption of which he died. Wearied with life's ichars—broken by its afflictions—and exhausted by long and painful sickness, he fell asleep, peacefully, and without a struggle. Heaven bless his more than orphaned little ones! and help us all to live as well, and die as tranquilly.

LINUS PARKER.

REV. DAVID S. GOODLOE.—In the death of the Rev. David S. Goodloe, the Church militent has lost a soldier, but the Church triumphant has gained an angel. He was born in Granville county, North Carolina, March 25th, 1810. He had the happiness to be born of a pious Methodist mother, and his life was an exemplification and a monument of her zeal and love. In his sixteenth year he was born again at Spring Creek Campground, North Alabama, and at once joined the Methodist Episcopal Church. For a number of years he was a faithful, and diligent Class-leador, and Sobbeth-schaal teacher. In March, 1832, he was married to Miss Anne J. Winter, daughter of Major W. H. Winter of Tuscumbia, Alabama, in all respects a help-mate for him. In 1845 he was licensed to exhort, and the following year was licensed as a Local preacher. As a preacher he was acceptable, edifying, and useful. His natural gifts were good, and were diligently cultivated. In his youth he spent two years at Augusta College, Kentucky, then went to Yale College where he graduated with honor. His gifts and learning, combined with his rare modesty and gracious affability of manner, won for him much esteem and love. He venerated the old, was singularly fond of the children, and was a general favorite with them. The poor and sick had the tenderest sympathy of his heart, and the ready help of his generous hand. In short, he was happy in his duty, faithful in all relations. His servants mourn for him like children, for he kindly cared for their material and spiritual wants. For a year past his health has been steadily failing. He died at Old Point Comfort, as he was traveling in pursuit of health, August 16th 1859. When one said to him, "you are very ill," he replied, "yes sir, my arrangements are all made for death." Nothing remained to do, but die. When too feeble to speak, some one asked a token, in proof that his way was clear, and all well with his soul. He returned a most hearty pressure of the hand; then sweetly fell asleep in Jesus until the "resurrection of the just." His death was calm, resigned and hopeful. His remains were interred at Canton, Mississippi. He lived to see his children all nearly grown, and reflecting honor on his name; who, with their pious mother, cherish his memory, and rejoice in hope of meeting and greeting on the eternal shore.

MRS. SARAH EMILY BOYD, wife of Rev. L. M. Boyd, and daughter of Col. James and Sallie Snedecor, died after a short but severe illness at her residence in Sumter county, Ala., on 26th of August, 1859. She was born in Montgomery county, Kentucky, professed religion at Flatwoods Camp-ground, Green county, in the 15th year of her age. She lived up to the time of her death an examplary and zealous Christian; a burning and shining light to all those around her; an ornament to society, a friend to the oppressed, and a most devoted and affectionate wife and mother. She was a lady of rare accomplishments, being naturally possessed of a fine intellect, and well versed in the scriptures; it was her greatest delight to impart moral and useful instruction to the inquiring mind. She spent much of her time in prayer and meditation. She was a "spiritual help-mate" to her husband in his ministerial duties. Her sufferings were such that she was unable to give utterance to her feelings, or to even bid us a final adieu in her last moments, but that she was at peace with her God in that awful hour, was clearly shown in a letter to a friend in Lowell, which she was providentially permitted to finish a few hours before her death. She wrote thus: "When I get on the love of Christ, I never know where to stop." The letter is filled with many cheering sentiments of similar import. She seemed to be aware that her earthly career was near its close, and loved to speak often of her bright hopes and that crown which awaits the finally faithful. She leaves a disconsolate husband, eight children and many kind friends.

J. L. B.

REBECCA R. FORD wife of John Ford of Copiah county, Miss., was born in Perry county in this State, July, 1819, and emigrated to Hinds county in 1828, where she remained until 1835, where she was married to Mr. Ford, and moved to Copiah, and remained there until her death, Sept. 2, 1859. She suffered for nearly five months the most excruciating pain. She has left a husband and seven children to mourn her death, but they do not mourn as those who have no hope. She joined the Methodist Church about 1834, and professed religion about the same time; she continued a faithful member until death. The family has sustained a great loss, and the community in which she lived. She frequently talked of death, and wondered why she could not go, but she said the Lord knew what was best, and so she would resign all to Him. She sang these words when seemingly insensible and when it was difficult for her to speak or even breath:

"O! heaven sweet heaven."

PURIFIES THE BLOOD!

B. F. WILLIAMS' COMPOUND SYRUP OF SARSAparilla, and Iodids of Potassium. This medicine is offered as one of the best preparations of Sarsaparilla extant, and as a curative remedy has won great favor at Nashville, Tenn., and other Southern Cities. The medical faculty authorize its use (having been shown the recipe.) As a BLOOD PURIFIER there is no remedy equal to this compound, and for the cure of numerous progeny that owe their origin and parentage to a strumous Diathesis or Scrofulous taint in the Constitution and in the blood, such as White Swelling, Chronic Ulcers of long standing, Obstinate Tetter, Ring Worms, Sore Eyes, Scald Head, Syphilitic Disorders, and other diseases of the skin and blood that resist the usual treatment. He can substantiate by the very best evidence in our City, its efficacy in Nervous and General Debility, Indigestion or Dyspepsia, Inflammation of the kidneys, Rheumatism, etc., etc. It is confidently recommended in diseases peculiar to Females, such as Leucorrhoea or Whites, Suppressed Menstration, Choloris or Green Sickness. Try it. You will be satisfied with the result. Read what Dr. Hudson says. He is a gentleman of high standing.

Charlotte, Tenn., Sept. 15, 1859.

MR. B. F. WILLIAMS: Instances are not rare where the attending physician fails to cure well confirmed Scrofula. The following memorandum is interesting:

SUBJECT.—A girl of 15 or 18 years of age, the attending physician had failed to cure. An anxious father had consulted me, and from my knowledge of your preparation, I was constrained to prescribe it. After taking six bottles she was considered well. She was cured of a deep seated ulcer and a constant drain of milky matter from one or more sores under the ear. The entire lymphatic system was deeply involved. This case alone is well worth the attention of all—but which added to a long catalogue of cases of great obstinacy, cured by on Panacea, not Nostrum, nor Patent Medicine, no Secret, but an invaluable preparation of Sarsaparilla, Iodide of Potassa, etc., well gotten up by the Chemist and made familiar to the intelligent physician. It very justly deserves a trial by all laboring under any of the numerous chronic diseases that afflict us. J. B. HUDSON, M. D.

Oakland College, Miss., Nov. 26, 1858.

MR. J. F. MCAVOY: With regard to your inquiry about the "Williams Sarsaparilla and Iodide of Potash," which I purchased of you, I have no hesitation in affirming that it acted magically. My sister was afflicted with a cutaneous eruption, which enveloped the head and a large surface of the body, and which resisted all medical treatment. I think that one bottle effected a permanent cure, though I continued the treatment until two bottles had been used. It has been eighteen months since, and as yet there has been no re-appearance of the disease. I have frequently expressed, and reiterate the opinion, that it is the best preparation of Sarsaparilla in use, and the addition of Iodide of Potash enhances its value tenfold. Very respectfully yours,
O. E. STEVENS.

TRUTH OMNIPOTENT.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from A. W. Vesey, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of North Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, one that ought to go home to those to whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

CONSERVATIVE OFFICE,
Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858.

Messrs. Wright & Co.—As any testimonial in reference to your preparations may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following, published at my request, in the "Conservative" of the 21st inst.

Col. Vasser was formerly associate editor of the "Conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity. Respectfully, J. W. VESEY.

Communicated. ABERDEEN, Aug. 19th, 1858.

DEAR VESEY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untimely sorrow in many a happy household.

On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 15 months, was quite unwell; from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sovereign remedy against this terrible enemy of children, I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly, by the acquiescence of my family Physician.

On the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, save in quantity, being afraid to give the amount of prescription. I was unable to detect any impression occasioned by it until late in the afternoon of that day; and should not then, but for the discharge of some thirteen worms, varying in length from two and a half to six inches. This I thought a remarkable number for a nursing infant. But, to my great amazement, about one o'clock the next morning I was aroused from my slumber to witness the incredible number of one hundred and thirty-six from one evacuation.

Before breakfast of the same morning, (Sunday) but one small dose was administered, which was followed by the discharge of fifty-three this day. The next day, (Monday) none was administered; but still occasional discharges occurred during the day, varying in size and quantity as described.

On Tuesday morning following, one more small dose was administered, making in all five doses of a quarter of a teaspoonful instead of a half as prescribed by the label of directions. In all, the little creature has discharged to this date, the rise of three hundred worms, a majority of which will average five or six inches in length; and is running about as usual, with returning evidences of good health and spirits.

Having met with such astonishing effects in the case of my infant, I was induced to use the Vermifuge on six other children under my protection, varying in age from two to ten years old, and in every case save one, (that of the oldest) the like happy results have been produced.

These facts are cited, 1st, because of my intimate hereforore to mistrust of every kind, and 2nd, because my experience has convinced me that, in the experiment I have made with WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, it is due to suffering humanity, as well as the manufacturer of the medicine, to make public the results of my observation.

We Dont Want Any Other.

Such is the language of all who use "WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE," as they call for that and any other is offered them; they have tried it, and from experience know it to be superior to all others; therefore when they are in want of a medicine of the kind, they purchase that which they know to be good and can be depended on. An Agent who called on us a few days ago, said "I find it difficult to sell any other Vermifuge when I have yours. I have had same in my store for a long time which I occasionally try to 'work off,' but no one will purchase it unless I warrant it as good as yours, this I cannot do." So it is, and so it will be, Winer's Vermifuge owes its unrivalled popularity to its own intrinsic merits, on the same it does away dependent, and were it not a fact that it is superior as a remedy for worms, it would ere this have shared the unenviable fate of many other articles designed for similar purposes. To all who are in want of a medicine of this kind we say try it and judge for yourselves, we are confident that it will

THE OPERA.

The St. Louis Presbyterian says, in substance, that the principal attraction of the opera is its fashionableness. People of fashion attend it, and the vast sheep-like herd of would-be-fashionables follow pell-mell.

But how did it become so? It is a foreign importation—an incongruous and uncongenial exotic—foreign in language and style—not understood by three-fourths of the Americans who visit it. Why then do they patronize it? and how has it become fashionable? Just because it is foreign. Because foreign ministers at Washington patronize it—and other titled visitors from Europe patronize it—therefore the brainless votaries of fashion follow them, and the would-be-fashionables follow them. Hence it has become the great popular amusement. It is displacing the noble dramas of Shakspeare and the inimitable and soul-stirring native airs and songs of the simple concert, and substituting foreign colloquy unnaturally spoken in foreign music. If its artistic excellence be admitted, it is art without sentiment or soul, which is as absurd in music as it would be in poetry to sacrifice thought and sentiment to mere ingenuity of rhythm. But it is fashionable, and there is nothing too absurd for fashion.

LOCAL PREACHERS' CONVENTION.

BALTIMORE, Sep. 13, 1859.

MR. EDITOR: Our local preachers and others here, are anxiously looking towards the South for co-operation from the local brethren among the Southern Methodists at our approaching Convention of Local Preachers to be held here on the first proximo. At the Local Preachers' Convention, held about a year since in the City of New York, it was then resolved that there should be no distinction between Northern and Southern Methodists, especially among Methodist local preachers. A national association was organized, including both M. E. Churches, North and South, under the name and style of the "Local Preachers' Association of the Methodist Episcopal Churches of the United States." The next convention, to meet in the City of Baltimore, on the first day of October, 1859. As that time is drawing near, and as it is not expected that the system of electing delegates by local associations will be strictly adhered to, we do hope that, from among your local preachers, those whose business engagements will permit will visit us at that time as delegates, and participate in all the deliberations of our convention. Ample arrangements have been made for the accomodation of our local brethren who may visit us; and we guarantee a cordial reception to all our brethren from a distance, especialy those from the South.

IS IT BAPTISM? CAN WE ACCEPT IT?

MR. EDITOR: The movements of some of the Churches are forcing now and important questions upon the religious public, which deserve to be calmly considered. The true ground should be deliberately and firmly taken, regardless of clamor, or crude notions, to the contrary.

It is settled by common consent: First, That Christianity has two, and but two sacraments—Baptism and the Lord's Supper: Second, They are both not only seals, but symbols of the work of God's grace and mercy, in the salvation of men: Third, That the two great facts and features of the plan of salvation, are—the work of Christ, accomplished by his death; and the work of the Spirit upon the moral nature of man: Fourth, That the Lord's Supper is a sign and commemoration of the work of Christ in his sufferings and death: Fifth, That this rite would lose its significance and character, if celebrated in commemoration of, and as symbolizing any other events—say, the death of Paul, or even the birth or transfiguration of Christ; it would cease to be the Lord's Supper: Sixth, It must be equally certain, and evident—that if Baptism be not symbolical of the work of the Spirit on the heart, this work has no symbol or type, important and prominent as it is in the economy of grace; while the death of Christ has two! Seventh, That if it is a symbol of this, then to administer it in commemoration, and as the symbol of something else—as the death and burial of Christ—is to rob it of its significance and destroy its character. It ceases to be Scripture baptism. For as it is a rite of positive appointment and with a specific design, if it be so changed that its significance is lost, or what is the same thing here—changed—its character is lost—the rite is rendered null, and void: Eighth, And as our Baptist friends are coming to administer the ordinance, generally, as symbolical of the death of Christ, and thus most manifestly changing entirely its true Scriptural character, can the Church of God accept such a performance as genuine Baptism? I think not. It is an unauthorized change of Christ's ordinance. The Church must look this question fairly in the face.

QUARTERLY REVIEW.

MR. EDITOR: I have just finished reading the July number of the Review; and I am highly gratified that we have such an ably conducted periodical. I have always believed that a denomination that has so much talent among its adherents, should have a literary journal of the highest order.

This Review has always paid its readers well for their time and money spent therein; and, although it has never faltered in its high mission, having always had talented contributors, and an able editor, whose critical reviews have ever been the most reliable, exhibiting laborious and faithful criticism, as well as thorough and diversified learning, yet I regret in common with others the fact that it is not as well sustained as it should be.

The various articles of the July number are written in a popular style, short, deeply interesting, and up to the demands of the hour; for in literature as well as in statesmanship, a writer must remember that we are in the midst of the nineteenth century.

The third article, by Rev. Mr. Watkins, on Calvinism and Armiuianism, is not the less appreciated because universal in its character; for whilst I deprecate public discussion and street disputes on controverted points in theology; yet a dignified and manly presentation of debatable questions are called for in our reviews.

I am pleased with the general tone of that article, and feel that it is demanded by the times; for there has been a growing desire of late years to put forward that doctrine among the people.

Many publications are being scattered, broadcast, whose sole object is to teach that faith; and its advocates from the pulpit, the lecture room, the College chapel, and their female schools, are zealously engaged in disseminating their views.

I would be glad if Brother Watkins could be induced to give his reviews of that doctrine a more popular form, in a tract or series of tracts, so that we can reach the mass and spread before them the true Scriptural views of the redemption of man, and full and free atonement of our blessed Saviour.

ABOLITION ANTINOMIANISM.

ABOLITIONISM and Antinomianism mixed! There must be "death in that pot." Dr. Cheever, the philthel abolition pastor of a Congregational Church in Brooklyn, stirs this boiling pot until he fancies that it gives forth gas enough to sustain a balloon—the balloon of Antinomianism—the Antinomianism of believing slavery wrong in principle, and yet right in practice. See his balloon rise. He says: "A church balloon, well netted, can carry up a prodigious weight of sin into the atmosphere, especially organic sin, in the shape of domestic institutions. The sin being passed into a system, ceases to be malum in se, and becomes bonum in re, good under the circumstances. Slavery may be denounced as wrong, but slaveholding in the same breath shall be defended as righteousness. Slavery may be roundly denounced as a system, but every particular slaveholder, defended as a Christian, unfortunately in the system by stress of circumstances, and unable to get out, and in such a network of Providence bound to continue "the relation," as one of God's missionaries. This priesthood is after the order of Melchisedec, and abideth for ever; at least, according to the testimony of Brigham Young and Mr. Jefferson Davis, authentic expounders of a slaveholding theology, "we consider it of divine institution, and not to be abolished, until the curse pronounced on Ham shall have been removed from his descendants."

CHRISTIAN UNITY.

IN THE Advocate of the 31st August last, there is published a call signed by several Protestant Ministers, for prayer for the Unity of the Spirit. This appears to me to be a move in the right direction, Popery is making vast efforts in our country. The untiring efforts of the Polish clergy to engross the education of youth, the private system of proselytism which is silently going on, the jesuitical parade of liberality of sentiment, and the outward show of their attachment to the civil and political institutions of the United States, whilst all their teachings are calculated solely for the aggrandizement of Popery, ought to open the eyes of American Protestants, and cause them to pause and reflect on the necessity of some countervailing efforts on their part. The unity of purpose of the Roman Church is favorable to the propagation of their doctrines and practices; indeed it is the salient point from whence springs all its power. Can there be no plan by which unity of purpose, feeling and interest, can be firmly established among Protestants? Unity of spirit leads to unity of purpose, and prayer would undoubtedly exercise a powerful influence toward this end. But this is a case in which we need not only prayer, but action—not only faith working by love, but work, indicating and proving a faith in our own most solemn conviction. Depend on it, Sir, that, whenever Protestantism ceases to become aggressive, it will be put on its defense by the superior tactics of Popery, which is even now casting a blight on the fair prospects of our country.

We hear much of political Conventions, peace Conferences, etc., in which, theoretically at least, are supposed to be embodied the great and permanent principles of those who are parties to them. What think you of a Protestant Convention? We have been unjustly taxed with holding so many various and discordant doctrines—our "variations" have been the subject of so much ridicule and so little sound logic, that one might suppose that a great good might be attained in proving to the world, that in all the essential doctrines of Christianity, all orthodox Protestants were of one mind. Is there not a "platform" on which we can all stand? Would not a Convention, or Conference of Delegates, from the various Protestant denominations of the United States, if conducted in a Christian and really catholic spirit tend much to unite all in the same common cause, and otherwise be of infinite service in promoting unity of spirit amongst us?

I would propose that the General Conference of the M. E. Church, South, should invite the controlling bodies of the various other Protestant denominations to send delegates at a stated period to a general Protestant Association, Conference or Convention, to be held at some point to be previously agreed on by all parties. The object of such a Convention would, of course, not be to establish any form of creed or to create any articles of faith or practice binding on its constituents, but principally to ascertain and publish to the world the essential doctrines of Christianity as professed by all orthodox Protestants, and thus prove that no real difference exists among those who hold the great doctrine of salvation by faith, which I take to be the distinctive feature of Protestantism as opposed to the outward show and penitential exercises of Popery. Such a Conference of eminent and pious men, would tend to create a Christian fellowship, and that unity of spirit and of action, so much to be desired amongst Christians. Such a Conference would bring together men of the highest order of talent, from various portions of our country, whose interchange of opinions on the various points which might be presented to the Conference, would be productive of much lasting good. It is not possible to say at present what the precise duties of such a Conference would be; the suggestion is now made in the hope that it may produce some good result, and that the subject may be brought to the notice of the Protestant community, as one well worthy of their serious consideration. I would fain hope that at our next Annual Conference, the question may be asked: Is a Conference, to be composed of delegates—lay or ministerial, or both—from the various Protestant denominations of the United States, expedient or necessary?

WHERE IS OUR ANCIENT POWER?

Passages from Manship's "Thirteen Years in the Itineracy."

MR. EDITOR: What has become of the stirring peculiarities of our Methodism? The thrilling incidents connected with the life and labors of our itinerant fathers forty or fifty years ago? We preach the same gospel, human nature is the same; and if ignorance and irreligion are what you want to bring about, upon the out-skirts of our large towns and cities we have as clearly a semi-barbarous race as ever swarmed on the borders of the Indian nations. We have settled down into the regular stereotyped service of two sermons a day on Sabbath, and prayer meetings once or twice during the week. The preacher must do it all. The people may pray but they must be very quiet about it. We want something out of the regular routine of the church service; something to shake the masses, to arrest the attention; some great tabernacle movement, or some old plank church operation, such as was gotten up in Philadelphia some years ago, in which five hundred souls were converted in a single year.

My attention has been called to this subject by reading "Manship's Thirteen Years in the Itineracy," a book by the way, full of thrilling incidents, and well worthy the attention of the ministry, generally; and I would recommend to all those who have not seen it, to get it, and read it. I presume it can be had at our Depository in Mobile.

Let me give you a specimen. The old plank church had been pulled down and the congregation had got into their new and elegant house of worship. A course of lectures by such men as Willets, Cookman, Loomis, etc, had been delivered; when this was all over, the author proceeds to state, we resumed in our new church our favorite work of trying to get sinners converted.

"The minds of the people had been diverted, and there seemed to be a reaction in this absorbing business. Not a man came forward. It was a dark hour. The devil tried to tempt me that we had desecrated the house of God, and there never would be another soul converted in it during any connection with it. I told the devil publicly, 'You are a liar, and the father of lies; and I will, by the help of God, prove you to be a liar this night.' Quick as thought, without previous meditation, the directions given to Joshua, the leader of Israel, relating to Jericho, came into my mind. I gave direction to the brethren to march round the church, and if it were necessary, let the church be compassed seven times. The direction was strictly adhered to; at first, when we began to walk about Zion, the number was comparatively small, but we had not passed round the church more than twice, ere there was 'an exceeding great army,' starting from the altar on the north aisle, going west to the back part of the church, then coming east, in the southern aisle, until they reached the altar. We had no 'trumpets of rams-horns' to blow, yet we did the best we could in blowing the gospel trumpet, by singing with much spirit:

'Blow ye the trumpet blow;
The gladly solemn sound;
Let all the nations know,
To earth's remotest bound.

The gospel trumpet hear,
The news of heavenly grace;
And saved from earth appear
Before your Saviour's face.'

"I can also testify, that 'all the people did shout with a great shout;' and, by the time that we compassed the church seven times, the power of the enemy was curtailed, and 'the mighty men of valour' were conquered, and sinner after sinner fell prostrate at our altar, and it was filled with earnest seekers of salvation.

"Several were powerfully converted. I felt free to say to the people, 'Shout! for the Lord hath given you the city.' This gave a fresh and powerful impetus to our spiritual operations. Does any one question the propriety of such a course? If so, I will inform him that on that night, a gentleman, the head of a family of the highest respectability, and who never before was impressed, was led to fall prostrate at Jesus' feet. While the people of God passed on and compassed the church, singing and shouting, his heart melted, he trembled, he yielded, and was happily converted. He lived only a few months. I visited him on his dying bed. I administered to him the ordinance of Christian baptism a few days before he left the world. His end was not only peaceful but triumphant. His wife, who survives him, and who is a valuable member of the church now, was likewise arrested by this uncommon course. When the devil 'shall come in like a flood, the Spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard against him.' When this conflict commenced with the powers of darkness, many felt the 'gates of hell' are likely to prevail against us; but soon, all were ready to say, the troop of the enemy are receiving a 'galling fire,' and the field was left to Zion's sons."

LETTER FROM WILBRAHAM.

Superiority of American Scenery—American Scientific Society—Aurora Borealis.

MR. EDITOR: How much America has to boast over other countries in its physical resources—how blest in natural beauty! From Canada to the Gulf of Mexico, its coast is varied with beautiful and sublime scenery everywhere. Its undulating hills and elevated mountains, clothed with natural forests; its lovely woodlands and flowing streams, its rivers of majesty and grace, all combine to give a charm to each rural landscape. The hills of New England bear a strong resemblance to those of Wales. Although no lordly owner, with his princely mansion and picturesque cottages adorn the soil, yet neat little farm houses, with cultivated fields, fruit orchards, gardens and door-yards with their favorite flowers, tell of cheerful homes, and comforts which are all their own; while the village school prepares their sons and daughters for active life, to fill up its drama as well as the wealthiest citizen of American soil.

What scenery surrounds my sight!—the park-like verdure of those sloping hills, the opening glade, the lovely grove inviting a walk in its sequestered shade; the flowing brook, rushing down the rocks with its musical notes of native harmony. In the distant perspective, ranges of mountains, with their soft blue outline upon a golden horizon; there in the foreground, with darker shade, Mount Tom of historic memory, and Holyoke, one of the celebrated sites of American scenery. It is well worth a visit, and, through the past summer, has averaged sixty a-day. It commands one of the most beautiful prospects of our country, and may be classed among the first of any country in extent of prospect and beauty of scenery.

The Connecticut valley lies like a map stretched out beneath it—there Northhampton, Amherst and other towns lie clustering around in rural beauty; while the river like a silver thread is seen winding through its luxuriant meadows, enriching its soil with the finest productions of the earth; and its banks adorned with towns and cities, still rising in prosperity and wealth.

And then, our lakes or inland seas—what glorious sheets of water! Where in Europe is there found the like? And our own Niagara! unrivalled in the whole world by its mighty power, and encircled by the bow, ever radiant with beauty. Yesnvius may vomit forth its flames, and keep its furnace burning within to wreath its lofty brow with perpetual smoke; yet, it cannot surpass in sublimity of effect this roar of water, where Lake Erie pours its vast body of waters down that cataract—for ever rushing onward and downward into the deep abyss, with a voice solemn as eternity—never to cease until time shall be no more!

Our country is also rife with intellectual resources, and a fresh impetus is given every year to scientific developments by these conventions. A vast concourse of people, beside the savans, were assembled at Hampden Hall in the city, a perfect galaxy of literary and scientific men from the different schools and colleges of our country, at the thirteenth annual session of the American Scientific Society, held in Springfield, Mass.

Professor Agassiz, a star of the first magnitude, whom we much wished to see, was absent.

Prof. Prince, of Cambridge, discussed the theory of comets: said, "that of 1858, had a small metallic density; that it had an atmosphere, and a vapor which was driven off from the body by the repulsive power of the sun, in a highly electrified or polarized condition, and that this formed the tail. He had been led to look upon it as something like our aurora borealis, upon which he had made observations. The vibrations, the flickering of the comet's tail, was not unlike that seen in our northern sky. And he said the borealis might be the tail of the earth."

On the 28th we had an exhibition of the aurora borealis, whose electrical motions and flickerings seemed to appear like the crowning of the heavens with a ray of glory, quite unlike the tail of the earth, so splendid and magnificently grand—as if the skirt of God's robe was spread across the heavens, and a ray of glory was let down from the upper temple to announce His Presence, which threw a blush of crimson over its face. It surpassed the most beautiful creation of fancy, and sent a thrill, mingled with awe, through the soul.

Early in the evening, the sky assumed a singular aspect, a clear light springing up in the north, not as brilliant as we had seen in the winter, but it continued to grow clearer and more luminous. A ray shot up from the east, like the rising of the full moon, sending a transparent glow through the heavens, mingled with a warm flush of crimson. But, at midnight, the whole heavens were spread over with a radiance which surpasses description—as if a bright drapery of clouds had been suspended from the zenith above, reaching down to the horizon, forming a perfect canopy of purple and crimson light, through which rays of silver glory were flashing up and down, like the wings of angels whose forms were enveloped in purple clouds of transparent light—yet their wings visible.

The scene was new and startling, so sublimely magnificent that it brought to mind a passage of Dr. Young's "Last Day."

"At midnight, when mankind are wrapt in peace,
And worldly fancy feeds on golden dreams;
To give more dread to man's most dreadful hour,
At midnight, 'tis presumed, this pomp will burst
From tenfold darkness; sudden as the spark
From smitten steel; from nitrous grain, the blaze.
Man, starting from his couch, shall sleep no more!
The day is broke, which never more shall close!
Above, around, beneath, amazement all!
Terror and glory joined in their extremes!
Our God in grandeur, and our world on fire!"

LETTERS FROM THE ISLAND CITY.—No. II.

The White City—Fata Morgana—Cottages, Oleanders, Bananas, Figs and Breezes—A quiet City—Texas Gallopade—Story of a Preacher in "Tight Place"—A Negro funeral—Cemeteries—Sermon from a Poet-Editor.

As you approach Galveston you behold a white beach, and beyond it a white city. One could fancy that the clouds of evening had fallen from the skies, and formed themselves into habitations for man, or for some more unearthly being. You draw nearer, and the city, not the houses, becomes the Fata Morgana of the Gulf of Mexico. You land, and find yourself in a plain glowing with yellow blossoms and dotted over with beautiful white cottages. These cottages are shaded by green blinds and surrounded with galleries—breezy forever with the fresh air that comes up from the Gulf, dallying with the blushing oleanders, and whispering among the vine leaves, and in the fig trees, and under the broad foliage of the bananas, seeming to say, after the manner of the "little green snakes" in the elder bushes, "Sisterkin, come out; come out, sisterkin." And the "sisterkin" and the "brotherkin" obey the invitation, and "come out" to enjoy the rosy evening on the delightful piazzas. The orange trees, too, are near, bending with fruit which is now becoming golden with the golden rays of the sun.

This is a lovely scene—but you view only part of it, and you feel a constant disposition to stand on tip-toe, or get up on a "store-box," that you may overlook the landscape. Then, you have not the time to be loitering among these laughing cottages; you start out to see the city, but the Fata Morgana flies before you, and after walking till your strength is failing with your expectations, you find yourself still in the midst of the yellow blossoms and the white cottages, the oleanders and the bananas and the fig trees.

The fever of competition seems as yet scarcely to have been felt in Galveston; the din, the confusion and hustle of trade is scarcely heard. The city still lies smiling in the arms of the country. Ships glide through the gentle waters, take on board the soft bales of cotton, and glide again from the wharves. Drays and carriages roll, almost voicelessly, through the sandy streets. The merchant walks along at his ease, feeling that there is no need to hurry, since, as the play-actor said, all the thunder and lightning are his own.

There is a Broadway in Galveston; but, as yet, no Wall-street, or, if there is, it is still beneath the luxurious shade of the banana. Time, however, is working his changes surely and not slowly, and some day the city will doubtless find itself electrified, and then will commence the earnest and terrible life-struggle which we find in more crowded cities, where no one says to his neighbor—"take care, gentlemen; let us not tread upon one another"—but each man strives for his own interest without being at all scrupulous as to the principle.

There is one thing, however, which is always done in haste in this Island City—men, on horseback, always gallop. The first man that passed our house in this way produced the impression that some one was violently ill, and the doctor was in immediate requisition; but soon, another was in extremis, and another, and another. It was then suggested to my mind that surely the whole city could not be in the last agonies, and that some other explanation of the furious riding should be sought. I presume it is a habit, induced in the first place by chasing cattle over the prairie; and, it may be, by being chased themselves by Indians.

Speaking of riding reminds me of a story that has been told me, which may serve in some degree to illustrate the manners of this friendly, warm, ingenuous and impulsive people. A minister, whose family were in the country to avoid the yellow fever, drove one morning into the city to preach. His road was, in fact, what we call boggy, and his horse, hired from a livery-stable, was also what we call "boggy." It became necessary for the minister to alight and help the horse out of the mire. A Highland costume would have been a convenience, but being in the ordinary dress of an American citizen, the gentleman's pantaloons were wet up to his knees, and his boots were full of water; nevertheless his congregation must not be disappointed on his account. Regardless of the danger of fever lurking in those saturated nether garments he mounted the pulpit, preached the sermon, and after the services were all finished, walked to the livery-stable preparatory to starting home. He told the keeper that he wished another and better horse than the one he had driven into town. The keeper refused to let him have another, and became every moment more and more insolent, and at last undertook to brick-bat the preacher. The preacher had "heard of the patience of Job," and knew that even his was not always proof against impertinence; so, after "bearing and forbearing until forbearance had ceased to be a virtue," he said to the keeper: "Sir, you presume too far upon my respect for the dignity of my profession; now, if any further provocation is given, I will take a stick and wear it out upon you." A pious brother just from church, who was standing by, exclaimed: "That is right! I will stand by you!" Then, turning to the keeper, said—"Come, get this gentleman a better horse!" And this better horse was got.—[Vide Annals of Methodism in Texas.]

Galveston is a very healthy place; indeed, but for the yellow fever occasionally, it is the healthiest place in the world;" notwithstanding a funeral procession does sometimes pass one's window. One day I observed a funeral train going to the burial of a colored man. Our dark brethren were arrayed in a black and white uniform, with pale blue sashes, and, perhaps, other badges, and were going forward with such an air of satisfaction that you could but feel that it had been very amiable in the man to die, and afford his friends such an agreeable little jaunt with him to the grave-yard. In the procession were twenty-five carriages, besides drays, and such meaner vehicles.

My cook came to me with great eagerness, not to say glee, and wished to ask as a favor that, if she did her work well, she might be permitted" to go with the next funeral, that came by." Of course I could not be so cruel as to deny her the pleasure. I derived from this respectable personage the information, that a storm which succeeded this burial was the consequence of a want of preparation in the subject for death. Such are the advantages of travel for the accumulation of knowledge!

One Sabbath afternoon we drove several miles out of the city, to hear a sermon from our poet-editor. By the way, Mr. Editor, I will just say to you, sub rosa, that whenever I talk so grandly about "driving out," I mean that our next door friend and neighbor, Mr. John, takes us in his carriage, and drives. The road was pleasant, the prairie, with its bursting flowers of gold, spread around us—and beyond was the sea,

"That broke into dimples and laughed in the sun."

We passed the different cemeteries—the Episcopal, the Methodist, the Jewish and the "Potter's Field." The Episcopal seemed in better order than the others, but even that was too weedy for the dead. We may neglect the living—but how can we bear the rebukes of our silent loved ones? I have seen few places where I should like to die, but Galveston is one of them; with that perpetual ocean-music in the ear, and that great stretch of ocean before the eye, that seems to promise a blooming world beyond—it seems that it would be delicious to dream oneself away into the land of the angels; but, when it comes to burial, some wild wood scene and a hillock of violets is more pleasant to think of than those weedy grave-yards.

The next thing that engaged our attention was a horned frog—a little animal resembling some persons in the world whose innocious qualities are their highest recommendation. As to personel appearance, it seems to be a bundle of excrescences.

We found at the place of preaching a new wooden school-house, clean and neat, with a very pretty cabinet-piano placed on one side, bringing to mind music accompanied by sweet young voices, and making one hope much for a country where music leads the van of improvement. The room was soon filled with an intelligent looking audience, who listened attentively to an interesting sermon, from this text—"Yet will I be to them as a little sanctuary in the countries where they shall come."

The poet-editor is slight and delicate, as a poet should be, with a kind of bashfulness of men, that would seem to ask two wings wherewith he might cover his face. His blue eye often flashes up with sudden thought, and then gradually subsides into a gentle, dreamy expression. His mental habit seems to be metaphysical. And now I leave you, with these few sketches of his lineaments before you.

CHIPS FROM AN ARKANSAS LOG-CABIN.

"Arkansas Travelers"—Sabbath Morn in Summer-time—Baptist Revival—A Happy Death—Refreshing Showers—Methodist Revival—N. O. Christian Advocate.

TUESDAY, the 9th of August, was ushered in with all the brightness and beauty peculiar to a summer morn. We were up, bright and early, for Rev. S. Hawes was to preach at Linn-wood church, Ashley county, Arkansas, about six miles above, on the Bertholomew; so we started, that is, we sent ahead a negro man to trace a road for a mile or more for the passage of our light buggy—supposing, after going that distance, we would find no more difficulty; but, alas, for human hopes; we wound about the woods, seeking for the new cut road and the man until our patience began perceptibly to ebb away—at last we found both; and sending Davy home, we plodded on our way, here jumping a root and there scraping the bark from a tree.

On we trotted, well pleased with the bit of smooth road before Mr. W.'s door. At a right angle we left the Bayou, and again wound along a woodland road.

A log across the way—a mere matter of moonshine in Arkansas—so we lightened the buggy, and on we went. Well, a dilemma indeed! a large tree, top and all, directly in the road.

I tell you, Mr. Editor, I dont believe a whole cane-brake or a hurricane could stop an "Arkansas traveler," so of course we by some means got around that tree. "Look! look! there goes a snake!" Sure enough, there he did go, just in time to save his tail. There was no time to tarry, and we jolted on until Mr. H.'s farm came in view.

When will we see Linn-wood church? Acres of new ground clearing, right and left and across the road; why, there was a "brush-heap" forty yards long, with a host of minor ones to keep it company.

"Well, my dear, shall we turn back?" "O no, you go through, over the logs and between the brush-heaps, and I will drive around through the woods."

And we parted with many misgivings as to whether we should meet on the opposite side of the clearing. I know you will be glad to hear that we did. Seating ourselves in the buggy we went on our way rejoicing. At last we reached Linn-wood church, a neat house, lately erected—where we were glad to meet a few familiar faces. The kindly greetings, the good sermon, and the sweet songs of Zion we heard, more than repaid us for our troubles by the way.

"Sabbath morning! Sabbath morning!
Welcome Sabbath morning, bright!"

Is it true, that the sunbeams fall with gentler radiance, the cool dewy breath comes up from the sparkling bosom of earth with a purer freshness—the birds sing more joyously, and the flowers bloom more beautifully, on the blessed Sabbath morning than during the rest of the week? We think so. "Make a joyful noise unto the Lord, all ye lands. Serve the Lord with gladness—come before his presence with singing," because of these holy Sabbath days.

A few weeks since there was a glorious revival of religion at Zion church, (Baptist) in Ashley county, Arkansas. There were twenty conversions, besides the general revivification in the members of the church. Ten ladies and gentlemen were immersed—the remaining four converts joined the M. E. Church.

One of the newly converted has already been called above, to the "rest prepared for the children of God." The young wife and mother has laid aside her clayey garment, with the calm dignity of a heart at peace with its Maker, and has ascended where only dwell the pure in heart.

Ere she died she had a glimpse of "Glory-land," and was content to leave all on earth with God, and go to her home in heaven. Thus died on the 12th August, 1859, Mrs. Mary Haynes, aged 18 years, daughter of I. F. Norrill, Ashley county, Arkansas.

She attended the protracted meeting in her usual health, professed religion, was immersed, and joined the Baptist Church a few days before her unexpected death. May we, like our young friend who has so lately departed from among us,

"So live, that when the summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan that moves
To that mysterious realm where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not like the quarry slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon; but sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach the grave,
Like one that wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams."

"Thou, O God! didst send a plentiful rain whereby thou didst confirm thine inheritance when it was weary. Bless the Lord, who daily loadeth us with benefits."

Our hearts run over with joyful gratitude to our heavenly Father, for He has not only sent us temporal but spiritual blessings. Refreshing showers have fallen upon the thirsty land.

"The pastures are clothed with flocks; the valleys also are covered over with corn; they shout for joy, they also sing."

But, better still, refreshing showers of divine grace have penetrated the dry soil of human hearts in our midst, and the lovely fruits of righteousness are seen where erst were nought but bitter, deadly weeds. Have we not need then to make a joyful noise unto the Lord, and bless him for all his benefits?

On yesterday closed a protracted meeting at Jone's Chapel, Morehouse parish, Louisiana, of eleven consecutive days. Such a general revival of religion has never been known before in this country. On account of the Elder's absence (Brother Ivey,) it was thought the Quarterly meeting would continue only three days; but, thanks be to our Heavenly Father, there was such power and mercy shown in the conviction of sinners and conversion of mourners, under the ministrations of Revs. Hawes, Brewer and Price, that the meeting was continued from day to day with the most pleasing results.

On Friday evening Bro. Waters came in to the "help of the Lord;" and, with a heartfelt appeal, petitioned sinners to come into the fold of Christ.

Some seven or eight couples, heads of families, professed and joined the Church. Brother J. C. Falks professed religion, and feeling called of God to proclaim the everlasting gospel of Christ, like a valiant soldier, he immediately responded—"Thy will, O Lord, be done;" and, having received the sanction of the Ministers and people, he entered directly upon his duties as a soldier of the Cross. May he, by God's blessing, turn many sinners from the error of their ways.

"Old things have passed away, and behold all things have become new." It is even so in this neighborhood. Religious discourse and spiritual songs have taken the place of the light conversation of former days.

Many are just beginning to live in the true sense of the word. How encouraging, how cheering to Christians the belief that their Lord is cognizant of every effort to do their duty.

We are told that the Lord will hearken to the conversation of those that fear Him, and a book of remembrance will be written before Him, for those that love and fear the Lord, and that think upon his name.

"How pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity." This pleasantness is beautifully exemplified in the neighborhood around Jones' Chapel, Morehouse parish, Louisiana. This neighborhood extends about six miles in Ashley county, Arkansas. I am inclined to think that the New Orleans Christian Advocate is one bond of union that draws the hearts of the people together. Ten families receive the "Advocate" at Line Post Office, and I donbt not that more or less are received at the other Post Offices in the immediate neighborhood.

I can now think of but four or five heads of families who do not belong to the Methodist Episcopal Church.

There were twenty-five converted, twenty-three baptized, and forty-four joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, at our last protracted meeting. May the good work still go on.

THE GREEK CHURCH.

IT HAS been long rumored that Turkey contains a large class of people who are Mohammedans only by name, and cherish the wish to return to the faith which the ancestors professed, and which they left only when compelled by brutal force. Since the promises of the Hatti-Homayoun have become better known among Moslems and Christians, and since the Turkish Government has given repeated proofs of its spirit of toleration with regard to converted Mussulmans, these secret Christians avow their intentions more openly. Valuable informations concerning them is found in a work recently published by a Russian, (Lettres sur la Turquie, par P. de Tchihatchef—Bruxelles and Leipsic, 1859,) who has lived for many years in the East, and made himself thoroughly acquainted with all classes of the people. He describes an interview which he had with a Turkish Mollah, (a higher order of judges,) who confessed to him that secretly he was a Greek priest, and implored his intercession in order to have his daughter preserved from the harem, and to have her sent to a Christian country. Tchihatchef estimates the number of such Christians in the vicinity of Trebizonde at nearly 50,000. From The New Evangelical Church Gazette of Berlin, we learn, that in the March of the current year a firman for the pashalics of Trebizonde and Erzeroom gave permission to the tribe of the Koorumloo to return to the faith of their ancestors, on the condition that also as Christians they would be bound to do military service, and that in consequence of this proclamation about 7,000 Koorumloo declared themselves before the Turkish authorities as Christians.

By the death of the ex-Patriarch Konstantios, Jan. 17th, the Greek Church is said to have lost a man of great merits in behalf of the education of his nation. He had the reputation of possessing a thorough knowledge of the oriental and classical languages and literatures. He is the author of a valuable monograph on the city of Constantinople. When Patriarch he founded many schools, introduced the Lancasterian method into the primary schools, established an ecclesiastical seminary on the island of Khalki, the only one of the Greek Church of Turkey, and reorganized the great Greek National Hospital. The latter part of his life he spent in literary occupations on the island of Antigone, in the Sea of Marmora.

PULPIT-WATERFALLS.

WE HAVE seen waterfalls, says Dr. Cheever in the Independent, in the other hemisphere, and there are some such in this, that are called dust-falls, not having quantity and power of water proportioned to the depth of the fall, so as to hold in one concentrated body the tumbling mass till it reaches the bottom, but letting it scatter as in a long slow-trailing cloud of spray. There are just such presentations even of divine truth, where there ought to be divine solemnity and energy. Such are some sermons, that in their descent into the ravines of an audience, wanting the depth and volume of thought to make an impression, break into flowers, festoons of flowers and beautiful sentiment, all the way down, and end in glittering generalities of spray, blown over the congregation by whatever devious winds of taste, fashion, or even popular and expedient transgressions, may be blowing for the time. Sometimes the diamond drops of eloquence are so vapory and fine, that the congregation are surrounded by rainbows, and yet the mist so floating above them, that not in any case is there concentration enough for a single whole round radiant drop to [illegible] and be carried away as solid thought. It is a [illegible] of transfiguration, only the people never tremble [illegible] they enter into it, neither do they behold Moses [illegible] nor the Saviour; but yet a general good and [illegible] season may be the result, and they may [illegible] church somewhat in the mood of a party [illegible] visiting a beautiful waterfall. They [illegible] of glittering spray tumbling over [illegible] in some cases is a sort of Horse-shoe Fall of [illegible] of nature and art, without grace, without [illegible] and without the voice of God, and that presence and power of the Spirit, which alone can reach the soul.

ALONG THE PREACHERS.

THIRD PAPER.

RICHARD CHEVENIX TRENCH.

RICHARD CHEVENIX TRENCH, D.D., is well known to the literary world. And to his praise be it said, that the most of his literary labors are in perfect sympathy with his calling as a minister, and reflect honor on his pulpit notes. In these days, scholarly and cultivated ministers are sometimes fascinated into literary pursuits, that if not positively inconsistent with habits of spiritual thinking, are yet doubtful, because of their latent tendencies to worldliness and intellectual ambition. We feel assured that a certain degree of literary culture is highly advantageous to every minister of Christ, and indeed he cannot be fitted for some of his duties if this culture is neglected. Apart from the specific value of the knowledge which a general acquaintance with literature gives, there is a breadth of thought, a depth of sympathy, a firm and well-braced attitude of intellect, which literary studies impart, that can scarcely be over-valued, at least as rudimental benefits to mind. None need this discipline more than preachers. Theology is the science of all mind—of mind in every aspect and form—and it is therefore of no small importance to preachers that they be cultivated men outside of their own immediate calling. But let them be cautious—prayerfully and watchfully cautious—lest the literary spirit take too strong a hold of them. This is fatal to their peculiar usefulness. Whatever is done in literature, whether in private study or public authorship, ought ever to be held as tributary to their special office. Spirituality is their intellectual life. It is their badge of rank in the world—God's seal on their hearts, on their brows, which is never to be dimmed or darkened for any other lustre, no matter how bright how captivating.

There are preachers (and they are an increasing number) who carry this literary spirit into the pulpit and throw it into the foreground of their discourses. They have a trim and polished way of putting their thoughts, a constrained deference to rhetorical rule, an occasional allusion to classical lore, a tame and repressed manner of utterance, an awe of criticism, and above all, a kind of temper that smacks of the schools, and which, however hard to define, is easy to detect, that is most pernicious to effective preaching. All this is deplorable enough. A sermon is the farthest possible remove from a literary performance. A sermon is not an essay, not a disquisition, not an oration. A sermon is a divine message to the world; and hence, if divine, it ought to be simply intent on recognizing and presenting the divine aspects of truth, taking its facts for granted, indulging no parley with this or that standard of human judgment, dismissing all considerations of self, both as self is concerned in speaker and hearer, assimilating truth with the highest spirituality of which the mind is capable, and breathing it forth, as it can only be breathed forth when the soul is in exclusive fellowship with the Lord Jesus Christ. Can any man doubt that this is the true attitude of a preacher's mind? But assuredly this is a peculiar attitude. Literature can never create it. Rhetoric and oratory can never create it. Genius cannot even personify it. No; it is God's own gift; and whenever it is felt, the most scholarly and cultivated mind is lifted far out of its common modes of thought and feeling, receives the unction of the Holy Ghost, forgets all artificialness, and speaks solely for God and eternity.

We do not know that Dr. Trench's sermons preached before the University of Cambridge, England, are altogether free from the literary cast that we have condemned. A practiced eye might possibly detect the presence of the library-student, but on the whole, these sermons, as sermons, are entitled to very high and cordial commendation. The great truths under discussion are fully before the preacher's eye, and no one can doubt that he sees them as they are—sees their realness and adaptation—sees their precise connexions, and justly appreciates their bearings on spiritual experience. He opens a subject with the skill of a practical anatomist, lays bare the very nerve he is in search of, never misses his aim and never disappoints your expectations. And in such a work there is necessarily a decided activity of intellect, and particularly that form of intellect which is both critical and creative.

But Dr. Trench never rests in the intellectual or philosophical aspects of a religious doctrine. Neither the sense of beauty in the imagination, nor the sense of fitness in the reason, is his aim. To pass beyond these into the interior recesses of the soul; to reach the conscience, and to stir that within man which forms his sense of the invisible and the eternal; this is the paramount end to which everything in the shape of analysis, argument and illustration is made to minister. We think that no one can read these discourses and not feel the presence of a believing, loving, adoring heart, vitalizing the otherwise dead processes of the intellect—struggling to render words obedient to its mighty impulses—and preferring infinitely to convey a deep emotion rather than a sublime thought. The only light in which the gospel can be consistently and impressively seen, is as the truth of God for the salvation of sinners. It is therefore the truth—the truth in Christ Jesus—as distinguished from all other truth; and as such, in its supremacy, it is to be preached. Dr. Trench is faithful to this ideal of the gospel. Indeed in some respects he is a remarkable model of good preaching. Although most commendably eager to unfold the genuine spirituality of doctrine, yet he takes care to avoid those errors into which preachers of the more evangelical class are too apt to fall. One of these errors grows out of a disposition to undervalue the agencies of intellect—to neglect breadth of statement, force of analysis, and appropriateness of illustration—and to trust in exhortatory and emotional fallacies for success. A great deal of this sort of spiritual preaching (so called) is quite superficial, and falls far short of the true ideal of the ministry. Dr. Trench strikes us as happily free from the extremes of literary sentimentalism and shallow spiritualism. So far as this last-named phase of preaching is concerned, Dr. Trench handles doctrines with great directness and skill—adjusts them to their place in the system of Christianity—and then shows what are their legitimate fruits in experience and practice.

We cannot better convey our ideas on this subject than by quoting an extract from the Dr.'s first sermon in this volume. It is on "Christ, the only Begotten."

"Theology, when it limits itself to the immediately practical and useful, dismissing everything which it does not esteem such, will not long retain even that practical and useful to which it has been willing to sacrifice everything besides. Its pastures will lose their greenness soon, its lower levels will become dry and parched and barren, if they be not fed and refreshed from the upper springs. Its conversation must be habitually in heaven, if it shall really have anything which is worth the telling upon earth. It is a Jacob's ladder, but angels must descend upon it no less than ascend. If there be none descending, there will be in a little while none to ascend."

All that is admirably said. It sets forth the just idea of spiritual preaching, viz: Looking at man and man's interests from God's throne and in its light, instead of merely looking up to that throne from man's earthly position. Such preaching will deal with the deep things of God and reveal the mind of the Spirit. It will be neither imaginative nor emotional. Nor will it be coldly argumentative, but it will address our whole nature—provide a benign influence for every faculty of that nature—move all its powers and mellow all its sensibilities.

Dr. Trench is very earnest in presenting the dignity of Christ's offices and ministry as the sum and substance of Theology. He argues in a decided tone for the Eternal Sonship. Believing that the Eternal Sonship is a doctrine of prime importance—believing it to be the basis of the incarnation, and the ground of man's being, no less than the ground of man's redemption—we congratulate ourselves gratified that Dr. Trench should have exhibited this neglected truth in a bold and striking light. It may indeed seem that this doctrine of the Eternal Sonship lies remote from the most tangible facts of Christianity, and that therefore it is not a matter of much moment what opinion is held on the subject. But this is a dangerous standard to set up. It is the standard of our judgment, and as such, whether it positively mislead us or not, is a false standard, at least in theory. Aside from this, we think the Eternal Sonship is not an abstraction. It has all the inherent force of the Trinity, nor can we see how that Trinity, as a Christian doctrine, can have a scriptural form of expression, when the Eternal Sonship is rejected. Athanasius did well to struggle and suffer for it. And moreover, we believe that the Rev. Richard Watson never rendered better service to Theology than when he defended this doctrine against the erroneous views of Dr. Adam Clarke.

Another point of interest in this volume, is the clear and satisfactory manner in which the doctrine of Christ's atonement is treated. Dr. Trench is emphatic here. And no wonder, for it is enough to stir any man's soul to see how this cardinal truth, without being utterly rejected, is yet despoiled of its force. We allude not to Unitarianism. We allude not to any of the repulsive forms of Socinianism and Arianism. But we allude to those accommodating theories of the death of Christ, which in certain quarters have lately become so fashionable.

All these theories, whatever shades of difference exist among them, repudiate the idea of Christ's death as a vicarious sacrifice for sin. None of them tolerate the idea of Christ's substitution for us; and while they use the word atonement, yet it is atonement in the sense of reconciliation, and not of expiation. Coleridge's views on this subject are well known. So are those of Julius Charles Hare and Professor Maurice. All these gentlemen of the "Broad Church" substantially agree with Bahr of Germany, that the Jewish sacrifices were not typical of the penal sufferings of Jesus Christ in our behalf, but were types of "his own self sacrifice, which actuated his (Christ's) whole life, shining only with a peculiar transcendency in his death." Poor John Sterling, whom no one can think of without an aching heart, once wrote to his friend Hare as follows: "On sacrifice, he (Milman) seems to have nothing of the least interest to offer; though I think he does keep clear of the ghostly speculations of Magee and of most of our modern orthodox Brahmins." Who the "Brahmins" are, need not be told, nor what are "the ghostly speculations" of Archbishop Magee, in his celebrated work on the Atonement.

Dr. Trench does not name these parties. Standing in the pulpit, he avoids very properly any such ill-bred personality. But he arraigns the doctrine, and justly condemns it. Says he: "The gravity of the matter thus brought to issue, none can deny, nor yet the very serious and far-reaching consequences which must follow, if, while the word 'sacrifice' should indeed be left us, all wherein the essence of sacrifice consisted, as mainly its vicarious and satisfactory character, were to be exploded from the New Testament." Proceeding then to argue that the "first of these consequences would be a loosening" of the bonds between the Old and the New Testament, he forcibly declares of the Levitical sacrifices, that on this false theory, "they are a huge husk without a kernel; types without their antitype; shadows, but not 'shadows of the true,' and thus, with no substance following, a promise without performance, an elaborate and enormous machinery for the effecting of nothing."

The following passage is full of vigorous, straightforward thought: "But if the question is here asked, how can one man satisfy for many? how by one man's obedience could many be made righteous? the answer is not far to seek. The transcendent worth of that obedience which Christ rendered, of that oblation which he offered, the power which it possessed of counterbalancing and counterbalancing a world's sin, lay in this, that he who offered these, while he bore in human nature and wrought human acts, was a divine person; not indeed God alone, for as such he would never have been in the condition to offer; nor man alone, for then the worth of his offering could never have reached so far; but that he was God and man in one person, indissolubly united, and in this person performing all those acts—man that he might obey and suffer and die—God that he might add to every act of his obedience, his suffering, his death, an immeasurable worth, stooping in the glory of his divine personality all of human that he wrought. Christ was able so summarily to pay our debt, because he had another and a higher coin in which to pay it than that in which it was contracted. It was contracted in the currency of earth; he paid it in the currency of heaven."

Such preaching speaks to our hearts. In it we hear the confession of the Church of Jesus Christ in all ages. In it come to our ears the voices of martyrs and saints, and extending still farther back, the voices of those whose inspired tones first swept over the world the blessed story of the Cross—whose glory and whose only glory was to preach Christ crucified, not as a martyr but as the Lamb of God that taketh away our sins—and whose example, whenever and wherever followed, lifts our frail nature into strength and introduces it into companionship, pure and precious, with the eternal Trinity.

We acknowledge ourselves to be debtors to the sanctified learning, earnest faith, and energetic spirit of Dean Trench. On other fields—fields too, where he has been an original explorer—the scholarship of the age has gathered no more harvest from seed sown by his own industrious hands. He has done much for language, especially in its historic and moral connections. His Hulsean Lectures are charmingly rich and full. But above every thing else that he has given to the world, commend us to his Discourses. Not indeed that he is a faultless sermonizer. Not that he is as eloquent, as soul-stirring, as some other divines. But he comes to us like a man redeemed—with a step manly and free—with a front unabashed, and with a voice that gives no uncertain sound. And for this we honor him. For this we thank him. There have been hours in our lives, that his genius has enriched—solitary seasons that he has adorned and cheered—and whoever fulfills for our hearts a ministry so beautiful and blessed, shall have our humble need of praise, no matter what country or what Church claims him as her own.

A VISIT TO THE ISLAND-HOME OF BLENNERHASSETT.

Burr was as infamous, as ungrateful and insinuating, as Blennerhassett was noble, generous and unsuspecting. Fifty-four years ago the most beautiful island nature ever gave to the Ohio was the home of contentment, elegance, letters and hospitality.

Wirt says that "its music might have charmed Calypso and her nymphs; its shrubbery Shenston might have envied; there an extensive library spreads its treasures; a philosophical apparatus offers to its elegant proprietor all the mysteries and secrets of nature; peace, tranquility and innocence shed their mingled delights around him; and to crown the enchantment of the scene, a wife who is said to be lovely even beyond her sex, and graced with every accomplishment that can render it irresistible, has blessed him with her love, and made him the father of her children."

Such was Blennerhassett's island-home fifty-four years ago. But, alas! its rural splendor, its magnificent simplicity and hospitality, its too confiding friendship, its misplaced confidence, and its ruin.

Blennerhassett's Island is twelve miles below old Marietta, in Ohio, and one or two below Parkersburg, in Virginia. Oh, I wish I could, if even for a day, exchange a little of my cold, square, matter-of-fact materials for a little of the imaginative, a little of the plain embroidery, or the poetry of thought and utterance. The present proprietor of the island, my good friend Mr. George Neale, of Parkersburg, gave me, this morning, a pleasant winding-way buggy ride down the river and across the half of it, and we spent two hours on the once beautiful home of the accomplished Irishman who so keenly felt the withering touch and so largely and so innocently shared the disgrace of Aaron Burr.

The beautiful mansion was accidentally burned up in 1811. The rude hand of agriculture has been there, raising corn and hay; and the more rude hand of time has been there, and left his mark. The old well, the digging and walling of which cost $500, is still there, "as good as ever." And there is also, hard by, a venerable locust tree, which it is said Blennerhassett planted with his own hand, and there are, also, some remains of the underground portion of a milk house, and a round, basin-like looking place, four feet deep by twenty in diameter, which was once a wine cellar. These, with some little remains of the foundation of the house, are nearly all that is left of the beautiful and classic mansion of the early island-forest of the far West.

Many a passing stranger in ascending or descending the Ohio has landed here, to walk over and look upon the grounds where once stood this strange American Alhambra, and where lived the accomplished exile with his beautiful and accomplished wife, and which romantic spot so strangely and mysteriously became the theatre of their happiness, their deception and their ruin.

Who was Blennerhassett? and what were his crimes? Why was he immured in prison? One of the most villainous acts ever performed by the Government of the United States was the arrest and imprisonment of Blennerhassett. Being, perhaps, practical piety, a more noble character or a better man never landed from briny water on the soil of this free land of ours.

The public facts respecting the history of Blennerhassett are known, and have been published in the world in connection with the career and trial of Burr. But there are many things of a more domestic nature connected with the interesting family not generally known. It has been my good fortune for the past week and more to be a guest in a family in Parkersburg, Va.—which is in sight of the celebrated island—the aged father and mother of which were well acquainted with Blennerhassett and his most amiable and accomplished lady. From these and others I have gathered many interesting facts respecting them which are not generally known, and as soon as a little leisure shall afford me an opportunity to do so, I propose to put these materials in a readable shape, and place a paper, or most likely a series of papers, containing them, in the hands of the editor of the Home Circle, and I hope, if I shall be spared to perform this labor, the papers may not be entirely uninteresting to his lady readers. In these papers I can but indulge a hope that I may be able to introduce Mrs. BLENNERHASSETT to our American ladies in a way in which she has not been heretofore introduced.

TUSKEGEE FEMALE COLLEGE.

MR. EDITOR: But little having been said in your columns in behalf of this institution, we have thought proper to send you, in connection with the advertisement, which please insert, a somewhat full account of it.

HISTORY.—The Tuskegee Female College, under the patronage of the Methodist E. Church, South, Alabama Conference, was opened February 11th, 1856, with the Rev. A. A. Lipscomb, D. D., as President. Eminent success crowned the enterprise at the outset. Within the first year of its existence, over 260 pupils were enrolled, while the thoroughness of its organization, the efficacy of its disciplinary regulations, and the success of its admirable plans of female culture, placed the College at once in the front rank of educational movements.

ORGANIZATION.—With modifications adapted to the ages of the pupils, the same general principles of Education obtain throughout these divisions. All the leading branches of literary culture are begun in the lower departments, and are carried forward, in various forms, through the succeeding stages of intellectual development, securing, in this manner, not only the utmost proficiency in the mere technicalities of education, but imparting, also, to the entire system a beautiful unity, consistency, and completeness. It will be perceived that pupils entering the lower Departments of the College, enjoy advantages superior to those whose course begins at a later period.

PRIMARY DEPARTMENT.—The main objects contemplated in this department, are to render learning, in all its most elementary forms, engaging to the mind of the young pupil—to employ the faculties in so agreeable a manner as to lay the basis of habits that may prove serviceable in the subsequent work of personal culture. To effect these ends, a large and elegant room is appropriated to the department, handsomely fitted with furniture of the most approved pattern, and decorated with mottoes and ornaments calculated to minister not only to the instruction of the pupils, but to contribute to their refined amusement, and to sustain their delighted interest.

INTERMEDIATE DEPARTMENT.—The design of this department is to supply instruction to pupils who have advanced beyond the range of Primary studies, but who are not fitted for the severe regimen of the College course. Opportunity is here afforded to review and perfect the studies of preceding years; to correct defective methods of earlier training; to ascertain the peculiarities of individual minds, and to determine with greater exactness such habits as shall fully qualify the pupil for her subsequent pursuits.

COLLEGIATE DEPARTMENT.—The system of Instruction, organized in the College, embraces five years. The Tuskegee Female College looks solely to the responsibility it assumes of presenting to the Church, and to the world, the highest type of womanly character, within the scope of its literary and religious culture. To effect this purpose, such topics are pursued, and such appliances are employed, as the ever-varying intellectual developments of the several classes may seem to require.

The Holy Scriptures are to be taught in all the classes of the Institution, and at every step of the pupil's progress. The disputed points of doctrinal teaching, as understood by different sects, are not to be made the subjects of discussion, or of dogmatic inculcation. But those great, cardinal, saving truths of the Gospel, held by the Holy Catholic Church in all its branches, and felt by the universal heart of Christendom, are to be taught systematically and zealously. To the Bible is to be assigned the first and paramount place amongst text books. "It must stand for God—sovereignty over intellect, over books, over everything—and in this majestic attitude, be honored, reverenced, and loved."

FACILITIES FOR EDUCATION.—In every department the amplest means of culture are supplied. The admirable adaptation of the College edifice to the uses of education; the comfort, size, and convenience, of its lecture halls; the elegant appointments of the Chapel as a general study room; the comfortable arrangements of the recitation apartments; the judicious location of the music and practice rooms, under the immediate supervision of the head of the department; the completeness of its laboratory; the full supply of drawings, paintings, casts, and models, in the gallery of art; the number and superiority of the musical instruments; the mineralogical and geological specimens, furnish to teacher and pupils the requisite materials for imparting thorough instruction.

LECTURES.—The Tuskegee Female College claims, as a special feature in its plans of instruction, the introduction of the Lecture System to an extent altogether greater and more effective than has hitherto been attempted in our Southern Female Institutions. Since the period of its organization, there have been, annually, several courses of lectures upon literary, scientific, and esthetic subjects, delivered to the young ladies of the higher classes, to irregular pupils and to resident graduates.

ART DEPARTMENT.—Having been the first seminary for young ladies in the world to incorporate into its literary framework the cultivation of the beautiful, as well as useful, Arts of Design; and having already awakened a surprising degree of interest in the public mind in reference to this novel and elegant branch of female culture, the Trustees take a just pride in carrying the organization of the department to the highest point of efficiency. The accomplished Principal is at present visiting the Eastern cities, where, in the study of such master-pieces of artistic genius as this country affords; in the inspection of the most celebrated galleries of paintings; in the examination of the sketching portfolios of artists, and in the presence of the grand and inspiring scenes of nature, she is fitting herself to renew her labors with redoubled ardor and enlarged experience. It will be her care to re-supply the department, under her own personal supervision, with the most approved facilities for illustration and for study. In furtherance of this purpose, an order has been sent forward, through an eminent teacher of Art, to London, for a full set of drawing models, such as are furnished to schools under patronage of the English Government. These, in connection with new casts, medallions, statuettes, and studies, will fully meet the demands for art instruction of the highest style.

In connection with the regular routine of instruction in this department, pupils are commended to the perusal of such works as bear directly on their studies, such as "Ruskin's Works," "Jarves' Art-Hints," "Ware's Works of Art in European Capitals," "Mrs. Jameson's Works," etc., while the Principal, by lectures and illustrations, familiarizes their minds with the varied styles of the different schools of art, in their relations to the ideal of artistic excellence.

For the purpose of more effectually encouraging the liberal study of art, in its higher forms, the Trustees of the Institution have decided to establish a Diploma or certificate of Graduation, to be conferred upon pupils who shall have completed a three years' course of art instruction in the Tuskegee Female College. Upon the satisfactory completion of this course the pupil will be entitled to spend the fourth year in the department, receiving instruction and attending upon the various courses of lectures gratuitously, by leaving to the institution, at her option, a specimen of her work to aid in the formation of a permanent Student's Gallery of Art.

MUSIC DEPARTMENT.—It is deemed unnecessary to add anything in reference to the Department of Instrumental Music, beyond the announcement of the retention of Prof. Corbeau as Principal.

RESIDENT GRADUATES' COURSE.—One of the objects of the Institution from its commencement has been to provide suitable means for the continuance of the education of its graduates, so far as they may wish to avail themselves of such advantages. To effect this end, during the college year 1857-8, a class was organized, embracing not only the Resident Graduates, but teachers, or any other persons anxious to extend their personal culture.

SPECIAL ARRANGEMENT.—The Tuskegee Female College is not an endowed Institution. With an earnest desire, however, to extend the advantages of a liberal education to persons of limited means, the Institution proposes to receive and educate one young lady from each Presiding Elder's District within the bounds of the Alabama Conference, taking her notes, properly avouched, for the settlement of her board and tuition, payable when she shall have earned the money to be applied to that object. In this manner it is believed that many worthy persons may be judiciously assisted in securing the advantages of enlarged personal culture, who would otherwise be entirely debarred from these high privileges. To secure the proper accomplishment of the proposed plan, the applicant, in each case, will be required to produce the official endorsement of the Quarterly Conference for the circuit or station in which she may reside, certifying to her worthiness socially, intellectually and morally. It is to be supposed that this arrangement will be sought mainly, if not entirely, by young ladies who intend to prepare themselves for the avocation of teaching. For particulars, apply to the President of the Institution.

BOARDING DEPARTMENT.—The domestic arrangements of the Institution are placed in charge of the Rev. John W. Rush, of the Alabama Conference.

EXAMINATIONS, PUBLIC EXHIBITIONS.—Disapproving the entire system of public exhibitions in our Female Institutions, the Trustees adopted at the outset the plan of having all examinations conducted in private. A more gratifying result could not be desired than has attended upon this radical innovation. The inspiring presence of a select number of judicious and appreciative persons; the colloquial ease and freedom from embarrassment on the part of the pupils; the genial discussions that pleasantly interrupt the accustomed exercises; the rare-strained participation of visitors in the offices of examination; the entire abandonment of textual questions and formal answers; the unexpected development of logical finesse and of expressional power in young ladies, under the legitimate stimulus of such agreeable circumstances—have abundantly vindicated the wisdom of this method of conducting examinations.

In this connection it is proper to observe that in the Tuskegee Female College, young ladies are not permitted in public to read essays, addresses, or compositions of any kind whatever. When such performances are to be publicly introduced, they are committed to the hands of gentlemen, selected with special reference to their ability to read them in an impressive and becoming manner. In vindication of this policy, nothing more need be said in this place, than that, in the views of female education held by the Institution, the qualities of mind and heart, fostered by such public displays, are inimical to its high ideal of womanly character.

RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION.—An effort is made in the Institution to develop and to embody the true ideal of a religious life—a life which, like that of our Divine Exemplar, blends the severest devotion to the humblest duties with the loftiest consecration to God's service, of redeemed intellect and of ennobled spirit. In addition to the daily expositions of Scripture in the morning exercises of the College, discourses are delivered by the President in the Chapel, every Sabbath afternoon. Other forms of Scriptural teaching are also adopted, and in this manner the pupils are taught to recognize the distinct existence of the College, as an organized religious power. Attendance upon Sabbath School is one of the requirements of the Institution. The membership of pupils in the various churches forms matter of special concern. Young ladies belonging to the Methodist Church especially are required to present their letters, and attach themselves at once to the communion in Tuskegee, and to attend the class-meetings which are regularly held in the College for their benefit. ¶

WASHINGTON CHURCH, PARISH OF ST. LANDRY.

DEAR BRETHREN: please read this in your Congregations, and receive their donations

I would most respectfully appeal to your kind charities, in behalf of our Church at Washington, St. Landry Parish, Louisiana. The debt hanging over it amounts to $1950. But the liberal creditors propose to deduct therefrom, $8,00, leaving a balance of $1150. We have raised about $400 of this, and the friends at Washington think they can possibly raise $200 more, still leaving $550 to be raised by foreign aid.

They are few and feeble, who are Protestants in Washington. Romanism and wickedness abound—and some enemies of christianity propose to purchase the Church for a Ball room, etc. Will you give us ten dollars towards paying the Church out of debt? "He that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord."

Address Rev. B. F. White, Opelousas, Louisiana.

THE SOUTHERN UNIVERSITY.

By reference to the advertising columns of the Advocate it will be seen, that the Southern University will be opened for the reception of Students on the 1st of October. The President will deliver his Inaugural Address on Wednesday, the 5th, and the Exercises of the Institution will commence.

The question has been frequently asked, how are the students to be accommodated with board, etc.? It gives us pleasure to say for the information of those interested in the answer to this question, that Mr. McDonald has now in course of erection one of the most convenient and commodious buildings in the State, for the accommodation of students.

Judging from the ground-plan and the design of the front elevation, it will, in magnificence and beauty, surpass the University building itself. When completed, there will be about forty well ventilated rooms and halls with columns, verandas, passages and stairways, and a large dining-hall 40 by 60 feet, all of which are modeled after the style of the most convenient and recent improvements. His arrangements for the comfort and convenience of his boarders are on the most liberal scale. The building stands immediately in front of the University, necessible at all hours to the faculty, and under their supervision, which will render it in every particular the most desirable boarding-house in Greensboro. Mr. McDonald will be in readiness for the reception of students by the 1st of October.

We may beg leave to say to those who may wish to send their sons to the University, that he is a gentleman everyway worthy of their confidence. If integrity, energy, industry, firmness, are the requisite characteristics for the position he will occupy, he certainly possesses them in a remarkable degree. Justice demands that we say this much of one who by his energy and zeal has so intimately identified his interests with the University. Its truthfulness will be endorsed by all who know him. We can confidently say to the friends of the Institution, send on your sons, and ample provision will be made by Mr. McDonald and others for their accommodation.

REV. JOSEPH T. AUERNATHY, of the Alabama Conference, died Sept. 15th last, at the residence of Rev. Jno. McKenzie, Coose County, Alabama, suddenly and unexpectedly, of congestion of the brain—having, as we gather from the letter informing us, overworked himself in filling his appointments and other services when nearly worn out. We knew him well. From the poor pine-woods of East Alabama, he went into the itinerant ministry, a few years since, an unsophisticated, untempered, roughhewn man; and, it seems, has been wonderfully blessed of God in the salvation of souls. He was an amiable, good man. If any one begins to lose faith in the itinerancy, let them look on this case. In any other system, this man could not have found an "open door" to become the instrument of the conversion of a single soul, as a preacher.

MANSFIELD FEMALE COLLEGE.—As the patrons of this Institution may feel desirous of knowing what arrangements have been made in regard to the care and over-sight of the young ladies boarding in the College, we are requested to state that Mr. and Mrs. Thomas, the Steward and Stewardess, will reside in the College building; and, in connection with the Governess, Mrs. Buckingham will give every attention to the comfort and wants of the young ladies. In another column will be seen the names of the Faculty. The prospects of the College were never brighter.

THE HERALD OF TRUTH is the title of a new weekly periodical issued by Rev. J. M. Major, 130 Nassau street, New York, prices, five cents a single copy—$2,00 a year—$8,00 for five copies—$15,00 for ten copies—containing five sermons, two of them by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon. It is to be devoted to the publication of sermons by the distinguished living ministers of the different preachers of the Christian Church. If none but good sermons are published, it will be valuable; otherwise, otherwise. Specimen copies sent free. Ministers charged but $1,00 a year.

THE BOOK AND TRACT CAUSE in the Mississippi Conference, as we learn by letter from Rev. H. H. Mongomery, Agent, is moving forward. He has been very successful, of late, in getting subscribers as shareholders—more having been obtained within a few weeks than in six months preceding. The Agent is a man of indomitable perseverance and energy, and success is so far from such qualities. Let the cause move forward. The Publishing House needs the "free cash capital" and the country needs the books.

DR. GRAHAM, of this city, the same who killed Mr. Loring of Florida in New York some years since, was killed one night last week, by Ernest Toledano. They were at enmity, Dr. Graham, as is alleged, having been defeated for the office of city Physician by Mr. Toledano. Graham, an amiable gentleman when sober, repeatedly threatened Toledano's life when drinking. They met in a bar room—Toledano fired several times, putting a number of bullets into Grahm's breast.

THE TEHUANTEC ROUTE, short, expeditious, and important as it is to New Orleans, has been ignored by the Postmaster General, in awarding the contract for the California mail, in favor of New York and the Nicaraguan route. Such freaks will, and ought to, kill any Administration, in the South.

SCHOOLS OF BATON ROUGE.—We learn that Miss Read's Seminary, and Prof. Magruder's Institute, are both promising well. They are both of good standing, well established, with ample facilities, imparting thorough moral and intellectual training and education. They are worthy of the amplest patronage.

PURVIS & HAYNIE, Cotton Brokers, have their card on third page, fourth column. Read it. We have known Mr. Haynie for many years. He is a reliable gentleman, and an experienced man of business.

DR. CLOUD'S SOUTHERN RURAL MAGAZINE, the American Cotton Planter, and Soil of the South, published at Montgomery, Alabama, for October, has reached us, and is as good as ever.

JAYNE'S FEMALE INSTITUTE, Brandon, Miss., has an advertisement in the fourth column, third page, of this paper. Read it. It speaks for itself. The references are the best.

SHELBY MEDICAL COLLEGE, Nashville, Tenn., has an advertisement on third page, fourth column, to which we invite attention. It is all that it is represented to be.

DR. A. L. PLOUDE, Dentist, has his card in this paper. He has shown high testimonials from distinguished Bishops, Presidents, and D. D.s, from 1828 down.

NO YELLOW FEVER yet at New Orleans. No one need fear to visit, or return to the city now. There will certainly be no epedemic here this season.

MANY COMMUNICATIONS, especially obituaries and revival intelligence, are crowded out this week. Be patient.

Read the advertisement of the worthy Agent of the Mobile Book Depository, J. F. EARLY, Esq.

YELLOW FEVER is at Houston, Galveston, and Key West.

REPORTS OF CONFERENCE SESSIONS, 1859.

WESTERN VIRGINIA CONFERENCE.

The Southern Methodist Itinerant, published at Parkersburg, the seat of the recent tenth annual session of the Western Virginia Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, comes to us with a full account of the proceedings. The Conference met on Wednesday September, 1859, Bishop Andrew presiding, and opening with reading the Scriptures, leading a Conference prayer-meeting for an hour, and delivering an earnest and appropriate address. Rev. S. Hargiss was elected Secretary, and Revs. H. B. Pope and W. Kennedy Assistants. The usual committees were appointed. It was resolved that, in the passage of character, each preacher, as his name was called, should give an account of his missionary and Conference collections for the year past—a first-rate plan.

Reports were received, read, and referred to appropriate committees, from Rev. Dr. Taylor, Sunday-school Secretary—Rev. Dr. Summers, Secretary of the General Conference, enclosing report on Itinerancy—from the same, on Quarterly Review—Rev. Dr. McFerrin, enclosing exhibit of the Publishing House—and from Rev. A. H. Redford, Book Agent at Louisville Kentucky. Rev. R. Abbey, Financial Secretary Publishing House, Rev. Dr. E. W. Sehon, Missionary Secretary, and Rev. Dr. Chas. Taylor, were present during the session, and made able and effective addresses in behalf of the Church interests in their respective departments, and also in behalf of the interests of the Church generally, as they severally came before the Conference. The Sabbath-school Anniversary meeting was addressed by Bishop Andrew, Dr. Sehon, and Dr. Taylor, and $52 67 was collected.

Four preachers were received on trial. The Statistical Report showed a total membership of 11,275, in full connection and on probation. The Missionary Anniversary meeting was addressed by Dr. Sehon, Dr. Taylor, and Mr. Abbey, and $200 collected was the result. The Sabbath services were earnest and spiritual—some souls were converted—Bishop Andrew, Dr. Sehon, Dr. Taylor, and others, preached to the town, and adjacent communities. The Publishing interests and periodicals of the Church received due attention, and Bishop Andrew and Mr. Abbey delivered addresses to the Conference in their behalf. The "Washington City Church," and the "Methodist Pulpit South," were not forgotten. The session was harmonious, brotherly, and devotional. Point Pleasant is the place of the next session.

Much business was done, yet, some of the interests of the Conference failed to receive all the attention required, notwithstanding the session continued about a week. The following is a list of the appointments of the preachers for the present Conference year:

CLARKSBURG DISTRICT—S. H. Mullan, P. E.

Clarksburg, S. T. Mallery; Rowlesburg, R. N. Crooks; Millcreek and Weston, J. M. Lanck; Buckhannon, J. D. Hauk; Jacksonville, F. M. Slaven; Braxton, S. M. Brannon; Glenville, John J. Goff; West Union & Harrisville, G. S. McCutchen; Beotha-ville, A. C. Flesher.

C. F. Medley, Agent for the Western Virginia Book and Tract Book Depository, and member of the Guyandotte Quarterly Conference.

S. Black, Agent for the Western Virginia Book and Tract Depository, and member of the Parkersburg Quarterly Conference.

M. Mark Russell, Agent for Marshall College and member of the Guyandotte Quarterly Conference.

J. F. Sedwick asked to be transferred to the Kentucky Conference.

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

Italy.

The National Assembly of the Romanis, comprising the Northern portion of the Papal States, was still in session at Bologna.

The Governor General of the Romanis, in an address to the Assembly, stated that he had provided for the defense of the country from all sides, by the formation of a league with the neighboring States of Modena and Parma.

The election in Bologna resulted in an immense majority in favor of the Liberal ticket, which entirely repudiates the temporal power of the Pope.

The aristocracy of the country are at the head of the movement.

The finances of the Romanis are found to be in an excellent condition, and the provisional government will be able, it is believed, to get along without a loan, now that the overthrow of the temporal power of the Pope has been so successfully accomplished in that section.

The bandits and smugglers which have so long infested that portion of the country have entirely disappeared, and perfect security prevails throughout the Romagna.

The Italians are beginning to exhibit much impatience at the inactivity and want of progress of the Zurich Conference, and the opinion generally prevails that a general Congress of all the great Powers must be held, as the only means of settling the great questions at issue.

The government of the Pope rejects all reforms and is using its influence and threatening force to prevent the establishment of those proposed in the Romagna.

King Victor Emmuel received a delegation from Tuscany on the 24 inst., and in reply to their address said that he hoped Europe would not refuse justice towards Tuscany, and that the pacific work of redressing grievances which it practiced towards Greece would be again adopted by them.

The vote of Parma upon the question of annexation to Piedmont resulted in 63,000 for annexation to 500 against it.

A new Serdinian loan of 5,000,000, it was expected, would soon be announced.

From 8000 to 9000 Papal troops have been concentrated at Pesaro.

The National Assemblies of Parma and the Romagna had resolved on annexation to Piedmont.

The Assembly of the Romagna at Bologna have authorized the President to express to the Emperor Napoleon and the King of Serdinia their sympathies for the Venetian people, and to express their readiness to make peculiar sacrifices in their behalf.

The Pope has experienced a severe attack of fever, and has been compelled to suspend audiences for several days, but at last accounts was recovering.

It is supposed the Pope's army will not be able to act against the rebels force.

The circulation of several French journals had been prohibited in Sardinia, on account of their advocating the separation of Savoy from Piedmont.

Appeals are pending in the National Assembly of Parma, calling Farini as Dictator, and declaring the expulsion of the Bourbon dynasty.

Russia.

The Russian expedition into Daghestan, in Asia, had proved completely successful, and a company had been formed at St. Petersburg for the construction of a commercial port there upon a large scale.

The government had ordered the three corps d'armee under Prince Gortschekoff to be placed on a peace footing.

Italy.

The Queen of Spain has sent a protest to the various European Courts against the expulsion of her cousin from Parma.

The Spanish Government has determined upon sending an expedition against the Moores, and has appointed General Prim commander-in-chief of the expedition.

The Madrid journals announce that the Imperial Government of Morocco has promised to inflict exemplary punishment on the tribes who insulted the Spanish flag and murdered Spanish subjects.

The Spanish Government, however, places little faith in these promises, is continuing its preparations for an expedition against Morocco.

Algiers.

Col. Charras and Col. Barbes have formally refused to avail themselves of the amnesty granted by Napoleon, and Col. Charras has written a letter filled with the most furious invectives against the Emperor.

The full triumph of the French admiralty over the English in relation to the New Foundland fisheries is announced in the Paris Moniteur.

Advices received from Paris represent that the French Government is making vigorous naval preparations with a view of strengthening the coast defences of the Empire.

Prince Napoleon has gone to Switzerland.

The accounts respecting the recent harvest in Algiers are quite favorable.

The Paris papers express the opinion that the Italian question will be submitted to a general Congress of all the great powers, and consider it almost certain that such a congress will soon assemble.

The French Ambassador at Florence, Prince Ponintowski, has been recalled.

Danubian Principalities.

At the Paris Conference for the final settlement of the question of the Danubian Principalities and the navigation of the Danube, the Ottoman Ambassador announced that "the Sultan agreed for this time only to grant investiture in Couzas as Hospodar of Moldavia and Wallachia."

The Austrian and Turkish Ambassadors have been called on for an early statement of their decision respecting the navigation of the Danube.

Belgium.

The Belgian Senate had adopted the first article of the bill providing for the fortifications of Antwerp by a vote of 34 against 15.

Austro French Alliance.

Prince Metternich, the Austrian Ambassador at Paris, had gone on a mission to St. Sauveur to confer with the Emperor Napoleon.

One object of this mission is said to be the formation of an alliance between France and Austria, the nature of which is such that if successful it would endanger Italian liberty and menace the peace of Europe.

General and Political Intelligence.

The steamship Great Eastern had been safely got out to sea and her performance proved quite satisfactory.

The Zurich Conference had been suspended, and the Plenipotentiaries had returned to their respective courts. It is reported that they had decided upon the boundary between Lombardy and Venetia, but nothing of an official character had transpired respecting their proceedings or the cause of their suspension."

England and Spain.

The English Government has addressed a formal note to that of Spain, asking an explanation as to the object of concentrating Spanish troops at Algiers, in the vicinity of Gibraltar.

Death of the Emperor of Morocco.

The Paris Moniteur announces the death of the Emperor of Morocco. Algiers was tranquil.

The Circassians.

A deputation of Circassians had arrived at Constantinople and presented a protest to the foreign Ambassadors at that Court against the invasion of the Circassian country by Russia.

They state that the whole province will be obliged to submit to Russia unless they are supported by the Porte.

Earthquake and Fire.

A great fire had occurred at Erzereuth, which destroyed a large amount of property. The place had also been visited by several shocks of an earthquake.

Another Imperial Meeting.

The Emperors of France and Austria it is positively stated, are shortly to meet again in Switzerland.

General and Political.

The general and political news by the steamers City of Baltimore and North America is of a very important nature. The overland mail from China had arrived at London, bringing the important intelligence that hostilities had been renewed between the Chinese and the English and French forces before Canton.

A most bloody conflict had taken place at the month of the Pekin river, in which the Allied squadron were repulsed with great slaughter, and obliged to abandon their attempt to land a force and capture the forts.

The Chinese fought with great bravery and sustained but little loss, as they were protected by fortifications, while the English alone lost nearly 500 men killed and a large number wounded.

It is reported that the American Ambassador to the Celestial Empire had arrived at Pekin and was received in a most friendly manner.

A terrible accident occurred on the steamship Great Eastern during her trial trip.

The feed-pipe easing to one of her funnels exploded, and five of the firemen were instantly killed, while a number of others were badly wounded.

The furniture and cabin of the steamer were considerably injured. The damage thus sustained is estimated at £5000. Otherwise the ship and machinery sustained no serious injury.

Mr. Scott Russell has undertaken to repair the steamer, and engages to have her ready for sea within three weeks.

Further by Steamship City of Baltimore.

The English and French fleets at the mouth of the Peiho numbered two ships of the line, seven large steamships of war, and ten gunboats.

Among the wounded is the Admiral of the British fleet.

No further attempt to attack the forts will be made at present, owing to the want of a sufficiently large land force, and it is probable that nearly a year will elapse before sufficient reinforcements can reach the Allies to enable them to make a successful attack. No serious interruption to the China trade is, however, anticipated.

The builders' strike in London has terminated in favor of the workmen, the leading firms and master builders having yielded to the demand of the workmen to recognize their nine hour's a day rule.

The King of Belgium has gone to France to confer with the Emperor Napoleon. The object of his visit is reported to have reference to a difficulty between Austria and Belgium.

It is reported that both the French and English Governments have agreed to the assembling of a congress of all the great Powers for the purpose of a final settlement of the Italian question.

The recently published article which appeared in the Paris Monitor upon the subject, and which attracted so much attention, is said to have come directly from the Emperor himself.

The National Assembly of Parma have unanimously voted the expulsion of the House of Bourbon and in favor of the annexation of Parma to Piedmont.

King Victor Emanuel is disbanding his army, and furnishing them with passports to Tuscany and Modena, for the purpose of swelling the army of Central Italy.

Schamyl, the noted and brave Circassian chief, has finally been made prisoner by the Russian troops and sent to St. Petersburg.

Further by the North American and City of Baltimore.

In consequence of the re-opening of hostilities in China, the plenipotentiaries of France and England have returned to Shanghai.

The Austrian Government, in carrying out the measures of reform proposed by the Emperor Francis Joseph, are making great concessions to the Protestants.

Signs of dissaffection and mutiny still continue to be manifested in some portions of India, especially in Madras, among the cavalry stationed in Hydrabad.

Advices from Australia state that the supply of gold was increasing, and the miners were doing well.

San Juan Island.

WASHINGTON, Sept. 26.—Col. Raukin, formerly Register of the Land Office at Olympia, Washington Territory, has arrived in this city direct from San Juan.

He says that if Gov. Douglass' plans and orders had been carried out, a collision would have inevitable have taken place, but the opportune arrival of Bayne, who countermanded his orders, prevented it.

Col. Rankin states that Gen. Harney did not dispatch troops to the Island of San Juan until he had received assurance from the Boundary Commissioners that our title to the Island was clear and certain, and then only at the request of the inhabitants, who demanded of him protection from British aggressions and Indian incursions.

The original difficulty was occasioned by the insolence of the Hudson Bay Company, which Governor Douglass represents.

Arrival of the Vanderbilt.—The Pope Dying.

LONDON, Sept. 15.—The reply of the Spanish Government to the inquiry made by that of England, in regard to the object of the armsonl concentration of Spanish troops in the vicinity of Gibraltar, is evasive and not satisfactory to the British Government.

The feeling in Spain against England is very strong. Some of the Madrid journals advocate taking Gibraltar from the English at all hazards, if further pressed.

The French and English Governments have determined to adopt prompt measures in regard to the renewal of hostilities in China, and intend to send out re-inforcements immediately to chastise the Chinese.

Advices from Rome state that the Pope was considered in a dying state, and it is reported that he has received extreme unction.

Advices from Tongerstate that in consequence of the agitation caused by the death of the Emperor of Morocco, all the foreign Consuls had been obliged to barricade their houses and arm their dependents to protect themselves from the violence of the natives. All the Christian residents were leaving, and the families of the Consuls have taken refuge on board the Spanish steamer. Great excitement prevailed and life and property were not considered safe.

A treaty was signed between the Papal Government and the Queen of Spain, on the 12th of August, by which the latter agrees to occupy the Roman States with troops whenever the French troops are withdrawn.

DOMESTIC.

Indian Massacre.

Advices received at San Francisco from Oregon report that Captain Wellin's command had been surprised by a large body of Snake Indians at the Warm Springs, and 140 of their number massacred.

San Juan Island Affairs.

The American troops still hold possession of the Island. Gen. Harney had sent a reinforcement of troops to the Island and the American force now numbers 400 men.

The papers from Victoria state that five companies of United States Infantry, four battries of artillery and eight thirty-two pounders had been landed from the United States war steamer Massachusetts.

The Colonial House of Assembly on the 12th of August, adopted an address to the Governor Douglas requesting him to require the home government to demand of the United States the withdrawal of our troops from the Island of San Juan, and to urge upon the English Government the importance of maintaining their right not only to the Island of San Juan, but to all other Islands in the same Archipalago which are now clandestinely, dishonorably and dishonestly claimed and invaded by the United States.

A motion was also adopted by the Assembly urging Gov. Douglass to commence the formation of volunteer military companies for the purpose of protecting British interests against the encroachments of the United States.

The shipments of gold from Victoria during the previous two weeks amounted to $144,000.

Later from New Mexico.

St. Louis, Sept. 20.—The New Mexican mail has arrived at Independence with dates from Santa Fe to the 5th inst. There had been an abundance of rain.

The return of the elections for delegate to Congress indicate that Senor Otero had been elected.

The San Juan Island Difficulty.

WASHINGTON, Sep. 20.—The Administration is somewhat apprehensive that a collision may occur between the American and British troops on the Island of San Juan, before General Scott can reach the Pacific, and every possible precaution has been taken to prevent it. This difficulty does not call for an increase of the naval force on Pacific, as the Pacific squadron is unusually strong at this time.

A New Political League.

NEW YORK, Sept. 20.—Ex-Senator Cooper has published a manifesto in favor of cheap postage and a protective tariff, and recommends the formation of an "Iron Men's League," for the purpose of controlling political parties. This manifesto has caused great uneasiness among some of the old political leaders.

Mexican Affairs.

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15.—Advices from Vera Cruz state that the French Minister at the city of Mexico has obtained the whole of the French claims against the Mexican Government, amounting to $140,000 which he proposes to invest in private enterprises in connection with Miramon. The French residents at the capital are indignant at his conduct in the matter.

Departure of General Scott for the Pacific.

NEW YORK, Sept. 20.—General Scott sailed to-day in the Aspinwall steamer for California, on his mission from the Government, in relation to the San Juan Island difficulty. He was escorted to the steamer by several regiments of the New York militia, who offered appropriate testimonials to the old soldier. As the steamer passed down the bay, a salute was fired in honor of General Scott from Governor's Island, Fort Columbus and Fort Hamilton.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING September 26, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New Orleans Price-Current, ending on the 24th instant:

The week has passed with a fair degree of activity in our leading staple, Cotton, and Sugar, also, has met with a fair demand at a further improvement in prices, but Tobacco has been neglected, and the operations in the various articles of Western Produce have been mostly confined to limited parcels for home consumption.

The steamer Borussia brough Liverpool dates to the 4th inst. They report the week's sales of Cotton at Liverpool to have been 57,000 bales, of which 4000 were taken on speculation and 2500 for export, and all the better qualities showed an advance of 1-16 to 1-8 on the figures of the previous week. The quotations given were 8d. for fair Orleans, and 7 1-16d. for middling; the total stock at Liverpool is stated at 652,000 bales, of which 555,000 bales were American. Trade at Manchester and the other manufacturing districts was improving, and Consols continued steady. At Havre the week's sales had been 5000 bales, and the quotations were 113f. for tres ordinaire and 105 for bas. On Thursday morning the Arabia's advices, still one week later, were received, reporting the sales of Cotton at Liverpool, for the week ended 9th inst. to have been 57,000 bales, the quotations remaining the same, though with a rather easier market. Manchester advices were still favorable, but the public funds were depressed. The Havre Cotton market closed steady at previous week's quotations, the sales of the week 6500 bales.

COTTON.—We have to notice the prevalence of a fair demand during the past week, the entire sales since our last report amounting up about 25,800 bales, viz.: 2500 on Saturday, 3300 on Monday, 8000 on Tuesday, 5500 on Wednesday, 4000 on Thursday, and 2500 on Friday. The receipts during the week amount to 37,633 bales; cleared during the same period, 13,059; and the stock remaining in presses and on shipboard, not cleared on the 23d inst. 90,740 bales. With respect to prices, we have again to remark that a good deal of irregularity has prevailed, though the general business has continued to be done on a basis within the range of our previous quotations, though the market closed heavy.

The receipts of new crop the past week were 38,740 bales, and the total receipts this season to date are 104,864, against 65,515 bales to same date last year.

We notice much complaint of the quality of the new receipts, as they are found to embrace an unusually large proportion of leafy and dusty cotton for so early a period of the season. The dusty parcels as we have already repeatedly stated, are exceedingly difficult of sale, as most orders received are imperative for their rejection. Under these circumstances, they must accumulate, and if sold at all it must be at a much wider difference in price than has hitherto prevailed.

The remainder of the old crop, of a similar character (some 7000 bales) still weighs upon the market without demand, and with prices entirely nominal.

New Orleans Classification:

Inferior	— @—	Good Middling	11½@11¾
Ordinary	— @—	Middling Fair	12 @12½
Good Ordinary	10 @10½	Fair	—@—
Low Middling	10½@10¾	Good Fair	—@—
Middling	11 @11½	Good and Fine	—@—

SUGAR.—The sales of the week amount to 1000 hhds. We quote for Inferior and Refining 3¾ to 4¾; Common to Good Common 5¼ to 6; Fair to Fully Fair 6¼ to 6¾; Prime to Choice 6¾ to 7¼; Centrifugal and Clarified 6¾ to 7¾ cents per pound. The above quotations apply to round lots, but small orders of 5 hhds and under, could not be filled without paying a further advance of ¼ to ½c per pound.

MOLASSES.—The sales of the week are about 350 hhls. The quotations are: For Inferior and Fermenting 30 to 35; Prime to Choice and Reboiled 30 to 37 in hhls., City refinery reboiled 40 cents per gallon.

TOBACCO, is quoted, for Lugs—factory, — to —; planters 3¾ to 4¾; Leaf—Inferior to common 5 to 5¾; fair 6 to 6¾; fine 7¼ to 8¾; choice, heavy and light, 8¾ to 8¾ and 10 cents per pound. The sales of the week barely sum up 100 hhds.

FLOUR.—The sales have amounted to about 5500 bbls. The market continues its heavy and inactive appearance. We quote a range, from $4 75 to $5 00 for ordinary to superfine, $5 25 $5 50 for ordinary to good extra, and $5 75 to $7 00 and $7 50 per bbl. for choice extra brands.

GRAIN.—The sales of Corn during the week amount to about 3,500 sacks—the extreme figures of the sales ranging from 70 to 75c. for mixed, yellow, etc. and 80 to 90c. for good to prime, and 92 to $1 for prime to choice white. Oats sell at 50 to 55c. per bushel for ordinary to prime St. Louis. Bran is quoted at $1 05 to $1 10, and $1 15 to $1 25 per 100 lbs. for good lots.

PORK.—The sales of the week amount to about 400 bbls. Mess. We quote Mess at $14 75 to $15 00, and a lot of Mess ordinary was sold at $14 per barrel. Retail parcels are selling at $15 25 to 15 50.

BEEF.—We quote Prime Mess at $14 50 per bbl. for extra brands.

BACON.—Shoulders 7¾ to 7¾; Ribbed Sides 10¼ to 10¾; Clear Sides 9½ to 10¾; Sugar-cured Hams 13 to 14½ cents per pound, Dealers prices for retail lots.

LARD.—We quote 11¼ to 11¾c for prime to choice prime, in tes. and 12¼c. for kegs.

BUTTER.—Western generally selling at 12 to 15 cents per pound, according to quality; and Cheese 9 to 10c.

BAGGING and BALE ROPE.—We quote Kentucky Bagging at 12 to 14½ cents per yard; India Bagging, 12 to 12¾c. Bale Rope, hand spun, 6¾ to 7¾, and machine made, 7¼ to 8 cents per pound.

GUNNY BAGS—Limited parcels sell at 11½ cents for light and 12¾ to 12¾c. to heavy and extra heavy bags.

COFFEE.—We quote fair at 11¼ to 12, and prime at 12¼c. per pound. Stock in first and second hands is only about 9300 bags against 24,200 at some period last season.

Nitrogen and its compounds; 6. Carbon and its compounds with Oxygen; 7. Compounds of Carbon with Hydrogen, including Illumination; 8. Sulphur and Phosphorus and their compounds with oxygen and hydrogen; 9. Potassium and its compounds; 10. Sodium and its compounds; 11. Calcium, and its compounds; 12. Constitution of Plants and Animals 13. Classification of Bodies of four natural Types primary, by course of life; 14. Spontaneous process of fermentation, etc.; 15. Preservation of animal and vegetable substances for culinary purposes; 16. The relation of the different classes of food to human health; 17. The relation of vegetation to the atmosphere and water; 18. Relation of animals to air and water; 19. Location, as affecting human health; 20. Hygiene, with practical applications.

Second Course.—Prof. W. H. PRICE, A.M.

First Division.—Geology—1. Introductory Lectures; 2. Primitive and Metamorphic Rocks 3. Secondary Formation; 4. Coal, with special reference to the coal region of Alabama; 5. Salt; its Geological position, distribution, uses; 6. Tertiary formation; 7. Alluvium formation; Delta Mud shipd, Silo, etc., 8. General view of the mineral resources of Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Florida, Mississippi and Texas.

Second Division.—Physical Geography.—1. Land; 2. Water; 3. Atmosphere; 4. Distribution of Flora; 5. Distribution of Fauna; 6. Farm, as related to commerce and future destiny of man; 7. Influence of physical characteristics upon Art; 8. Farm, as related to landscape painting.

Art Department.—Miss JULIA A. SPEAR, Principal. Pupils go to—

Music Department.—Prof. F. CORDEN, Principal Instrumental Music; Prof. J. M. ANDERSON Instructor in Vocal Music.

RESIDENT GRADUATE'S COURSE:

Reading and Lectures.—1. Taylor's World-of-Mind; 2. Ruskin's Modern Painters; 3. Mrs Jameson's Works; 4. Coleridge's Aids to Reflection; 5. Lord Kame's Criticism; 6. Sir William Hamilton's Metaphysics.

Boarding Department.—The domestic arrangements of the Institution are placed in charge of the Rev. JOHN W. RUSH of the Alabama Conference.

Collegiate Year.—The academic year begins September 28th, 1859, and closes the first week in July, 1860.

There are two Sessions of unequal length. First, from September 28th to March 1st; Second March 1st to vacation, in July. No pupils taken for less than one session. Pupils beginning in the middle of a session are charged from time of entering. Daughters of Trustees Ministers pursue the regular literary course, without charge; but instruction in extra branches, books, materials, and board are charged at usual rates.

Payment of half the tuition fees in advance is rigidly insisted upon, as the only possible plan upon which the income of the Institution of the College can be sustained. Patrons at home as well as abroad, are respectfully urged to adopt this method of adjusting their accounts. Deductions, except for protracted sickness, are at the option of the Faculty. Upon all bills, not settled by the 1st of August annually, interest will be charged from the close of the Session.

Commencement, first week in July, 1860, unless otherwise announced. Private examinations, the week preceding. A summer vacation of about two months and a half will be given.

Boarding—per month—including Washing, Fuel and Lights—$16.

Expences in the Institution.

LETTER FROM ANNOTATOR.

Our Large Mirror again—Its Reflective Force—The Herald's (Providence) Strictures on Annotator, Reviewed—Another Peep—The Herald's advice taken, "to hold the Mirror up to Nature"—The Sabbath—Its Desecrations.

I have not forgotten, gentle reader, my promise to let you take another peep into our large mirror; and I do so the more cheerfully as it "reflects the image true to the picture."

Such is its reflective force, that things done in the dark are brought vividly to view, and that which is done behind the curtain is made manifest. As an evidence of its bringing "hidden things to light," in one locality at least, the "Providence (La.) Herald," conceiving that by "our town" was meant Lake Providence, stoutly takes to task Annotator, for the little missile in the former letter.

The Herald must be argus-eyed and quick of perception. How does the Herald know Providence was meant? Was Providence correctly delineated? If so, does not this prove our mirror a rare instrument? But are there not two-score or, more towns in the broad valley of the Mississippi that have Churches and hotels and drinking saloons and gambling halls and cursings and fightings?

By way of application, as the Herald has saddled Providence, I remark in that trite but significant saying, "If the cap fits, wear it." This, however, the village paper denies unequivocally. I shall give its effort at abortion, literatim. It says: "Some wiseacre over the signature of "Annotator," in the New Orleans "Christian Advocate," of Aug. 31st, pretending to give a picture of things in our town, has drawn upon his distorted imagination for the following:"

Here, the writer pockets the missile, beginning with: "I promised to exhibit some of our male friends," and concluding with: "Will give you another peep into this mirror some other time:" and then proceeds: "The 'Gambling Hall,' the 'shooting' and stabbing,' are features that do not exist to our knowledge, and must be the creation of Annotator's diseased fancy.

"This place has heretofore been bad enough; but now, we claim for it a character of order, law, morality and quietness, second to no place of its dimensions in the State, and claim it justly; and, whoever the correspondent of the Christian Advocate may be, we are bound to regard him as being opposed to the welfare of our town and its inhabitants, and would ask him, when he next takes a 'peep,' to hold the mirror up to nature.'"

Here is evidently an effort at something; and if the writer survives and is not lionized, should'nt be surprised some day to hear that he had actually turned to a sardine.

"Wiseacre," alias Annotator, thinks—notwithstanding "his distorted imagination" and "diseased fancy"—that the writer of the above specimen was like the man that was drunk; he thought everybody else was drunk too; and I have no doubt if the Herald would acknowledge up, he would be the "diseased" one, and not Annotator.

"He says, "whoever the correspondent of the Christian Advocate may be, we are bound to regard him as being opposed to the welfare of our town and its inhabitants." The Advocate's "correspondent" claims to be an inhabitant of our "town," be its name what it may; he claims to be as devoted "to the welfare of our town and its inhabitants," as the man does that wrote the above paragraph; and this is the reason why he opposes gambling and fighting and drinking. Does the Herald man oppose these things en masse? "Answerest thou nothing?"

Again, he says, "the Gambling-hall, the shooting and stabbing, are features that do not exist to our knowledge." I am heartily glad to learn from the organ of Providence, that it is not cursed 'with a 'gambling-hall' and 'shooting and stabbing.' But it is "known and read of all men," that these are, or have been—and that recently—"features" in "our town."

The Herald, in confirmation of this "bold stroke," says: "This place has heretofore been bad enough; but now we claim for it a character of order, law, morality and quietness, second to no place of its dimensions in the State, and claim it justly." I shall let the Herald reply, at this point, to its own assertions. Just to the left, in another column, is information which stands in beautiful contrast to the "order, law, morality and quietness," as claimed for Providence. Here it is: "The Mayor's Court was full of business until a late hour on Wednesday evening. A general melee took place at one of those establishments outside the levee, in which several countenances were disfigured, a quantity of whisky consumed and claret wasted." "I speak as unto wise men—judge ye what I say;" for "out of his own mouth have I condemned him?"

Now, reader, in "our town," as you will clearly see from the mirror, "those establishments" spoken of in the Herald, are by some known as "dead-falls," by others as "doggeries;" but to the "refined circles," by the more classic name, "bar." At those establishments they sell poison by the wholesale and retail. Men get drunk—make brutes of themselves—rob their wives and children—become a stench in the nostrils of society, and as Mr. Herald says, disfigure their countenances and waste claret. Drinking is not confined to the low, dirty, vulgar Irishmen; but as you will perceive from the mirror, men in authority, men of wealth, of influence, instead of frowning upon these things, and setting a good and virtuous example to the young people, and especially to the children, drink and swear and gamble, if they do not fight. These things naturally lead to the most flagrant desecrations of God's Holy Day. Men are licensed to sell goods and groceries and whisky in this Christian land on the Christian Sabbath. Negroes are encouraged to bring chickens, meal, potatoes, corn, fodder and wood, to sell on the Sabbath. Cotton wagons freighted with bales are seen every Sunday.

Now, I ask the Editor of the Lake Providence Herald, if these are "features" of Lake Providence? If they are, how do you manage to stretch your conscience to such tension as to "claim justly, a character of order, law, morality and quietness" for that town, "second to no place in the State of its dimensions?" The Herald must have an elastic conscience. ANNOTATOR.

ONE THING LACKING.—BY RAG-PICKER.

New Orleans is but little, if any, behind other cities in public institutions for the afflicted. Her well known Charity Hospital, her Seaman's and Widow's Homes, several Orphan Asylums, Houses of Refuge, &c., are monuments that will evidence, in the far distant future, her love of mercy. In genuine and unostentatious benevolence her citizens are unsurpassed; for the poor unfortunate needs but to be known in order to find speedy relief.

There is, however, one thing yet needed. Hundreds of children, from five to fifteen years of age, wander about the streets suffering the ills of poverty, who from their peculiar situations receive no benefit from the public institutions. They are truly objects of what may be called half charity; for by selling papers and matches, and picking rags, they manage to obtain a half living. These poor boys and girls barely succeed in keeping soul and body together, while in the effort they suffer much from heat or cold, and contract habits of shameless wickedness.

Now a Sunday school or missionary system that would bring them under the influence of religious training, and at the same time assist them to preserve their bodies, could not fail in doing much good. 'Tis useless to talk religion to them while they are hungry and naked, and those who talk are both warm and fat; but a kind and practical regard for their physical well-being will be greatly conducive to that state of mind best suited to the reception of religious truth.

Then let the benevolent reflect upon and mature a plan by which these immortal, but now neglected souls shall be trained for useful places in life, and the exalted life of the blest around the Throne Above. No doubt in such an enterprise the people of New Orleans will take stock, and pay high premiums for shares; and certain it is that the next generation will cherish their names, and shed tears of grateful remembrance over their graves.

CONSCIENCE.

"HERRIS do I exercise myself, to have always a conscience void of offence toward God, and toward man."—It is not easy to define conscience. But in general we may say:

Conscience is that natural power, faculty, or principle within us, which, by the light and influence of the Holy Spirit, and of divine revelation—urges us to do right, and decides upon the merit and demerit of our thoughts, words, actions, passions and affections. And education, habit, example and usage, exert a peculiar influence upon our conscience, either right or wrong, good or evil.

The light and influence of the Holy Ghost, and of divine revelation, always give correct intimations of what we ought, and ought not to do. But the total depravity of man, and erroneous education, habit, example and usage, and Satan, counteract, to some extent, this light and influence.

This view of the subject is sustained by the whole tenor of Scripture. For example, Moses says: "God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually." The apostle Paul writes: "The carnal mind is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be." Here is the native, total, moral depravity of man; one fundamental view of human nature. But in another view there is less or more good, even moral good, in every man; and that too without any volition or act of his own. It is a free gift of God, giving him ability to "work out his salvation with fear and trembling." This distinction in the use of the term, "human nature," is important. In one sense it means the native, total, moral depravity of man. But in another sense it embraces the good, as well as the evil, that is in men. The apostle Paul, speaking of this compound of good and evil, in human nature, says: "The good that I would, I do not, but the evil which I would not, that I do. Now if I do that I would not, it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me. I find then a law, that when I would do good, evil is present with me. For I delight in the law of God, after the inward man. But I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members. O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" Here is a struggle, a warfare, in a penitent sinner, between fallen human nature on the one hand, and conscience on the other.

We come now to a very important point. The apostle Paul says: "The Gentiles, who have not the law"—that is, the revealed and written law—"are a law unto themselves . . . their conscience also bearing witness . . . accusing, or excusing them;" or, conscience is the law by which they are to act. Those heathen who have no correct knowledge whatever of the gospel plan of salvation by faith, and have no means to acquire this knowledge, are to act, and be judged, and be saved or damned, by the law of conscience. Faith is not required of them in the same sense and degree that it is of us. St. Paul inquires, "How shall they believe in Christ, of whom they have not heard? and how shall they hear without a preacher?" But although they may be saved by the law of conscience, and we by the law of faith, the salvation itself, in both cases, is the same, though there may be a difference in the degrees of light, grace and enjoyment. Even Job, an Arabian, who lived perhaps three thousand years ago, "was perfect and upright . . . feared God, and eschewed evil;" and why may not other Gentiles be perfect too?

But then if the heathen may be saved without the gospel, why make so much effort to send it to them? We answer. The New Testament expressly says: "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature." And God requires the Church to support the vast missionary enterprise. And thereby elevate the heathen to civilization and christianity.

Man has the right of conscience to avow his own opinion on subjects of religion, and to worship the Almighty in the mode which he deems most acceptable to him. And no person or earthly power has any authority to obstruct this right. Yet, no individual, sect, or party, has a warrant, under a plea of conscience, to infringe upon the legal or religious rights of others. But if this be done, then where admonition cannot prevail, or is impracticable, the civil authority should interfere. Nor can any person knowingly violate the revealed law of God with impunity under a plea of conscience.

Conscience is the second testimony to the christian that he is a child of God and an heir of heaven. The apostles Paul writes: "The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit"—that is, our conscience—"that we are the children of God; and if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ." Here is a very pure, important and lofty office assigned to conscience. When our hearts are entirely filled with the love of God, we are conscious of the admirable fact. All other evidence to the contrary cannot overthrow it. Here, "by faith . . . . . we stand, and rejoice in hope of the glory of God." Again the Apostle most clearly affirms that, "our rejoicing is this, the testimony of our conscience."

On the other hand, conscience is an evidence to the sinner that he is a sinner, and that he is not a child of God, is not prepared to die in peace, and is not fit for heaven. These startling and awful facts he reluctantly believes by the power of conscience.

An ill-informed conscience is a powerful instrument of mischief. And a well informed conscience, possessed of sensibility, is good security for virtue. These two points are elucidated in the case of St. Paul. In the extraordinary speech he made in his own defence before the council in Jerusalem he said: "Men and brethren, I have lived in all good conscience before God until this day." When he was under the influence of an ill-informed conscience, he was a sinner, and persecuted the Church of Christ. But when he was under the influence of a well-informed conscience, he was a genuine Christian, and chief Apostle. But he should have been a child of God from his youth, for he had the Jewish Scripture, and sufficient opportunity to be orthodox, and to worship God in spirit and in truth.

The apostle Paul wrote, "that in the latter times some should depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and the doctrines of devils; speaking lies in hypocrisy, having their conscience seared with a hot iron; forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats." "Even their mind and conscience is defiled. They profess to know God, but in works they deny him." "They received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved. For this cause God shall send them strong delusions, that they should believe a lie; that they all might be damned who believe not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness." On this ground we can account for nearly all the erroneous and absurd opinions of some people on the subject of religion. And here is a reason why some sinners even die without remorse.

But in general, conscience so exercises its judicial functions that the most profligate are forced to respect its claims and stand in awe of its insulted majesty. And it makes cowards of profligates, bold offenders, and hardened criminals. It terrifies and drives them to distraction, and sweeps away their refuge of lies. It confronts the persecuting monarch in his dying chamber, presents him the ghosts of the victims he murdered, crimsons the splendid hangings of his bed with their innocent blood, and makes him feel that he is a criminal arraigned before the Supreme Judge.

Conscience will not be destroyed or removed from us at death; but it will be delivered from those errors incident to human depravity, and its office will be somewhat changed, as will presently appear. It may be called a recorder of all our thoughts, words and actions. It will be a true witness that cannot be bribed, flattered, deterred, nor erased by time. And though it may be scared, hardened, resisted, and defiled in this life; yet, immediately after death, and especially in the great day of final judgment, it will arise in awful majesty, vigor, terror and wrath, to execute eternal vengeance on those who have rejected its light and influence. And the book of conscience will be opened before Jehovah's court as a living testimony against the wicked. Then each one will read his own history in his own conscience. And all that was forgotten will be remembered. He will read, not slow as now, but as in the lightning, flash after flash, he will read distinctly the history of his whole life. Terrible indeed will be the power of conscience, this viceroy of heaven, in asserting the claims of the Supreme Judge.

And in the world of endless woe, "their worm"—that is, their conscience—"dieth not." And it will be the most excruciating part of their agony. It will make them feel that they are ruined, lost, damned to all eternity. It will sink them in the ocean of despair to rise no more. Nor this alone, "the fire that never shall be quenched," will kindle upon their entire being, and burn, but not consume. In the midst of all this, conscience will be inexorable and make them acknowledge their punishment just! They will remember the good things of this life, the blessings of Christianity, the offers of salvation, the wooings and admonitions of conscience. And they will contemplate the eternal paradise of God, the heaven to which they were invited but which they refused! . . . . . And "Jesus wept!" . . . . . Again he invited them to come . . . . . And they would not! . . . . . These and similar reflections will forever augment the consciousness of their guilt, and of the justice of the final and eternal doom? O, intolerable anguish! woe! despair!

But on the other hand, a good conscience is a solace, a boon, a source of unfailing consolation. It approves the piety of the righteous, and affords them a blessed prelibation of that fullness of joy, and of those pleasures for evermore, which will constitute their great and eternal reward. It enables them to triumph over death and the grave. In the day of final judgment they will read in their own conscience the history of their pilgrimage on earth. They will read with rapture, as in a ruinhow of refulgent glory, that they have a title to a home in the eternal paradise of God. And in the world of endless bliss, while the magnificent universe rolls in harmony through the cycles of eternity, the glorified saint will forever have an approving conscience.

DAVID KINNEAR.

MINISTERIAL PLEASANTRY.

SAYS Dr. Bond, in the Baltimore Advocate, August 16th: "Good humor has always been a characteristic of Methodism. Mr. Wesley and many of the early preachers were remarkable for their pleasantry, and at this day ministers are the most agreeable of companions, whether they draw their theological opinions from Oxford or Geneva. Religon is wine as well as milk, exhilaration as well as sustenance. We wish we had more wit and more religion, though some of our contemporaries have intimated that what little we have of the one, accounts for our having less of the other. Mr. Wesley, too, was accused of too much levity, and there are yet some who consider every countenance to savor of sin that is not rigid to petrifaction. Our opinion is that such an endowment of God should be so devoted to the Devil that it may not be redeemed to the service of him who created it for his glory. We would like to see the humor that abounds in the conversation of religous men become as abundant in their writings; from which it is so completely and unhappily excluded. No man has a right to publish a dull book, and wherever the subject will permit of the use of wit and humor, they should be employed. Mr. Spurgeon's new sermons owe much of their popularity and effectiveness to his naturalness in this respect."

FATHER CHINIQUY.

Rev. Dr. Rice and Mr. C. A. Spring have lately visited the Colony of Canadian French at St. Ann's in Kaukakee Co., Illinois. In a letter to the N. York Observer, the latter of these gentlemen bears testimony to the genuine conversion of this interesting people from papal superstition under the pious and zealous labors of Father Chiniquy. His testimony is confirmed by that of Mrs. Susan T. Wills of Chicago, a French Canadian lady of high standing, who has spent a few weeks in visiting among them. They have resisted both the threats and temptations of Rome, and have borne persecution even to suffering for principle's sake. They are worthy the sympathy of christian people.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MRS. SOPHIA JONES NEW, daughter of Maj. John Harrison, of Westmoreland county, Virginia, and relict of Robert A. New, Esq., and born in Clarksville, Indiana, in sight of Louisville, Kentucky, to which latter place she was removed, when but six weeks old. She was born on the 15th day of February, 1788, professed religion in Corydon, Indiana, November, 1819, and after a life of usefulness, died in Louisville on the morning of Sabbath June 19th, 1859. Endeared by her unassuming manners and gentleness to a large circle of friends, we cannot but mourn her absence from the society which she enlivened by her holy life and godly deportment. She was instant in season and out of season, always abounding in the work of the Lord. No inclemency of weather nor darkness of night kept her from her seat in the female prayer-meeting which she led, benevolent societies, class-meetings, love-feasts, visiting the sick and poor, or the public worship of the sanctuary. The almoner of thousands of bounties, scarce any one could resist the appeals she made in behalf of her beloved poor. She loved her Church; "old Fourth Street Methodist;" but she loved the image of her blessed Savior wherever sustained. Her conversation was in heaven, administering balm and consolation to the afflicted; she did truly weep with those that wept and rejoice with those that rejoiced. But in her old age she seemed to forget that it was time for the energy and activity of youth to disappear, and, heedless of remonstrances on account of her feebleness, for a year prior to her decease would exert her self as much as in her prime. The consequence was, that in a few lingering months the machinery of life stood still. A cold was contracted; fatigue of body—the growing infirmities of age, caused her to take her last rest on earth. Concerning such an one, need it be asked, "How did she die?" Her life was the exponent of her profession; her death its endorsement. She was resigned to go or stay, as her Father in heaven willed. During a period of her six months illness, she talked incessantly of religion, would frequently burst out in strains of rapture and song, and was much engaged in prayer. She exhorted those around her, and enforced her exhortations with many appropriate texts of scripture. "Let me die in peace," were her last words.

MRS. CATHARINE MARANDA RIDDELL, wife of Anderson Riddell, and daughter of John B. and Louisa M. Scrivner, died in Leake county, Miss., September 11th, 1859; was born Oct. 31st, 1839; professed religion and joined the M. E. Church, South, in 1852, and has been a consistent member ever since; was married 3rd November, 1858. She leaves a kind and affectionate husband, father and mother, brothers and sisters, and a large family of connexion to mourn her loss; but we mourn not as those who have no hope, for we feel that our loss is her eternal gain. May we all live and die with that blessed hope, and, at last, get home to God, where we will be better enabled to praise and glorify His holy name. I. J. SCRIVNER.

PURIFIES THE BLOOD!
B. F. WILLIAMS' COMPOUND SYRUP OF SARSAparilla, and Iodide of Potassium. This medicine is offered as one of the best preparations of Sarsaparilla extant, and as a curative remedy has won great favor at Nashville, Tenn., and other Southern Cities. The medical faculty authorize its use (having been shown the recipe.) As a BLOOD PURIFIER there is no remedy equal to this compound, and for the cure of a numerous progeny that owe their origin and parentage to a strumous Diathesis or Scrofulous taint in the Constitution and in the blood, such as White Swelling, Chronic Ulcers of long standing, Obstinate Tetter, Ring Worms, Sore Eyes, Scald Head, Syphilitic Disorders, and other diseases of the skin and blood that resist the usual treatment. He can substantiate by the very best evidence in our City, its efficacy in Nervous and General Debility, Indigestion or Dyspepsia, Inflammation of the kidneys, Rheumatism, etc. etc. It is confidently recommended in diseases peculiar to Females, such as Leucorrhœa or Whites, Suppressed Menstration, Chlorosis or Green Sickness. Try it You will be satisfied with the result Read what Dr. Hudson says He is a gentleman of high standing.

Charlotte, Tenn., Sept. 15, 1859.
MR. B. F. WILLIAMS: Instances are not rare where the attending physician fails to cure well confirmed Scrofula. The following memorandum is interesting:
SUBJECT—A girl of 15 or 16 years of age, the attending physician had failed to cure. An anxious father had consulted me, and from my knowledge of your preparation, I was constrained to prescribe it. After taking six bottles she was considered well. She was cured of a deep seated ulcer and a constant drain of milky matter from one or more sores under the ear. The entire lymphatic system was deeply involved. This case alone is well worth the attention of all—but when added to a long catalogue of cases of great obstinacy, cured by us Panacea, not Nostrum, nor Patent Medicine: no Secret, but an invaluable preparation of Sarsaparilla, Iodide of Potassa, etc., well gotten up by the Chemist, and made familiar to the intelligent physician, it very justly deserves a trial by all laboring under any of the numerous chronic diseases that afflict us. MR. J. F. MCAVOY With regard to your inquiry about the "Williams' Sarsaparilla and Iodide of Potash," which I purchased of you, I have no hesitation in affirming that it acted magically. My sister was afflicted with a cutaneous eruption, which enveloped the head and a large surface of the body, and which resisted all medical treatment. I think that one bottle affected a permanent cure though I continued the treatment until two bottles had been used. It has been eighteen months since, and as yet there has been no re-appearance of the disease. I have frequently expressed, and reiterate the opinion, that it is the best preparation of Sarsaparilla in use, and the addition of Iodide of Potash enhances its value tenfold. Very respectfully yours,

TRUTH OMNIPOTENT.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from C. W. Vesey, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of North Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, one that ought to go home to those in whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.
CONSERVATIVE OFFICE,
Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858.
Messrs. Wright & Co—As any testimonial in reference to your preparations may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following, published in my paper, in the "Conservative" of the 21st inst.
Col. Vasser was formerly associate editor of the "Conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity. Respectfully, J. W. VESEY.
[By the Conservative.]
Commendated. ABERDEEN, Aug. 19th, 1858.
DEAR VESEY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untold sorrow and untimely and unhappy bereavement.
On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 15 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sovereign remedy against the terrible scourge of children, I was induced to give it a trial, believing, by the acquiescence of my family Physician.
On the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, calculating, being afraid to give the amount of prescription. I was unable to detect any impression occasioned by it until late in the afternoon of that day; and should not then, but for the discharge of some thirteen worms, varying in length from two and a half to six inches. This I thought a remarkable number for a sparing infant. But to my great amazement, about one o'clock the next morning I was aroused from my slumber to witness the incredible number of nine hundred and thirty-six from one evacuation.
Before breakfast of the same morning, (Sunday) but one small dose was administered, which was followed by the discharge of fifty during the day. The next day, (Monday) none was administered; but still occasional discharges occurred during the day, varying in size and quantity as described.
On Tuesday morning following, one more small dose was administered, taking all five doses of a quarter of a teaspoonful instead of a half as prescribed by the label of directions. In all, the little creature has discharged to this date, the rise of three hundred worms, a majority of which will average five or six inches in length; and is running about as usual, with returning evidences of good health and spirits.
Having met with such astonishing effects in the case of my infant, I was induced to use the Vermifuge on six other children under my protection, varying in age from two to ten years old, and in every case save one, (that of the oldest) the like happy results have been produced.
These facts are elicited, 1st, because of my antipathy heretofore to nostrums of every kind; and, 2nd, because my experience has convinced me that, in the experiment I have made with WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, it is due to suffering humanity, as well as the manufacturer of the medicine, to make public the results of my observation.
W. H. VASSER.

Read! Read! Read! "Ye afflicted read" the following Certificate of a cure of over 20 years' standing:
B. T. HERMSON—Dear Sir: I have been troubled with an affliction of the Bladder and Kidneys for over twenty years. I have tried Physicians in vain, and at last concluded to give your Genuine Preparation a trial, as I had heard it highly spoken of. It afforded me immediate relief. I have used five bottles, and I have obtained more relief from its effects and feel much better than I have for twenty years previous. I have the greatest faith in its virtues and curative powers and shall do all in my power to make it known to the afflicted. Hoping this may prove advantageous to you in assisting you to introduce the medicine I am truly yours, M. MCCORMICK.

The Goddess Hygeia!
When Hygeia lent medicinal aid to man,
And taught him all his evils how to scan,
Not to a favored few she showed the way
To banish the wound and all its pain allay—
Not to the few who now claim physic theirs,
And think but what they give legitimate wares,
No! to all human kind communed she gave,
"Employ your skill, and your sick brother save"
So went he forth the Magic Salve to find—
The Magic Salve that now heals all mankind.
Nor Wound nor Bruise, nor Cut, can long remain,
Nor Scar its rude appearance long retain.
Use it—you'll find we urge not truth's detractor,
For you'll be healed by
Dalley's Pain Extractor,
The only sure, effective and complete remedy for Bruises Scalds, Eruptions, Piles, or any Cutaneous disease whatever.

We Don't Want Any Other.
Such is the language of all who use WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE," when they call for it, and any other is offered them; they have tried it, and from experience know it to be superior to all others; therefore when they are in want of a medicine of the kind, they purchase that which they know to be good and can be depended on. An Agent who called on us a few days ago, said "I find it difficult to sell any other Vermifuge when I have yours. I have had some in my store for a long time which I occasionally try to 'work off,' but no one will purchase it unless I warrant it as good as yours, this I cannot do." So it is, and so it will be, Winer's Vermifuge owes its unrivalled popularity to its own intrinsic merits, on this alone it has a ways depended, and never will, for in fact that is superior as a remedy for worms, it would ere this have shared the unenviable fate of many other articles designed for similar purposes. To all who are in want of a medicine of the kind we say try it and judge for yourselves, we are confident that it will give entire satisfaction.

Beware of Calomel.
The public generally may not be aware that nearly all Worm Lozenges contain Calomel, and that the lives of children are thereby endangered; parents should remember this, for although medicine may be easily administered when in the form of Lozenges or Candies of any description, yet the danger that is incurred outweighs the advantages, besides Calomel very often fails in accomplishing the desired object, it is by no means to be depended on as a remedy for Worms, and it is not now so generally resorted to by physicians as it was a few years

A BLIND MAN'S BOOK.

BY A CRITIC IN SPECTACLES.

First Paper.

THANKS be to God for a man that can write a book!—a man simple-hearted, earnest, fervid, genial, eloquent; a book full of tear-starting pathos, of glowing descriptions, of keen humor, of admirable character-painting, of affecting personal incidents, of hair-breadth escapes, of moving perils by flood and field;—a book that records the opening of a lovely life suddenly shrouded in the darkness of severe affliction, that records the development of a loving spirit, the manly struggles of a heroic nature, the growth of a vigorous intellect, the fearful agonies of a soul wrestling with doubts, and distracted by the vain janglings of a false philosophy, the triumph over the powers of darkness, and the serene culmination of the brilliant orb in the cloudless zenith of an assured faith and an unhindered trust in God! Such a man is William H. Milburn, and he it is who has written such a book.

Upon the fringed curtain of our eye-lids hath lain the shadow of that land wherein there is nevermore any rising of the glorious sun, no more blooming of odorous flowers, no more unfolding of beautiful landscapes. To us, also, hath been the darkness of the forbidden day-light; the hushed stillness of the imprisoning chamber: the dreaded visitation of nauseous drugs. To us hath come the yellow haze of the flickering lamp-light, all blown which, to our disordered vision, went floating tumultuous black motes, wreathed serpents luridly lustrous, shimmering shapes of ominous darkness, springing and darting downward and fainting away, through the moist halo that encircled the waving chandelier. To us hath it been for us to press again and again the cold horny eye-ball, in the pauses of our midnight watch, waiting full painfully until the wearied sight could refresh itself for another studious effort. Even now, while the lamps are lighted in our chamber, and the cool wind sighs over the fragrant vanilla by our window, we must we sit idly, never for a moment daring to lift the cover of the volume that lies so temptingly by our side, nor to trust for any space, however brief, this quiet pen to the waiting sheet. When a man has lived with eyes half-shut to shield them from the sunlight; when he has trembled upon stepping into a parlor, lest he ignore a friend, or bespeak a stranger; when he has been harshly misjudged for his painful infirmity, looked as haughty because he could not see the bow he solicited, or the nod that patronized him; when to the night is barred against his keen thirst for reading, and even the day-light is a harsh interpreter to his diseased eye-sight, then must there be sympathy in his heart with every man of like infirmity with himself. Therefore we love William H. Milburn, were it only for our common affliction, though in different degrees, which bound us in a brotherhood of suffering, the like of which, oftener than any other human weakness, touched tenderly the pitiful heart of Jesus.

We had heard through the letters of a friend, some time ago, that a young man well-nigh blind, was electrifying the good folk of Montgomery by the surpassing eloquency of his pulpit efforts. We were curious to see this youthful prodigy. In 1849, we sat in the old Methodist Church in that city, one Sabbath morning, waiting for the preacher. The people were rapidly in, crowding all the available space in the body of the Church. The hour for service came on. Presently there was a little flutter, as it were a surprised "there he is", running along up the aisle. Looking about, we saw, passing us, noiselessly as it had been a spectre, a small, frail-looking man, inultlessly habited in black, who walked with steady step to the sacred place, ascended the little stair, and disappeared behind the pulpit. We sat still, scarcely breathing, so great was our expectancy. In a moment he arose, and turned full toward us. We were painfully struck by the extreme pallor of his countenance, the angular lines of his attenuated visage, the thinness of his emaciated person, and the general air of feebleness which marked his entire presence. Our sympathies were wrought upon. We yielded him in our own heart, so frail, so thin, so feeble, so seemingly inadequate to the arduous duties of a laborate, so little competent to the fatigning labors of a faithful ministry. Judge of our surprise, when with clear, round, full, unquivering, sonorous voice he solemnly began one of his favorite hymns: "O where shall rest be found?" We were amazed that such a volume of sound could find lodgement in such a feeble-looking body. Never shall we forget the peculiar emphasis with which he was wont to enunciate the word "weary", in the second line of that hymn, rolling it liquidly nhont his well-modulated tongue, until it fell of in a burden of moaning, like the mournful refrain of "nevermore" in Poe's song of the "Raven." After the recital of appropriate Scriptures he said "let us pray." Never had we heard, until then, a voice that seemed so full an embodiment of the essence of supplication, calm, solemn, earnest, penitential, humble, as its tones rosa up in thanksgiving, or sank into the measured utterances of urgent intercession. The sermon gave us high delight, combining the glowing fervor of Robert Hall, the energetic terseness of Dr. South, with a power of verbal collocation that seemed to us almost as felicitous as Jeremy Taylor himself could boast. Such was our first hearing of the man, whose second book is before us, entitled "Ten Years of Preacher-Life."

Mr. Milburn's book does not aim to give a detailed account of his life. Not at all. He but very briefly alludes to his early history, not venturing to disclose the sanctities of the home-circle previous to his fifth year. Ever memorable to him stands out that year in his terrible isolation of sorrow and darkness and affliction. Up to that time he saw with two as bright and sparkling eyes as any young Philadelphian could boast. How clear, how keen, how observant were those childish eyes, we have abundant proof, for even now in their period almost rayless gloom they cling with loving lithesomeness to the pictured impressions of that glorious season of boyish delight. Standing, on a bright, breezy summer afternoon, down in his father's garden, drinking in the brave show of sky, and flower-girt earth, and wavy trees, a play-fellow, drawing back to throw a bit of rock, or oyster-shell, laid open the ball of the left eye, just below the pupil, and in an instant was blotted out the celestial glory of the outer world!

The opening chapter, in which Mr. Milburn recounts the particulars of that distressing providence, is scarcely inferior in tender pathos to the death scene of Little Nell, by Dickens. The original injury was so much aggravated by ill-judged medical treatment, that not only was the sight of the left eye totally destroyed, but the sight so far sympathized that but one triangular, transparent spot, not much larger than a pin's point, remained in the cornea and pupil, through which the light might enter. To render even this fraction of an eye available, it was necessary to wear a shade above, to place the middle finger of the right hand beneath it, and to seek the strongest natural or artificial light in which to read. Thus painfully spelling out, letter by letter, and word by word, stooping until bent double, with cramped frame, suppressed breath, and straining eye-ball, could the emaciate thirst of the scholarly mind alone be quenched. And yet, while suffering in a manner that would have absolved common minds of any responsibility of intellectual culture, and furnished occasion for whining complaint and bilious discontent with the allotments of providence, Mr. Milburn has read in this agonizing way a prodigious amount, devouring greedily the contents of libraries, and dog-earing with repeated perusal, books of which many a man with two good eyes has only heard by the hearing of the ear.

Mr. Milburn's father failed in business, and removed to Illinois. It was at a time when fabulous accounts were circulated of the glorious possibilities of the great prairie-world. To the mind of the ardent boy, these stories put on the hues of oriental romance. But the prosaic reality administered a serious shock to his imaginative temperament. The sad removal, leaving the golden memories of the irrevocable past for the unrevealed actualities of the future; the location in the far West; the novel customs and manners of the primitive inhabitants; the striking scenes that were constantly presented to the eye of the stranger,—all are told in a most agreeable manner in the second and third chapters of the Autobiography. Young Milburn became, at once, domestic and merchant's clerk, assisting his mother in various little household arrangements, while helping, also, his father to barter and trade and sell in the store, in which the latter had embarked his small capital. His moments of leisure were passionately given to the perusal of such books as the sympathy and kindness of newformed friends placed at his disposal. While engaged in the dull, unpoetic business of counting eggs, or weighing butter, or measuring home-spun, his youthful fancy, all aglow with the fervor of an imaginative nature, revelled in the bright elysian world to which his favorite books had given him loving access and the sweet embraces of a hearty welcome. Not satisfied with his attainments in the English tongue, "ye clerke" yearned for an acquaintance with the languages of ancient renown. A Latin Grammar was purchased and mastered. A favorite turn in pecuniary matters gave him a teacher for an hour daily. To the Latin was added the mysteries of Greek, and, in due season, the young student was ready for the college, which grew and flourished in the town of his adoption. A sturdy set of collegians were those, not your fellows with varnished boots, and creaseless coats; with hats of mirrored silkiness and straw-colored kid gloves; with curling mustache and gold-headed cane. Never a bit of it. Young men they were who cut wood at seventy-five cents per cord, lived on potatoes and corn-meal, paid their own tuition bills, declining aid, and pushed their way through all obstacles with a glorious spirit of vigorous manhood. How far our embryo preacher stood his hand with these fellows of thews and sinews we know not, but we can but believe that much of that fearlessness of danger and that manly independence, which break out all through his subsequent history, is due to his early acquaintance with the unrestrained freedom of Western life, and the self-reliant spirit of his young associates. But alas! in the midst of his devotion to his studies, his health gave way, and with the goal to which his youthful ambition aspired so pantingly full in view, he was reluctantly compelled forever to abandon the classic shades of college retirement.

The question naturally occurs to the reader, "how came Mr. Milburn to be a Methodist Preacher?" Anticipating this laudable curiosity, he devotes the fourth chapter to the giants that were in the early days of Methodism. It is the old story. The house of his father was the home of Methodist Preachers, and therein did he entertain angels, though it may be not unawares,—messengers of grace, peace, and mercy to the dwellers under that consecrated roof-tree. There the wondering and delighted lad often saw the venerable forms of McKendree, George, Roberts, Capers, and their compeers. It is not surprising that upon so sensitive an organization as that of young William, the reverend and grave aspect of these men, "in sanctitude severe and pure:" their qualat straight-brensted coats; their broad-brimmed white beavers; their simple dignity of manner; their kindly regard for children, to whom they spake always "some comfortable words,"—should have made a deep and permanent impression. Seated in their midst, in listening awe, he heard them recount their long and arduous service; their perilous travels; their frequent persecutions; their lonely journeys through untrodden wildernesses; their nights of sleep under the leafy coverts of the solemn woods, or the still canopy of the over-arching heavens; their exposure to death in every form, and their marvelous deliverances from the very jaws of destruction. He heard of their religious experience; their conflicts with sin, as with bodily presences of evil; their penitential exercises; their glorious initiation into the joys of the kingdom; their inspiring faith in God. And when, at the close of an evening of sweet fellowship in Jesus, the Bible was fetched from its wonted place, and its solemn words read in the hearing of all; and when, with faces reverently turned to the wall, the sublime strains of the evening hymn rose full and clear from the lips of these prophets of the Lord, a strange fire burned in the boy's heart, and a strange spirit seemed to glide into his bosom, as he tremblingly ventured to think that he too might one day become of this goodly company of witnesses to the power and glory of the Gospel of Christ.

We left Mr. Milburn turning sorrowfully away from the promised land of his youthful aspirations, the scholastic seclusion of a contemplative student's life. About two months before this sad termination of his college career, we find him enjoying a ride over the snow-clad prairie on a brilliant December morning, in company with "a tall, stalwart, weather-beaten man," "a profound thinker, an able theologian, and a powerful preacher of the word." They had not proceeded far, when he was startled and subdued by the commanding voice of his companion saying, "William, did you ever feel that you were called to preach?" He had for years felt the call, but now that it was presented in a definite form, he shrank from it with unutterable dread. He demurred, putting in the usual pleas, of "youth, inexperience, incompetency," and finally concluded that he could by no means think of it until he had graduated.

In less than two months his health was a wreck; books were banned; study fore-sworn of necessity; plans overruled; visions beclouded; aspirations checked, and in his lonely wretchedness, the ever-recurring inquiry of his venerable friend haunted him day and night with its earnest persistency of unanswerable appeal. But the dawn came to his troubled spirit, his resolution was formed, and soon we find him mounted "on a five-year-old, frolicksome but kindly," his comfort consulted by the provident care of his loving mother, his saddle-bags stuffed with clothing and books, his umbrella and overcoat strapped behind his saddle, an exhorter's license in his pocket, and his former querist, the Rev. Peter Akers, presiding Elder, for his traveling companion. Then follow the incidents of his early ministry, and to many an itinerant's experience will they present the stirring counterparts of recollected tribulations. Here we have the awkward occasion of his first stammering exhortation; his induction into the mysteries of a Western Quarterly Meeting; his acquaintance with the jolly shoemaker, "who worked half his time, and attended meetings the other half", "and who sat astride a bench, seesawing to and fro, slapping his hands, and pouring forth his stentorian solo; his attendance upon a Western wedding, where a gormandizing native gulped down boiled custard, declaring that he had been raised upon "thickened milk;" his participation in the striking panorama of an Illinois Camp Meeting; his effective tuteiage, under the superior instruction of his "venerable guide, philosopher, and friend," when, riding over the limitless prairies, he had for "his seminary the wide open universe with the glowing sunshine, or the glimmering star-light, the fathomless azure, or the embattled clouds juluing in the fierce din of the tempest over-head, and the land all around arrayed in the luxuriant garb of summer time"—for his teacher "one whom he revered and loved," and for discourse "a theme deep as life and solemn as eternity."

At Quincy, the seat of the Illinois Conference, on the day completing his twentieth year, Mr. Milburn was received on trial in the traveling connection. His brethren, he signalizes as "a brave and hardy band of pioneers," whose "confidence and esteem he coveted more than that of generals and kings."

THE GOSPEL AND SLAVERY: No. I.

BY A MISSIONARY.

Do not be alarmed or offended, friendly reader, because of my name. I am no enemy in disguise. I am your friend, and the friend of mankind; and in communing with you for a brief space, I desire only to confer a real kindness on you, and through you, upon others. Do not, therefore, throw me aside, nor put me off, until you hear fully all that I have to say. My public name is as above, but my real name is, The Gospel in practice; and, as you are a shareholder, there is an intimate relationship existing between you and me, far we are kindred. The first part of my name binds me to the last; and both bind me to you. So, being kindred, we are at once on terms of social intercourse, and can therefore dispense with formality and ceremony.

Suffer me then, both as a relation and a friend, to ask you: Do you provide your servants sufficiently with the Gospel? They are yours—wholly yours; and no one has, according to the teachings of Heaven, and the laws of men, any right to interfere, in the smallest degree, with you or them, except myself. For the very reason, then, that the word of God recognizes the relation of master and servant, it becomes the more necessary for me, while you occupy this position among your fellowmen, to ask this question, to see if you have observed and performed a very important duty arising out of your part of the relation. You know very well that if a Book is quoted as unquestionable authority, on any given subject, that that book must be imperative in its teachings on all correlative matter belonging to the same subject; and, where such a Book is known to be divine, there is no appeal from a performance of every duty enjoined in it. It is therefore essentially necessary for your own, and the good of others, that you should hear, know, and keep in remembrance, all that Heaven says in reference to your position as a master. This is an age evincive of activity, of progress, and of great humanity. The ends of the earth are being speedily brought together; and the gospel, according to the design of its author, * is being rapidly carried to every creature on the face of the whole earth.

Look at the missionary operations of united christendom, at the present time, and you will see more laborers and more conversions among the tribes and nations of men than the world has ever before known or heard of. Now, as you hold absolute control over the persons and religious privileges of a portion of the human family, you will at once see the propriety, necessity, and friendship of my present interrogatory. If you do not see and answer it yourself, your neighbors may for you. With them you enjoy the reputation of a good citizen, an intelligent, humane, and liberal man, in all your sentiments, principles and actions; but the world is becoming sensitively alive to the necessity of fulfilling the design of the author of the gospel, to have it preached to every creature; and, perhaps, by carelessness, or for want of due reflection, you are standing in the way of this being done to a goodly number of the creatures of God. They are your slaves, it is true; but, by the declarations of Heaven, and the common sense of men, they are also human beings, with human souls, and wholly dependent upon you for what they know, or what they hear, upon the subject of salvation.—Are you ready to meet them on the day of eternity to answer my question there?

Allow me then again to ask the question: Have you fully provided your servants with all the means and opportunities of the Gospel? But you "do not believe it yourself, and are not therefore bound to obey it yourself, or to furnish it to your servants." Think again. Does your failure or neglect, as to yourself, lessen your responsibility towards your servants? Not in the least. Your want of belief is simply the evidence of your own loss; but whose fault is it that your servants do not hear and believe? You have never moved in the matter, and † "How shall they hear without a preacher?" But you "want to do what is right towards your servants—still, you do not think that it will do them any good to hear preaching." I am very glad to hear you say so; but is it left to you to think when Heaven has already decreed that the gospel shall be preached to every creature? But your "neighbor, who is a professing christian, does not think that the gospel does his servants any good." But you are neither held responsible nor justifiable according to what he thinks. Is he wiser than that which is written? The gospel must and will do good whenever it is fully known—in all its plainness and simplicity—as the conversion of tens of thousands of slaves all over our land already sufficiently exemplifies. But, seeing that you introduce your christian neighbor as a witness, and, through him, bring a very formidable objection, allow me, through you, to ask him a few cross-questions.

Brother, how have you had the gospel made known to your servants, so that it has falsified its own declarations, in not becoming the power of God unto their salvation, which it actually is, both to the bond and the free? "By the Missionary." And does it require no more than the mere existence of this fact to give the gospel, in all its fullness, freeness and simplicity? Has the gospel no concomitants to render it readily acceptable besides the presence of the Missionary? What place, for instance, did you specially erect and set apart to the exclusive worship and service of Almighty God, so as to make your servants feel, as much as possible, that they were actually in the House of God? What! "a common cabin!" Is this all you thought God worthy of, in which to call upon Him, in a public manner, for His blessing? Can you believe that your servants could feel devotional where there was so little respect paid to the Almighty by one who knows so well the respect and reverence due Him? What does experience say? ‡ For instance, you can never make the slave population believe that a sugar-house or cotton-gin" (or indeed any common house) "is a church; nor do they feel, in the place of their daily toil, that pleasure and delight which they experience in a house consecrated wholly to divine worship." And then again, how much money did you expend so as to obtain a sufficient portion of the Missionary's time for this very important purpose? "One year $20 and another $30." Do you not see, brother, that you have not really begun to give the gospel to your servants, and yet you testify to your neighbor that you think the gospel does them no good. I am ashamed of your christianity, and tremble for your responsibility. You provide no special place in which God may may be sought unto—you give only $20, or at most $30, to meet the expenses of the Missionary, (the church having no store-house from which to feed and clothe him) and, as you require and allow him to preach only on the Sabbath, he is reduced to the necessity of finding (if he can—for you don't concern yourself) two other places, on the same day, with nine others for the rest of the month, (which he seldom can) to entitle him to the same miserable pittance which your example has established as a gospel measure, that therewith he may try to keep soul and body together; so, at an unseasonable hour, he must come, in a hurry, to get you to force your servants out in a hurry—preach in a hurry—and attend to their spiritual and eternal interests in a hurry, and then go in a hurry, to go through the same hurried procedure with another and another distant congregation, in like circumstances, on the same day; and so on, throughout the month. Is this doing as you would be done by, to hear and know the gospel of your salvation? Is it rendering § "to your servants that which is just and equal?" Do they enjoy equal privileges with yourself, to hear and believe the gospel? To give them what is just, has reference, I will say, to this world only; but, to give them what is equal, must include the other world also; because both are amply within your reach.

You have, in comparison with others, food, raiment, and shelter, with absence from involuntary oppressive labor, so far as this world is concerned. You have, doubtless, great variety—perhaps, superabundance; but your variety and superabundance resolve themselves at last into food, raiment, and shelter—these being all that you have, as compared with your servant, or the world at large. Now justice (leaving self-interest and humanity out of the question) requires you, in return for their entire labor, daily to render "unto your servants" an ample sufficiency of proper and nutritious food, answerable to the work which they have to perform, with raiment and shelter, and all necessary care and attention in sickness and old age—as well as freedom from over-work at all times. A share of your variety would be wholly unsuited to their wants and necessities; but that variety is more than compensated to them in the abundance of their wholesome substantiality. In so far, therefore, you render to your servants that which is just, and "even equal with yourself, in this respect.

But, besides these things, both to you and them, in this world, you are also immortal beings—destined to live forever; and to you, at least, the providence of God has thrown around you the amplest means for your eternal salvation, which, without hindrance, you can use to the glory of God, in your own personal salvation. The gospel—the way of salvation—is also in your house, and you can read it and have access to it at any time. You have, or have the means to have, the regular preaching of the gospel at your own door, and can even go to a considerable distance to hear it. Your opportunities, privileges and advantages, in preparing for the other world, are very great indeed.

Have you rendered unto your servants that which is equal to yourself, in all respects, also? Heaven awards you their constant, single-hearted labor and obedience; but as rigidly exacts of you the amplest means for securing their spiritual and eternal interests. Have you taken their obedience and labor and yet denied them the gospel? They cannot read the gospel themselves, and ought, by its ministers, to be provided with it by ample and unhurried hearing of it, accompanied by oral instruction, to compensate for this deficiency. They cannot go to the ordinary place for the public worship of Almighty God, as their are no seats and no room for their accommodation; standing outside at the doors and windows being no privilege to worship God in his own House; and they ought and must be provided with the same means, advantages and appliances by you at home before you can be clear, in your final account, in rendering to them that which is "just and equal."

INTERESTING COMMUNICATIONS, No. II.

IN the town of P., State of G., in the year 1833, during a prayer-meeting conducted by the preacher in charge, Rev. E., one Sabbath morning before preaching, the power of God was most marvelously displayed among the people. The intelligence spread through the community during the day. At night a crowd gathered at the Church, to see and hear for themselves. Among them, was a Mr. L., a tavern-keeper in the place, who was an honest, reliable man, but decidedly irreligious. He said that he would go down to the Church and "see the fun," as he expected they would have some rare scenes that night.

At the close of preaching, two of Mr. L.'s daughters, grown young ladies, presented themselves among the penitents at the altar for prayer.

God was in the midst of the assembly—it was no time for "fun" to any present. The scoffing infidel stood in awe before the Lord of Hosts—the cries of broken-hearted penitents filled the place, while the shouts of the redeemed came up like incense before the throne: the scene was awfully glorious!

After prayer, the preacher extended a second invitation to approach the altar for prayer; when, to the surprise of all who knew him, Mr. L. "came running and kneeled before the Lord." This new development intensified the excitement to the highest conceivable degree. It was enough to rend the very rocks themselves to see the old scoffer and his two daughters locked in each others' embrace, and all prostrated before the mercy-seat crying, "God be merciful to me a sinner." Other centres of influence like this were thrilling whole circles around them—for it was one of the days of "the right hand of the most High."

Mr L. and his daughters were converted, and the divine assurance given that they were now the children of God. Just one month from that day Mr. L. breathed his last, and went home to heaven. The mocker saved! Saved by just one month! But saved he was! Not only were his conviction and his conversion attended by demonstrations of the divine power scarcely less overwhelming than those displayed by the darkened heavens and the rending graves at the crucifixion, but the pathway of that short month was all radiant to its very close with the glory of the Lord.

Never had the inmates of that old tavern witnessed such a scene as the dying triumphs of Mr. L. He was filled with glory and with God. He had a word of admonition or of encouragement for every one that entered his room. An old companion in infidelity and in sin hearing that Mr. L. was dying in triumph, said: "I will go and see him; if he tells me now that Christianity is true, I will believe him; for L. will not deceive me; he is an honest man." As soon as Mr. L. saw his friend D. enter the room, he addressed him in the most earnest and emphatic manner, assured him that Christianity was true, that he knew it, and that now in the dying hour he realized its all-sustaining power, and urged him to seek it and meet him in heaven. The infidelity of Mr. D. gave way before such a demonstration of the divine power and glory of Christianity. He sought the Lord and joined the Church.

Such are the epistles God has written in the hearts and lives of his people; and by these shall men know that he is the Lord.

BOOTH, THE ACTOR, ON THE LORD'S PRAYER.

The following anecdote of Booth, the great tragedian, is related in the Washington Sentinel. It occured in the palmy days of his fame, before the flash of his great black eye had been dimmed by that curse of genius and bane of humanity, strong drink.

Booth with several friends had been invited to dine with an old gentleman in Baltimore of distinguished kindness, urbanity, and piety. The host, though disapproving of theatres and theatre-going, had heard so much of Booth's remarkable powers, that curiosity had, in this instance, overcome all his scruples and prejudices. After the entertainment was over, lamps lighted, and the company repaired to the drawing-room, some one requested Booth, as a particular favor, and one which all present would doubtless appreciate, to read aloud the Lord's Prayer. Booth expressed his willingness to afford them this gratification, and all eyes were turned expectantly upon him. Booth rose slowly and reverently from his chair. It was wonderful to watch the play of emotions that convulsed his countenance. He became deathly pale, and his eyes, turning tremblingly upwards, were wet with tears. As yet he had not spoken. The silence could be felt. It became absolutely painful, at last the spell was broken, as if by an electric shock, as his rich-toned voice, from his white lips, syllabled forth, "Our Father who art in Heaven," etc., with a pathos and solemnity that thrilled all hearts. He finished. The silence continued. Not a voice was heard or a muscle moved in his rapt audience, until from a remote corner of the room a subdued sob was heard, and the old gentleman (their host) stepped forward with streaming eyes and tottering frame, and seized Booth by the hand. "Sir," said he, in broken accents, "you have afforded me a pleasure for which my whole future life will feel grateful. I am an old man, and every day, from my boyhood to the present time, I thought I had repeated the Lord's Prayer, but I have never heard it before, never." "You are right," said Booth; "to read that prayer as it should be read has cost me the severest study and labor for thirty years, and I am far from being yet satisfied with my rendering of that wonderful production. Hardly one person in ten thousand comprehends how much beauty, tenderness, and grandeur can be condensed in a space so small and in words so simple. The prayer of itself sufficiently illustrates the truth of the Bible, and stamps upon it the seal of divinity." So great was the effect produced (says our informant, who was present,) that conversation was sustained but a short time longer, in subdued monosyllables, and almost entirely ceased; and soon after, at an early hour, the company broke up and retired to their several homes, with sad faces and full hearts.

NEARER HEAVEN.

The weary laborer, counting the hours until the sun goes down, rejoices at each sound of the bell that warns him that he can soon return to his home. The little child hurrying from play or from school to the kindly welcome of a mother's arms, is glad when the well-known roof is in sight, and he almost there. The home-sick stranger enters joyfully the vessel whose swift wing shall waft him over the waters to the land he loves. Even so the Christian pilgrim gazes through the mists that enshroud his pathway, for the first glimpse of the everlasting hills which are crowned with the city of his God. Heart-sick and desponding, fainting and weak, there is no surer word of hope that can cheer his drooping faith, and arouse his sleeping zeal, than the melody of "nearer heaven."

If we are toilers in the vineyard at all, every glowing sunset is the token that one day less is left to journey over. Every new morning is another mile-stone, silently telling us that we are approaching the end of the road. Every hour of labor is an earnest of never-ending rest. The path we travel may be tangled and wide; it may lead up rough and rugged mountain-sides, and into dangerous ravines; storms may break over our heads, and the blinding hail and dripping rain render it almost hopeless; yet in sunshine and in gloom we are ever going onward. At the end of the way is the "house Beautiful," where the Master has gone to prepare a place for us.

We know not what lies before us ere we reach our home. Joys may be lying in the way, waiting to clasp us in their fragrant arms. Fairer hopes may spring up, like flowers, which we tread. Happy hearts may be around us, and the gentle ministries of the fire-side make earth an Eden; or darkness may be on the wing, and the creeping shadows already looking over the shoulder of the sunshine; yet in the same sweet spirit of submission and gratitude let us take whatever our Father sends.

"If grief await, O let me murmur not;
He passed through furnace-fires tenfold as hot!
And shall the servant scorn the Master's lot?"

One moment in glory will more than recompense for all the toils and griefs of the way thither. Let us cheer each other by thus wing with the songs of Zion, and whisper in the ear of every singing one, "Nearer heaven!"

"My days are gliding swiftly by,
And I, a pilgrim stranger,
Would not detain them as they fly,
Those hours of care and danger.
For O! we stand on Jordan's strand,
Our friends are passing over,
And just before the shining shore
We may almost discover."

THE IRON MOUNTAINS OF MISSOURI.

THE State of Missouri is rich almost to a fabulous amount in its iron ores. Its iron mountains—well named mountains—will yet prove a mine of wealth to the Mississippi basin. A correspondent of the Toledo Blade, who has just paid a visit to the Pilot Knob, one of the most remarkable of these iron deposits, gives some facts about it which will interest some of our readers:

This hill is 500 feet high, and one mile in circumference. The iron ledge crops out everywhere upon the sides. Laborers are quarrying it in open daylight on the mountain-side, as you would quarry granite. From the inclination of the strata, and every external indication, the hill or mountain seems to be homogeneous of solid iron ore. It is what is called micaceous oxyd of iron. Its relative weight to pure iron is as 90 to 100. At the furnaces it yields under very crude management 50 per cent of pure iron. It might yield probably 65 per cent. The indications of iron at the Iron Mountains are equally marvellous. Calculations have been made of the quantity of iron in those hills—mere approximations, of course—which make it amount to 600,000,000 tuns; a quantity sufficient to supply one hundred millions of people, with twenty-four pounds each, for 500 years, if it was accessible to them all. The iron is said to be very malleable, and hence very desirable for all those uses and purposes for which such qualities are required. No large quantities are now used at St. Louis, though it can be transported cheaply by the Iron Mountain Road, which connects the mines with the city. The difficulty of obtaining an abundance of coal, at cheap rates enough and free from sulphur, is said to be the present difficulty in the way of making St. Louis a great mart for iron manufactures; even greater than Pittsburg. The iron, when cast into harness fixtures and ornamental work, receives a polish like burnished silver. Much of the silver plating on harness used in our country, is merely polished iron from the Missouri Iron Mountains.

INVISIBLE ARMOR.

General Schuyler was one of the American officers in the army which fought for our freedom. He figured largely in those stirring scenes which took place on the Hudson and Mohawk rivers, when the English Generals hired the Indians to fight on their side. General Schuyler had great influence with the red men; they loved and feared him; so the English wished he was out of the way; and as he did not get shot on the field of battle, a plot was hatched to waylay and murder him.

Two men were picked out to do this bloody deed, an Englishman and an Indian. The day and time was set; they shouldered their rifles and took their stand behind a clump of trees which he had to pass by on his way home.

After waiting and watching for some time, the General hove in sight. He was on horseback and alone. Now, or never! They took aim. In a minute or more, the General would have been a dead man.

At that moment the Indian knocked down the Englishman's gun, crying:

"I can't kill him; I have eaten his bread too often."

The General rides on unharmed; he has buckled on an invisible armor stronger than brass, and he is safe. What was it? The armor of friendly a[ctions]. General had often relieved the distresses of [the] men; he had fed them when hungry, and clothed [them] when naked; and now British gold cannot [buy] the grateful memory of his kindness, as it melts the deserter's heart.

"I can't kill him; I have eaten his bread too often!"

Oh, what power there is in friendly actions. They not only make you friends, but disarm your enemies. Remember, boys, they may defend you when a great name, a stout arm, a brave heart, a good rifle, a fleet horse, can avail you not. Think of this.—Child's Paper.

THE BORROWED SERMON.

A clergyman, in passing to his parish, which was at some distance, had to pass by the house of another clergyman. On one occasion while on his way to hold the sermon for the day, to his great discomfort he found he had forgotten his sermon. He was at a loss for a moment to know what to do. The time would not admit of returning home; and to attempt to preach without a book was not of the question. There was only one help for him in this difficulty, and that was to call at the clergyman's whose house he had to pass, and ask him to lend him a sermon. This he was most loth to do, "because," said he to himself, "he is a Methodist sort of a fellow; however, it cannot, under the circumstances, be helped." He called at the parsonage, saw the clergyman in question, told him of his dilemma, and asked him for the loan of one of his sermons. The clergyman consented, and withdrew to his study, resolved to make the most of the opportunity. He sought out a sermon upon the text, "Ye must be born again." The clergyman received it with thanks, proceeded to his church, conducted the service as usual, and concluded by reading the borrowed sermon. At the close of the service, one of his congregation came to him in great distress of mind; "Sir," said he "what must I do to be saved?" "O, repent the Lord's Prayer, and say the Creed and the Ten Commandments." "Ah, Sir, I have done that, but I find that won't save me. I want to know how I am to be born again, as you have been telling us this morning?" "Well," said the clergyman, "the fact is, it was a borrowed sermon; and you had better go to Rev. Mr. ——, who lent it to me, and he will tell you what to do."

EDUCATION SOUTH.

The Boston Post has published a series on "Colleges and Schools at the South," which concludes as follows:

"In reviewing the subject of education in the Southern States, we arrive at this general result: That the scattered condition of the people is unfavorable to the very general prevalence of the common school system, such as prevails in New England. Private schools are more general in the South than any other portion of the world; and as to the higher seminaries of learning, if she is not now equal to the North, she soon will be. And then the education she acquires from social intercourse may outweigh all the real instruction imparted through the lyceum system.

"At the present time the South is more active in improving her educational system than the North. At her recent commercial conventions the subject has been freely discussed, and the general view has been taken that her sons and daughters should be educated at home, and not at the North. The Southerners not only propose to furnish themselves with education, but with school books. The last have been very generally procured from the North. The South has been accustomed to pay the North for school books and education $5,000,000 annually. But she is now endeavoring to manufacture both school books and education for her own children.

THE VALUE OF STORIES.

A gentleman who acted as private secretary and amanuensis for Prescott, the historian, gives some extremely interesting particulars in relation to the habits of a remarkable man. He was as regular in his movements as clock work, and among his invariable habits was that of listening every day of his life, for the space of an hour, to some story or tale, read to him by his wife or his secretary; he needed this kind of mental refreshment as a relief from his grave study of the matter-of-fact histories which he worked, as much as he needed sleep or exercise in the open air. And what he required every mind requires. Stories, therefore, are necessary to the preservation and improvement of the human intellect as any other kind of literary exercise. It is only the thoughtless and unphilosophical who speak of stories with contempt. They are to the sober realities of the earth what flowers are to the vegetable world. Roses and violets are as important to the economy of the universe as are the oaks and cedars. The story-writer, therefore, is not to be held in less esteem than the author of ponderous volumes of history or dissertations of philosophy and political economy. Each has his sphere, and is entitled to respect according to the degree of ability with which he fulfills the duty which his talents qualify him to discharge.

THE SECOND THOUGT.

"You have stabbed me; I could kill you, but will not, on account of your wife and family." This is the language, as reported in the Sacramento Union, of Mr. C. S. Fairfax, clerk of the Supreme Court, to Mr. Lee, its official reporter. It seems, that during a conversation between these two, concerning the withholding from Lee (as the reporter) the transcript of cases decided in the Supreme Court, Mr. Fairfax became much excited, and told Lee "you lie," or "you are a liar," at the same time giving Lee a slap in the face. The latter having a sword-cane in his hand, drew at once and stabbed Fairfax twice. Mr. Fairfax then drew a derringer and presented it at the breast of Lee all ready to fire—when to the astonishment of all present, as it must indeed have been, as well as to that of Mr. Lee himself, instead of shooting—said, "You have stabbed me," &c., &c., and as if afraid to trust himself with the dangerous weapon, delivered it into the hands of a friend.

ECCENTRICITY.

WE never see an eccentric man—especially if he be a young man—without suspecting him of a spice of affection. Nature is a whimsical old dame, and now and then manufactures an odd fellow; but such works are rare, and therefore likely to be counterfeited. We have no patience with those young gentlemen who, in company, affect absence of mind; who, if you ask them a question, seem so profoundly wrapped in meditation as to be unmindful of what is passing around them. Vanity often makes a man ridiculous, but never more so than when he affects to be eccentric.

SIGNIFICATION OF THE WORD CREOLE.—The Southern journals are discussing the origin and signification of the word creole. As there is a popular error that the word is applied to a person of European and African blood, it should be remembered that there is an authority for it. The word was originally used to designate the children of Spanish parents born in Spanish colonies. In time it was applied to the children of other nations, and people talked of French creoles and Dutch creoles. The word properly signifies now that the person to whom it is applied was born in a country originally colonized by France or Spain, and descended from ancestors residing in that part of the country, at or before the time of its transfer to the United States.

PULPIT VEHEMENCE.—Dr. Hamilton, in a speech before the General Assembly of the Scotch Free Presbyterian church, to illustrate that the vehemence of Scotch preachers who settle in England is offensive to the people, quoted a French visitor as saying to him, "O, yes, I did hear you in your church one day, or rather I did see you, when you were making the Gospel offer with clenched fists."

POWER OF CALMNESS.—When Mr. Webster stood before the eager thousands at Banker Hill, on an occasion which must have agitated any common man, his wife, regarding him from a distance, observed to a friend; "I do not care to remain; for I see that he is calm, and I know that he will succeed."

With a true wife a husband's faults should be A woman forgets what is due to herself when she scends to that refuge of weakness—a female
A wife's bosom should be the tomb of a failings.

UNBROKEN RESOLUTION.—A sovereign, once broken into, soon goes, and it is the same with a resolution. A resolution, unbroken, is hard as gold; once change it, and it is thrown, as it were, into so many coppers, and rapidly melts away.

ENVIABLE DISTINCTION.—"Not a single infidel publication," says an exchange, "can be found in the Welsh language."

APPLICATION OF ART TO THE WORLD'S CONVERSION.

Philosophus and Philander are friends. The one is a thinker and the other a man of fine common sense. Both are practical men, but the first is most abstract—has a philosophy for everything—sees no place for expediency either in a system of truth or an earnest life. The second is regarded as most practical, by his neighbors, but Theophilus, their Pastor, says differently. He is, however, very happily practical, to a degree, without a philosophy, guided by good instincts and common sense. They are both good Christians, however, and love and admire each other hugely—one, for his far-seeing and godly wisdom, and the other for his hearty, ready goodness. To their Pastor they are both devoted, like Aaron and Hur to Moses, each supporting an arm. The three form one of those rare and delightful circles in this world, where piety, intelligence, refinement and friendship, constitute, cement, and crown the joyous Rest of kindred souls. They all believe in God, in Jesus Christ, in the Holy Ghost, in the Holy Catholic Church, in the remission of sins, in the resurrection of the body, in the life everlasting, and, as a matter of course, in the conversion of the world.

Philander is a "revivalist," and thinks that the world is to be converted mainly, if not entirely, through the instrumentality of revivals. He is a friend of education, especially of Christian education. The Church has good schools, and "they must be supported." He is also a friend to literature, especially Church literature. The Church has her periodicals and Publishing House, and "they must be supported." Then, they have revivals every year at the schools. The periodicals publish all the revival intelligence and happy deaths, and the Publishing-House sends out many good books, abounding in illustrations of Christian experience, and the workings of the Itinerancy. He loves every thing connected with the Church and religion, and feels that sanctified literature and christian culture have much to do in the welfare of the world; but he has never been able to explain to his own satisfaction their relation to religion and the world's conversion.

Theophilus and Philosophus agree with him as far as he goes. Their philosophy of instrumentalities is much wider in range, and various in details, however.

On a certain beautiful moonlight evening in autumn, the three friends were seated upon the front gallery of the Pastor's study engaged in pleasant conversation. The high aims of a truly enlightened Christian Life was the general theme of discourse. The scriptural phraseology in which their sentiments were uttered was not widely different in the mouth of each, yet an intelligent listener might have discovered that with Theophilus and Philosophus there was an understood and felt interpretation much deeper than with Philander—a broader horizon and a higher sky. From personal religion, culture, and life, they naturally expanded into a discussion of the destiny of their race. Philander, as was usual with him, warmed with the thought of the world's conversion. At last he broke out as follows:

"O for a spiritual steam-engine with which to convert the world; or at least a spiritual sowing-machine (he did not mean sewing-machine) with which to sow the gospel broad-cast over all the earth—a sort of spiritual seed-planter, capable of sowing millions of handfuls of the "good seed" by the same force now necessary to sow only single handfuls by the old-fashioned hand-plan of individual preaching and christian labor."

"Ah, my friend," answered Theophilus, "you have uttered the true idea of the whole matter. But take care that you do not undervalue the old-fashioned hand-plan of individual preaching and christian labor. It is of divine institution, and large development and varied application of the original principles of that plan, constitute the only improvement that can be made; and, indeed, such development and application, when properly understood, contain the very multiplied power for which you long. The true and only motive power lies in the preaching of the gospel; the application of that power, in a way analogous to the application of native water, and latent steam, to machinery—this is the problem of modern Christianity. The world was long in discovering the one, and the Church has not, as yet, fully discovered the other. But the fullness of the time approaches. The preaching of the gospel must ever remain as the primary power for the salvation of souls. But the development and application of this incalculable power, upon the art-and-machinery-principle is to be the means of the salvation of the world. As material civilization has advanced more in the last half century, upon this philosophy, than in the whole Christian era before, may we not hope that the last half of the present century will witness, from the same cause, a similar advance in the triumphs of the Kingdom of Christ?"

At this point, Philosophus, who, for the last few moments had remained silent, kindled into an enthusiasm not common to him, and delivered himself as follows:

"You have touched upon the great question of later Christian times—The Indefinite Multiplication of the Power of the Christian Church, through appropriate agencies. These agencies are many—Missions, Sunday-schools, Schools, Colleges, the Press. At some other time I will tell you my views of all these. But the agency that admits of the greatest multiplication of power is our Newspaper Press. Of that I wish to speak at present.

"Newspaper-power, much as is said about it, is the most grossly promising, and, at the same time, the least appreciated, of all the agencies auxiliary to the Church and ministry. It preaches, prays, describes revivals and conversions, expounds Scripture, teaches the children, records the death of saints, advocates Sunday-schools, Bible-distribution, missions, education, religious literature, church, parsonage and school building. It imparts sanctified knowledge of philosophy, science, politics, art, poetry, biography, travels, geography, scenery, trade, commerce, medicine, law, agriculture, navigation, and manufactures. It nourishes character, moulds life, creates and concentrates opinion, develops thought, plants principle, refines taste, corrects error; encourages poverty, comforts affliction, cheers loneliness, unites its readers with bonds of sympathy, and opens a world of truth, beauty, joy and hope to tens of thousands of minds and hearts every week. Besides, it tells every thing that is worth knowing of the news from all parts of the world. Its influence is silent as the dew, all-embracing as the sunshine, and productive as the spring-time.

"Newspaper-reading is a "University Course" to the vast masses of American youth unable to go to school or college. One paper in a family gives this course of culture to all its members. When you get a new subscriber, it is as though you had given the means of education, and furnished a library, to every member of the family. Religious newspaper-reading is weekly gospel-preaching to the tens of thousands of subscribers. The speaker or preacher can only reach those within the compass of his voice; and but few audiences are large enough to tax a good voice. But the newspaper can speak to a million at a time as well as to a hundred. No expense is necessary in building churches or lecture-halls, or recitation-rooms, or chapels, or dormitories. It is emphatically reading and "worshipping God under our own vine and fig-tree, with none to molest or make us afraid."

"It is a blessing that comes to the poor as well as the rich—to the cabin as well as the mansion—to the poor farmer or mechanic in his work-day clothes, and to their wives and children in their homely apparel, as well as to those in the most elegant attire. No need of dressing to go hear the weekly messenger discourse of all thoughts and feelings, and enantries, and conditions, and facts, and fancies. No bad roads to traverse, no dark and cold and stormy nights to brave, no children, and sick, and affairs, to leave unprotected, in order to hear that voice that sounds in every man's home all over the country. It sounds even in the sick-room. It says to the lonely dweller in the wilderness, or on the prairie, or in the far interior, or in the heart of the city, "We are all here. you are not alone—we are working, and laughing, and fighting, and making peace, and preaching, and praying, and striving, and going to heaven, over here, in New Orleans, New York, London, Paris, Rome, St. Petersburgh, Constantinople, Jerusalem, Pekin, Calcutta, the Cape of Good Hope, and in all the country wide of the world. What are you doing over your way?" It brings the news from both earth and heaven.

"Every virtue is strengthened by it, and every vice repressed. Every intellectual want is ministered to, every moral sentiment inspired, every noble aspiration encouraged and counseled, every hope strengthened, all love of beauty gratified, every sorrow sympathetically divided and sweetened. It is a friend to every imaginable legitimate interest. The preacher, the educator, the litterateur, the publisher, the missionary, the Sunday-school teacher, the merchant, the mechanic, the manufacturer, the planter, the farmer, all are assisted in the knowledge, the sentiments, the tastes, the sympathies, the information, imparted by the newspaper. He who plants a tree is a benefactor to his kind, but he who gets a subscriber to a good newspaper, has scattered a handful of intellectual seed which will, the first crop, bring forth thirty, sixty, or a hundred fold, which will likewise be sown, in million increase, by thousands of hands, until "shaking like Lebanon" shall be a feeble figure of its infinite fruitfulness.

"This is the new power that is to shake the world. The question of the world's conversion, settled in divine promise, but made doubtful by the slow progress of human instrumentalities, is to receive its greatest help toward salvation from the religious newspaper-press. What steam and electricity are to material civilization, the newspaper is to mental and spiritual civilization. What the Atlantic cable and the Great Eastern are to general progress, the newspaper is to spiritual progress. The neglect of our preachers and people to circulate broad-cast our newspapers, depending alone upon the ordinary instrumentalities of usefulness, is like going to New York on horseback to buy goods, or hauling cotton to market in an ox-wagon hundreds of miles, along the track of a railroad, or the banks of a navigable river. The other instrumentalities of good are not to be under-valued, but their highest value is to be developed in connection with the influence, and through the help of the newspaper, to say nothing of its independent unrivaled power for good, increasing, as it circulates, in an incalculable ratio.

"Let us awake to the value and power of the newspaper, and make it available to the highest possible degree. This is the lever-power that is to move the world. It is many-handled, and all men, all women, all children, may take hold, and throw their weight upon it, to assist in lifting the world out of the mire of ignorance, and sin, and unbelief, into the sunlight of wisdom, and purity, and a heavenly faith. Every one who writes a good, readable article for a good religious newspaper, or reads the paper, or gets others to take it and read it, is using this lever-power in behalf of God and man. It is a cheap, practical, available way of doing good. If you cannot preach, get a newspaper into some family or families in which it is not. If you cannot give money to support the gospel, or to send out a Missionary, or to build churches and schools, get a few more readers for the religious newspaper.

"If you cannot visit the sick and poor, send them the newspaper. But, if you can do all—preach, give money, visit the sick—double it, treble it, quadruple it, increase it a thousandfold, by circulating the newspaper as largely as possible. This philosophy is true. If our friends would practice it, our range of usefulness would be doubled immediately."

THE PLACE OF SOULS.

It has been said that the spirit-world—Paradise, and the place of the unhappy—is not far distant from us—indeed, that it is strangely near to us—so near that nothing but the fleshly walls of mortality intervene between us and its scenes and inhabitants—and that if the earthly house of this tabernacle were suddenly dissolved, we should find ourselves, without changing our position, within the space and presences of its grandly solemn domain. Is this the case with our departed friends? Are they only disembodied, instead of departed? Do they still keep us company? "Are they not all ministering spirits," constantly "ministering to them who shall be heirs of salvation?" How can they minister to us, unless they be present with us? How solemn, how precious the thought, that the loved and lost, as was supposed, are not lost, but are the dearest and most loving friends and companions God has allotted us! Do we all have society and sympathy and companionship that the world knows not of—the society of the spirit-world!

Could we always carry in our hearts an assured consciousness of these things, what a serious atmosphere, what a solemn tone, what a pervading grandeur would it give to our lives! But there are more solemn, and perhaps more real things, on every side of every human life. We need not open the mysterious portals of the shadow-land in order to find them. We need not wait for death to disclose them. The present world is full as real, full as solemn, as the spirit-world.

What is it that gives the spirit-world its almost intolerable solemnity? It is the fact that it is the place of souls. And are there not souls in this world? This world is full of souls. Every human being has a soul. Every human face is the life-mask of a human soul. Wherever you see the glancing light of the gleaming eye, you see the out-beamings of a soul, its countenance flashing through the windows of its mortal home. Every smile indicates a joyous soul, the sunshine of whose gladness illumines the cloud-like countenance that hides it; and all gloomy countenances indicate unhappy souls. Most of the sounds of the world that ring against the dome of the sky, or steal out from hidden chambers and cellars, are the glad songs or agonizing groans of human souls. All prayers and blessings, all curses and blasphemies, are the sounds of the wings of upward or downward-flying souls. All thought, all imagination, all sentiment, all feeling, all speech, all literature, are foliage, flowers, and fruits of living souls. All trade, all commerce, all art, all government, are products of the labor of human souls. All civilization is simply the sum-total of what souls have done for themselves. All history is the web which, silk-worm-like, souls have woven for their memories to dwell in, before they departed.

The world is full of souls.—The souls of little children, and young men and maidens, of wives and husbands, of old grey-headed men and women, of wise men and ignorant, of rich and poor, of bond and free, of sick and well, of good and bad, of happy and unhappy. The world is a soul-field, life is soul-life, and the work of life is soul work. If we do good, it is good to souls; if we do evil, it is evil to souls. Our interests here are soul-interests; our duties are soul-duties; our responsibilities are soul responsibilities; and our rewards and punishments are predicated of the soul. Everything in this world is for the soul: our bodies, and our homes, and our relationships; our pleasures, and our business, and our education; the sky and the earth, the day and the night, the sunshine and the shade, all sorrow and all joy. The love of God for the world is the love of souls; the death of Christ upon the cross is for the salvation of souls; the Holy Spirit is the light and comfort of souls; the Bible is the book of souls; the gospel is the power of God unto the salvation of souls. All life is the probation-time of souls, and the eternal weal or wo of souls depends upon its issues.

"COMFORT YE MY PEOPLE."

Comfort, encouragement, is the spirit, and import, and purpose, and effect, of the ever-blessed gospel. "I bring you glad tidings of great joy." "Unto you is born a Savior, Christ the Lord." "He is risen"—"and become the first-fruits of them that slept." He "died, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God." He "come into the world to save sinners"—even the "chief" of sinners. "Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out." These doctrines, declarations, and sentiments constitute the sum of the gospel-message to all men, saints or sinners; for no sinner is so low in sin as to be beyond the reach of Christ's mercy, and no saint is so high in holiness as to possess any thing better than simple salvation from sin through Christ's ever-present and ever-bounding mercy. Comforting encouragement to trust in Christ, therefore, is the primary element of gospel-preaching.

There are three things that ought to comfort all the sons and daughters of men. The first is, that the mercy of Christ is for all men and women alike—none are excluded—none are favored; none need despair—all may be saved. The second is that the mercy of Christ is regardless of the differences in moral character. As the "rain falleth upon the just and the unjust," and as the sun smiles as sweetly upon festering pools as upon fragrant flowering plains, so mercy and pardon are offered with equal graciousness and cordiality to the poor crimson-dyed, scarlet-hued sinner whose "offence smells to heaven," as to the sinner of courteous, circumspectly moral unbelief and disobedience. Christ loves the one as much as the other, and will forgive the one as soon as the other.—Our estimate of character, and Christ's love of the soul, are as infinitely separated as the east from the west. We should be cautious, especially if we be preachers, that our estimate of a fine character does not prevent us from loving, in a Christ-like spirit, a lost soul. Mercy, thank God, is no character-philosopher, but a simple soul-savior.

The third encouragement is, that not only are mercy and pardon offered to the worst sinner, but if he repent and come to Christ, God's justice demands his salvation. "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." The pardon and salvation of the truly penitent and believing sinner, therefore, becomes a matter of claim, as well as of mercy, and is as certain as any thing else that depends upon the justice of him who "will do right."

Courage to go to Christ, and confidence in his forgiving compassion, are much more necessary to be inspired in the minds of men, in order to their salvation, than keen convictions of the "terror of the Lord." Unbelief—despair of mercy—is much more in the way of the world's salvation than presumption; and presumption, in a majority of instances, is the re-action of despair. Confidence, faith, in Christ's mercy, and not despairing fear of him, is the object to be accomplished by gospel-preaching—to win souls to Christ, and not to frighten them away from him. In harmony with this, Christ's love is the gospel-theme. No sermon explanatory of faith, has a millionth part of the value in inspiring faith, as a sermon descriptive of Jesus.

Brother in the ministry of the Lord Jesus, think on these things. Reader of the Christian Advocate, show this paper to your unsaved friend.

MAKING HASTE TO PRINT.

"Making haste to be rich," the scriptures teach us, lead men "into a snare," and "many foolish and hurtful lusts." Making haste to print, is a morn modern development of "total depravity." Literature and Republicanism are both cursed with the same calamity, viz: the rush of the incapable for place, and paper-room, and the indisposition to such noble public services among those who are capable; and the unfortunate result is, that the offices and the papers are almost monopolized by demagogues and scribblers; the government of the country, and the power of the periodical press, are not in the hands of the wisdom, the patriotism, the genius and taste of the time. As in the political case, so in the literary; declension from the stern principles of both literary and political criticism and judgment, are well nigh forced by the mere selfishness of the majority-power.

A judge is elective, and must remember this in his legal decisions. An editor is either elective, or dependant for bread upon popular favor, and must remember these things in his literary decisions. A pure and elevated judiciary will never be attained until it is made independent of popular whim; and the highest newspaper character, tone, and power, will never be realized until we have an independent press, endowed, or otherwise, for the same reason that we have endowed universities and colleges. Absolute editorial freedom from all influences calculated to sway the judgment, whether from hope of reward, or fear of condemnation, is indispensable to the realization of the ideal newspaper. An editor should never feel constrained to publish any thing which his judgment and taste condemn, or decide to be valueless. Half the newspaper columns of the land are filled with such things.

The highest editorial capacity consists in the knowledge of what ought not to be published, rather than in the knowledge of what ought to be thus honored; for the latter is easy of determination. Mediocrity and ignorance, though blessed by providence with a large and respected place in this world, were surely not intended to usurp the places assigned to genius, and learning, and taste. In the language of the gifted writer of the paper on the "Rev. Thomas Arnold D.D.," in the last Southern Quarterly Review, "mediocrity is tolerable, even enjoyable, in some things, while in others it is not to be endured. Common men are great blessings in the pulpit and elsewhere, but the press belongs to the nobility of mind, and ordinary talents ought to respect its dignity."

Men should make haste to write, but not to print. Writing in an important part of personal culture, but printing is for the culture of the public, and its end is defeated if it is made the medium of communicating the inanities and vulgarities of those who have no culture themselves. Many men print because they never reflect upon the audience to which they speak. They utter things through the press which they, with all their hardihood, would not have the courage to utter before a large and intelligent congregation; forgetting that through the press they speak to an audience of from thirty to fifty thousand, perhaps, including the highest intelligence and refinement of the land. And not only do they speak in an august presence; they record their folly upon the bulletin-boards of the world. If a man speak folly, not many hear it, it will be forgotten, and he may improve. But if he write himself down an ass" in the public prints, wo be unto him.

Nothing that is not valuable, in thought, or sentiment, or popular interest, should ever appear in a newspaper. Unimportant things, which must be published, should be in the fewest possible words, that brevity may secure a reading, or occupying but little space, be out of the way.

LETTER FROM DR. SUMMERS.

Mistake about our Missionary Plans Corrected—Nashville Election—Work-houses—"Smoky Row" Mission—Insane Hospital—University—East Alabama Male College—Dr. Wightman—That Billet at Columbus.

Mr. Editor: The Tennessee Conference is to hold its session this year at Columbia, October 12. Bishop Early is to preside. We expect him to visit Nashville next week, to hold a meeting of the Missionary Board on Friday, October 7. This meeting is to take into consideration the measures to be adopted in regard to the dispatch of our new Missionaries to China and Japan. By-the-way, I find the following on dit going the rounds of the Northern Christian Advocates. I am quite certain it is improperly fathered upon that accurate sheet, the North Carolina Christian Advocate:

"Missionaries for Japan.—The North Carolina Christian Advocate states that five Missionaries from the Southern Methodist Church will sail for Japan in November, including Rev. M. L. Wood, of the North Carolina Conference; Rev. Mr. Allen, of the Georgia Conference; Rev. Mr. Stewart of the Tennessee Conference, and two ministers from the Memphis Conference."

Be good enough to contradict this wild statement. There were but two Missionaries spoken of for Japan, and one of them has turned back, and the other is in this city, having come hither to attend the medical lectures at Shelby Medical College—the Faculty, with characteristic liberality, having given him free tickets. Rev. Sullivan is not a member of an Annual Conference. He is a local preacher of Oxford, Mississippi, Memphis Conference; and purposes to make application to that body at its next session for admission into the traveling connection, and ordination for the mission work. He is a man of learning, and of serious piety; he is nearly thirty years of age, and has, I think, been preaching some five or six years. Some are of opinion that it would be well for him to complete his medical education before he goes to Japan. It is also thought desirable that he should have a companion—I do not mean a wife, though I am not sure that a wife ought to be ranked with the impediments of our missionary army—and it is a shame to the Church if no one can be found willing and worthy to bear him company.

I understand that it is the intention of the Bishop to send the Rev. Messrs. Allen and Wood to China this Autumn; whether or not any others will accompany them I cannot say.

Our little metropolis has just passed through a somewhat exciting contest in the Municipal elections. The ballot-box showed that Mr. Hollingsworth (1198 votes) beat his competitor, Mr. Smith, by a majority of twenty-two votes. Mr. H., therefore, is our present Chief Magistrate. I hope he will carry out some good reforms initiated by his predecessor, Mr. McGavock, who, by-the-by, refused to be a candidate for re-election. One of the good things done by the late Mayor was, the enlargement and improvement of the workhouse—a humiliating but necessary institution of the city. It is put under excellent regime. By the special request of the late mayor, Divine service has been held on Sunday afternoons for the benefit of the wretched inmates. I officiated there a fortnight ago, and my heart was saddened by what I heard and what I saw. There were a number of wretched females in attendance—a quota being supplied continually from the fifteen hundred prostitutes that the Mayor informed me are to be found in this little city! Judge of the habits of many of our young men—and, I fear, old ones too—by these figures.

One of our city missionaries, Bro. Duncan, has established preaching and a Sunday-school for the benefit of the miserable wretches who inhabit "Smoky Row," the "Five Points" of Nashville. I am happy to say, he has some promise of success. His reports at the weekly Preachers' Meeting are full of painful interest. O what prudence, and charity, and zeal, and patience, are required to get the lever of the gospel under this lower stratum of society, to upheave its corrupt and festering masses!

I visited, a Sunday or two ago—I have done it frequently—an institution of a widely different character from that which I have just noticed. I mean the Tennessee Hospital for the Insane. The magnificent edifice of this institution is located about six miles south of Nashville. It is constructed in the castellated style, 405 feet long, and 210 feet wide—having in this area two airing courts. It contains 265 rooms, exclusive of domestic apartments, etc. It is heated by steam, and ventilated by a centrifugal fan, driven by an engine. It is supplied with water by a steam-engine pump. It was erected under the superintendence of Major Heiman—the architect by-the-way of our Southern University at Greensboro, Alabama—at a cost of some $180,000.

At every visit I have made to the hospital, I have been impressed with the excellent system there adopted, and successfully carried out by the excellent superintendent, Dr. Cheetham. His treatment is kind and rational, and has proved eminently successful; many of the patients—among whom are some in whom I have felt great interest—have been restored to sanity.

The Doctor bestows much attention on the ornamental grounds and farm. (150 acres) which afford fine employment and recreation for the patients. He has an extensive green-house, where there are many rare and curious exotics, including a magnificent Victoria Regina, tea and coffee plants, sago and other palms, ferns, mosses, and hundreds of other botanic beauties. These are all soothing and sanitary in their influence on the minds of the patients who assist in their culture.

The Superintendent has a Chapel fitted up in the Hospital, where Divine Service is performed every Sunday morning. The Chaplain is the Rev. Mr. Warren, of the Tennessee Conference. I sometimes officiate for him, and never without the greatest satisfaction. The Doctor says he cannot maintain the regime of the institution without this weekly service. It has a fine, a blessed effect. There are now some 260 patients in the hospital. The Tennessee Legislature has made an appropriation for 100 patients; the others are charged at moderate rates.

On yesterday I preached a couple of sermons, and organized a Sunday School Society in a school-house in Edgefield, to be the nucleus of the Russell Street charge. A lot has been purchased in a beautiful grove—an eligible site—and a church is to be erected for the accommodation of the fast-growing community on that side of the Cumberland. The congregation which attended and the interest manifested give promise of success.

After all that has been said about the unfitness of the site chosen for "The University of the South," in Tennessee, the enterprise is likely to succeed. Our Protestant Episcopal friends, though, as a sect, they are in a decided numerical minority, are very apt to see their enterprises through. I notice in the papers that Mr. Oliver H. Morgan, of Louisiana, has presented to Bishop Polk $10,000, thus making up the half million desiderated for the University. Does not that throw us rich Methodists into the shade? With all our wealth and prestige in Alabama, we have only raised about $300,000 for the Southern University at Greensboro, and not half that for the College at Auburn, those two institutions which have so drawn out the liberality of Alabama Methodism. By the way both of these institutions are to be launched next month. I should like to see them salute the waves. They are both well manned. President Sasnett is a noble christian scholar, and he is supported by a fine staff. Of my old friend and colleague, William M. Wightman, D.D., LL.D., I could say much, and would say much, if I were not rather principled against the eulogizing of living men. This much I may say; he seems to be the very man for the place to which he has been chosen with so much eclat. He is of the right age—fifty-two years old—a Hebrew of the Hebrews, his father and mother, William and Matilda Wightman, having been "of note" among the old Methodists of Charleston. Their son was pious from his youth, and was, I believe, the first graduate of Charleston College, from which he recently received the honorary degree of LL.D. That means something in the Charleston College. Of Dr. Wightman's successful career as one of the best preachers in America, a professor in Randolph-Macon College, editor of the Southern Christian Advocate, and President of Wofford College, it is not necessary here to speak. It certainly is not expedient for me to say much; for a most intimate daily association with him for eight or nine years, a course of friendship which never had a ripple on its surface, quite unfits me to speak on the subject. I may be allowed, however, to say that unless he has changed since I was associated with him, he will endeavor to have the institution over which he is to preside thoroughly permeated with the spirit of a living christianity; and this I consider a point of transcendent importance. There was a Providence in that mistake in the single billet at Columbus, by which my honored friend was kept from the Episcopal bench. He has placed one noble institution in a successful career, and now he is called to do the same for another; but nous verrons.

Congratulating you, your correspondents and subscribers with the success of your beautiful sheet, I will close my hasty scrawl. Thos. O. Summers.

Nashville, Tenn., Sept. 26, 1859.

REV. A. A. LIPSCOMB, D. D.

Mr. Milburn, in his recently published book, pays a beautiful and heart-felt tribute to the noble friend, who was a "friend indeed." We take the liberty of giving it to our readers. We dissent from Mr. Milburn on one point—Dr. Lipscomb is as good a writer as he is a speaker. Mr. Milburn, after having heard him preach for the first time, says:

"The portraiture of John Wesley in his old age presents a wonderful example of the triumph of the soul over the decays of nature. At the age of threescore and ten his gray hairs were the only signs of declining life. His brow was as smooth, his eye as brilliant and piercing, his complexion as ruddy, and his voice as strong, as when he first heralded the truths of the Gospel to a former generation. For more than fifty years he had constantly risen at four o'clock in the morning, and commenced preaching at five—an exercise which he always found eminently favorable to health. Not a year, during that period, had passed without his traveling, by sea or land, not less than four thousand five hundred miles. For the greater part of the time, this uninterrupted traveling—equal to the circumnavigation of the globe in less than every six years, was performed on horseback. His labors were extended to the remotest corners of the British Islands. In Ireland, he not only visited the chief centres of the Methodistic fields, but penetrated to the obscure villages, and mountain regions, preaching in the market-places, the streets, and on the hill-sides. Scotland was the scene of his repeated labors, and the mountain defiles of Wales echoed to his persuasive appeals.

"Arrived at the age of eighty-two, he still exhibited no signs of mental or bodily decay. His writings were never more fresh and vigorous. For eleven years he had felt no "such thing as weariness." In spite of his manifold labors, he was "perfectly easy from head to foot." His mind seemed to recover the simple vivacity of childhood. His daily life was illuminated by a purer and brighter light. He was singularly susceptible, even in those years which are usually marked by labor and sorrow, to all the beauties of nature and all the charms of literature. He makes frequent records of his impressions of books; compares and criticises Ariosto and Tasso; indulges occasionally in dramatic reading and criticism; discusses the question of Ossian's poetry, which was then a great topic in literary circles; and notes, in brief, picturesque passages, the scenery of his out-door preaching and the landscapes of his travels. He was delighted with the gardens of the nobility, the ruins of old cathedrals, and fine music; and rejoiced in the approach of spring and the return of the singing birds. His conversation still fascinated the Christian households which entertained him in his rapid movements. He cherished the delicacy and fervid sentiment toward woman which is always entertained by the noblest minds. Children flocked around him with fondness, always with reverence, but never with fear, for the bland old man. For them he always had a peculiar tenderness. His demeanor was marked by cheerfulness, mingled with gravity; he had an unusual flow of spirits, but tempered ever by the most serene tranquillity. His dress was a pattern of neatness and simplicity. He wore a narrow, plaited stock, a coat with a small upright collar, no buckles at the knees, no silk or velvet in any part of his apparel, while his snow-white head suggested an idea of something primitive and apostolic.

It was not till Wesley entered on his eighty-fifth year that he began to be conscious of the infirmities of age. Then he acknowledges that he is not as agile as formerly. His sight is a little decayed; his left eye has grown dim, and hardly serves him to read; he cannot walk as fast as he did; his memory for recent events is somewhat impaired; but he feels no weariness, either in traveling or preaching, and writes his sermons as readily and as correctly as ever. Decay, however, was now coming on apace. He presided at his Conference for the last time in the summer of 1790. He was then in the eighty-eighth year of his age. His sight was so dim that he could not see to read the hymns in public worship. His limbs were too weak to ascend the pulpit or to walk the streets without support. His memory was too feeble to recall readily the divisions of his sermons; and yet the tottering evangelist pursued his course of daily travel and daily preaching. His last sermon was preached on Wednesday, February 12, 1791. On the next Sunday he wrote his final letter. This was addressed to Wilberforce, urging him to perseverance in his parliamentary labors against the African slave-trade. On the Sunday morning after his last sermon he rose with apparently improved health; but attempting to converse, he was quickly exhausted, and was obliged to lie upon his bed. The next day he was lethargic. On Tuesday, March 1, he sank rapidly, and after attempting to sing some of his favorite hymns his voice failed, and though his lips continued to move his meaning could not be understood. He rose no more from his bed. Prayer and praise still lingered on his dying lips. The next morning the scene closed, and while many of his old friends were prostrate in prayer around him, the spirit of John Wesley took its flight, without a struggle or a sigh."

Harper's Monthly for October is one of the best of that really "excelsior" American magazine. "Daniel Boone" should be read by every body. Duty and justice demand it. If ever man had cause to say "Republics are ungrateful,", this brave old hero and pioneer had. The "Gaujlquero Indians" is full of interest and information. The paper on Mr. Milburn is much after the style of the one now appearing in this paper, and is excellent. Mr. Milburn's continued fidelity as a Methodist preacher, and his present American and European reputation, fully vindicate the discriminating friendship of those who, when he was a member of the Alabama Conference, sought to do him justice, without, as some do "valuly imagine," "imitating" his transitional transcendentalism. "The cultivation of the ideal," the paper under the head of "Editor's Table," is really "splendid." Our Alabama friend, "L." of the Southern Quarterly, surely wrote it, we think.

BEAUTFUL PEN-PORTRAIT OF JOHN WESLEY.

Harper's Monthly, in a notice of the second volume of Dr. Abel Stevens' great work, the History of Methodism, which is said (we have not been permitted to see it) to contain the best life of Wesley ever published, says the following:

"As I left the Church I felt that I had never listened to so wonderful a preacher, and I think so still, after having heard most of the renowned pulpit orators in England and America. It was as if upon the copious diction, the calm, elevated philosophic thought of Channing had been ingrafted the vital energy and evangelical fervor of John Wesley. Yet it is hard to say wherein his wonderful power lies; there is such a harmonious blending of gifts and grace. Allowance must be made for a fine voice, the result of a diseased throat; and for a want of distrust which amounts to the shrinking timidity of a girl. His strength is in the tongue, for he speaks incomparably better than he writes—the magnetism of a listener is essential to his full inspiration. His method is athletic as it is subtle, delicate as it is strong. But for me the charm of the man lay in his genuine, unaffected piety, his rich experience of the deep things of God. In him reverence was profound as the source of life, without the slightest shadow of superstition. He seemed to have wrought its highest results in his character, and to have become the evidence of things not seen, the substance of things hoped for. His love for God and man showed itself in unfaltering obedience to the divine law, and in a tender regard for his fellow beings, which took all the shapes of compassion, forbearance, toleration, courtesy, sympathy, benignity, as personal relations required. But I am anticipating. I did not come to all this knowledge of the man at first. After the discourse in question I inquired of a number of persons if this was his usual style of preaching; for notwithstanding that my doubts as to the genuineness of the production had been laid, my surprise could but vent itself in an occasional query. I was told that he always preached as well, and usually better. Thereupon I fell into a great disgust toward the people of Montgomery; for they did not appear to have discovered that they had one of the greatest living preachers among them. As I lay weltering in my chair, looked as if God had sent an angel to succor me, I therefore went to him at once, and said, 'If thy heart burns as my heart, give me thy hand.' From that time forward I quitted Montgomery a part of almost every day I spent in his society. Such was the commencement of my acquaintance with Andrew A. Lipscomb."

CALVINISTIC JESUITISM.

Of the late Dr. Alexander, the eminent Old School Presbyterian divine, the New York Independent says: "Often the unconscious theology of his heart, which, with the love of Christ and of souls, got so much better of the narrow and repulsive dogma of that he poured forth the invitations of the gospel, and urged its commands as if it were no heresy at all to say that Christ died for all men, and that every one ought to repent and believe on the instant, because he can."—Memphis Christian Advocate.

Well, suppose this statement were true—which is likely the case for the New York Independent's readers—did the Christian Advocate never hear a Methodist brother in prayer recognize a particular providence, or his absolute dependance on divine grace to enable him to perform any commanded duty? Did he ever hear such a brother boast at the throne of grace the merit of good works or his christian perfection? If a Methodist never prays his theology, a Presbyterian may be excused for preaching what, with fair explanation, is not inconsistent with his theology.—St. Louis Presbyterian.

The case supposed in the first question of the Presbyterian, as he very well knows, involves no inconsistency. "Particular providence" and "divine grace" can be "available" an Arminian "to perform any commanded duty," but they have no place in the eternally fate-forced and decree-determined automaton-righteousness of Calvinism. As to the second question, the Presbyterian very well knew that he was bearing false witness when he implied that Methodists ever preach a theology that "boasts of the merits of good works," or one including a "christian perfection" that admits of boasting. His sneer at christian perfection is a sneer at the Bible—at the teachings of the Holy Ghost. We "move" that it be considered time to bold the editor of a religious paper responsible for misrepresentation as a secular editor—that is, if we can "get a second."

The Boston Traveler, speaking of the work of American Missionaries and the Arabic Bible says:—"This language is spoken by not less than eighty millions of people scattered throughout Syria, Northern Africa, Persia, Hindostan, and China. Through all these vast barriers to the circulation of the Scriptures have been broken down so rapidly as to surprise the most sanguine. No kingly or priestly power can ever set up these barriers again, and loud is now the call to give the Arabic Bible to these accessible millions. The late Dr. Eli Smith had carried a new and superior translation of the New Testament to the last of Acts, when death took him away from his loved and important labors. The work will, however, be completed under the skilful and energy of Dr. Van Dyke, of the Syrian mission, who is eminently qualified to succeed Dr. Smith in the work. Each proof is sent, for criticisms and suggestions, to all the members of the mission, and also subjected to the most rigid scrutiny of the most learned grammarians in Syria. This Arabic New Testament will take rank as a classic, wherever pure Arabic is spoken, and yet will be beyond the reach of the common people.

Our Paper.—God knows we are not egotistic in telling our friends, and patrons, and agents that their paper is good enough to have twenty thousand subscribers. Encouraging words come from every quarter. Brethren, send us a thousand new subscribers before the Conferences. Do! you can. Try. Don't forget. Let every one send as many as possible. Collect every account. Subscribers in arrears, pay up—remit at once, or pay the preacher. Come! The paper is yours. It is worthy. Support it well. Send the money along. Many have paid. Thanks to them.

"A Critic in Spectacles," on our first page is raving, with much delight, a "Blind man's Book," and giving his impressions of both man and book; but what he says. Harper's Monthly is just on, and has a paper on the same theme, which is about the length as the one in our paper, and which reads velously like it was from the same pen. At any rate our "critic" is equal to Harper's. Do not not read it because it is in three numbers.

Telegraphic News, which happens not to be important, has this week, to give place to revival news, which is important. Read our "Home Work." Verily, God is with our people. O for a general and permanent revival! Shall Ireland go before us.

The Ladies' Repository (M. E. Church, North) for October, has reached us. Hating its abolitionism, which is of the bald, unreasoning, demagogical, pharisaical kind—it is a delightful Monthly.

The Gospel and Slavery, on our first page, should not fall of a careful reading. The South, and the Southern Church, need "line upon line" in this direction.

"Dr. Hamilton has the second of his "interesting communication" in this paper. In the next issue another will appear, from the pen of the lamented Dr. Winans.

The Home Circle for October has come. Mrs. Cross, Dr. Taylor, Dr. Lee, and others, contribute very readable articles.

REPORTS OF CONFERENCE SESSIONS, 1859.

MISSOURI CONFERENCE.

Mr. Editor: This body closed a most delightful and harmonious session of one week, on yesterday afternoon—Bishop Pierce presiding. It is entirely free from those abominable pests of some Conferences—party cliques and leaders.

All the interests of the Church have greatly flourished within its bounds during the past year. Among them, the Sunday-school cause is prominent. The Conference resolved itself into a Sunday-school Society, and auxiliary to the Sunday-school Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and has called a Sunday-school Convention to meet May, 1860, at Chillicothe—one of its most central towns. It also recommended the holding of such a Convention in each Presiding Elder's District, at some time during the year.

On the Sunday preceding the meeting of the Conference, the largest and most beautiful Church in this State, North of the Missouri river, was dedicated—the Rev. Robert A. Young of the St. Louis Conference, conducting the services. The entire debt then remaining on the building, $2500, was paid at that time.

The next Session of this Conference is to be held at St. Charles.

Below you will find a list of the appointments.

Bishop Pierce and myself are about leaving to-day for Kansas.

NEWS FROM OUR HOME WORK.

"To spread Scriptural Holiness over these Lands."

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Eufaula District.—The Rev. J. W. HANEY writes: The work of saving souls is going on gloriously. Several appointments have shared largely of the Divine blessing. Gods ministers are faithful. They have held forth from the pulpit the controverted doctrine of the Church in danger of Apostacy, Infant Baptism, etc. The proclamation of those points peculiar to us have had a fine effect, notwithstanding some tender-hearted Methodists have feared and trembled. Some of our people would rather our vessel should spring a leak, and continue to leak, than that we should assail others that are constantly attacking our peculiar views. But, thank God, these are few, and are growing fewer.

Now, what has been the result of the preaching of our brethren? In one Circuit 73 infants have been baptized; in another 50; another 30; and so on. And the adults that have been converted, and have joined our Church, have taken baptism in the scriptural way, by pouring.

We have in the District a noble band of Itinerants; men that have religion, enjoy it, preach it, and live it; men who love the institutions of the Church, as they are. The cause of Christ will prosper where such men lead in the great enterprise of saving souls, and the institutions of Methodism will be maintained. A number of local brethren labor with great success. The cause of Christ and the success of Methodism would be greatly retarded if these men were removed. God bless them! They love and are beloved.

The Missionaries in this District are doing well. They are much loved by the white people, and no men can eclipse them in the estimation of the slaves. Many of the negroes are being converted, and have been instructed in reference to the mode of baptism, so that they are not always hearing voices saying, "go down into the water," etc. They come up and are baptized in the Church; and bring their little ones with them. These Missionaries should have our prayers. Their's is, in some respects, a hard work.

Let me say one other thing.—The cause of Sabbath Schools is greatly improving; these Schools form bright spots in every part of the District. Schools have been started in many places where there never had been one. The P. E., in passing through the District, collected about one hundred dollars, to have the Sunday School Visitor sent to the children.

Several churches are being built. Some fine houses will soon be going up. The number that have been converted and joined the Church, I will leave the several pastors to report. The people of Eufaula are talking and fixing, and fixing and talking, about the approaching Annual Conference. These people will get up an Annual Conference just right, no doubt. An Annual Conference will be a new thing in this part of the world. There will be more people there than we have ever seen at our Annual Convocation. Eufaula is improving, in view of the completion of their railroad.

Union Circuit.—Revs. Dickinson and Dowling writes: We are in the midst of a gracious revival which has been in commence seven weeks.

We commenced at Hopefield on Friday night, before the third Sabbath in July, and continued until the night before the fourth Sabbath—received on probation, four whites and three colored—the membership greatly blessed.

While some of the brethren were engaged at Hopewell, others were out and commenced at Rehoboth, on Saturday, before the fourth Sabbath in July, which continued one week, and received four colored members. The membership, both white and black, was revived.

The next point at which we commenced was Mount Hilliard. This embraced our Third Quarterly Meeting, which was held on the fifth Sabbath of July, and Saturday before. Dr. Jennings, the P. E., was present, and preached with as several days "a demonstration of the Spirit and of power." The meeting continued until the first Sabbath in August—received twenty-four whites and seven colored—the membership powerfully blessed.

At Salem, we commenced Saturday before the first Sabbath in August, and continued till the second—received twenty-two members—seventeen white and five colored.

Commenced at Murphey's Chapel Friday night before the second Sabbath—continued till the Friday night after, and received eight whites.

We commenced at Magnolia on Friday night before the third Sabbath in August continued till Thursday night after, receiving thirteen members, twelve white and one colored.

On Saturday before the fourth Sabbath in August, we commenced at Farriorville, under a bush arbor, and continued until the Thursday night after the fourth Sabbath—received twenty-eight members—seventeen white and eleven colored.

Union Circuit is in a flame. We have not ascertained the number of conversions; however, there have been scores.

During the Conference year we have received 245 members into the Church on probation.

Black's Bend Circuit.—Rev. A. WEST writes: I have just closed my round of protracted meetings.

I held my first, at Union Church, the third Sabbath in July; it continued five days. Five white members joined on probation.

At Mount Charmal Church, the fourth Sabbath, I held a meeting of five days, at which five white members joined on probation. Nine professed conversion.

On Saturday before the first Sabbath in August, I commenced at the Academy, and continued six days. Four white and thirty colored persons joined on probation. Twelve were converted.

The last was at Palmetto Church, commencing on Friday night, before the fourth Sabbath in August, and continuing eight days. Twenty-four white and eleven colored persons joined the Church; thirty-five in all. Eight embraced religion that we know of. The Church was made to rejoice. There was a good feeling in the congregation. The hardest sinners were moved. At the latter part of the meeting there was from ten to twenty-five mourners at the altar.

I am now finishing my work for the second year in this Circuit. I love the people. I must soon leave them. I ask of the Lord, his blessings upon them.

Mount Zion Circuit.—Rev. W. H. RILEY writes: The Lord blessed us with six revivals; the members have been much revived; and fifty-nine added to the Church. The general prosperity of the Church is good.

Sapulga Circuit.—Rev. H. J. HUNTER writes: We have held several meetings, at which the Lord has been with us in great power. At Asberry Chapel eight accessions, and, perhaps, as many conversions, were made.

At Concord, we had quite an interesting meeting continued five days—nine white and three colored, on probation.

At Ruenhope, we only held two days; the Lord was present in great power—seven conversions—seven additions to the Church.

We have just closed one of the most interesting meetings of all, at Wesley Chapel; twenty-nine conversions, twenty-seven whites and two colored, joined the Church. It was thought, at several times, there were over one hundred mourners at the alter.

At a new place, Neale & Gandy's steam-mill, at a bush arbor, there was a glorious work—thirteen whites and ten colored added to the Church. We have two good houses of worship on the way, which will soon be completed. Still the work goes on.

Enterprise.—Rev. A. MCBRYDE writes: Connected with this Station there is a country appointment at which our best Quarterly meeting was held; commencing on the night of the 9th inst. and continuing five days. Sixteen accessions were made to the Church and the same number of conversions. On the night of the 17th we commenced in town, and continued until last night. Twenty-two whites and nine colored were added to the membership, most of whom are converted; and could we have continued the meeting the present success was only a pledge of a great ingathering. Many of our first citizens are manifestly interested on the subject of their souls' salvation.

REV. W. A. MONTGOMERY writes: Our camp-meeting has just closed. There were some thirty or forty conversions, and an addition of thirty whites and twenty-two colored to the Church. The last night of our meeting was as good a meeting as I ever witnessed. The Lord came down in such power that we had no use for preaching. There were some as bright conversions as I ever saw. Up to the present, about fifty-eight whites and sixty-five colored persons have joined the Church on probation, and near one hundred have been received into full connection.

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

Attala Circuit.—REV. L. ENCANBRACK writes: On September 2d, Bros. Deshazo and Mathews, exhorters, began a meeting at Mr. Ware's shop, five miles West of Kosciusko; in a neighborhood where, so far as I can learn, a soul never was converted. The people were almost entirely under primitive Baptist influence. Yet, when these brethren proposed a protracted meeting they all consented; met together, built an arbor, and made every necessary arrangement. Good congregations attended, day and night, and the interest increased till the close. I was at the meeting about three days, and up to that time twelve were converted. From Wednesday till Friday night, the last three days of the meeting, Brother Deshazo had the entire labor to perform—except two sermons by Brother Harmon—but God was with him in a wonderful manner. He says, on Thursday night every mourner at the altar between eight and twelve, were converted; and for several hours, you could hear nothing but the shouts of these, and those converted before; together with the shouts of a number of good Baptist sisters. To these, shouting seemed as natural as to the Methodists, and you would have thought them anything else but "Hard Shells." Rev. D. was compelled to close the meeting on Friday night, the eight day, from sheer exhaustation, leaving some fifteen mourners at the altar. Between twenty-five and thirty were converted, five joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, and probably a number more will join soon. O how many might be saved if our exhorters and Local preachers would go into the destitute neighborhoods and hold protracted meetings! Of many, I fear it will never be said, "Well done good and faithful servants." He, delinquent brother, and imitate brother Deshaza, a poor mechanic. Give a week to God and his cause, and glorious may be the results.

Paulding Circuit.—REV. J. R. THOMAS writes: We have just closed one of the best meetings in Garlandsville I ever witnessed. The meeting was protracted ten days; the last four days the presence of the Almighty was wonderfully manifested. The result of the meeting was some twelve or thirteen conversions—twelve accessons, whites—some nineteen blacks.

Black Creek Mission.—REV. N. H. YOUNG writes: We have just closed a meeting at Rouse's Church; the Lord was with us in power. There were twelve accessions, sixteen conversions, and two professed perfect love. We have had fifteen accessions this year.

Rocky Spring.—REV. D. A. J. PARKER writes: The Lord has greatly revived his work at this place. We have an interesting meeting now in progress; forty-six have joined the Church. The work is still going on and we trust that many may yet be born of the Spirit.

Rocky Springs.—REV. D. A. J. PORTER writes: We have a good meeting in progress at this place; sixteen have joined the Church.

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

Calhoun Circuit.—Rev. W. O. STAYTON writes: We closed a meeting on Monday night last that resulted in the conversion of ten souls; five accessions to the Church; the membership greatly revived. The congregation only numbered about forty.

When we closed there was but one sinner left, and she was at the altar praying for mercy.

Our camp-meeting will commence the 20th of October. We hope for a Pentecostal shower.

Monroe Circuit.—REV. W. G. MCFARLANEY writes: We have just closed a five days' meeting in Floyd; had fourteen accessions to the Church and the membership greatly revived. The tippling houses closed their doors, and the keepers thereof were in attendance all the time.

"METHODIST PULPIT SOUTH."

DEAR BRO. GILLESPIE: Every body, who has seen and read the "Methodist Pulpit South," speak in glowing terms of it. No one has read it without profit. No one has seen it, without speaking in terms of high commendation of the style in which it has been gotten up, and also, of the object, for which it has been published, to promote. Every body, who speaks to the publisher in relation to the work, wants to know, if every friend of the Church does not buy a copy, and when they are answered in the negative, of course they express great surprise at it. Now, my impression is, that every friend of the Church, intends to buy a copy, but some of them, want a little time to consider about it. It is not every man in the world that acts upon first impulse. A very large portion of the human family want, and must have, a little time to reflect before they act, and, a great many of us need a great deal of persuasion before we will consent to say yes. Everybody to whom the work has been offered, who act without requiring time to reflect, who are ready and willing to act at once, have purchased a copy. Others who are waiting for a little time to get ready to buy, will buy a copy after awhile. And there are others who have not yet seen the work, but are anxious to see it, and intend to buy a copy just as soon as they can get hold of one. And after awhile, every body will have a copy. Of course, no friend of the Church, no friend of enterprise, no friend of benevolence will allow this great and attractive work to pass away without purchasing a copy. They can't do without one. It is altogether out of the question to think of doing without a copy of the "Methodist Pulpit South." Remember this, brethren in the ministry, and harden together every body with whom you come in contact a copy of the "Methodist Pulpit South."

Those who have already generously engaged in the sale of the work, will please do what they can to close out all they have on hand by the next session of their conferences. It will be very desirable, dear brethren, to settle up at that time. The demand for funds, with me, is pressing, and is becoming more and more so every day. This is owing to the fact, that I am obliged to make heavy expenditures every day, more or less to carry on the publication of the work, and the amount already in the hands of our friends, throughout the South, is very large, and is daily accumulating. Brethren will see the force of my request, without further explanation from me.

One brother writes me: "Find enclosed ten dollars. I send the money as fast as I collect it." Would that all engaged in the sale of the work would do likewise! Then I should not be at all pressed for funds to carry on the publication of the work.

In conclusion, dear brethren, allow me to encourage much zeal and ready action in the prosecution of this great work. Let us determine every friend of the church that one hundred thousand copies of the "Methodist Pulpit South," shall be sold, and that speedily. The sale of one hundred thousand copies may be the means of the conversion of as many precious souls. May God encourage our hands and bless our labors!

Washington, September 22, 1859. WILLIAM T. SMITHSON.

GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

THE STANDING ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES, composed of the militia of the different States, numbers 2,756,720 men, and they are the best soldiers in the world, equal to the French at Solferino.

THE SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD, writes Dr. Cowlks, is now free from all difficulties—its liabilities all provided for, the old and new companies merged—the feeling in Texas favorable—and J. Edgar Thompson, the great Railroad man of Pennsylvania, soon to accept the Presidency.

THE FINANCIAL CONDITION OF THE U. S. GOVERNMENT is encouraging. The surplus from importations will exceed the estimate about $6,400,000, while the expenses are below the estimate. About $7,771,053 surplus will be on hand to meet, in part, the Treasury note debt.

A NOVELTY IN FASHION. Among the novelties recently introduced in ladies' apparel, is a new article of suspenders. They bear resemblance to those worn by gentlemen, except that they are made of more delicate white elastic fabric, with frilled edge about one inch wide and are attached to the skirt by buttons in like manner.

THE NAME OF WASHINGTON.—Judge Daly of New York, in the course of his decision, in the matter of John Snook for a change of name, remarked that the name of Washington was originally "Wessyngton," which signifies "a person dwelling on the meadow land where a creek runs in front the sea."

THE FIRST AMERICAN WOMAN who ever went ashore in Japan was Mrs. Daily, wife of Captain Daily, of Philadelphia, master of ship Mary Ellis. She was surrounded and followed by a large crowd of Japanese, but all their movements were perfectly respectful.

A NEW EPISCOPAL CHURCH is building in Houston, Texas. One is shortly to be built in San Antonio for the Rev. Mr. Jones, who was ordained in New Orleans last spring.

THE FLORIDA RAILROAD.—The Fernandina Floridian reports the Florida Railroad finished, and ready for operation on the 15th, to Chunky Pond, twenty-five miles beyond Gainesville—making the number of miles ironed and in running order one hundred and twenty-two.

DEATH OF A REVOLUTIONARY SOLDIER.—Wm. Owney, of Southampton county, Virginia, died a few days since, aged one hundred years and five months. He was engaged in the battle of Brandywine, and also at Petersburg, Va., when Arnold paid that town a visit. The old soldier had never taken medicine in his life.

COMMERCE OF MEMPHIS.—The receipts of cotton at Memphis the last year were 325,480 bales; an increase of 82,480 on last year. The value of the crop estimated at $18,000,000. The total business of this flourishing city is believed to have amounted to $19,000,000 during the past year, an increase of 33 per cent. on that of the year previous.

MAJOR TYLER, of the Citadel Academy, Charleston, has accepted the Presidency of the Georgia Military Institute, at Marietta.

DIPLOMACY IN CHINA.

It is well known to our readers that the treaties formed with China at the close of the late war stipulated that the Ministers Plenipotentiary of England, France, Russia and the United States should be permitted to enter Pekin and reside near the Imperial Court. The Queen's speech at the prorogation of the English Parliament, very clearly indicated that the English government intended promptly to avail itself of that provision in its treaty, and advices by the Etna reported that the Hon. Mr. Bruce, the English Ambassador, was about to test the value of that clause in the treaty. It appears that at the latest advices the English fleet, under the command of Admiral Hope, had left Shanghai for the Gulf of Pechele, embracing about seventeen ships of all classes, from frigates to gun-boats, and having on board a strong force to meet any resistance, should it be made, to Mr. Bruce's purpose. There does not appear to be any ground, however, for supposing that the Celestial government will attempt to repudiate or nullify its treaty, although the character of that government probably warrants that disposition which accompanies the English Minister, whose example would soon be followed by the French and American Ministers.

A new era in Chinese diplomacy is therefore about to be inaugurated. Taking it for granted that this provision of the treaty will be complied with in good faith, and that foreign Ministers will henceforth hold the same relation to the government of China that they hold to other governments, the character of Chinese diplomacy will undergo a radical change. The intercourse of China with the other great nations of the earth will be marvellously different from what it hitherto has been. This change is prefigured in the terms of the treaties in question. China comes into the brotherhood of nations, and as her entrance fee gives freedom to religion, opens her ports to commerce, and admits foreign Ministers to direct intercourse with her government. Thus is a wide field open for cultivation, on terms of brotherhood, to those whom hitherto she has assumed to regard only as barbarians. The nations interested will sensibly feel the effects of this improved state of intercourse with the Flowery Kingdom, but China itself will be most changed and let us hope benefitted by it. When brought into contact with Europeans and Americans, the Chinese, we are disposed to believe, will manifest some valuable traits of character. They have evinced industry and endurance even in the ungenial climate of California, and it is not too much to assume that when brought in contact with the best society of the United States and Europe, still better traits of Chinese character will appear and be fostered.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, October 3, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New Orleans Price-Current, ending on the 1st instant: The operation in our market have generally been on a limited scale within the past week, the only article in which there is any movement of consequence being our leading staple, Cotton, and that has found purchasers to a very fair extent. Sugar has further improved in prices, upon a low stock, but Tobacco continues dull, as do most other articles of Western Produce, while the general merchandise market, with ample and attractive supplies, must remain comparatively inactive until more extended intercourse is opened with the interior by a rise in the tributary streams.

European advices, received by the City of Baltimore, from Liverpool to 14th ultimo, report a dull market, the sales for four days being 24,000 bales; some authorities reporting a decline of 1-16d, though Middling Orleans was still quoted at 7 1-16d. Consols declined on receipt of the advices of the renewal of the Chinese war, but subsequently recovered; also, the steamer Circassian, with advices from Liverpool to 15th ult. have come to hand, reporting the week's sales of Cotton to have been 45,000 bales, and all qualities are stated to have declined during the week—Middling 1-16 and the lower grades ¼d. The quotations given were 8d. for Fair Orleans, and 7d. for Middling do. and the stock at Liverpool was estimated at 618,000 bales. The advices from Manchester were generally favorable. At Havre the Cotton market was dull, and a decline of 1f. was reported. The week's sales were only 4500 bales, and the quotation given was 112f. for très ordinaire.

The river is about thirteen feet below high water mark.

COTTON.—Our last report closed upon a dull and drooping market, and Saturday passed off heavily, with sales of about 4000 bales, and at irregular and generally easier prices. On Monday, however, with a better supply to select from, there was a more general attendance of buyers, and the sales of that day reached fully 8500 bales. There were, also, 8000 bales taken on Tuesday, 8000 on Wednesday, 7000 on Thursday, and 6500 on Friday; making a total for the week 42,000 bales. The receipts during the week amount to 48,000 bales; cleared during the same period, 25,202; and the stock remaining in presses and on shipboard, not cleared on the 30th ult. 122,613 bales.

With respect to prices, we are again without any marked change to notice. The transactions of the week show a good deal of irregularity in the purchases, but the prevailing rates have continued within the range of our quotations.

The receipts are on quite a liberal scale, but the dusty descriptions, which are in unusual proportion for this period of the season, obstruct operations. The demand runs mainly on Middling and Strict Middling, as clear of leaf as possible, strong in staple, and free from dust.

The receipts of new crop the past week were 58,099 bales, and the total receipts this season to date are 152,951, against 101,490 bales to same date last year.

SUGAR.—The sales of the week amount to 600 hhds. We quote for Inferior and Refining 3¾ to 4¼; Common to Good Common 4¼ to 4⅝; Fair to Fully Fair 6¼ to 6⅝; Prime to Choice 7 to 7¼; Centrifugal and Clarified 7¼ to 8¼ cents per pound. The above quotations apply to round lots, but small orders of 5 hhds and under, could not be filled without paying a further advance of ¼ to ½ per pound.

MOLASSES.—The sales of the week are about 550 hhds. The quotations are: Fair Inferior and Fermenting 28 to 30; Prime to Choice and Refined 34 to 37 in hhds.; City refinery refined 34 to 40 cents per gallon; 10 hhds new crop syrup, an inferior article from immature cane, sold at 40c.

TOBACCO, is quoted, for Lugs—factory, ——; planters 3¾ to 4¼; Leaf—inferior to common 5 to 5½; fair 6 to 6¾; fine 7¼ to 8¼; choice, heavy and light, 8¾ to 9¾ and 10 cents per pound. The sales of the week barely sum up 400 hhds.

FLOUR.—The sales have amounted to about 6000 bbls. The demand for this article continues quite limited. We quote a range, from $5 00@$5 25 for superfine, $5 50 to $6 00 for good extra and $6 25 to $7 00 and $7 50 per bbl. for choice extra brands.

GRAIN.—The sales of Corn during the week amount to about 3,500 sacks—the extreme figures of the sales ranging from 90 to 95c. and $1 00 for ordinary to prime mixed, 90 to 95c and $1 for yellow, and $1 05 to 1 10 for good to prime white. Oats sell at 55 to 56c. per bushel for ordinary to prime St. Louis. Bran is quoted at $1 10 to $1 25 per 100 lbs; closing rate for good lots being $1 10.

PORK.—The sales of the week amount to about 3000 bbls. Mess. We quote Mess at $15 00 to $15 25, and M. D. at $14 to $14 50 per barrel.

BEEF.—We quote Prime Mess at $14 50 per bbl. for extra brands.

BACON.—Shoulders 7¾ to 7¾; Ribbed Sides 10¼ to 10½; Clear Sides 9¾ to 10¼; Sugar-cured Hams 13 to 14¼ cents per pound.

LARD.—We quote 11¼ to 11¾ for prime to choice prime, in tcs. and 12¼c. for kegs.

BUTTER.—Western generally selling at 12 to 15 cents per pound, according to quality; and Cheese 8¼ to 10c.

BAGGING AND BALE ROPE.—We quote Kentucky Bagging at 12 to 14¼ cents per yard; India bagging, 12¼ to 12½c Hale Rope, hand spun, 6¼ to 7¼, and machine made, 7¼ to 8 cents per pound.

GUNNY BAGS.—Limited parcels sell at 11¼ cents for light and 12¼ to 12½c. to heavy and extra heavy bags.

COFFEE.—We quote fair at 11¼ to 12, and prime at 12½c. per pound. Stock in first and second hands is only about 22,000 bags against 35,400 at same period last season.

Our Terms to Ministers and Wholesale dealers, are twenty per cent. discount from retail prices, on six months time; and thirty per cent. for cash.

Any of the regular Catalogue Books will be sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of the money, at retail prices, but at the risk of the purchaser.

Jackson, September 23, 1859.

To the Members of Mississippi Conference:

The Preachers and Delegates to the next Mississippi Conference, to be held in the city of Jackson on the 16th November next, will, on their arrival at Jackson, report themselves to a committee at the Methodist Church—who have been appointed to receive and conduct them to their homes. It is particularly requested that Delegates who intend to be present will notify me as soon as possible after their appointment, so that places may be assigned them in advance, and they be shown to their quarters without confusion.

The Legislature, the State Fair, and the Supreme, Federal and Circuit Courts will be in session; and, although the city will be excessively crowded, ample provision has been made for the entertainment of every member of and delegate to the Conference and such visiting brethren from a distance as may see proper to attend; but no provision could be made for preachers' wives or daughters, who might be disposed to attend Conference. Sorry for it; but cannot help it this time.

To spread Scriptural Holiness over these Lands.

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Eufaula District.—The Rev. J. W. HANEY writes: The work of saving souls is going on gloriously. Several appointments have shared largely of the Divine blessing. Gods ministers are faithful. They have held forth from the pulpit the controverted doctrine of the Church in danger of Apostacy, Infant Baptism, etc. The proclamation of those points peculiar to us have had a fine effect, notwithstanding some tender-hearted Methodists have feared and trembled. Some of our people would rather our vessel should spring a leak, and continue to leak, than that we should assail others that are constantly attacking our peculiar views. But, thank God, these are few, and are growing fewer.

Now, what has been the result of the preaching of our brethren? In one Circuit 73 infants have been baptized; in another 50; another 30; and so on. And the adults that have been converted, and have joined our Church, have taken baptism in the scriptural way, by pouring.

We have in the District a noble band of Itinerants; men that have religion, enjoy it, preach it, and live it; men who love the institutions of the Church, as they are. The cause of Christ will prosper where such men lead in the great enterprise of saving souls, and the institutions of Methodism will be maintained. A number of local brethren labor with great success. The cause of Christ and the success of Methodism would be greatly retarded if these men were removed. God bless them! They love and are beloved.

The Missionaries in this District are doing well. They are much loved by the white people, and no men can eclipse them in the estimation of the slaves. Many of the negroes are being converted, and have been instructed in reference to the mode of baptism, so that they are not always hearing voices saying, "go down into the water," etc. They come up and are baptized in the Church; and bring their little ones with them. These Missionaries should have our prayers. Their's is, in some respects, a hard work.

Let me say one other thing.—The cause of Sabbath Schools is greatly improving; these Schools form bright spots in every part of the District. Schools have been started in many places where there never had been one. The P. E., in passing through the District, collected about one hundred dollars, to have the Sunday School Visitor sent to the children.

Several churches are being built. Some fine houses will soon be going up. The number that have been converted and joined the Church, I will leave the several pastors to report. The people of Eufaula are talking and fixing, and fixing and talking, about the approaching Annual Conference. These people will get up an Annual Conference just right, no doubt. An Annual Conference will be a new thing in this part of the world. There will be more people there than we have ever seen at our Annual Convocation. Eufaula is improving, in view of the completion of their railroad.

Union Circuit.—Revs. Dickinson and Dowling writes: We are in the midst of a gracious revival which has been in commence seven weeks.

We commenced at Hopefield on Friday night, before the third Sabbath in July, and continued until the night before the fourth Sabbath—received on probation, four whites and three colored—the membership greatly blessed.

While some of the brethren were engaged at Hopewell, others were out and commenced at Rehoboth, on Saturday, before the fourth Sabbath in July, which continued one week, and received four colored members. The membership, both white and black, was revived.

The next point at which we commenced was Mount Hilliard. This embraced our Third Quarterly Meeting, which was held on the fifth Sabbath of July, and Saturday before. Dr. Jennings, the P. E., was present, and preached with as several days "a demonstration of the Spirit and of power." The meeting continued until the first Sabbath in August—received twenty-four whites and seven colored—the membership powerfully blessed.

At Salem, we commenced Saturday before the first Sabbath in August, and continued till the second—received twenty-two members—seventeen white and five colored.

Commenced at Murphey's Chapel Friday night before the second Sabbath—continued till the Friday night after, and received eight whites.

We commenced at Magnolia on Friday night before the third Sabbath in August continued till Thursday night after, receiving thirteen members, twelve white and one colored.

On Saturday before the fourth Sabbath in August, we commenced at Farriorville, under a bush arbor, and continued until the Thursday night after the fourth Sabbath—received twenty-eight members—seventeen white and eleven colored.

Union Circuit is in a flame. We have not ascertained the number of conversions; however, there have been scores.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

…and here, in company with his pleas… daughters, … passed a few days very … They are one of those families whose Christian … and easy manners will not permit a guest to feel … them as home. The society of Athens is refined, and its hospitality proverbial. I obtained as a donation to the … Bible Society, $205.

Decatur.

This is an old town and bears the marks of decline. The … imposing edifice to be seen here is the old Decatur Bank. It has been appropriated to other than banking purposes, and … is beginning to assume an antique appearance. This town lies on the … banks of the beautiful Tennessee river, which is navigable up … to this point for only a short season of the year. Here the … Charleston and Memphis Railroad crosses the river. The bridge … was being rebuilt when I was there. The former bridge had … been a few weeks before struck by a storm sweeping down the … river, and carried away, and with it went a traveler who ran … into it for shelter. This bridge being roofed tightly, and left … open at the bottom, was filled with wind like an umbrella, and … blown off its pillars. Measures are being taken to build a rail-… road from Montgomery to this place, and others to connect … north and south Alabama, long separated by mountain bar-… riers. This is "a consummation devoutly to be wished."

Courtland.

While on my way to Courtland, who should I meet in the … cars but Brothers Bates and Hamilter, from East Alabama. … The latter, is the magnificent giver of $15,000 to East Alabama … Male College. They were on their way to look at Red River … lands. Their design was not to move, but simply to purchase … land. I was truly glad to get with them, for it brought over me … the home-feeling. Met also in the cars Dr. Maddin, whom I … learned to know in Nashville last spring. He is a delightful … Christian gentleman and traveling companion. He is author … of the work styled the "Apostate Methodist Preacher;" a … copy of which he gave me, and which I have partly read. … Others, who have read it report well upon it. I should re-… port well upon it, if permitted to judge it by his conversation … and preaching, for in both he is eloquent. As presiding elder … he gave me ample privileges as Bible agent. At Courtland, I … preached at his quarterly meeting and took up a collection … realizing some $100.

In company with him I spent a night at Col. Jas. E. Saun-… ders, whose wife is a relative of mine. They live out from … Courtland about three miles at a charming place, where native … forest trees, clover and blue-grass refreshingly abound. The … family spend their winters in Mobile and their summers at this … delightful country home. I found that death had recently … visited them, and seized as his victim one of their lovely and … accomplished daughters, Mrs. Blair. It has not been long since … she gave to the destroyer her young husband. Now, she to… … passed away. But what a death! How full of hope and Chris-… tian triumph. The valley of death was to her one of enchant-… ment—full of celestial light—the entrance-way to "the city of … our God." Her departure was so calm and joyous, that her de-… voted parents repress every murmur and rest their confidence … upon Him whose grace is all-sufficient.

Courtland bears the marks of age. Railroad facilities seem … not to have inspired it with new life, or to have started it for-… ward in the path of improvement. Its low situation indicates … chills and fever in abundance. Its citizens are many of them … intelligent and refined. A circus was in full blast when I was … there; but, if I am not mistaken, not a lady of Courtland hon-… ored the strolling, profane-Sabbath-breaking, licentious gentry … with their presence. The visitors were mostly from the coun-… try—the negro element greatly preponderating.

Florence.

This has gotten to be a classical name; for here is a Univer-… sity that is acquiring a character far and near, for what it has … done and can do for the education of young men. The building … is constructed in the Gothic style, and is unsurpassed by any I … have seen of male colleges, for chastaness and beauty.

I had the pleasure of meeting with Dr. Rivers, its popular … President. Another Institution made an offer lately to the Doc-… tor, but the Board of Trustees at Florence felt that his services … could not be dispensed with, and they ran up his salary and … said we cannot give him up. And so he remains.

My success in the Bible cause in Florence was good—raised … over $200, as a donation to the American Bible Society.

I spent my time at the house of Bro. Washington Foster, … who took me to his plantation, where I had the benefit of hunt-… ing, cool shades, baths, and mineral waters—the latter of which … I felt profitable to my health.

I had the pleasure of meeting at her daughter's, Mrs. Foster, … a niece to my father whom I had never seen, Mrs. Robt. H. … Watkins. Though over seventy, she is sprightly and cheerful. … Her piety has no sombre hues about it; light and smiles play … around it, and you understand what our Savior meant, when he … said: "My yoke is easy, and my burden light."

After preaching three times in Florence, I took leave of this … kind family, and came to Tuscumbia.

Here I preached in the Presbyterian church to a congrega-… tion made up of Presbyterians and Methodists—Bible collection … over $100. Tuscumbia, like Courtland and Decatur, manifested … no little thrift. Florence has nearly completed a rail-road … connection with it, and will, I imagine, take the wind out of … its sails, and float out upon the sea of prosperity the more … gallant and triumphant craft.

There is at Tuscumbia one of those glorious springs that you … will find now and then rolling out from under hills and moun-… tains in North Alabama. It comes out at once a full-grown … river.

As you look into its crystal depths, you observe schools … of beautiful fish swimming about, and you feel tempted to get … in and share the pleasure with them, but you remember it is a … spring, and the waters may be too cold. And now, Mr. Editor, … with wearying you and your readers, I will take the cars, and … through lovely valleys, and over, around and through moun-… tains, and across gorges dire, I will hie me home.

COLD SPRINGS, TEXAS.

MR. EDITOR: Our country is in a prosperous condition. We … have abundantly good crops in this portion of Texas. Cold … Springs community is a most suitable place of location for … some one or more Methodist local preachers. We have a good … house of worship, and church-going community, without a … Methodist minister in their midst. The circuit preacher … preaches here but once a month, and has to assist him but one … local preacher in the bounds of the entire work, Rev. Dr. J. E. … Scott, of Waverly, whose time is mostly taken up there, and at … points nearer home. As to health, it will compare with any … other place in the State no near our largest rivers. As to the … richness and productiveness of the soil, the many strong … planters located here who have been here for years and intend … staying here, give abundant proof of its superior qualities over … many other boasted places in Texas. As to schools, we have … them—male and female, Methodist and Baptist—in the town. … As to its being a well-watered country, its name took its rise … from its numerous springs—cold at that—both where the town … is now situated and in the surrounding country. We do heartily, … in the name of the Church, invite some good, strong, efficient … Methodist preacher to locate here. Souls are here to be saved. … Ministers should go where they are most wanted, and not … where they have least to do. Faith and its Effects.

"Oh, Aunt Jane; see what a nice wet evening it is! Just the … evening for a story. Will you not tell us one? One of Mr. … Caughey's pretty ones, that he used to tell in the pulpit?" … said a little girl to her aunt, one dull November day.

The rain was falling, not as if it were at all in a passion, but … calmly and quietly, like the tears we shed after the first wild … burst of grief is over, and we can look at sorrow with the … "meek and quiet spirit which is, in the sight of God, of great … price."

"A story, darling. Well, let me see. It is a long time since … I have heard Mr. Caughey, but I will try and remember one. … So, now Artie, do you try and sit quiet, and listen to me."

"Once upon a time, many years ago, there were a number of … little boys playing in one of the dirtiest, dingiest, darkest alleys … of London, England. The bright beams of the blessed sun … never pierced that den of filth; it seemed afraid to look with … its pure, sweet beams, upon that miserable place; in fact, the … houses were so high, and the alley was so narrow, that the sun … would have had but a small chance of succeeding were he even … to have tried to shine down there—so, like a wise sun, he did … not make the attempt; but left the alley alone in its gloom. … Yet still the boys played on, heedless of the dirt and the dark-… ness, and the tall ghostlike houses that surrounded them.

"Their game at last led them opposite a house that appeared … still darker, direr, and more gloomy than any of the others.

"'O, boys!' said Bill H., the tallest boy amongst them. … 'Don't let's play here. Let us go somewhere else. I am afraid … to stay here.'

"'Why?' said one; and, 'Why?' said another; and, … 'why?' were asked all round.

"'Because,' said Bill. 'But come near me, for I must whis-… per it to you. He might hear me up there,' and he pointed … with his finger to the topmost room of this direst house. … 'There is an old woman there, who has been very bad and very … wicked; and she is dying; and she says she is going to hell; … and she knows the Devil is only waiting to drag her down … there. O, boys, let us go away; for they say you can hear her … talking to the Devil at nights; and the Devil says, he must and … will have her.'

"The boys for a few moments were silent. They looked, with … a feeling of awe and fear, at the old house, and at the room … where the Devil was said to pay his nightly visits, waiting to … fly away with the soul of the old sinner. One of the windows … wanted some panes of glass—an old hat supplied the place of … one; old rags, that of another; a board, that of a third, and … so on.

"Leaning beside the house, with its top touching the old hat, … was a ladder, very rickety, 'tis true, but still it was a ladder—… not a Jacob's ladder though; for, as the boys looked at it, they … thought that very probably the Devil used that same ladder to … get in and out of the old woman's room.

"It was getting late, and the increasing darkness added to their … fears; besides they thought they heard groans proceeding from … that doomed top-room, and they were just going to run when … George S. A. the little blue-eyed urchin, exclaimed—

"'Well, what have we to be afraid of? The old woman need … not go to hell unless she likes. I know a text that I learned in … Sunday school that would take her safe home to heaven if she … only believed it.'

"'Well, then, if you do, why don't you tell her?' said Bill.

"George seemed to think for a minute; he hesitated; he felt … half afraid to board the devil in his own den; but, children, … what do you think he did? Imagine you see the old ladder. … Look at him now. Now he goes over to it. No more hesitation … now; no more uncertainty now. He knows what he ought to … do, and he is going to do it bravely; going to carry a message … from heaven to that sin-sick soul. See how he climbs, step … after step, hand over hand. Now he has reached the window. … Gently he withdraws the old hat. He puts in his little head … with its halo of golden curls clustering around it, and with a … clear, silvery, child-like voice, he says:

"'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved.'

"And down he comes quicker, much quicker, than he went up. … The old women turns round on her miserable bed to see who … spoke. She looks at the door; it is shut. She looks at the … window; none but a bird or an angel could fly in there. She … thinks; and then, wondering who could have brought the mes-… sage, she repeats the blessed words to herself. "Believe on, … &c." Years had passed since that women had heard one line … of that Good Book; years of sin, and shame, and sorrow, and … now they are brought to her by an angel's voice. She clasps … her withered hands. She repeats over and over again those … few words. She weeps; she prays; she pleads with God; she … asks him, for the sake of His son, to pardon her sins—even … hers. Yes, children, hers. Faith seizes hold of that text—she … has but a few hours to live—she dares not let that text go, and … venturing her whole salvation on it, she dies repeating, "Be-… lieve on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved."

AUNT JANE.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

REV. JAMES ALEXANDER JAMES, a faithful, holy man of God—for nearly thirty years a Methodist preacher—died in Holmes county, Mississippi, August 20th, 1860. Brother James was born in Williamsburg District, South Carolina, September 19th, 1805; came to Mississippi in 1811, and has resided in that State since that time, with the exception of a short time in Louisiana. He was converted at the age of twenty; three years after, he was licensed to exhort. In 1832 he was licensed to preach, and traveled the first year, by employment, under a Presiding Elder. In 1836-7 he traveled the Yazoo circuit; his health failing he returned to his home, continuing however to work as a Local preacher, when his health would allow, and always acceptably and usefully.

In 1844, he again attempted to labor as an itinerant, but was forced to give up at the end of the year. In 1848-9 he served the Yazoo, Misslou, and since that time has never been able to do effective service, nor labor with any regularity—though always working beyond his strength. He was never idle—his business, to the last of the pulpit, was to urge the claims of the Cross of Christ. His afflictions were many and great—in addition to his personal afflictions, his home has been desolated by the hand of death; two of his children sleep in one grave; and others, at different times, have been torn away from the heartstone. Only two are left with the widowed mother. The writer of this was for a length of time an inmate of their home in Mississippi, and will remember, with a gratitude as lasting as life, the generosity, the kind Christian sympathy of Alexandr James, and his sweet spirited Christian wife.

"Holiness to the Lord" was his motto through life, and his pilgrimage was over a path which shone "brighter and brighter even unto the perfect day," until, "beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, he was changed into the same image, from glory to glory, even by the Spirit of the Lord." His whole existence, from the hour of his conversion to the hour of death, was an unbroken record of holy living. Such a life necessarily brought a peaceful, a triumphant death. The highest ambition of a Christian could not lead him to ask a greater boon, than to die as Dr. Alexandr James. Let those whose hearts and homes have been blessed by his pious labors, not forget that the widow and the orphans he has left, have claims upon them.

La Grange, Tennessee, 1859. H. T. LEWIS,

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF WILLIAM SMITH.

I now stand on the verge of the grave in the last stage of consumption, and thus become a witness for my master. I was born in Mughlenbergh, Kentucky, on the 30th May, 1812. Moved with my parents to Louisiana in 1817, and located in Natchitoches parish, Louisiana. Buried my father, October 23d, 1825—now, my mother widowed and her numerous children orphaned, with but a scanty sustainence for maintenance, in a wild and almost uncultivated forest. Here God more mani-festly dwelt with us after the toils of the day: my deeply pious mother would call us around the family altar, read portions from the old family Bible and tearfully instruct us therefrom. Then beseechingly entreat God for help. Oh, blessed remem-brance and worthy of record, He heard and supplied our numer-ous wants. On the 12th of January, 1833, my much respected mother took her final leave of us, her orphaned children shout-ed "victory!" and went up to heaven. From my youth I was often religiously moved to fervent prayer and holy meditation. But mixing with the world, omissions multiplied until I laid aside all forms of the worship of God. In 1846 I attended a Camp-meeting at Kisatchie, and on the second day, in the eve-ning, the Rev. Daniel Watkins preached, with but little success. He proposed two prayer-meetings—one conducted by the men, and the other by the women—in the grove, on either side of the Camp-ground. He stepped out of the pulpit and invited all the men to follow him in procession. The evening was dark and rainy. Silence prevailed until he halted and was surround-ed. Then throwing his hat on the ground, others imitating, in less than one minute the whole concourse were prostrate around the pile of hats, and praying as for life. A shower of convic-tion followed; but, poor me, left without the witness of accep-tance. When the door of the Church was opened I resolved to enter, and did so; fifteen or twenty associates followed. I re-mained a probationary member one year before conversion, and now feel grateful for said liberty. I confess, a false humility made the cross of public prayer intolerable; but now I see my loss is immense. After long struggling I gained the family al-tar, and for ever after was more happy. I solicited prayer-meet-ings at my residence, and found it a rich means of grace. I gladly record, the Lord blessed me in them with liberty to pray, I hope usefully; though I have ceased them as my lungs are almost gone, and I am too prostrate with consumption to join in them again. But heppy. Oh, how happy—to know that my prayers peet, shall be succeeded by endless preise in heaven. Now for the encouragement of my dear brethren who labored at the altar of prayer with me long and anxiously, in my deep penitence, I record their names, and return them thanks for their labor of love. Rev. Daniel Watkins, Rev. P. P. Mathews, Rev. Richard Overby and Bros. Daniel Brown, Thomas Brown, Jonathan Sproul, Hampton Turner, and Dr. McAllen. The Rev. W. A. Smyth promises, after my decease, he will send this brief Autobiography, together with my Obituary, to the New Orleans Christian Advocate for insertion. Now brethren, as you read this, rejoice with me. Our prayers and intercessions were united in our Savior, and peace, love and joy in the Holy Ghost, is mine. Amen!

WILLIAM SMITH, author of the above, died at his resi-dence in Natchitoches parish, Louisiana, on the 24th July, 1859, of lingering consumption. Sunday at eight o'clock Rev. P. P. Matthews sang the chorus, "I have not long to stay etc.," but a short time before he died; he faintly joined in singing the last chorus, and then clapped his pale and icy hands and dis-tinctly shouted "glory to God! I am going to meet my mo-ther and daughter!" He had suffered much, but called it "light afflictions." Soon after he became easy and passed away without a struggle or groan. His corpse was a smiling sleep, bewilderingly beautiful, and is interred in his garden, beside his much loved daughter, Louisiana.

"He leaves friends here, who weep and pray;
To meet friends there, in endless praise."

In compliance with the deceased's request, this I send you.

WILLIAM A. SMYTH.

RESOLUTION of the third Quarterly meeting Conference, in the Natchitoches circuit held at Kisatchie, Louisiana, offered by the Rev. P. P. Mathews.

Resolved, That as God in his infinite wisdom saw fit to take from our midst our beloved Brethren William Smith and W. D. Stephens, that Rev. O. P. Westmoreland be appointed by this Conference to collect the most important events in their lives for publication in the New Orleans Christian Advocate; toge-ther, with our respects to their memory and our heart-felt condo-lence, as offered to their much bereaved friends.

J. PIPES, P. E.

DEAR BRETHREN, members of the Natchitoches Quarterly Conference: in compliance with the above resolution, I hereby present you with the Autobiography from Brother Smith, whose house was a welcome home to all the preachers. May it be blessed, as he in my presence has often prayed.

O. P. WESTMORELAMD.

MR. MILLS WILKES, of Higginsport, Ohio, aged about forty years, died in Thibodaux, Louisiana, on the night of 22d September, 1859, of Chronic Inflammation of the Liver. The deceased came to this place about four weeks since, in delicate health. During his last illness he had every attention paid him by surrounding friends, especially by Capt. B. F. Holden and family, at whose house he died. Years gone by he made a pro-fession of religion; but being a boatman, entertained the idea too prevalent with that class of men that his calling and a strict observance of the duties of religion were incompatible; he re-linquished his profession, and cared for "none of these things." He was directed by the Presbyterian minister and the writer, to the Savior of men. He became a true penitent and an humble believer in the Lord Jesus. He did not fear death, for Christ had died for him, and forgiven his sins. R. A. NEW.

MARGYANNE VALINE TEARS aged one year and one day, died September 2d, 1859. "Suffer little children to come unto me, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." W. P. H. DAY.

L. W. TEATE, in the fifty-seventh year of his age, died in Holmes county, Mississippi, at the residence of Col. W. W. Lamar. He was a native of North Carolina, but raised in Georgia, where he lived to the age of mature manhood. Then moved to Alabama, and to this State in 1845, where he lived to the time of his death. Though reckless and dissipated, he pos-sessed a warm heart and many noble traits of character, that recommended him to the kind consideration of those who knew him in this community for fourteen years. The king of terrors claimed him for his victim, while attending a protracted meeting under the control of Rev. T. C. Rayner, in the Method-ist Episcopal Church, at Emory—not before however, he had attached himself to the Church, during that meeting, and ex-pressed his determination never to cease seeking until he through the grace of God, had obtained the remission of his sins—which happy blessing was granted unto him several days previous to his death. He has left a wife, seven children, and many friends to mourn his loss, but they mourn not as those who have no hope.

MR. JOHN GALLATIN PAXTON, was born and raised in Rockbridge county, Virginia, and removed to this State and county about two years since, to seek his home and fortune among brothers and friends previously residing here. His ill-ness was protracted through ten or twelve days. In his death the country has lost a worthy citizen, and many devoted friends and relations mourn the departure of one much beloved. If a calm and philosophic mind, scholarly attainments, and cultivated manners; if medical skill, the attention and earnest prayers of ministers, the love and sympathy of friends, could have stayed the fatal shaft, our friend and brother had been with us still. But he is gone! Thank God! "we sorrow not as those who have no hope." During his illness, he professed faith in Christ and gave strong evidence of a renovated and sanctified heart. He constantly asserted his confidence in God through Christ, often, but calmly praised God in hope of an immortal crown. About two hours before his death he was told that in a short time he would be in heaven, and joy kindled upon his face, and he said: "Bless God! Amen!" After leaving his blessing for his brother and sister and their children, and aged father, and bestowing his property upon his widowed sister and her chil-dren, he fell asleep in Jesus. W. B. H.

LITTLE MAGGIE, youngest child of Dr. George W. and Orra Carter, of the University of Mississippi, died in Lynch-burg, Virginia. She was only two years of age, the pet and darling of her little brother and sister, and the joy of her fond parents' hearts. On Saturday the 3d ult., this end of sweet promise was transferred from earth to heaven, to bloom upon the bosom of the blessed Saviour, where bright cherubs will develop and expand its delicate petals into the full-blown rose.

"O, not in cruelty, not in wrath,
The Reaper came that day;
'Twas an ANGEL visited the green earth,
And took the flower (s) away."

MARY F. SELBY, daughter of C. E. and Eliza Selby, died in Oktibbeha county, Miss., Sept. 10, 1859, in the 13th year of her age. She was perfectly resigned to the will of her Lord; told her father and mother not to weep for her, and to meet her in heaven; bid adieu to all her friends and relatives present, then fell asleep in Jesus. She repeated the following lines just before she died:

"Am I a soldier of the Cross,
A follower of the Lamb?
And shall I fear to own his cause,
Or blush to speak his name?"

O. P. CARLISLE.

REBECCA JANE WELLS, wife of Jorden Wells and daughter of John B. and Louisa M. Scrivner, died in Leeko county, Miss., on the 25th September, 1859, in her 23d year. Professed religion, and joined the M. E. Church, South, 1851. Gave many tokens of a saving faith in Christ—was a bold soldier of the Cross—an affectionate daughter—leaves a large connexion to mourn their loss. But those who mourn, mourn not at those who have no hope, but are satisfied their loss is her eternal gain. ISAIAH J. SCRIVNER.

THERESA LEWELLA LANEY, youngest daughter of Rev. James H. Laney, of the Miss. Conference, died near Holmsville, Pike county, Miss., 19th September, 1859. She lacked a few weeks of being three years old. She was a sweet-spirited child, much devoted to her friends, and remarkable for her good sense. We all loved her, but she is gone to live with the angels, and with her angel-mother that passed over death's cold river some six months before her. AMELIA F. NICHOLSON.

REV. LUKE CONNERLY died of consumption in Louisiana, Sabine Parish, at his residence, September 8, 1859, aged 66 years. He was beloved by his friends. He was willing to die. He said to his wife, not long before he died, he would soon be where he would have the best of society, while she would be so lonely; but not to grieve; for they would soon meet again. He was sick about five weeks. He left a wife and a large number of friends to mourn. C. C. MCCRARY.

WILLIAM SHADRACH, son of Duncen B. and Susanna Easterling, died Sept. 5, 1859, of typhoid flux, aged three years four months and three days. He was a sprightly, promising boy, but he is gone to attain his majority in a more congenial clime. Weep not fond parents. Let this be your comfort in affliction, that though he cannot return to you, you can go to him. May God bring you, with the remainder of your charge, to meet your departed loved one "beyond the great river," where death is no more. B. B. WHITTINGTON.

ABBIE A. BARKER, died at the residence of her father, in Jefferson county, Mississippi, August 11th, 1859, of "congestion of the brain," in the fourth year of her age. No more shall her little heart thrill with joy on earth. She has passed through the golden gates of the Eternal City, and "quaffs joy and im-mortality" from the waters that flow hard by the throne of God. Then weep not bereaved friends. W.

GEORGE ANTHONY, son of Mr. J. and Mrs. A. C. Smith, died in Rankin county, Miss., Sept. 5, 1859, at the tender age of two years. Fare thee well little George. Fond mother and father dry your weeping eyes; know that your little angel George can not return to you, yet you may go to him. W. W.

EDWARD FRANCIS, youngest son of Rev. W. P. and Mrs. E. J. Harris, died in Orrville, Dallas county, Alabama, Septem-ber 19th, 1859, aged twelve months. W. P. H.

"Of such is the kingdom of heaven."

MARY A. CARLISLE, daughter of C. P. and J. C. Carlisle, died in Oktibbeha county, Miss., Sept. 18, aged 14 months and 27 days. She rests for evermore. C. P. C.

TRUTH OMNIPOTENT.—We give to our readers and the public gener-ally the following copy of a letter received by us from C. W. Veasey, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing at the same time a com-munication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of North Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, one that ought to go home to those in whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

CONSERVATIVE OFFICE, Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858.

Messrs. Wright & Co.—As any testimonial in reference to your pre-parations may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following, pub-lished at my request, in the "Conservative" of the 21st inst.

Col. Vasser was formerly associate editor of the "Conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity. Respectfully, J. W. VEASEY.

Commandments. ABERDEEN, Aug. 19th, 1858.

DEAR VEASY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am in-duced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing un-timely sorrow in many a happy household.

On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 15 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms, and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sover-eign remedy against this terrible enemy of children, I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly, by the acquiescence of my family Physician.

On the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, save in quantity, being afraid to give the amount of pres-cription. I was unable to detect any impression occasioned by it until late in the afternoon of that day; and should not then, but for the dis-charge of some thirteen worms, varying in length from two and a half to six inches. This I thought a remarkable number for a nursing infant. But, to my great amazement, about one o'clock the next morn-ing I was aroused from my slumber to witness the incredible number of one hundred and thirty-six from one evacuation.

Before breakfast of the same morning, (Sunday) but one small dose was administered, which was followed by the discharge of fifty during the day. The next day, (Monday) none was administered; but still occasional discharges occurred during the day, varying in size and quantity as described.

On Tuesday morning following, one more small dose was adminis-tered, making in all five doses of a quarter of a teaspoonful instead of a half as prescribed by the label of directions. In all, the little creature has discharged in this city, the result three hundred worms, a majority of which will average five or six inches in length; and is running about as usual, with returning evidences of good health and spirits.

Having met with such astonishing effects in the case of my infant, I was induced to use the Vermifuge on six other children under my pro-tection, varying in age from two to ten years old, and in every case save one, that of the oldest, the like happy results have been produced.

These facts are chiefly for, because of my antipathy heretofore to nostrums of every kind; and, 2nd, because my experience has con-vinced me that, in the experiment I have made with WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, it is due to suffering humanity, as well as the manufacturer of the medicine, to make public the results of my observation.

W. H. VASSER.

Helmbold Extract of Buchu,

Read! Read! Read! "Ye afflicted read" the following Certificate of a cure of over 20 years' standing:

H. T. HELMBOLD.—Dear Sir: I have been troubled with an afflictioe of the Bladder and Kidneys for over twenty years. I have tried Physi-cians in vain, and at last concluded to give your Genuine Preparation a trial, as I had heard it highly spoken of. It afforded me immediate re-lief. I have used three bottles, and I have obtained more relief from its effects and feel much better than I have for twenty years previous. I have the greatest faith in its virtues and curative powers, and shall do all in my power to make it known to the afflicted. Hoping this may prove advantageous to you in assisting you to introduce the medicine. I am truly yours. M. MCCORMICK.

The Goddess Hygeia!

When Hygeia lent medicinal aid to man,
And taught him all his evils how to scan,
Not to a favored few she showed the way
To stanch the wound and all its pain allay—
Not to the few who now claim physic theirs,
And think but what they give legitimate wares,
No! to all human kind command she gave,
"Employ your skill, and your sick brother save."
So your he forth the Magic Salve to find—
The Magic Salve that now heals all mankind,
Nor Wound nor Bruise, nor Cut, can long remain,
Nor Scar its rude appearance long retain.
Use it—you'll find we are not truth's detracter,
For you'll be healed by

Dalley's Pain Extractor,

The only cure, effective and complete remedy for Bruises Scalds, Erup-tions, Piles, or any Cutaneous disease whatever.

We Dont Want Any Other.

Such is the language of all who use "WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE," when they call for that and any other is offered them; they have tried it, and from experience know it to be superior to all others; therefore when they are in want of a medicine of the kind, they purchase that which they know to be good and can be depended on. An Agent who called on me a few days ago, said "I find it difficult to sell any other Vermifuge when I have yours. I have had some in my store for a long time which I occasionally try to 'work off,' but no one will pur-chase it unless I warrant it as good as yours, this I cannot do." So it is, and so it will be, Winer's Vermifuge owes its unrivaled popularity to its own intrinsic merits, on this alone it has always depended, and were it not a fact that it is superior as a remedy for worms, it would ere this have shared the unenviable fate of many other articles designed for similar purposes. To all who are in want of a medicine of this kind we say try it and judge for yourselves, we are confident that it will give entire satisfaction.

Beware of Colomel.

The public generally may not be aware that nearly all Worm Lozenges contain Calomel, and that the lives of children are thereby endangered; parents should remember this, for although medicine may be easily administered when in the form of Lozenges or Candies of any descrip-tion, yet the danger that is incurred outweighs the advantages, besides Calomel very often fails in accomplishing the desired object, it is by no means to be depended on as a remedy for Worms, and it is not now so generally resorted to by physicians as it was a few years ago, they have become convinced of the danger of its use and of the uncertainty with which it acts, and have prudently and wisely resorted to other means by which these objections are obviate.

Physicians generally now use WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, this medicine is a simple vegetable preparation and can always be admin-istered with perfect safety and confidence as to the result, as it will al-ways destroy Worms and restore the patient to health.

Save the Children.

Of the multitudes of children that die before they reach their twelfth year, three-fourths are believed to be the victims of internal worms, or of diseases arising from that cause. A medicine like WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, which will infallibly and rapidly cure the disease is there fore of immense importance to every family. It is entitled in the highest terms by the faculty, and at this time when the mortality among children is greater than was ever before known, it is not safe or prudent for any household to be without it. Believing that the frightful increase of deaths among children is mainly attributable to worms and the dis-orders they produce, we recommend this specific to all who have charge of young families.

Winer's Canadian Vermifuge.

Of all the pernicious humbugs that ignorance ever preached, the doctrine that internal worms are not injurious, is the most cruel. They engender incurable diseases of the stomach and bowels, and are the truthful causes of Chronic Diarrhœa and Chronic Dysentery, Inflamma-tion of the Mesentery, Epileptic Fits, Insanity, Imbecility, Consumption and Asphyxy. In fact the disease saps the very fountains of vitality, and leads with absolute certainty, unless arrested in time, to an early death. Let Parents reflect on these undeniable facts, and remove the danger in time with that infallible preparation, which the faculty have pronounced a specific, WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE.

INTERESTING COMMUNICATIONS—NO. III.

It will be seen by the date of this—June 1, '57—that it must have been among the last earthly labors of the lamented author, as he died, after a protracted illness, the August following. —J. H.

SPIRITUAL RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE OF REV. GABRIEL BLACKBURN.

Rev. GABRIEL BLACKBURN was a Local Preacher of the M. E. Church, within the bounds of the Mississippi Conference, for more than twenty years. The materials for the following narrative were furnished to the writer by Mr. B. himself; and the truth and frankness by which he was eminently distinguished, will be a sufficient guarantee, with all who knew him, of their absolute reliability. There is much, in his moral and religious vicissitudes, which, to say the least, was strikingly peculiar. It is that fact which principally induces me to condense the materials furnished by him into the following brief memoir. I say that this is the principal inducement—it certainly is not the only one. The manner in which sinners are brought to God is always matter of much interest, and very often instrumental of much good when made known. Few departments of religious literature are so effective in winning souls to salvation; as that which lays before the reader the experience of those who have been "turned to righteousness." My sincere prayer is that, by means of this narrative, Rev. G. Blackburn, "though dead, may yet speak" effectively to many who are now wandering in the way of transgression!

G. Blackburn was born in Samson county, North Carolina, in the year 1769; was carried thence by his parents, at two years old, to Caroline county, S. C. Two other removes brought him near to Georgetown, in the same State, where he married at the age of twenty-one years. In 1793 he removed to the State of Tennessee; in 1797, to the neighborhood of Natchez, in the then Mississippi Territory. His next remove was into West Florida—then a Spanish Province—near where the town of Jackson now stands. Finally, he removed to the neighborhood of Monticello, in the State of Mississippi, where he died several years ago; "rejoicing in the hope of the glory of God."

His education was very limited; but the native activity and strength of mind with which he was endued, enabled him to maintain a respectable standing in position somewhat prominent, in both civil and ecclesiastical society. He was a man of exceedingly ardent temperament—of stern and unfaltering veracity. There was nothing he more abhorred than departure from truth in any form.

He received no early religious instruction from parents or others. His parents were wholly unqualified to give religious instruction—being themselves utter strangers to religion, even in theory. I have said he received no religious instruction from his parents; and I think the assertion perfectly consistent with the facts, that his father taught him, when eight years old, to repeat, when going to bed, "Here I lay me down to sleep," etc., and that he admonished him, just before he died, to "Be good to all men." He was as little instructed by example as by precept. He had never seen a person kneel in prayer—had never heard a prayer, till at eight years old, led by the Spirit of Grace, he himself "kneeled before God, and called upon Him in prayer." He was, it seems, incited to this by the remark of a stranger in relation to him. "This child will some day be a preacher." He neither knew the author of this prediction, nor understood the grounds on which it was made; but it made a strong and lasting impression upon both his mind and his heart.

His earliest religious opinions were Calvinistic—how enlightened he does not afford the means of determining—most probably, by association in early life with those who entertained such opinions. But, by whatever means they were taken up, they exercised an important influence for many years upon his course in regard to religion. His predilection was to the Baptist Church; and, so strong was his partiality, that, when he resolved on a Christian life, having no opportunity to join that Church, he would not for many years attach himself to any other. After maintaining a religious life with honest integrity for a considerable time, he was prevailed on to join in the amusement of dancing, which, for the time being, extinguished his religious desires altogether. After some months they returned upon him in sufficient force to indnce another honest and earnest effort—persevered in for a considerable time—to be a Christian. At length he was overcome by a temptation which was especially adapted to his social disposition. This "well-circumstanced sin" plunged him deeper than ever in darkness and hardness of heart; and he now abandoned himself without stint to whatever sin commended itself to his fallen nature. In these circumstances, he became intimately associated with an avowed Deist; and very soon approved himself an apt scholar in infidelity. Though for a short time exceedingly zealous in this cause, it was not long till he was compelled to abandon it, by a conviction, too strong to be resisted, that it was unreasonable and false. Thus convinced, he once more made a somewhat protracted and very earnest effort to be practically a Christian man. He considered his success decidedly encouraging, and derived much comfort from it; so much so, that he imagined himself a converted man. But alas! his easily besetting sin again plunged him into guilt, darkness and recklessness; and he became debauched, profane and intemperate—eminent for transgression!

While in this state, he obstinately evaded religious influence as far as he could—not hearing a sermon for seven years. His range of wickedness was wide, and the spirit in which he indulged in it, ardent and resolved. Nothing nearly allied to desperation goaded him on to perpetration, that he might lose in the excitement of open iniquity, that sense of remorse which he was conscious would overwhelm him in any moment of calm and serious thoughtfulness.

At length, in circumstances which, to human apprehension, seemed most unpropitious for such a purpose, a call was put upon his headlong career, and he was effectually aroused to a consideration of his latter end. He indulged for three successive days in bacchanalian revelry; during which time he had a fight with one of his boon companions, in which one eye was very much injured, and the other nearly extinguished. This swelled his bosom with malice; and he deliberately planned and resolved upon the assassination of his antagonist. His plan was cunningly devised, and it would, doubtless, have been successful had he not in a wholly unexpected manner been prevented from carrying it into execution. He belonged to a volunteer cavalry regiment, and had brought to the tavern with him his holster of pistols, which, upon coming, he had placed in the hand of the landlord for safe-keeping. His plan was to throw his antagonist off his guard by affecting a reconciliation with him, and, having done this, to order his horse and possess himself of his pistols, as if he were going home: then carry his holsters on his left arm, and take deliberate aim of the company present, taking care that his antagonist should be the last person whom he would approach for that purpose; when, instead of extending his hand to say farewell, as he had done in the case of the others, he would draw a pistol and shoot his antagonist. Having done this, his purpose was to rush to his horse, mount remarkably fleet one—and hastening home, obtain money for his expenses, to escape to a distant tribe of Indians. The initial steps of this murderous plan were taken—his horse was in readiness for him; his adversary had been lulled into security by a reconciliation, and he applied to the landlord for his pistols; who without reason misgiving, refused to let him have them. This effectually frustrated his plan of revenge. He sat down in sullen silence, his heart swelling with disappointed rage. He felt that it was intolerable to live with such an injury as he had received, unrevenged. After dwelling for a considerable time with intense bitterness on this aspect of his case, other views presented themselves to his mind. The thought of the social consequences which would inevitably have followed upon the successful execution of his plan of vengeance. He must have been forever an exile from his country and from all civilized society—must, especially, forever have been seperated from his wife and children. Next, the moral character of deed he had meditated rose up before his mind in horrible colors. And, finally, the eternal consequences armyed themselves in lurid terrors before his now awakened and affrighted apprehension. He now felt that for no earthly consideration would he inflict the slightest injury upon the man whom he had so recently intended to murder; on the contrary that he would, if it was in his power, do him good. All these vicissitudes of thought and feeling occurred to him while he sat among his associates in disputation. He now resolved to go peaceably home, and, with that view, asked for his pistols, which, without any remark, the landlord instantly surrendered to him.

A few brief remarks on the incidents related in the last paragraph may not be out of place. I have represented Mr. B. as remarkable for truth and candor, and as abhorring any departure from veracity in any form.—I repeat that he was so. Yet, in this plan of vengeance he meditated falsehood, and in its grossest and most revolting form. The fact was, that he was beside himself with rage. The conduct of the landlord, in first refusing him his pistols and then giving them up without an observation in either case, may, perhaps, be accounted for by supposing that he had remarked in the countenance of Mr. B., the deadly purpose which he meditated, and the subsequent change which reflection had wrought in his mind. Mr. B., I think, always ascribed the landlord's conduct to the controlling influence of Divine Providence. Far be it from me to impugn a supposition which is in such perfect harmony with Bible teachings!

Mr. B. set out from the scene of his late debauch hardened with a sense of guilt, and with an apprehension of impending punishment, almost greater than he could bear. As soon as he thought himself secure from human observation he turned aside to pray, and this, in riding some two or three miles, he repeated a number of times, but without any sense of relief. Instead of going directly home he turned aside to the residence of Samuel Cresswell, for many years a Local Preacher of the M. E. Church, and, rushing into his house entreated him to pray for him. Mr. C. excused himself on the plea of bad health. Soon after, two other Preachers came, to whom Mr. B. presented the same request. They also declined praying with him. They, doubtless, believed him drunk. He then told them that as they would not pray for him, he would pray for himself, and kneeling down in their presence, did so in a very earnest manner. His son now coming for him, he extorted a promise from Mr. C. to visit him at a certain time, and then left with his son for home. Arriving there, he was met at the entrance of his house by his wife, when he fell upon his knees to pray. His wife supposing him anything but a sincere penitent, and shocked by what she considered his mockery of sacred things, fled from him, exclaiming, "What will he not do?"

On the day appointed, his neighbor, Mr. C., paid him the visit he had promised. As he had continued to be earnestly engaged in seeking his salvation, his neighbor had become satisfied of his sincerity; so that now, he reasoned, prayed with and exhorted him, but without apparent success; except that he obtained a promise from him that, as soon as his eyes were in a condition for him to do so, he would attend public worship. Some weeks elapsed before his eyes were in this condition, and he considered the time very long—such was his anxiety to be among praying people! Meantime, in his dreary isolation he did not relax in the earnestness of his prayer for saving mercy. He, moreover, strove to bring his whole life into an exact conformity to the Divine requirements. Thrice he was overtaken by the sin of profane swearing, to which he had been greatly addicted. The provocation in all the cases was sudden and violent. But he was enabled to overcome his most easily besetting sin, when the temptation was peculiarly urgent and the opportunity most convenient; and, in general, was watchful and successful against his evil tendencies and habits. But neither his earnest, almost incessant prayer, nor his careful amendment of life, brought him any abiding peace of conscience, or permanent relief from fearful apprehension.

As soon as the condition of his eyes would permit, he attended both preaching and class-meeting; and in all the services to which one not a member of the Church was admitted, heartily participated. He would not join the Church for fear he should not stand fast, having so often fallen, and he loved both the cause and the people of God so much that he would not hazard doing them an injury, by indentifying himself with them. In the prayers of God's people he had great confidence; and, hence, feeling his great need, he was always found among those who kneeled at the altar as objects of intercessory prayer. Nor was he less diligent in private prayer for himself. Still, months of almost utter darkness and despair saw him unsaved and uncomforted.

A camp-meeting was to come off not far from his residence; but he had heard such representations of this institution as induced him to doubt whether any good equal to the evil it occasioned was to be expected to result from its operations. At any rate, he had no hope of himself finding the blessing for which his soul longed at such a meeting. Nevertheless, he resolved to attend this camp-meeting, that he might for himself judge of its character and tendency. He accordingly went, and though satisfied of the entire misrepresentation of camp-meetings, which had betrayed him into such utterly erroneous views concerning them, he did not derive any sensible spiritual benefit from his attendance on its services for two days. He labored to throw himself into the current of religious influence, but, like the poor sufferer at Bethesda, he was unable to accomplish his purpose. He therefore left the meeting where others had been filled with joy, hardened with guilt—still sorrowing towards God. It is true, that transient gleams of consolation and hope occasionally broke the horrible gloom in which he had been so long enveloped. These gleams, however, visited him only apart from the public exercises of the meeting. In them he experienced only darkness, hardness and the oppression of his burden. After his return home, his reflection probably suggested the true reason of this: he had gone to the meeting expecting no spiritual benefit from its services, and "according to his faith it was done to him."

But the day of his deliverance was nigh at hand, though to him it seemed afar off. God would "not suffer the spirit to fall before Him, nor the soul which He had made." He continued his diligent attendance on the public and private means of grace—indulging some hope, but suffering far more fear, in regard to his salvation. Private prayer was the means of grace on which he placed most reliance, and in this he was much engaged. Sometimes he imagined that a particular spot would be most favorable to the success of his prayers. Disappointed there, he would repair to another, under a like illusion. He was in the condition so graphically described by Job, where he says, "Oh, that I knew where I might find Him! that I might come even to His seat! I would order my cause before Him and fill my mouth with arguments. I would know the words which He would answer me, and understand what He would say unto me. Behold! I go forward, but He is not there; and backward, but I cannot perceive Him; on the left hand, where He doth work, but I cannot behold Him. He hideth himself on the right hand, that I cannot see Him."

He entertained the opinion that only upon his knees and engaged in prayer, could he be converted. After spending a great portion of the day in earnest prayer upon his knees, experiencing the alternations of hope and despondency, he walked into his field. While sadly wondering and musing on his condition, his burden was greatly increased. But at this interesting point he shall speak for himself: "I said, or thought, Lord, shall I never find mercy? All I had ever felt was nothing. My heart-strings appeared to swell; and I was sure that I should burst. I could not step another step. I appeared to myself almost powerless and speechless; and felt sure that hell was right between my feet, and that in a few moments I should drop into it. In this situation I broke out into a laugh! I then could speak, and cried, 'Lord have mercy on me! What sort of a being am I, that can laugh at my calamities?' I found that I was about to laugh again, and if I had possessed all the wealth in the world I would have given it rather than to do so. I clenched my fists and strained every nerve and muscle in my system to repress the tendency, but in vain. In spite of all my repugnance and all my efforts I broke out into a laugh so loud that it might have been heard a considerable distance. But blessed be God! at that instant my load of guilt and sorrow was removed; and, just at the point where I was looking to drop into hell, I was enabled to praise God for His great salvation. I accordingly fell on my knees and poured forth the gratitude of my renewed heart. But I could not long remain in that posture—I must hasten to tell my wife and children of the goodness of God." On the night of this auspicious day he set up Family Worship, and, at the earliest opportunity, united himself to the Methodist E. Church, in whose communion he lived unblameable, until his Heavenly Master said, "Come up higher!"

Of the evangelical character of his conversion, none of his fellow-christians who knew him, had any doubt. Indeed, according to the Scripture-rule, "By their fruits ye shall know them," there could be no reasonable doubt entertained by any one. His ardent piety; his deadness to the world; his abhorrence of sin, especially in the modes of it in which he had particularly indulged before his conversion; his love for "the brethren;" his zeal for the advancement of the Redeemer's cause; and his uprightness towards all men, were perpetual and convincing evidences that at this point he was "made a new creature"—was "created in Christ Jesus unto good works."

Almost immediately after his conversion he commenced seeking the blessing of entire sanctification. When he began to seek it, he had, as he himself confessed, no distinct understanding of its nature; but believing it to be in an eminent degree a higher attainment than justification, he sought it with earnestness and perseverance, till about three months after his conversion he received a blessing so great, that he then and ever after believed it to be the sanctification which he sought. He accordingly made profession of his experience; but, meeting with an old preacher who had himself never experienced the blessing, and consulting him with regard to the nature of the work and of the proper evidences of its attainment, he received such an answer as led him to doubt the genuineness of his experience. Immediately upon the admission of the doubt, he lost the evidence of the blessing, and, I believe, never regained it; though he long lived in the conscious enjoyment of the Divine favor, and in the hope of eternal life, and died in the "full assurance of that hope." A BLIND MAN'S BOOK.

BY A CRITIC IN SPECTACLES.

Second Paper.

"BRUSH COLLEGE," is the significant title of Chapter Eight, in which our author gives us some account of his first "work," lying on Illinois River east, comprising thirty (30) preaching places, requiring four weeks time and three hundred (300) miles distance for each round of appointments. Although in comparison with some of the circuits of the Fathers, this was not such a formidable parish, yet a compass of three hundred miles in that westerly world, even at that day, (1843,) was likely enough to furnish material for adventure and exploit to an inexperienced hand, especially to one who saw "men as trees walking."

Accordingly he found bad bridges to cross, swollen streams to ford, roads turning off into mere bridle-paths, or even faint trails, where woodcraft might well demand keener sight than his fragmentary eye afforded, and often the low prairie overflowed, until the "chaos seemed to have come again, and the waters under the firmament had united with the waters above the firmament." Yet right honestly and right nobly does our pupil magnify the stern discipline of "Brush College" and of "Swamp University," for out of such hard tuition has grown up the bone and muscle of many a man of giant strength and fiery soul.

Our Preacher next comes up to a Conference, and passes his examination, and receives his appointment. His eye growing rapidly worse, he resorted to St. Louis for medical advice, in the autumn of 1844. There he spent nine months following, finding kind, hospitable, refined friends, who came to his help most providentially, while he was dolefully meditating a separation from his last dollar. By the pleasant fireside of one of these friends, a legal gentleman, he heard from the lips of his intelligent host, the voices of the great poets, especially of Shakespeare, while he made acquaintance, also, with the great masters of prose literature. His time passed between walking the hospital, attending the lectures, drenching with nauseous medicaments, leeching, cupping, and the imprisonment of the invalid chamber. The intervals were solaced by listening to the pomp of verse, the stately march of prose, or the genial converse of accomplished female friends, while the monotony was relieved by an occasional "pulpit sweat" in town or country.

The ensuing Conference found him blinder than ever before, yet he reported himself as effective, and ready for work. After his ordination as deacon, he was appointed agent to travel eastward for the pecuniary benefit of a Male and a Female College, to be established in the Illinois Conference. Although his success in this new field was but moderate, yet the pursuit of his agency brought him in contact with the circumstances that gave an entire change to the direction of his talents and his energies. Upon one of his steamboat excursions he had for his fellow passengers a number of Congressmen. Observant of their conduct and conversation, Mr. Milburn was overwhelmed with mortification to find their profane, drunken, blasphemous gamblers, instead of presenting that embodiment of wisdom, virtue, temperance, and patriotism, which his rose-colored fancy had painted as the ideal characteristics of national representatives. Unexpectedly detained over Sabbath upon the boat, he was invited to preach. He accepted gladly. At the conclusion of his sermon, turning to the Congressmen, who were seated in stern decorum about the speaker, he poured forth the pent up indignation of his soul, denouncing their vices with unstinted boldness, declaring, that as an American citizen he felt humiliated and disgraced by their conduct, and concluded with a pungent warning as to the consequences of their continued transgression. Retiring to his state-room he awaited, not without some nervousness, the issue of his vehement denunciation. Soon a knock aroused him. A gentleman, representing the members of Congress, tendered him their thanks for his fearlessness and fidelity in rebuking their misconduct, begged him to accept fifty or a hundred dollars as a token of their appreciation, and solicited him to allow the use of his name as candidate for a Congressional Compliment.

Thus at the very unusual age of twenty-two, Mr. Milburn found himself standing where many of the most eminent divines of the country had stood, in the responsible office of Chaplain to the American Congress. With what success he discharged the onerous duties of this elevated position, the author modestly refrains from telling his readers. Upon the expiration of his term of service, declining re-election, Mr. Milburn married in Baltimore, and set out for Paris, the distant seat of the Illinois Conference. After countless mishaps, pending which his wife was very unceremoniously introduced to the interesting details of Western cuisine and menage, eating sparingly of half-done saleratus biscuits and fried chickens, compelled to sleep rather gregariously for comfort, and testing the locomotive capacities of sundry non-descript vehicular contrivances, the place of destination was reached. Our preacher was once again appointed to the Agency. His success as a beggar is rather mildly drawn in the Autobiography. In 1847, upon the first September, he closed his Conference year, and put off the Agent's harness at the same time.

Here Mr. Milburn indulges a momentary retrospect. He finds himself "four years" old in work; has traveled about 60,000 miles, and has delivered 1500 sermons; has preached in all kinds of houses, from the humblest log-cabin of the distant West to the stateliest edifice of the national capital; has "exercised" before audiences of every imaginable size, from the eager squad of motherly crones by the blazing hearth of a prairie farm-house to the listening thousands of the tented Camp-ground; has tried every species of locomotion, whether four-footed or biped, whether by land or by flood, whether of wind or of steam, save the careering balloon or the plebeian wheelbarrow. Quite Wesleyan this, and proof that his youthful admiration of the giants of early Methodism, was not a sickly, evanescent sentimentalism. But this work had told so seriously upon a constitution naturally frail, that he must needs abandon the regular itinerant field, and find a more hospitable climate. With face set Southward, he journeys down the mighty Mississippi, stops for a breathing space in New Orleans, passes over to the genial hospitalities of Mobile, and while briefly sojourning there, receives an invitation, from the Presiding Elder of the District, to supply the vacant Church in the city of Montgomery. An account follows of his two years residence in the latter place, interrupted by occasional preaching tours through the State; then a narrative of his four years stay in the city of Mobile. These interesting pages are concluded by the statement of the eventual failure of his health for the second time, his consequent compulsory flight Northwards, and his arrival in New York, September 26th, 1853, shattered, wrecked, and clinging for solace alone to the word of Him whose promises in Christ are "yea and amen." Having thus imperfectly sketched the mere outline of Mr. Milburn's Autobiography, we must content ourselves with a few generalities, which may serve, however rudely, to mark the characteristics of this fascinating book.

The author shows his wisdom in limiting his present attempt to a single decade of his rather eventful life. Seizing upon the formative period of his ministerial career, running from his admission into the Itineracy to the close of his Southern residence, rejecting with fine discrimination all the less important details of his earlier years, he has succeeded in maintaining a consistent unity of plan throughout the performance, that, while it leaves us with an agreeable impression upon our minds, whets the appetite for further chapters of this entertaining record.

We have alluded to the pathos that pervades portions of the book. In stirring up the tender emotions, in sounding the depths of the heart, in awakening its freshest impulses, and in unsealing the hidden fountain of tears, Mr. Milburn possesses the art of a master, whether he speak from the pulpit, or woo us with his graceful pen to the gentle motions of a sympathizing spirit. We have pointed out the opening chapter as a specimen of his power in pathetic writing. Who can read without being touched, of the little boy, imprisoned in his narrow chamber, where brooded a solemn perpetual night; of the tender care of the mother, who all through those weary days and nights, suffered never for one time the handuges to dry upon the throbbing temples of her suffering child; of the moving, speechless grief of the father, when in the noontide pauses of his daily business, he stole noiselessly into the darkened room, and taking the patient little fellow upon his knee, let fall upon his upturned face the warm shower of his unrestrained tears, telling him, when he grew calm, all in the gloom of his unlighted chamber, the old stories of the Revolutionary war, and the tales about duck-shooting among the river celery, and the pleasant histories of the Family Bible! Other passages there are that start our tears. Such is the incident of his sojourn in St. Louis, when sick, almost blind, friendless, penniless, and alone, upon rising to return to his cheerless lodgings after a pleasant evening at the house of a mere acquaintance, his generous host, seizing both his hands, says "This house is your home, sir, as long as you will stay in it." So, too, when after being censed for attempting "to come the blind humbug," because he solicited assistance in getting into a Cincinnatti omnibus, and after reading how he was allowed to receive a severe fall in getting off the cars at Baltimore, we read that, while groping his way, one bitter cold night, along the Washington wharf in peril of tumbling off the pier, a friendly Irish voice saluted him, and when upon mention of his infirmity, the whole-souled Hibernian clasps him in his arms, bears him through the crowd, as you would a child, to the centre of the warm, bright cabin, commends him to the care of the waiters, and at the mention of pay, exclaims, "Do you're think I'd take money for helping a blind man? My old mother wouldn't spake to me, if she thought I would!"—we are not ashamed to take off our spectacles, and to dry out the tears that have been, all this while, getting in the corners of our eyes.

If there is pathos in the book, so too is there humor, rich, abundant, overflowing. It is remarkable with what uniformity the humorous and pathetic elements blend in the minds of men of genius. We do not now speak of wit, that pungent, dazzling, startling power, that flashes out its lightning-halts with instantaneous brilliancy; that cuts and thrusts and bites and stings, as often as it charms or soothes; that flushes one face with anger, or suffuses another with shame, while it sets the company in a roar of "inextinguishable laughter;" that gleams in the sardonic snarl of Douglas Jerrold, or plays imbently over the cynical sneer of Sydney Smith. But we speak of humor, that genial, humanizing power, that makes a man smile all inwardly as he reads with serene self-complacency; that kindly faculty that bespeaks you so tenderly from out the stammering lips of the gentle Elia, or that glows with the subdued radiance of a purple Indian-summer sunset, all over the pages of David Copperfield.—We should judge Mr. Milburn to be a capital fellow at a joke, to have a keen relish for fun, and to take to wholesome laughter with a kindly genius. This humor crops out all through the book. How sportively he tells of the disenchantment of his visions of the Prairie-world; how unctuously he dwells upon the amusing episodes of Western life,—the lively market day scenes,—the promiscuous "plunder" that was bartered and sold,—the piratical cows boarding the wagons so adroitly,—the trade in "them molasses," the chaffering garrulousness of homespun dames and damsels, and the indignant exclamation of one of the latter, when offered three cents per dozen for eggs:—"what, d'ye spose our hens is gwine to strain themselves a layin eggs at three cents a dozen? Lay 'em yourself, and see how you like the price!" The same vein of humor pervades his graphic description of itinerant life in the West,—the little audience of gossiping old women hugging the chimney corners, with knitting and cohpipes, pronouncing the earnest and excited preacher to be "a powerful pert little feller;" the treasured tin cup of frosted persimmons, graciously bestowed by the hostess; the dinner of "hog, hominy, and pone," finished off with a steaming dish of "seed-tick" coffee; the bed under the eaves, up the rickety ladder, amoogst "broken tools, strings of onions, piles of potatoes," and spun truck; his laughable confusion at "hitching a long-metre tune to short metre words,"—for he was not gifted of St. Cecilia; his Dickens-like portraiture of the New Orleans simpleton, who spent all his earnings in rigging up his person with gold ornaments for the gratification of a Sabbath day's strut in his peacock finery.

Of anecdotes there are full a score or two, many of them entirely new, and all rich, racy, piquant, mirth-provoking. Anecdotes there are about the funny things said and done by Western Preachers; anecdotes of the exhorter, with the boil on his knee, who knelt upon the prostrate body of an accommodating hearer; of the zealous friend of Bishop Morris, who kept peace among the boys of the congregation by slapping them right and left, calling them "little savages," and threatening to knock their heads off; and of the devotee to the Thomsonian system of medication, who tartly replied to the presiding Bishop's remark, that he neither knew nor cared anything about the prospect of the life to come, and the servant finds his humble grave. 'He dwelt long with me and received laws from me. He served me well, and when the day was done demanded no hire. What have I done for him? Bears he no charge against me to my Master in Heaven? Did I treat him as having a soul to save, and what have I done for his salvation? Am I clear of his blood?' The grave levels all. The small and the great are there, and the servant is free from his master. The history of homes, whether in the country or city, of plantations on river bottoms, bayous and hammocks, will then be an open record, and every part of it will be of unspeakable importance when those immortal beings who have been moulded and fashioned thereby take on their eternal destiny. What of heavy crops then? Of so many bales and hogsheads to the hand? What though you fed and clothed and housed your servant well, and kept him in good working condition? What of all this, if you have not cared for his soul? The simple mound of earth is raised over his body, and the account between you and him is closed—till the judgment."

You "desire no argumentation but wish to know how you may meet your obligations to your servants in this respect, according to the expectations of men and the requirements of Heaven"—to doing all that is proper and right towards them; and again I say, I am glad to hear you say so.

The plan is simple and easily carried out. I have advocated it for many years and have tried, in some places, to establish it; but the same interest has never been taken in it that is now manifested upon the whole subject. It is:

First.—In the absence of sufficient accommodation (for special services to them) in the Church nearest to your residence or plantation, or in the face of your objections to their going with others promiscuously to such a place, to have a chapel or house for the public worship of Almighty God erected, and set apart for this express purpose—either on your own place or (under given circumstances, as hereafter detailed,) contiguous to one or two of your neighbors, who may be similarly situated with yourself—alike disposed, as to the performance of this duty and in joining you in such an enterprise, would accommodate you, as well as themselves, as I shall shortly make apparent.

Second.—Procure for them a man of God, to bestow competent moral and religious instruction in this house of worship; and see to it that this man shall not be hurried for want of time, in giving this instruction efficiently.

Third.—As they must "hear" to be benefitted, let it be a part of the discipline exercised over your servants, to require their unfailing attendance upon this public worship and instruction.

Fourth.—Give your own present and continued countenance and approbation, and that of your family, if present, and of your agent, whether you are present or absent, upon all the faithful labors of him who, in the estimation of the world, demeans himself to toil in such an undesirable field of Missionary enterprise; but which, even in this life, will be sure to be productive of a rich harvest; and, in the world to come, will have "a great recompense of reward."

These four items include the whole plan; and when faithfully carried out by you, and the Missionary appointed to that work, will never fail to produce visible, desirable and valuable results.

"But you cannot see the difference between a house of worship and one used for the time being for such a purpose." This may be; and yet there is a vast difference notwithstanding. If the service gone into is really the worship of Almighty God, surely God is worthy of having a house of worship to Himself—those who wait upon Him, without desecrating it by any common use afterwards. This, at least, [illegible] the belief and practice of those who have been [illegible] how to worship God aright, for more than three thousand years; and then, the argument against your Christian neighbor, of rendering to your servants what is equal, is

THE GOSPEL AND SLAVERY: No. II.

BY A MISSIONARY.

Would you be willing to place to yourself under the same religious privileges, only, as your servants now possess and enjoy? If you misuse or abuse your privilege, what may you not look for from them? Is it any wonder then, brother, that the gospel has not done, among your servants, what it has already done, and is now doing, all over our land? Your spirit and conduct have begotten like principles and practice in your servants; and, no marvel either. Your light has shined, but at the expense of the Missionary and his work; and the same has passed with you for the reality. Indeed, you have spent less to test the power of the gospel among your servants, than, perhaps, you have smoked or spit away, in the use of tobacco, or in the gratification of some useless self-indulgence, or other extravagant expenditure. I fear exceedingly that the leading reason why you have ever done what has even been done by you was, that you might enjoy among your fellowmen the reputation of christianity, at the cheapest possible rate of money or anxiety.

I am sorry to say it, brother, but you are not a competent witness in this case—because you are a party deeply interested in opposition to the real success of the gospel. I pray you to reflect seriously upon the duties and responsibilities which you owe to God, to yourself, and to your servants, while I finish my conversation with your sensible, candid neighbor; and, to help you in your meditations and reflections upon this subject, in the meantime, I earnestly urge you to procure a copy of a small book entitled, * "Duties of Christian Masters," which will richly repay you for the small outlay of money in its procurement, and greatly assist you in arriving at a knowledge of the full measure of your duty in this matter.

And now, friendly reader, having disposed of your christian neighbor's testimony, I return to you again. You readily perceive that his acts and testimony do not at all sustain your objection; that the gospel does servants no good; and, as you have said you want to do what is right towards your servants, we must, therefore, find out what right is. The search is simple and soon made. Indeed, the right has been found out already, in the declaration previously made, that Heaven has decreed that the gospel shall be preached to every creature upon the face of the whole earth. Whatever Heaven orders must be right, and cannot be otherwise. There is no room for doubt. Heaven is infallible, and cannot be mistaken, as to our duty, or its results. Good, and only good, must be the result of what Heaven has intended and designed to be heard by the children of men. Our views, our experience and our judgment, must not come in conflict with the wisdom and will of Heaven. God is wiser than men, and cannot err. He has commanded the gospel to be carried into all the world, and to be preached to every creature; and, as your servants are a part of those to whom the gospel must be preached, you must, therefore, see to it, that this important duty is neither overlooked nor neglected, lest, hereafter, you shall be found acting in opposition to the will of God. It is an exceedingly serious matter, allow me, as your friend and kinsmen, to say, for you, yourself, to neglect the gospel; but, it is an awful responsibility wilfully to keep the gospel from reaching 50 or 100 others—perhaps even more than that number. If they die in their sins, without having the proper means and opportunities for religious instruction, in reference to personal salvation, afforded them, their blood will be required at your hands.—You are their master; and, while you remain such, you cannot divest yourself of the responsibility of the position and relation which Heaven fixes upon you towards your servants. That tribunal has unchangeably determined the relative and respective duties of master and servant for this life; and will not hold him guiltless who overlooks or neglects them—whether he be bond or free—whether he be master or servant. † "There comes a period to every servant's history, when his master survives, that must press home to the master's heart weighty reflections. It is when the toil of this life ends in death, and that death is accomplished without any cheering prospect of the life to come, and the servant finds his humble grave. 'He dwelt long with me and received laws from me. He served me well, and when the day was done demanded no hire. What have I done for him? Bears he no charge against me to my Master in Heaven? Did I treat him as having a soul to save, and what have I done for his salvation? Am I clear of his blood?' The grave levels all. The small and the great are there, and the servant is free from his master. The history of homes, whether in the country or city, of plantations on river bottoms, bayous and hammocks, will then be an open record, and every part of it will be of unspeakable importance when those immortal beings who have been moulded and fashioned thereby take on their eternal destiny. What of heavy crops then? Of so many bales and hogsheads to the hand? What though you fed and clothed and housed your servant well, and kept him in good working condition? What of all this, if you have not cared for his soul? The simple mound of earth is raised over his body, and the account between you and him is closed—till the judgment."

You "desire no argumentation but wish to know how you may meet your obligations to your servants in this respect, according to the expectations of men and the requirements of Heaven"—to doing all that is proper and right towards them; and again I say, I am glad to hear you say so.

The plan is simple and easily carried out. I have advocated it for many years and have tried, in some places, to establish it; but the same interest has never been taken in it that is now manifested upon the whole subject. It is:

First.—In the absence of sufficient accommodation (for special services to them) in the Church nearest to your residence or plantation, or in the face of your objections to their going with others promiscuously to such a place, to have a chapel or house for the public worship of Almighty God erected, and set apart for this express purpose—either on your own place or (under given circumstances, as hereafter detailed,) contiguous to one or two of your neighbors, who may be similarly situated with yourself—alike disposed, as to the performance of this duty and in joining you in such an enterprise, would accommodate you, as well as themselves, as I shall shortly make apparent.

Second.—Procure for them a man of God, to bestow competent moral and religious instruction in this house of worship; and see to it that this man shall not be hurried for want of time, in giving this instruction efficiently.

Third.—As they must "hear" to be benefitted, let it be a part of the discipline exercised over your servants, to require their unfailing attendance upon this public worship and instruction.

Fourth.—Give your own present and continued countenance and approbation, and that of your family, if present, and of your agent, whether you are present or absent, upon all the faithful labors of him who, in the estimation of the world, demeans himself to toil in such an undesirable field of Missionary enterprise; but which, even in this life, will be sure to be productive of a rich harvest; and, in the world to come, will have "a great recompense of reward."

These four items include the whole plan; and when faithfully carried out by you, and the Missionary appointed to that work, will never fail to produce visible, desirable and valuable results.

"But you cannot see the difference between a house of worship and one used for the time being for such a purpose." This may be; and yet there is a vast difference notwithstanding. If the service gone into is really the worship of Almighty God, surely God is worthy of having a house of worship to Himself—those who wait upon Him, without desecrating it by any common use afterwards. This, at least, [illegible] the belief and practice of those who have been [illegible] how to worship God aright, for more than three thousand years; and then, the argument against your Christian neighbor, of rendering to your servants what is equal, is

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Terms—$2 00 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1859.

NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

The volume of the Advocate will hereafter begin and end with the year; and it is very desirable that subscriptions should conform to the same rule.

Thus, new subscribers, who do not begin with the year, will always need, not two dollars, but an amount sufficient to pay for the paper till the end of the year, at the rate of Four Cents a Week.

Thus, every subscriber will know, without being informed, that at the beginning of the year is the time to remit the subscription money.

Many accounts having been sent out before this arrangement was made, we shall not be able, until next year, to make the accounts of old subscribers conform to this rule.

Our Agents will please notice, and help us in this desirable arrangement. It is an approximation to the cash system, without its objections, and will obviate confusion in accounts.

THE OPENING FIELD IN ITALY.

Sardinia is now the hope of Italy, in reference to both civil and religious liberty. She herself, is free, and in her bounds religious toleration prevails. And the sympathy of all Italy is with her. With Sardinia for a centre, Italy now presents the most interesting missionary field in the world—the land of art, and poetry, and beauty, and the seat of Popery. The susceptibilities of the Italian character to the influences and benefits of the religion of the Bible are of a much higher order than is generally imagined. A writer in the Christian Examiner institutes an interesting comparison between the Italians and Germans. According to him, in point of intelligence, the middle and lower ranks in Italy are much superior to the same classes in Germany, and, so far as the charities of life belong to the department of ethics, in morals also. Stupidity, churlishness and rudeness are as rare among the Italian peasantry, as they are general among the German; and as for the hotel-keepers, traders, and veturini, while in Italy you may be flattered or argued by them into paying a few shillings above a reasonable reckoning, you will in Germany be treated with boorish insolence, if you refuse to submit to an extortion of as many pounds. With respect to the educated classes, the relative position of the two nations is reversed, and the German is superior to the Italian, in just the same proportion as his advantages of education are greater. The reason of this lies in the intellectual constitution of the races. The German is just what books and scholastic discipline make him, and in German life there is no social training which alone supplies their place. Take these away, and you have but a coarsely organized and intensely animal being left. The Italian, on the other hand, has original endowments, a facility and a flexibility of nature, and habits of associate life, which enable him to form and develop a character without the aid of the artificial means which are indispensable to the German. The Italians are inherently and collectively a civilized people; the German must be reclaimed and civilized de novo, in each individual case.

FOUR GREAT NAMES.

It is a misfortune to a man to have the name of Shakespeare, or Milton, or Wesley, or Washington. The world will never know, or care for, but one of each. They all lived whole lives—lives as large as humanity—in sympathy with principles as universal as truth, appreciated by the hearts of all people in whatever age. As a matter of course, their names are imperishable. Their light has neither gone out nor become dim. They have become guiding stars in the intellectual firmament. With the increase of knowledge, of historical and political information and literary culture, they become better known, and more reliable as models and exemplars. Their lives constitute, at this late day, the most interesting and attractive subjects of literary study and labor. The writings concerning Shakespeare have been continuous. The glorious living has devoted the maturity of his years and the ripeness of his powers to the life of the glorious Washington. Dr. Stevens, in his recently published second volume of the History of Methodism, has, it is said, presented the world with the best life of Wesley it has ever seen. And Prof. Masson has recently published a life of Milton, which is said to be one of the greatest works of the age. In the January number of the Southern Methodist Quarterly, a paper on Milton will appear, which, we have good reason for believing, is the result of years of appreciative study, and will be worthy of its great subject. David Masson, a Scotchman, of thirty-six years, devoted from youth to the higher periodical literature, especially the British reviews and magazines, is about to become deservedly known to the world in his published Essays, and Life of Milton, from the press of Gould and Lincoln, Boston.

SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS.

Rev. Joseph Cross, D. D., and lady, have arrived in San Antonio, and, day before yesterday, Monday, Oct. 10, 1859, opened a Methodist female institution, in the basement of the Methodist Church. It is intended to develope it into a first-class seminary. Mrs. Cross is the "elect lady" for the work. A child of the wide and wonderful West—with an intense native love of beauty, whether of nature, art, or "holiness," and which has been cultivated by the study of polite literature, and by travel in the historic land of beauty and of art—she has made her home in that most beautiful place of the beautifullest land in the Union—San Antonio, Western Texas. Devoted to God and the Church, she is to consecrate the ripeness of her years and experience to the christian culture of the beautiful maidens of the far West, that they "may be as corner-stones, polished after the similitude of a palace." And by this time next year, we confidently expect to see Dr. Cross at the head of a male institute at the same place. Dr. Boring has earnestly labored for this consummation, and has, for this purpose, sought this concentration of forces. Dr. and Mrs. Cross, we believe, both speak Spanish. Dr. Boring's Church in San Antonio has been graciously prospered of God this year. The Rio Grande Conference will give a good account of herself in a few years. May God illumine, guide, bless, and bind together in heart, Boring, Cross, De Vilbiss, Cox, Fly, Harper, Belvin, Ferguson, Thompson, and their co-laborers.

NORTH BRITISH REVIEW ON DR. BUNTING

The North British Review for August, gives the following in its notice of the first volume of the biography of Dr. Bunting, by his son:

We had anticipated, like others, that another respected member of Dr. Bunting's family would have told the story of his venerable father's life; but as far as the story has yet gone, it has been told so well that we are entirely satisfied with the arrangement which assigned the task to the present biographer. In spite of the wide difference of professional habits and pursuits, we have in the author of the memoir a hearty sympathy with all that interested his parent, which is infinitely better than any fellow feeling that is merely professional. We find just such avowals of connectional or denominational preferences as we like to meet with, frank and manly, yet not obtrusive; decided, yet discriminating, expressed with a cordial appreciation of what is excellent in other branches of the Church of Christ. It is quite refreshing, to come in contact with a spirit so manly and genial, so full of Christian charity and good will, while at the same time, the most strenuous Wesleyan must be satisfied that the biographer of Bunting regards Methodism with as warm and intelligent esteem and affection as could possibly be desired. We rejoice to find such a man, in speaking of religious truth and experience, using without disguise, yet without parade, his "Methodist mother-tongue;" while his earnestness of tone, combined with his keen perception of character and thorough knowledge of the world, give us an ample guarantee that the old familiar words are not mere sounds and forms, but are full of genuine significance. It affords us sincere pleasure to be able to speak of this volume in terms of cordial commendation.

FRUITS FROM THE SEEDS OF METHODISM.

Dr. Bond, of the Baltimore Advocate, in a notice of volume 2nd of Stevens's History of Methodism, says: "We have no need to be bigoted, or even sectarian, in order to contemplate Methodism with the highest satisfaction. Dr. Stevens very properly follows both the great streams into which the Wesleyan movement was divided, and traces the broad, green belt of fertility that marks the progress of both Calvinian and Arminian Methodism. From these have been drawn off every rill that is now turning the wilderness of sin into a garden of the Lord. It is strange indeed to find that all the great plans of evangelical effort, that have assumed such glorious proportions as to give a character to the present age, as distinctive as any of its features, were devised by early Methodists. The Bible Society, the missionary efforts, the popular book of science—even the medical dispensary—seem to have come out of Methodism. There came out of it, too, the religious song—the Christian carol—that has done, and is doing, almost as much as preaching to spread sound doctrine among the people. Charles and John Wesley, Toplady, John Newton, Cowper, Montgomery, and many others, put songs in the mouth of the people such as never were sung before. They furnished the ballads of the hearty Christianity they felt. And now, we ask, where is there any religion worth the name not, traceable to these old Methodists? Take the low or Calvinistic Church out of the Episcopalian, and the influence of Whitefield, and Hill, and Jay, and Wilberforce, and the rest of the Calvinistic Methodists from the Independents and Presbyterians, and what of vital piety would be left? Take away the writings of these men and their coadjutors, of the Arminian school, and what would a Christian library be worth in lessons and examples of piety?"

EXTRA LOYALTY.

In Ethridge's Life of the Rev. Adam Clarke, D. D., just published, there is a singular incident of the loyalty of ladies noticed. When Dr. Clarke had become a very popular preacher, the trustees of the Wesleyan congregation at Leeds had petitioned that Mr. Clarke should be appointed there for the ensuing year, as the stationed minister. The conference was held at Leeds, and Mr. Clarke preached twice during the Sabbath. In the morning prayer he casually omitted to pray for the King. Reminded of the failure in the morning, he endeavored to repair it in the evening, when, among other supplications for his Majesty, he devoutly implored that God would bless him with his pardoning and sanctifying grace. Some of the "chief women" of the congregation took umbrage at this style of petition, as implying "that the King was a sinner." So deeply was their sense of loyalty wounded, that a remonstrance against the appointment was signed by these ladies, and sent to the Conference, with the understanding that "the dangerous democratic principles" implied in such a prayer sufficiently unfitted the person who could utter it for ministering among the people of Leeds. The trustees and other male members endeavored to bring about a reconciliation, but Mr. Clarke would not listen to it, and declared his determination never to accept an appointment in Leeds as a stationed minister.

THE GREAT EASTERN.

The accident to this mammoth steamer—the explosion of a pipe—will delay her departure for the United States until the 20th of this month—later, we now hear. Her arrival at Portland, Maine, will be greeted, doubtless, by assembled thousands from all parts of the United States and Canada. It will be a spectacle well worth traveling to see.

The performance of the Great Eastern gave great satisfaction. During the trip a storm came up and the sea ran high, but the Great Eastern moved along steadily, while other vessels in the same sea rolled badly.

The vessel proceeded down the Thames as far as Purfleet, on the 7th, and anchored there for a tide of the following morning. Her departure from her moorings, accompanied by four powerful tugs—two at the bows and two at the stern—gave rise to a scene of the greatest enthusiasm on the Thames, which was continued at all the prominent points. Captain Harrison and the most experienced Thames' pilot directed the ship's motions. Mr. Scott Russell was on the bridge directing the action of the engines, both of which, screw and paddle, were under steam. Capt. Comstock, of the Collins steamer Baltic, stood aft to transmit directions to men at the wheel—the new steering apparatus not being completely fitted. The very first turn in the river demonstrated that the ship was as completely under command as a river steamer, and that the only difficulties to contend with were the sharp curves in the stream. She steers as easily as a wager boat, and her engines were found capable of starting her or arresting her motion literally almost by a single motion of the hand. The only difficulty experienced was at Blackwell Point, where the river forms an acute angle, and in the centre of the channel, at which point a bark and a schooner had unfortunately anchored. There was an anxious and perilous delay of fifteen minutes, but the danger was passed and there was no other serious cause for uneasiness. There was not a single regular seaman on board during the river trip, the crew not having joined.

There were perfect ovations at Greenwich, Blackwall, Woolwich, and other points, where immense crowds had assembled. At Purfleet the ship swung round to her single anchor in beautiful style, and the anchor, "Trotman's patent," never yielded an inch from the spot where it dropped. On the 8th the Great Eastern got up steam and weighed anchor, and at 8:40 A. M. started from Purfleet for the Nore. As on the preceding day she was accompanied by tugs, and the enthusiasm along the river, particularly at Gravesend, was very great. On arriving at Chapman's Head, at the top of Sea-Reach, the tugs were cast off and the real vessel was left to herself. Increased speed was then got on her, simply to give her good steerage way and move her engines readily, but with no view to test her power. In ten minutes, however, says the correspondent of the Times, she set at rest all doubts forever as to her being the fastest vessel beyond comparison in the world. Employing less than two-thirds of her power, in her worst trim, being six inches down by the head, and too high out of water to permit her paddles or screw blades to work properly, and with a strong tide against her, she ran a distance of fifteen statute miles in two minutes under an hour. The engines worked with astonishing ease, and there was scarcely a vibration perceptible. Before anchoring the vessel was put about and went completely round in less than three quarters of a mile. At 12:30, the vessel anchored at the Nore. She was to leave the Nore at 7 o'clock on the morning of the 9th, and steam away easily for Portland, Dorsetshire, which harbor she was expected to reach early on the morning of the 10th.

Much regret was felt that serious illness prevented Mr. Brunel from being on board to share in the triumph. He has since died! Moses-like, he was not permitted to witness one of the grandest triumphs of modern material civilization, in which he had been the leader.

ORATORICAL EMBELLISHMENT.

Mr. Editor: It has been my happy or unhappy fortune to have heard much public talking by quite a large variety of public speakers, and though I have made but poor improvement of these advantages I have not forgotten all I have heard. It may be that some of these reminiscences may be of use to aspirants for oratorical and elocutionary fame. Of course these reminiscences and suggestions are meant for the young the modes of expression have become chronic and crystalized with the old, and I may not hope to benefit them; to the young then I commend these reminiscences.

For the speakers on Commencement occasions, my first, and, indeed, I esteem it my most valuable recipe for oratorical embellishment is "the blind old bard of Scio." As this is a precious morceau, it ought to be made as available as possible. I would suggest a new turn or two to the sentence. Say then, "The old bard of Scio, who was blind," or, "Scio's blind old bard," This diversifies the statement, and turns up as in a new light another angle of the shining gem, and gives a certain air of freshness and spice to what, historical candor compels us to admit, is not the most rare of classic quotations.

"Troy," glorious old Troy!—with all her heroes, inside and outside her battle-defying walls—the theme of the blind old bard's immortal song, well deserves a shining place; and no collegian can overlook her claims without doing an unpardonable injustice to his classic learning.

"Old Rome"—(the Eternal City is the modern style,) with her consuls, legions and Cæsars, terminates a period with a certain swell and grandeur, that is most impressive. By no means omit, just in this connection, that famous old quotation—"Delenda est Carthago." It may be that some of the audience have never heard it—if so, it cannot fail to do signal execution.

The "Pharos" of Alexandria, with its far-streaming light; the "Pegasus," with his winged speed—worthy the bestriding of a god, and that glorious emblem of perennial juvenescence and immortality, the Phœnix—all, all, are admirable things, and no one who recognizes the elegancies of classical learning will ever omit them.

But in all the classical cornucopia there is nothing richer than—"Cloudy Olympus," where Jupiter and all the immortal gods once reigned and revelled. There is a shadowy mystery, an impressive incomprehensibility, that affectingly appeals to the faith and poetry of an audience.

Virgil, Horace and Seneca must never be omitted; and if the speaker will remember to say—"Virgil's glorious Æneid," "Horace's immortal Satires," and "Seneca's profound Maxims"—he will find from the effect, that the adjectives have stood him in good stead; it gives an air of familiarity with these classic authors. If a quotation or two can be done in Latin it looks all the more learned, and is a delicate compliment to the Latinity of the audience.

Lest a good thing should be overlooked, I will suggest to young speakers the priceless value of the "Rubicon" as a rhetorical embellishment; from the days of the revival of literature until now the successive generations of youthful orators have recognized and appreciated the valuable uses to be made of this gem of antiquity; fail not then to advise your audience of your familiarity with this historic stream. No man guilty of such a crime against classic lore can ever hope successfully to stir the thousands, or jar the Senate-house.

The people need to be told about Demosthenes and Cicero—Alexander, Hannibal, Cæsar, Brutus, Leonidas, and Cato the "divine," must be mustered into the ranks of oratory, and made to achieve greater triumphs on the rostrum, than erst upon the martial field.

When you introduce into the machinery of your speech an animal, let it be the lion; do not fail to make mention of his shaggy mane, and loud, terrific roar; say, too, that he is the king of beasts.

But no department of animated nature has furnished so rich a contribution to the higher embellishments of oratory, as ornithology; poor indeed would be the speech and barren the imagination of the speaker that did not introduce the eagle, "the bird of Jove," with his imperial sweep and sunward flight. For a Fourth of July speech, nothing is reckoned equal to the eagle; its absence would be as unseemly and unpardonable as the absence of the stars and stripes themselves. I would suggest that too much has been sometimes exacted of the eagle, by some rather extravagant declaimers. When, for example, he has been perched upon some cold and towering crag, his wings so expanded that they dip in the ocean on the East and on the West—sheltering the Continent—looking alarming threats at the despots of Europe, and perhaps bathing in the insufferable splendors of solar light. We submit, that is too much—not to say unkind.

There is another item or two not precisely to be designated as "embellishments," but still essential elements for a good Commencement speech or composition; that is, to administer at least a modicum of sober advice to the audience; they always feel edified by these admonitory suggestions, and they may do them incalculable good.

To citizens generally we would modestly suggest, that whenever any of them have to make an inaugural address or speech of acceptance, that they fail not to express their profound regret that a more able man has not been selected for the place, and their painful sense of their utter incompetency to the grave and difficult duties of the position; but, at the same time, the speaker's firm reliance upon the charity that will forgive his errors, and the wisdom that will correct them.

But let me not overlook the grave claims of "the cloth." The pulpit orator should not hazardously depart from ancient usage. There are a number of excellent things, hallowed and memorable because venerable, which may be used "in their customed place" without the peril and possible failure attendant upon venturous flights into new and unfamiliar regions.

If, for example, you would speak of man's moral helplessness, how can you better say it, than "there was no eye to pity, no arm to save?" In describing the crucifixion, what is more graphic than "the darkened heavens and the trembling earth?" If you speak of this world, what is better than the venerable phrase—"This vale of tears?" It is most pathetic, and may do considerable execution.

The phrase, "as it were," is of the cautious genus; it is not to be pressed so far, perhaps, as in the case of the brother who said "Christ died (as it were) upon the cross." This rather smacks of ancient heresy. But in avoiding the evil of over-cautiousness do not run into the other extreme of over-statement, like the preacher who said "he had shed barrels of tears" over a certain infirmity of his nature.

In prayer, there are certain forms and ancient phrases that you would do well to note; as, for example, "Our land and country;" it is so explanatory. The phrase—"Thy Church and people," has the same strong claim.

"The galleries of his grace" is ancient and pretty, though, I must confess, rather obscure—not having as yet been able to gather its import.

I remember a preacher who always said in his prayer, "Forgive us our iniquities, sins, transgressions and crimes." This was most comprehensive, and nearly exhausted petition in that direction. Another, always in beginning, said—"We see, feel, know, and believe." This, though a strong statement, was barely in keeping with mental processes and psychological laws. In all, remember the statement of the master of the feast, "the old is better."

LETTERS FROM TEXAS—NO. III.

On the March again—Parting with Friends—A Representative State—Boat between Galveston and Havana—The Boat.

I had sojourned two weeks in Galveston. Most agreeably had the days passed in spite of that Paul Pry intrusion, the tooth-ache, that always "just steps in" at the most inconvenient moment; but even this was not altogether unfortunate, as it brought to my notice the fact that no city of the United States, perhaps, boasts a more accomplished dentist than Galveston does, in Dr. Ing. Thus, the tooth-ache cured, according to the old recipe, "Have the tooth removed root and branch, and if the jaw-bone is not broken it will be well in a few days," I was somewhat in a condition to enjoy the pleasures of the Island City; and just then I made my adieux to them. This occurs more than once in life. We clear a little space around us, plow up the ground, sow the seed which is to produce future enjoyment, and before the twin leaves have pushed through the soil, the order comes, as to the Wandering Jew, "March!" and again we start forth to make another clearing. If this world were our resting-place, we might find this state of things intolerable; but when we reflect that all those little detours carry us still forward on the great march of time, to that country where enjoyment is not always in seed, but in fruition, we may pursue them with cheerful hearts. The most difficult thing to manage in these changes is parting from one's friends, and it is astonishing how ivy-like the heart is, sending forth a thousand little threads and tendrils to attach itself to that which is near; and even when you have been but a few days in a place, attempt to move and you will find that more of those tendrils have to be broken than you had suspected. I scarcely thought when I stormed Mr. McMahan in his counting-room, on the strength of his having come from our "old Kentucky home," when I sat and talked to him, discerning all the while, through his dark and quiet eye, a reliable soul—I scarcely thought that I should feel so much regret in parting from him and his kind and affectionate family. I scarcely thought that it would be such an effort to tear ourselves away from our neighbors who lived the next door—from Mr. John, whose mirthfulness is ever rising like bubbles of gas through the pure waters of a generous nature; from his gentle, thoughtful, Christian wife, whose life seemed to me a comment on the text: "Charity never faileth." Yes, snapping off threads and breaking loose tendrils is decidedly an unpleasant work,—picking cotton were preferable, if one might choose. But here again comes the Great End us the consolar, and bewilderingly joyful is the array of bright forms and loving faces, as the curtain drops.

The people of Texas are rather different from any I have ever met: they are a conglomerate, and the better for being so. Texas is a great representative hall of all nations. They come from all parts of the world, from France and Italy, from Spain, and especially from Germany. The South and West have sent their sons to occupy these fertile fields, and the North has furnished quite its proportion. These elements have made a fine character—kind, frank, ingenuous, friendly and generous; ready to help you, yet, like Hercules, expecting you to do something for yourself. If a Texian is pleased, he expresses, his pleasure without hesitation, and if he is displeased he is not like Moses, "slow of speech;" neither is he slow of action, though he does not rush to an end like the character in the "Memoirs of a Nullifier," who made such extraordinary haste toward certain unmentionable regions because a debtor who owed him a dime had just preceded him. He works heartily, yet not as if labor were a curse that was resting upon him; or as if the demon of Avarice were lashing him on with a cat-o'-nine-tails.

But while I sit discussing the character of the people, the steam-boat is making ready to leave the wharf. Good-bye is said. Miss H. V., and "little Ruby" remain behind, while Mr. Cross and I take our seats in Mr. John's carriage, as if it were our own—we have used it until we half believe it; and in a few moments we are on a beautiful and exceedingly clean steamer—so much is it like the Ohio river steamers, that I feel as if I were just about taking a little trip from Louisville to Cincinnati.

As we were detained by some extra freight I had time to observe a steamer that lay near us. Its appearance was altogether unpromising. A great, heavy, slow, uninteresting vessel it looked, painted black and yellow. I learned that it was intended for the transportation of cattle from Galveston to Havana. If it were so contrived that it could bring home loads of tropical fruits one might forgive it for being so ugly. Several gentlemen stood by discussing its merits, and they all agreed in the opinion that it would be rather an unreliable safeguard in the time of a storm—so true is it that "men value life more than anything else, and take less pains for its security." It is something, however, to see a steamer started between Galveston and Havana, even if it go to the bottom instead of the destined port. One of the pleasures of a new country is to see it growing, to be able to mark its rise in inches as one does the rise of the Nile, and to know that every inch is bringing it to the climax which will spread, in one broad wave, comfort and wealth and prosperity over this land; it is somewhat, too, if one can add to this inundating flood, if it merely be by adding a little half-pint cup of water.

Our boat lingered as if reluctant to quit the beautiful shore, but when she seemed to have fully made up her mind, she darted forward, sending back drops of spray as farewell and love-tokens to the city. The Bay was placid as a fair girl listening to flattery, and nothing could have been more delightful than the gentle motion of the boat, and the soft breezes, and the glowing evening sky, and the gilded, vanishing city. With great good taste our supper was not served until twilight had drawn her grey curtains around the landscape and left the tea-table as the most pleasant object of contemplation. Seldom does one find such a table—crowded with every luxury prepared with the nicest skill.

After tea we resumed our seats upon the guard, and engaged in a pleasant conversation with a gentleman from Austin. Soon we touched ground; that was more like the Ohio than ever. Then we were off again, and now we are proceeding cautiously through a channel staked on each side—surely Texas is a strange place: you travel over the land without roads, and have roads through the water.

Kindly,

JANE T. H. CROSS.

MINISTERIAL EDUCATION.

REV. F. O. FERGUSON.—HIS REPLY, ETC.

Mr. Editor: In your paper of Sept. 21st, I find a reply to an article from myself, published in a former issue, from Brother Ferguson. Baring two slight errors: first, in which, by the grammatical connection merely, I seem to say that Bro. F. classed St. Paul with the Methodist clergy, a thing I did not intend to say, and so correct it; and, secondly, in which I carelessly made the mistake of writing "until the reformation" for "until the days of Wesley," in copying what he said of certain articles I published in the N. C. Advocate on Ministerial Education, which I also gladly correct: he has said nothing in his reply which either answers or abates the force and truthfulness of what I felt constrained by truth to say in my article.

As to the additional evidences of vanity and self-conceit furnished in his last article; the little and contemptible abuse of myself and the friends of true Ministerial Education; his obvious failure to meet any real issue in it, and his utter evasion of the question proposed for honorable and fair discussion—namely, "Ought our church to educate young men who give satisfactory proof of a call to preach the gospel, but whose insufficient education disqualifies them for the work of the ministry?" with no reference to theological schools, I have only to say that I shall observe the pledge made in my first article—"Get out of Mr. F.'s way," and heed, by his own suggestion, Solomon's advice—"Answer not a fool according to his folly." What is writ is writ. He can say on.

LETTER FROM MOBILE.

Proposed City Mission—The Right Man—Great Need of the Work—Fallacious Objections.

Ma. Editor: You will doubtless remember that at the anniversary of the Parent Missionary Society, held in this city last Spring, amongst other propositions one to support a City Missionary in Mobile met with a very prompt and liberal response; and to call attention to this wide and growing field of usefulness is the object of this communication. Fully impressed with a conviction of the good and gracious results to our common Methodism, that would grow out of this enterprise, if the right man be sent here to inaugurate it—it is exceedingly desirable to us, nay more, indispensable, that we have a man of "fervent spirit," indomitable energy and perseverance, and if possible, one somewhat acquainted with the field he will be called upon to occupy. We want a man who can engage the sympathies of the efficient membership of our churches, to induce them earnestly to co-labor with him—who can marshal our young and active members to go out with him into the highways and hedges, and compel the unknown and suffering outcasts to come to the gracious feast so liberally prepared for them, at the immeasurable cost of the precious blood of Jesus—one under whose leadership the latent talent of our churches, now rusted from inaction, will be evoked and fully developed. We may no longer, with quiet consciences and in inglorious ease, content ourselves with simply providing for the pastoral care of our churches—leaving scores and hundreds in our immediate neighborhood to go down to the grave and appear at the Judgment seat of Christ, ignorant of the first principles of godliness—without an effort on our part to carry into their abodes of careless indifference or squalid poverty, the glad tidings of salvation. The command was to "go out into the highways," and "compel them to come in." We may build churches and have their pulpits occupied by the most faithful and earnest preachers—our congregations may be served by the most devoted pastors—and yet many go from this Christian land to that without having been benefited by either.

"death, whose pang Outlasts the fleeting breath,"

In large cities, and with large charges, our best men are too much engaged, necessarily, by the duties imposed upon them in their peculiar work, to devote the time requisite to secure the interest and attention of that class a city missionary would especially seek; hence the need of a missionary—a lack none so sensibly perceive as those who have taken the pains to cultivate an acquaintance with our suburbs. To be and to get good, we must do good, is a Methodistic axiom; and as true is the declaration, that aggression upon the kingdom and powers of darkness is our only road to true progress in the kingdom of grace. To preserve the purity and power of our holy religion, and retain the gracious influence of the Holy Ghost in our hearts, we must use the talents (however feeble) that God has endowed us with, else we shall with the "unprofitable servant" be cast out "into utter darkness," when we are called upon to render an account of our stewardship.

Calling into active, real usefulness, and eliciting the interested Christian benevolence of our brethren and sisters in Christ—arraying them in an invincible phalanx to push forward the conquests of our Redeemer's kingdom, is one of the first fruits we anticipate from the establishment of the City Mission. Who can doubt that we shall make many converts to the Lord, from amongst those to whom the faithful Missionary—aided and encouraged by a host of Christian sympathizers—shall offer the "bread of life," who would otherwise live and die almost within sight of one or more of our churches, without ever once listening to the message of salvation as addressed personally to them. Let us carry it to their doors, and preach it in their houses, so that no one can escape the conviction that personally and practically "Jesus died for me." To this end it will be readily seen that we require a thoroughly ardent and energetic Missionary, combining with his energy a full share of discretion—in short, the very best man that the Conference can send us; and as the enterprise is a new one, it is very important that it be so set on foot in the outset as to ensure its success, and establish its utility firmly in the confidence of its friends and patrons.

From the fact that we have already several churches and stationed pastors in Mobile, it may be conceived, possibly, by some that there is the less need of the qualifications we have described, in the Missionary who will be sent here next year; and to impress the fallacy of this idea upon the appointing power of our Conference, by briefly adverting to the great and important interest at stake, and the promising field of usefulness offered in the proposed missionary effort, is the principal reason of this intrusion in your columns.

Mobile, Oct. 7th, 1859.

LETTER FROM LEXINGTON KENTUCKY.

Convention of Veterans—Hon. J. R. Giddings—Cincinnati—Covington and Newport—Kentucky Conference College—Bishop Andrew—Gov. Wright—Missionary Anniversary—Bishop Kavanaugh.

After leaving Niagara, I went, via Buffalo, to Painesville, Ohio. Here was a large convention of old veterans of the war of 1812, devising means by which to secure a pension from the Government. There was present in procession and council about one hundred and fifty infirm old men—some grey, some bald, some deaf and some blind. It was an interesting sight. Hon. Joshua R. Giddings—the wheel-horse of "Western Reserve" abolitionism, was the orator of the day. His speech was ordinary.

After leaving this place I proceeded, via Cleveland and Columbus, to Cincinnati. Cincinnati being almost exclusively a commercial town has but little interest to a stranger. It perhaps has more elegant business-houses and capacious streets than any other city in the Union. The public buildings most worthy of attention are, the "Mechanics Institute," "Woodward College," the "Custom-house," "Pike's Opera-house," "Fourth-street Presbyterian Church," "Wesley Chapel," and "Ohio Medical College." It has two first class hotels—the "Burnett" and "Spencer" houses—and markets unsurpassed by the world. It derives a great deal of importance from the beef and hog packing business, which is carried on more extensively here than at any other place in the world. A splendid wire suspension bridge is being erected to connect Covington with Cincinnati. Covington is on the Kentucky side of the Ohio river, and is a city of 15,000 inhabitants. Newport is separated from Covington by the Licking river, but is united to Covington by a wire suspension bridge. It has 9000 citizens. A United States barracks is located in Newport.

After I left the "Queen city" I came to Millersburgh, the seat of the "Kentucky Conference Male College;" and, also, of the "Female Collegiate Institute," under the supervision of Dr. Geo. S. Savage, of the Kentucky Conference.

Methodism in Kentucky is emphatically progressive. Years ago, such eloquent and influential agents as Drs. Bascom and Kavanaugh, canvassed the State in behalf of Augusta College, and Transylvania University, and raised in the aggregate only about $35,000. During the last year the Rev. Mr. Wellburn raised in one half the territory, in a hasty canvass, $50,000 for the Methodist College, located at Millersburgh by the Kentucky Conference, at its last session. The Educational Board confidently expect to secure an endowment at an early day of $100,000; Rev. Wm. C. Dandy goes forth as its Agent. A handsome and commodious building of the Norman style of architecture, three stories high, and costing about $20,000, has been erected during the past year, and the whole enterprise has a substantial appearance about it. But not only in this—but in other departments of the Church—has the Conference been steadily advancing. The Ministry are now (all the advantages of the location of the Conference considered) paid as well as the preachers of any other Conference. The laity are attending Conference in large numbers, and exhibiting a vital interest in the legislation of the Church. Young men of social culture and education are joining the Conference, and indeed, I may say, all things are hopeful in Kentucky.

Bishop Andrew spent a few days before Conference with me at my mother's home, "Forest Hill." On Sunday he preached a plain but forceful sermon, to a large congregation in Millersburgh. The Bishop claims the prerogative, as an old man, to say whatever he thinks proper in the most unadorned way. In this manner, like Mrs. Fletcher's beau ideal preacher, he never fails to "scrape the hearts of his hearers." God bless the father in Israel!

On Tuesday, in company with the Bishop, I went to Georgetown to attend the Kentucky Conference. On Wednesday, the Conference convened. The usual routine of business was proceeded with, which in its development revealed the encouraging fact that Methodism in Kentucky, in every respect, is more promising now than ever before.

On Friday night, the anniversary of the "Sunday-school Society" was holden. Addresses were delivered by Drs. Sehon, Huston, and your correspondent. A fine religious feeling pervaded the crowded assembly. Rev. J. S. Bayless, President of the Society, read a letter from the Hon. Joseph Wright, United States ambassador to Berlin—and, what is more honorable, an active laymen of the Methodist Church—commending to him, (his former pastor) the progress of Methodism in the German States, and an account of a large Sabbath-school of German children which he had the pleasure to address at Bremen. Brother Bayless paid a deserved tribute to Gov. Wright for his fidelity to the Church amid the cares of his administrative and diplomatic life.

The Missionary anniversary was held on Saturday night. Dr. McTyeire delivered a forcible speech on the practicability of the Missionary enterprise. He dealt with facts, and stern logical conclusions. Dr. Bond delivered a rousing speech, in his best vein of eloquence. If I mistake not the addresses on the occasion infused a warm zeal into the hearts of all the preachers present, and I believe the Missionary report of 1860 will reveal it. So mote it be.

The preaching on the Sabbath was excellent. Brother Abbey was present—but the Conference, while it approved his plan, did not think it expedient for them at this juncture, to present the scheme through an agent to the people. The brethren of the Kentucky Conference, however, appreciated the Christian sacrifice of Brother Abbey, and he has a warm place in their hearts.

On Wednesday night, the appointments were read, and the Conference adjourned. The preachers heartily went forth, to battle another year for the truth of God. May the Lord give them the victory!

Dr. McTyeire came home with me; and I took particular pains to show him "the elephant," as it presented itself in Bourbon. He saw fine blooded horses, cattle, mules and hogs—such as he never looked on before. On Saturday, he went to Lexington, where he preached on the Sabbath.

Bishop Kavanaugh has been very ill, but is reported better. It is exceedingly doubtful whether he will be able to attend the Conferences assigned him. Let all the brotherhood pray for him! Possibly I may go to see him to-day.

I am now on my way back to Alabama, and next Sabbath expect to preach in my charge.

H. A. M. HENDERSON.

Lexington Kentucky, October, 1859.

Mrs. Sarah Clark, wife of Moses Clark, Esq., died recently at their residence, at the Brooks House, in this city. Having been intimately associated, as a most estimable friend, with the family of the writer, since their first arrival in this city—and in times of anxiety and distress—a word of tribute to her memory is appropriate and just—a sad pleasure. Amiable and intelligent, consistently and earnestly pious, devoted to the welfare of the sick and poor, her memory is blessed—permanent in the hearts of many. Beloved of her husband, and loving in return, her untimely death was indeed a sad providence. But she had laid up her treasure above. Let this be the consolation of the bereaved ones.

The Baltimore Christian Advocate, in reply to a Western Virginia correspondent of Zion's Herald, who had asserted that Virginia would be a free State in ten years, says: The tendency towards emancipation has not been only checked, but almost destroyed by the unreasonable violence and unjust expedients of controversy. Even in England and the Northern States of the Union, the tide of feeling that set so strongly in the direction of emancipation, becomes feebler day by day, and even gives indication of an ebb proportioned to its highest flow. It is much more probable that, under the continued influence of present causes, there will not be a free colored man in Virginia ten years from now than that there will not be a slave.

Rev. Abel Stevens, LL.D., acknowledges himself a "Black Republican," and his paper, the Christian Advocate and Journal, will doubtless lend the weight of its sanction to Seward, or to the Black Republican nominee, in 1860. He says: "The Church has no politics, and this paper has none; but a large portion of our laymen are "Republicans," and we are perfectly willing it should be known that we personally are with them there." In a note to the notorious New York Tribune he avows similar sentiments.

New Orleans Clothing Emporium.—L. W. Lyons, the proprietor, advertises this "institution" fully on third page, fifth column. Cool weather admonishes a re supply of the outer man. Utility, comfort, and aesthetics should combine in the selection. Good and handsome clothing is a part of moral and intellectual culture. Lyons is an accomplished "professor" in that "department." Call and take "lessons," from city and country.

Typographical Blunders.—Editorial absence resulted in some in last week's paper. Wesley's head was put on Lipscomb's shoulders, and vice versa. In the "Home-Work" there were mistakes. Bishop Pierce was made to preside at the Missouri Conference, though in California. Bishop Paine was in the manuscript. Cannot help these things now, except in this way. More watchfulness in the future will be exercised.

Normal Sunday School.—The rarity, need, and value of good Sunday School teachers, is such that there ought to be in every well-organized Sunday-School, a class, or normal department, for the training of teachers. We commend the suggestion to our pastors, Sunday School Superintendents, and brethren, generally.

Let us Hear.—Throughout the United States, a large class of secular newspapers are ringing the cry: "It is wrong and inexpedient to force the observance of the Sabbath by law." Let us ask if they will join us in the "moral suasion" to bring about Sabbath observance. If we yield the "legal suasion" doctrine; or will they continue to encourage, directly or indirectly, the desecration of that holy day! Let us hear.

Tuscaloosa Female College has an advertisement on third page, fifth column. It is well located, well established, and well manned; and deserves the support of all concerned.

REPORTS OF CONFERENCE SESSIONS, 1859.

KENTUCKY CONFERENCE.

We copy the appointments, and condense somewhat of the proceedings of this Conference, from the Nashville Advocate, whose editor is leisurely and comfortably sojourning with his Kentucky brethren. The session was at Georgetown, and closed September 28. Bishop Andrew presided, we are sorry to hear, in feeble health. The membership in its bounds, including probationers, is 23,775—increase, the past year, 880. On Conference claims, paid fifty-four per cent. The Louisiana plen—n per cent on preachers' receipts, adopted for the future. Louisville Depository doing well. Preachers hearty, and ranks full, for once. Fine talkers and singers. Speeches short. Shelman, from Alabama, fresh as ever, beloved and useful. Many laymen present. Sunday-school Convention to be held at Lexington fourth Wednesday in November. Blue grass, clover, and fine stock. Dr. Sehon working and preaching. People hospitable, and other Churches brotherly.

NEWS FROM OUR HOME WORK.

"To spread Scriptural Holiness over these Lands."

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Demopolis District.—REV. J. BARKER, P. E., writes: Not long since you requested preachers to send notices of revivals for publication; I am induced therefore to be one of the multitude reject letter-writers; fearing however that your patrons may end the reading of this brief note with that awful "cui bono?" Anticipating such a result, let me say, "It is a good thing to give thanks unto the Lord," and this is what we desire to do: hoping that the righteous hearing thereof may "be glad," and that many may thus be constrained to say amen, to our giving of thanks.

Our good times began on the Butler circuit a few weeks since. We were dedicating a specious and beautiful Church to the worship of Almighty God at Mount Stirling; the house was filled with the presence and power of God, and fourteen were added to the Church on probation that day. Since then, the preacher in charge of the circuit, Rev. T. J. Rutledge, has held pretracted meetings at various points on his work, and reports the following additions to the Church: at Pleasant Greve, twenty-one; at Bethel, twenty-nine; at Ebenezer, sixty-eight; Brightwater, twenty-five, and at Butler, sixty-five—making a total of two hendred nnd twenty-two.

Rev. G. Hawkins, on the Gaston circnit, reports an increase of ninety-nine (99) member on probation.

Rev. J. W. Shores, on Reubert Hills circuit, has received fifty persons on probation during the last quarter.

Rev. L. M. Wilson, on Spring Hill circuit, reports an increase of one hundred and forty-nine (149) received on probation.

Rev. J. W. McCan, on Unlontown colored mission, has one appointment among the whites, at which he has lately had a good meeting, where ten white persons were converted and added to the Church.

These members added, make a total of five hundred and thirty received into the fold of Christ during the last few weeks—and these are not all. Among this number are found, the old, the middle-aged and the young; but I think there is a larger proportion than usual of those appropriately termed "hard cases," dwellers among the tombs. May the mercies of our God abide with them and keep them from "that wicked one!"

It will not be difficult to persuede yon Mr. Editor, thet during these meetings there have been many "heppy people over yonder," I can testify for one, and guess for a good many others. But I promised brevity, nnd will therefore close this communication with words which spring from a gled and thankful heart: "O magnify the Lord with me, and let us exalt his nama together."

Vilnia Colored Mission.—REV. J. W. JORDAN writes: Saturday night, I am sitting in wife's sick room, where I have sat nearly six weeks, during which time my colored friends have needed my visits. I feal it, but cannot help it. The room is a log-cabin, snug and comfortable, about fifteen feet square, seven feet high in the pitch inside, with one door, one window, and a hole near the fire-place.

There lies wife. Whether the prospects for recovery are favorable or not I cannot tell. But, thank the Lord, she says she don't think she is afraid to die," for I always ask her about that matter when she is sick, and sometimes when she is not. Bless God for some one to move my deepest sympathies! And this is a good stand-point, I take it, from which to view what it is—"its vicissitudes and vanities." I am not sad—but very sad. I am solemn.

It is nearly five years since I found a place to work among the holy men, the Abrhams Conference; and hallowed be the day that ee honored me. May it never be made to mourn. During each year I have thought that I was doing the best I could. But ever and anon, on turning back and reviewing the past, I have seen with shame that I had not in anything done or suffered my master's will as I could and should have done. And then? Why, "Lord, give ma anothec trial, and I will do much better." And so it has ever been until this good hour. And now under all those circumstances, ten dollars in pocket, no horse, he having become useless—having to hire one for each appointment I fill—wife on the verga of the grave, and "a man too"—I can say in truth, "Woe is me if I preach not the gospel." Am I sane? may be, not! I cannot tell. Are souls in glory, helped in any degree by me? They said so when they were dying that they were going there. But, no matter: I would be calm. Pardon ma, gentle reader. I have this day finished reading Dr. Wm. J. Basnot's book on "Progression." It has made me a new man, as a minister in the Church of God: I needed it. I will not attempt a panegyric, that has been done long ago; and yet, perhaps, there are those of mine equals, in the humble walks of life, who would give more credence to a criticism from me than from a more exalted source. Allow me then to say that his plan of "Progresslon" may be speedily adopted, and faithfully practiced throughout the Church.

But my mission. I purpose writing you a particulnr account of it; but not now. There are many things that might, and ought to be said; but I can wait. Suffice it that I have not been very successful in getting numbers into the Church. I am not a revivalist, after the common acceptation of that term; have only received on probation twenty-eight as yet; have baptized many children; catechized much, etc., eff. There is one thing that does encourage me, however, and that is, the one hundred and one received on probation last year will yield no et least ninety in full connection. Moreover, there is religion among the people, deep, vital religion—saving religon. Yes, blessed be God, not withstanding the crippling infidelity in certain quarters, nearly concerned, there is power in the atonement to save the old, hardened, weather-beaten African. But I must not preach now—say then, my mission, so far as the negro is concerned, is healthy.

Touching the patrons, appointments, preaching places, accommodations, pay, etc., etc., please hear me sometime hence.

Union Circuit Again.—REVS. J. P. DICKINSON AND A. DOWLING write: We commenced a meeting at Greenwood Church, which continued till Wednesday night after the second Sabbath of September. There was a mighty stirring among the "dry-bones"—sinners convicted, mourners converted, and the believers greatly revived. The result was, thirty-nine accessions—twenty-four whites, fifteen colored—and twenty conversions. Up to this time we have received two hundred and ninety into the Church on trial.

Manvilla Mission.—Rev. S. BURGOS writes: The Misson is a small one, in a thinly settled country. The membership is about one hnndred and fifteen. Of these we have some very substantial members. The missionary has met with great kindness and hospitality. He has been able to meet all his appointments but two, on account of sickness.

I closed a protracted meeting at Citronelle, on the 8th September. We had quite a revival among the membership, some few conversions and accessions. I have just closed a meeting at Manvilla, of a few days. We had six accessions to the Church.

I am getting on pretty well with my Missionery collections.

Union Town Colored Mission.—REV. J. W. MCCANN writes: For the third Quarter, I have received thirteen on probation; three into full membership, baptized one hundred and twenty-two children, and seven adults. The children at some of the appolntments are progressing finely in the catechism. I find where two or three plantations meet, they seem to enjoy preaching better. Some have been converted, and some have died. The last words one was heard to say were, "I am rising higher and higher."

In addition to my colored Charge, at the solicitation of some, I took in an appolntment for the white people in a destitute neighborhood. By the way, there are many such places between two Stations. Rev. Josiah Bancroft and myself commenced a two-days meeting Saturday before the second Sabbath in August; it was protracted, it resulted in ten conversions, and eight accessions to the Church. There were some that had not heard preaching in five years before.

Columbus Circuit.—REV. J. N. GLOVER writes: We have had since the fourth Sabbath in July last, some glorious meetings. God has been with us. Over one hundred professed religion, and joined the Church—mostly whites.

Choctaw Corner, Circuit.—REV. WM. H. CARTER writes: This is the Western part of the old Lower Peach Tree Circuit—the Stage-road from Grove Hill to Clay Hill being the dividing line. When I got there in December last, I found five appointments—at each of which was a Society. The state of experimental and practical religion was very low; old church difficulties, and very unpleasant feelings among many of the members. But by the blessing of God, and though the instrumentality of local and travelling brethren, we are considerably revived again. At Carleton's Chapel we had a protracted meeting the third Sunday in July, and God graciously revived us. Prayer-meetings have been held in the neighborhood ever since, which have resulted in the conversion of ten or twelve, and the sanctification of some eight or ten. At Paine's Chapel, a protracted meeting was held, embracing the fourth Sunday in August, at which several were pardoned. At Sweetwater, embracing the second Sunday in September, we had a gracious refreshing from on high. Some ten or twelve pardoned and reclaimed, and several sanctified. And at Bethel we have just closed a meeting of some ten days continuance which resulted in the pardon of some seven or eight and the sanctification of some two or three. But we deeply feel that we ought to have had much better times. God help us to in the future! Mr. Editor, why do not our preachers insist as much on sanctification as justification? Is it not best to do so?

Calhaba River White Mission.—Rev. R. W. COONS writes: For the 2d, 3d and 4th quarters: 10 appointments; received by letter, 6; on probation, 23; into full connection, 8; dropped, 1; baptized by local brethren, adults, 11; infants 13. Received in cash, $3 40 for the support of their Missionery. One new church built this year; two Sabbath schools; two superintendents; eight teachers; seventy students; volumes, 110. The schools are in a prosperous condition. Five hundred and fifty persons preached to. The prospects of this Mission are only tolerably good.

Mariana District.—Rev. W. P. MILLER writes: For the last three months we have had refreshing times from the presence of the Lord on my District. I think we shall be able to report prosperity in nearly all our borders this year, and in nearly every department of our interest.

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

Fayette.—Rev. W. G. MILLSAPS writes: We have just concluded a protracted meeting of seven days, about six miles west of Mt. Carmel, during which God gave us the victory through the power of His spirit. We began in a cluster of forest trees, the dense foliage of which was our protection from rain and sunshine—in a region where Methodism was not established and where we had neither church nor member. About two weeks previous we had taken fifteen into the Church. During the past week twenty persons were converted and joined us, happy in the love of God, the principal part of whom were heads of families. Several gray-headed fathers sought and obtained pardon, and with their families came into the Church. Besides, there were about sixty colored persons joined and several conversions among them. We organized a Church with thirty-two active and zealous members, newly-converted, and ready to pray in public, private, at the altar, or in the woods prayer meeting. A church will be immediately built, and no doubt others will soon join us who are now serious.

Many interesting scenes were witnessed on the occasion; especially among the aged. One day of the meeting an aged, gray-haired father came tremblingly and with streaming eyes and gave himself to God by joining the Church. During the intermission, while kneeling by a hickory tree, (now dear to his memory,) God powerfully converted his soul in the "woods prayer meeting." He came back praising God; met his son and daughter near the stand, took them on either side and walked down the aisle, exhorting them to meet him in Heaven. Many of his servants joined, and he is anxious for preaching at his house. We sold about fifty of our hymn books, besides disciplines and other religious books, and hope to send you a list of new subscribers soon. Rev. J. J. Wheat was with us from Monday till the close of our meeting, and preached in his usual earnest and effective style. May he make equally as effective a teechor of Greek.

Attala Circuit.—REV. L. ENCANDRACK writes: Our Liberty chapel camp-meeting closed on the 5th inst. with good results. A more general interest among the people about camp-meetings prevailed than ever before. Several of the tents had two and three families in them. The families were all on the ground the first day, and when the signal was first made to assemble at the stand, all with few exceptions came. Saturday it rained; things looked unfavorable; but at length the clouds cleared away, and at night we had a good congregation and a number of penitents at the altar. On Sabbath, a large congregation, good order and a good state of feeling among many. At night several conversions. After the 3 o'clock services on Monday, the penitents, with a number of professors, repaired to the grove for a "woods" prayer meeting. The Lord met with the sisters in mercy, and many of them shouted aloud for joy. Four or five were converted. At night we had seven or eight conversions and a number of professors rejoiced with great joy. It was good to be there. The next day in a woods prayer-meeting seven or eight youths, (some say eleven) were powerfully converted. May some of them be called to labor in the vineyard! We may safely say that twenty-five to thirty were converted; thirty-seven joined, (eight or ten of them children nine or ten years old). A number were reclaimed. Eight adults and fourteen children were heptized.

Sharon Circuit.—REV. J. M. PUGH writes: I have just closed a very interesting protracted meeting at Madisonville. It was continued sixteen days and resulted in seventeen conversions and nineteen accessions to the Church. The Society was feeble, consisting of six members and five probationers. Three years ago this appointment was thrown out of the Circuit, and was last year partially supplied by Rev. J. A. Light. This year it was attached to Sharon Circuit. There are in this neighborhood a few Presbyterians and a number of Baptists, but neither having a church organization, most hold their membership at Canton. Our Presbyterian brothers, and also our Baptist brothers, with a few exceptions, entered into the meeting with commendable fraternal zeal. It was "pleasant for brethren to dwell together in unity."

We had an experience meeting, in which Presbyterians, Baptists and Methodists participated. It was a meeting long to be remembered; and if there was any difference as to shouting, our Presbyterian and Baptist friends must bear off the palm. Two young men were convicted by hearing the experience of a young brother, and were converted. A warm-hearted Baptist sister, feeling it her duty to speak to a certain lady on the subject of religion, was instrumental in her conversion. Persons who had not been for some time on friendly terms embraced each other. Many were made to realize a deeper work of grace in the heart. It was truly a religious festival, and such is the interest, a prayer-meeting will be continued for the benefit of those penitent ones who still linger at the altar.

Attala Circuit.—Rev. L. ENCANDRACK writes: I have still good news for the Advocate. We closed our camp meeting at Bethel on the 21st ult., with good results. For the first three days our prospects were very discouraging, though a few had been converted. Monday morning, at the eight o'clock service, there was much feeling, and several penitents at the altar. At 11, feeling still increasing, and more seekers at the altar. At 3, several clear conversions. At night we had the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and such a sacrament I have rarely witnessed. Many communed, and among these several young converts. O how near and dear the Saviour appeared to all.

"Hail, sacred feast, which Jesus makes!
Rich banquet of his flesh and blood!
Thrice happy he who here partakes
That sacred stream, that heavenly food!"

This over, mourners were invited to the altar—15 or 20 came, most of whom were powerfully converted. At times we could neither prey nor sing so as to be heard—husbands and wives, parents and children, brothers and sisters, all rejoicing at once. Long will that scene live in my memory, and long that arbor, where it was witnessed, be dear to my heart. These scenes are oases in a minister's pilgrimage. Blessed be the Lord for such displays of His power. How they do encourage my naturally doubting soul to confide in God, and persevere in the way of duty.

The tent-holders displayed a noble generosity, though some of them were sick or had several of their families sick, through the meeting. God bless them and theirs for ever!

Between twenty and thirty conversions and reclamations, eixteen accessions, and several professed sanctifications, may be stated as the results of the meeting. Thanks to the preachers for their efficient labors.

Soon after the tenters left the ground, a fire broke out in one of the tents, and burned up six or seven tents before the fire could be arrested.

Buffalo Circuit.—Rev. J. J. CLARKE writes: We have had several good meetings—a number of conversions, some of whom have long been members; twenty-three to join the church, and seventeen received into full connection.

There has been raised for this circuit, for church purposes, this year, over four thousand dollars in cash, and good subscriptions. We have four framed churches on hand, in the hands of building committees, composed of energetic business men. One of which is to cost $1,760, the others after a time. Each house is to be forty-five feet long, and thirty-five feet wide.

A "home" is offered the next year's preacher. I have collected more Advocate accounts than you sent me.

Scarcely any one has been asked for money, the people have made free-will offerings to God.

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

Bon Idea Circuit.—Rev. S. HAWES writes: Our Third Quarterly meeting was held at Jones' Chapel on the 20th of August, commencing on Friday and continuing eleven days.

As the meeting progressed it became evident that the power of the Lord was present to heal. Like a gentle summer shower that gradually increased from pattering drops to dreadful torrents, until the whole country was deluged with a "refreshing season from the presence of the Lord."

After the meeting had progressed several days a call was made for those who had never tasted the joys of pardoned sin, but had, during the present meeting, found "the blessing," to make themselves known by taking the "front seats." Sixteen boldly came forward—perhaps others had left.

As we know of several that were converted after this, we may conclude there were about twenty-five conversions. There were also forty-one accessions to the Church. Nearly every day witnessed the scene of husbands walking across the house, leading up their wives and joining the Church together.

I baptized in one day nineteen adults and nine children, among them whole households.

One brother, a native of Louisiana and of a Methodist family, appeared to be moved by a sense of duty to operate in a more public capacity. He was recommended by the Society to receive license to exhort. I hope we may hear from him again.

I had the assistance of Bros. H. B. Price and A. H. Brewer. The latter, a protestant Methodist, a good man, faithful and true, and having no church of his own in the country, concluded to unite with us.

Monroe and Trenton.—Rev. A. W. SMITH writes: Monroe and Trenton Circuit is looking up. There is an increased interest on the subject of religion. Our hearers are more numerous—more eager to hear the word of life. Penitents at the altar of prayer and accessions to the Church are more frequent. Up to this date we have had four conversions, eighteen accessions to the Church and more than fifty seekers at the altar. Two more appointments have been taken in; one church house built, dedicated and paid for early last Spring; $800 subscribed for the erection of another, with ground to build it upon, and a burying-ground connected therewith. This is an evidence that we have some practical, enterprising believers here in the Christian religion.

Mansfield.—Rev. S. B. SCRATT writes: We have lately had a gracious revival of religion in Mansfield. We preached there on the fourth Sabbath of this month, with but little thought of protracting the meeting. We called for penitents. Five presented themselves, and one was converted. We continued eleven days. Thirty souls were converted and thirty-five joined the Church. Dr. Thweet and Rev. B. J. Hamilton rendered us efficient aid. Praying and not preaching was the characteristic of the meeting. The Church as well as the preachers were the workers. Our morning prayer-meetings were attended with great power. The young ladies' prayer-meetings were eminently successful. Several who a few weeks since were foremost at the dancing parties were the most zealous in sending up petitions to God for more grace. This revival we believe to be the fruit of the Pleasant Hill camp-meeting. It is no more impossible for a river to rise without a corresponding swell in its bayous and lakes than a good camp-meeting without a gracious revival influence in the surrounding Churches. To God be all the glory.

Opelousas.—Rev. B. F. WHITE writes: We are at work preaching at thirteen different places. Have baptized about 100 children. Received on probation about 110; into full fellowship over 100; collected $60 missionary money; paid for our parsonage; paid in notes and money the old debt of the Church at this place; have half enough to pay the Washington Church debt; have carried God's Word to every man's door in the parish. Have a pretty good emigration to these parts. Have influenced several young, intelligent christian gentlemen to come over and tench some of our schools; and "last, but not least," perhaps, we are establishing, with fine prospects, a good Female College at this place, as a co-worker with Rev. C. A. Frazee's High School for boys, in educating and training the "sons of the sires," and their sisters for future usefulness and final happiness. Under the smiles of God, we expect to do a vast amount of good. We need the smiles and prayers of all the "good and holy." "He that goeth forth, and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him."

North Rapides Circuit.—Rev. R. T. PARISH writes: The Lord still continues to revive his work on this Circuit. There have been sixteen conversions and twenty-five accessions since I wrote you last, whilst the Church has been greatly revived and strengthened.

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

From the Rio Grande.

Brownsville, Texas, has been attacked by Mexican guerrillas, and five citizens had been killed. They had robbed the mail from Loredo. Mexican troops were sent from Matamores to protect the city. Most of the citizens had escaped to Matamores. Word was sent to San Antonio for troops.

From Mexico.

A conspiracy to overthrow Miramon had been discovered at the city of Mexico, and crushed. The Liberals were preparing to attack the capital, and other places—they have had several successful fights recently.

From California.

Mr. Broderick, U. S. Senator, and Judge Terry, Chief Justice Supreme Court, had fought a duel, and Broderick was killed the first fire. The Lecompion Democrats have carried both California and Oregon.

Arrival of the Canada.—Advices to Sept. 24th.

The Italian Question.

It is rumored that Tuscany is to be ruled by the King of Belgium. The second son, Count Flanders, is to have the three Italian Duchies; and the Archduke Maxhnillian, Venetia, with separate constitutions.

It is stated that a European Congress is soon to be held at Brussels, and to be presided over by the King of Sardinia. The Sardinian Government denies the ruported cession of Savoy to France, and has protested to the great Powers against the secret aid of Austria in recruiting troops for the Pope.

The affairs of the Pope are very alarming. Antonelli has declared himself unfit to attend to public affairs.

The Paris correspondent of the London Harald calls the story, placing a Belgian Prince on the throne, a ridiculous canard.

Cochin China.

The French Admiral has obtained four concessions from Cochin China. The right to exercise the Christian religion; a treaty of commerce; cession of the town of Segar, in the adjoining territory; and the recognition of the French right to the Bay of Suzan.

Spain.

Advices from Madrid confirm the report of the appointment of General Serano, Captain General of Cuba, to replace General Concha.

Arrival of the Indian—Advices to Sept. 28th.

The Chinese War.

Advices of the 10th August from China have been received at London. The exact whereabouts of Hon. Mr. Ward, the American Minister, on his journey to Pekin, with an Chinese escort, was unknown at Canton and Shanghai.

The English force against China, in the new expedition, is to consist of 10,000 men, all of whom will be sent from India. No troops are to be sent from England to join this expedition, which is to be under the command of Gen. Sir Hope Grant.

The Italian Question.

It was rumored at London that a treaty of peace would be signed at Zurich, in a few days; but that Sardinia opposed the proposed Italian Confederation under the Pope's Presidency.

In the proposed general European Congress at Brussels, it is believed that Austria will be represented by the Archduke Maximilian, and Great Britain by Prince Albert.

Steamship Great Eastern.

The day of sailing of the steamship Great Eastern, for the United States, has again been postponed, to allow of the repairs occasioned by the late explosion on board being fully completed.

Further by the Indian.

The British Japan Treaty.

Intelligence has been received from Japan to the effect that the British treaty with that country was ratified on the 11th of July.

Subsequently the Japanese attempted to evade it by confining foreigners to a small island ten miles from Jeddo. The British Consul entered his protest against it and trade for the present has been stopped.

China.

The Hong Kong newspaper, of the latest datos, says that the American Minister, Mr. Ward, is still on board of his ship, and will be little likely to obtain a ratification of his treaty.

Another paper says that the British Minister had gone to Pekin, and a Russian dispatch says that he had arrived at Pekin, but had been placed in confinement.

The Russian account of the affair at Pelho states that the Chinese had 1000 men killed, but the number of wounded not ascertained; and that the Englishmen who fell into the hands of the Chinese were well treated.

Riot at Shanghai.

A riot had occurred at Shanghai, during which several foreigners were killed and others wounded, among the latter was the interpreter Fuy, whose wounds are said to be dengerous.

The riot is said to have originated on account of kidnapping coolies for a French vessel. The Captain of the French vessel, however, states that the coolies were coming on board to rob the vessel, and that he was compelled to fire upon them in self defense.

The French Minister has ordered the French ships into port for a strict investigation of the matter.

At Shenghai black teas were ranging 30 per cent. higher than last season, while the quality is inferior.

India.

The disarming of Oude has been completed. There has been no official requisition for troops for China yet made, but the Government has given orders to two regiments to hold themselves in readiness.

The crop of indigo is shorter than was anticipated.

Africa.

Dates from South Africa of the 21st August state that satisfactory accounts have been received from Mr. Livingston, the renowned explorer.

From the same source the intelligence of the burning of the ship Sheeghanpore, loaded with Coolies, bound for the West Indies, has been received. The Captain and crew sixty four in all, were rescued. All the Coolies three hundred and fifty in number perished.

Advices from Tunis state that the Bey of Tunis died on September 22d.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, October 10, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New Orleans Price-Current, ending on the 8th instant: The operations in our market generally continue on a limited scale, the only exception being our leading staple, Cotton, which has met with a very favorable demand, generally at well-maintained prices during the greater part of the week. Sugar has run down to a very low stock, and prices have materially improved within the week, but Tobacco continues to be almost entirely neglected, with an accumulating supply. In the various articles of Western Produce the transactions are mainly confined to limited parcels for home consumption, and the general merchendize market can present but little activity so long as low waters continue in the tributary streams.

On Friday evening despatches were received, announcing the arrival of the Canada with three days latter European advices, which are said to report a decline in the Liverpool Cotton market of ⅛d in Middling and ¼d in the grades below, with sales for the week of 46,000 bales.

COTTON.—Our semi-weekly report closed upon a very fair demend, and but a moderate supply of desirable lots, the sales for the first three days of the week summing up about 18,000 bales. On Wednesday the inquiry was renewed with a good degree of activity, and sales were effected to the extent of about 10,000 bales. On Thursday, with later European advices hourly looked for, there was less animation in the demand, and the sales were confined to about 4500 bales. Under similer circumstances Friday's sales were about 5500; making a total for the past three days of 20,000 and for the week of 38,000 bales, taken mostly for Great Britain, with some purchases for France, the Continent of Europe, Spain, the North &c. As we have remarked in several previous reports, the demand runs mainly upon the Middling and Strict Middling descriptions, free from dust and of good staple, and the rates of these descriptions have generally been well maintained through the greater part of the week, while dusty parcels, of similar classifications, are comparatively unsaleable, and may be bought at irregular rates under inside figures. Indeed a good deal of irregularity has been observable in prices throughout the market generally, but the quotations heretofore given were tolerably well maintained in the general transactions up to yesterday, when buyers obtained a marked advantage, and we reduce our figures ¼ cent for all qualties.

The receipts at this port since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas,) are 200,873 bales, against 155,084 bales to same date last year, and the increase in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 42,000 bales.

New Orleans Classification:

Inferior	—@—	Good Middling	11⅛@11⅜
Ordinary	—@—	Middling Fair	11⅜@12⅛
Good Ordinary	9⅞@10⅛	Fair	—@—
Low Middling	10⅛@10⅜	Good Fair	—@—
Middling	10⅜@11⅛	Good and Fine	—@—

SUGAR.—The sales of the week amount to 1200 hhds. We quote for Inferior and Refining — to —; Common to Good Common 6 to 6½; Fair to Fully Fair 6⅞ to 7; Prime to Choice 7¼ to 7⅞; Centrifugal and Clarified 7 to 8 cents per pound. The above quotations apply to round lots, but small orders of 5 hhds and under, could not be filled without paying a further advance of ⅛ to ¼c per pound.

The first receipt of the new crop last year was on the 20th September, but this year the crop is said to be about one month later; a very important and unfavorable difference, and all accounts agree that the product must fall very materially short of that of last year.

MOLASSES.—The last year's crop is nearly all disposed of, and there are but few transactions of consequence in this article. The quotations are: for Inferior and Fermenting 25 to 30; Prime to Choice and Rebolled 35 to 37 in hhds., City-refinery rebolled 33 to 40 cents per gallon.

TOBACCO, is quoted, for Lugs—factory, — to —; planters 3¼ to 4¼; Leaf—inferior to common 5 to 5¾; fair 6 to 6¾; fine 7¼ to 8¼; choice, heavy and light, 8¼ to 9¼ and 10 cents per pound. The sales of the week barely sum up 350 hhds.

FLOUR.—The sales have amounted to about 8000 bbls. The demand for this articles continues quite limited. We quote a range, from $5 15 to $5 30 for superfine, $5 50 to $6 75 for good extra, and $7 00 to $7 50 and $7 75 per bbl. for choice extra brands.

GRAIN.—The sales of Corn during the week amount to about 3,500 sacks—the extreme figures of the sales ranging from 90 to 95c. and $1 00 for ordinary to prime mixed, $1 00 to $1 05 for yellow, and $1 10 to 1 20 for good to prime white. Oats sell at 54 to 62c. per bushel for ordinary to prime St. Louis. Bran is quoted at $1 10 to $1 15 per 100 lbs; closing rate for choice lots belag $1 15.

PORK.—The sales of the week amount to about 2000 bbls. Mess. We quote Mess at $15 30 to $15 75, and M. O. at $14 to to $14 50 per barrel.

BEEF.—We quote Prime Mess at $14 50 per bbl. for extra brands.

BACON.—Shoulders 8 to 8¼; Ribbed Sides 11½ to 10½; Clear Sides 12½ to 12¾; Sugar-cured Hams 13 to 14½ cents per pound.

LARD.—We quote 11¼ to 11¾c for prime to choice prime, in tcs. and 12 to 13c. for kegs.

BUTTER.—Western generally selling at 12 to 15 cents per pound, according to quality; and Cheese 7½ to 8¾c.

BAGGING AND BALE ROPE.—We quote Kentucky Bagging at 12 to 14½ cents per yard; India Bagging, 12 to 12½c. Bale Rope, hand spun, 6½ to 7¼, and machine made, 7¼ to 8 cents per pound.

GUNNY BAGS—Limited parcels sell at 10½ cents for light and 11½ to 12¼c. to heavy and extra heavy bags.

COFFEE.—We quote fair at 11 to 12, and prime at 12¼c. per pound. Stock in first and second hands is only about 11,300 bags against 28,300 at same period last season.

CHALLENGE ACCEPTED.

Evergreen, La., Sept. 17, 1859.

To Elder John Oquin and Robert R. Irion, Esq.:

GENTLEMEN: We, the Committee appointed by the Quarterly Conference of the "Evergreen" Circ

necessarily applicable also to you. You have, or can have, a house of worship wholly devoted to the service of Almighty God, to which you go, or may go, to wait before the Lord your maker; and, to be clear of responsibility, you must make your servants "equal" with yourself, in this respect; and this equally necessarily demands a chapel, or house, in which to worship God. But you "do not believe in allowing your servants to mix promiscuously with other servants." This may be, and your objections, with the discipline heretofore exercised on such occasions, may be well founded; but this does not remove the necessity for submitting to such an alternative. There are other important considerations which must enter into this part of the subject. The Missionary—the moral instructor and servant to your servants—is a man, and must, according to the common dictates of humanity, as well as the positive arrangement and decree of Heaven[‡]—live while doing his work—must live at your expense, and not at his own. The duty is not met,—the "right" (to use your own words) is not done by simply providing a "house of worship, and then, merely granting to the missionary the privilege of access to your servants—you yourself must fully meet the entire expense of the whole enterprise—[ ] "who goeth a warfare at any time at his own charges?"); for the Church could never succeed in taxing poor men to pay the expense of preaching to rich men's servants—neither would it be just to attempt it. Many planters already, individually ask and obtain of the Church, annually, the services of separate missionaries, for the exclusive benefit of their own servants; and each cheerfully meets the entire expenses of his own particular missionary. It is with them a component part of the care, government and management exercised over their servants annually. I could mention, if necessary, names of parties who do thus, with whom you are quite familiar. Do less obligations rest on you than on them? But "the expense is too great." Are the present moral government and good of your servants, and their eternal salvation, to be measured or weighed down by a consideration for dollars and cents alone? Allow me to transcribe, for your perusal, a part of Bishop Andrews' address to Christian masters, where—speaking of the conduct of a certain wealthy planter, who refused to give the Gospel to his servants, even while his overseer offered to meet one-half of the expense—he says: ¶ "To this, the owner of so many broad acres demurred—probably could not afford to give to his negroes the preaching of the Gospel, at a small cost; and yet this same man could afford to spend two hundred dollars at a single wine party! Will such men never awake to a realisation of the solemn fact, that, whether they will or not, they have to meet these fearful responsibilities at the bar of One who will deal out impartial justice to all, master, overseer and slave, without reference to cotton bags, sugar hogsheads, or rice barrels!" And again, as "O you, whose annual income counts by thousands, for which you are indebted to the toil and sweat of your slaves, is it a great boon, if you, from their own earnings, appropriate a few hundred dollars, to have the Word of God carried to their cabins, that they may live to love and serve that Almighty Being who is your Master as well as theirs? Do you demur at the cost? Remember, man, your reckoning at the bar of God!—a settlement which you must soon make, and which you have no power to avoid or postpone. Come, go to all your quarters and call up all those negroes which you are already, in prospect, appropropriating to your sons and daughters; call them all up before you; look on the countenance of each; mark them well, and remember that you will meet them again, and they will be strong witnesses either for or against you."

Poetry.

A SUMMER IDYL.

"The harvest is past, the summer is ended," and, whether we are saved or not, it is past the season for which this beautiful little poem is intended. But the "Indian Summer" is about coming, and it will be cruel to make the readers of the Advocate wait for the pleasure of reading it until next summer. The verses are from the Springfield Republican, signed J. A. H.

The air is hushed to holy calm,
A sun-dipped cloud hangs here and there,
And eon low tide of music rare
Falls like a sweetly ebbing psalm.

Above, the sun in one bright blaze
Flames down alike on high and low—
Creation's censer! to and fro
It swings, and burns in endless praise.

In one vast flood of argent gold,
O'erflowing pasture, land and wood,
It falls as though the world were good;
And needed blessings manifold.

And so it does—for just as fair
Is earth to-day, as when the June
First woke the happy summer tune
That charms the seasons every where.

Oh, happy days!—oh, season sweet!—
Oh, priceless wealth of rural joys!
What, though we have no shepherd boys
To trip the hills with bare, brown feet:

Or rose-lipped maidens, rustic clad,
To guard with them the vagrant flocks;
We have the vales, the woods, the rocks,
As fair as aught the ancients had.

What sweetness now the sense assails,
While slumber steeps the soul in dreams—
Low, murmurous sounds of singing streams
Float by, on odor-bearing gales.

The trill of bird, the croon of bee,
The gaunt cicada's slender reed,
For one brief life of pleasure plead,
And universal love and glee.

PENSIVE AUTUMN STANZAS.

Sadness and hope and beauty are happily blended in the following sweet lines, which we find in a newspaper. Some poetry-loving reader of the Advocate will find pleasure in reading them.

Leaf by leaf the roses fall,
Drop by drop the springs run dry;
One by one, beyond recall,
Summer beauties fade and die;
But the roses bloom again,
And the spring will gush anew,
In the pleasant April rain
And the summer sun and dew.

So, in hours of deepest gloom,
When the springs of gladness fail,
And the roses in their bloom,
Droop like maidens wan and pale;
We shall find some hope that lies
Like a silent gem apart,
Hidden far from careless eyes
In the garden of the heart.

Some sweet hope to gladness wed,
That will spring afresh and new,
When grief's winter shall have fled,
Giving place to rain and dew—
Some sweet hope that breathes of spring,
Through the weary, weary time,
Bedding for its blossoming,
In the spirit's glorious clime.

Children's Column.

"Suffer the Little Children to come unto Me."

Little Johnny Moore.

The St. Louis Republican, a newspaper published in the city of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, has the following account of little Johnny Moore, which we publish in the "Children's Column," for the benefit of the little readers of the New Orleans Christian Advocate. Read, it little friends, and whenever you are tempted to do a mean or dishonest thing, think of it, and remember also, that God's eye is upon you, and that he will bless the honesty, and curse the dishonesty, of the children of men.

Johnny Moore is the name of a bright-eyed, jolly-faced lad, twelve or fourteen years of age, whose invalid widowed mother, living on Morgan street, he helps to support by the sale of newspapers and by such errands and small jobs as he may chance to fall in with. Johnny, who is the hero of the pleasant and truthful incident we are about to record, is extremely neat in his attire, though his clothes have not always been of the best, and may have shown, in sundry patches and mended rents, the results of both poverty and frugal care. In short, Johnny is just such a boy as "we used to" read about" in Sunday-school books. Yesterday morning, bright and early, he was tugging along Broadway, between Franklin Avenue and Wash street, when he chanced to stumble against a large pocket-book, which he picked up and found to contain a large number of bank notes and papers. While he was meditating on the suddon riches he had amassed, and which he had slid into a capacious pocket, or perhaps racking his youthful mind whether to seek for the owner or conceal his good fortune, a gentleman rushed by him in an anxious, hurried, nervous manner, which convinced the boy that he was looking for something, and he thought he knew what.

"Have you lost anything?" asked Johnny. "Yes—my pocket-book," was the gentlemen's answer; "have you seen it?"

The little fellow "expected" he had—he didn't know, though. What kind of a pocket-book was it?

This led to an adjournment to a neighboring store, where the flushed and almost breathless individual "of the first part" proceeded to say that the pocket-book was a large black one, containing $1200 in bank bills, and some accounts, a strip of red morocco binding underneath, the flap being inscribed "Robert Thomas, Covington, Ky." The description tallied, and Johnny's eyes snapped with cheerfulness as he placed the treasure, just as he had found it, into the stranger's hands; and we opine there was greater joy in that one act than ten thousand dollars could have purchased, at the expense of a guilty conscience.

Mr. Thomas hardly seemed to know which to feel most—relief on the recovery of his money and papers, or gratitude to the lad and admiration of his honesty. Taking Johnny by the hand, whose bounding heart (he knew not why,) had by this time "splashed tears into his eyes," the gentleman took him to a clothing store and dressed him out, from top to toe, in a bran new suit. Then proceeding to a jewelry store, he purchased a good silver watch, upon which he directed to be engraved these words: "Robert Thomas to Little Johnny Moore. St. Louis, September 3d, 1859. Honesty is the best policy." Not even content with this, the generous stranger placed in a neat bead purse five twenty dollar gold pieces, which he directed the lad to give to his mother.

We shall not attempt to portray the emotions of the boy. If his quivering lips, and choked utterance, and the smile that strove so hard to get through the great watery globes that trembled in his eyes, failed to tell what was going on in his heart, how shall we tell it?

The Family Circle.

"Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee."

A WIFE'S REMORSE.

"Sick—sick again!" said the heedless wife, with petulance—"I'm so tired of seeing a pale face from morning till night, of hearing groans, of mixing doses. It seems to me there is little need of this constant giving up—why don't I give up!"

"Mary—Mary," cried a quavering voice.

"Coming, coming" replied the woman. "O! dear, how I have to run. He's so impatient, and I must always be there; men ought never be sick, they make so much trouble."

There was but little tenderness in the voice that answered the faint queries of the sick man, yet Mrs. Nash was not a hard-hearted or unfeeling woman. Her character leaned somewhat to the side of selfishness, and being in robust health, she had no knowledge of the heart-wearing that continual pull-backs cause to men of the strongest wills.

"O dear," sighed the man half childishly, "It seems as if my head never did ache as it does now."

"I've heard you say that a hundred times," said Mrs. Nash, not in the softest manner.

"But I'm sure it's worse—if you'll only pull the curtain down—the least light strikes through my eyes even when they are shut."

"Up again," thought the wife, rising impatiently, scattering her work with some noise as she did so, and, heedless of the groan that followed, she let the blind fall heavily.

"I'm a great deal of trouble," said the sick man, seeing the cloud on his wife's brow.

"O! no"—her face cleared up—"you're notional of course; all men are—men dont know what sickness is, and they are so frightened at the least pain."

"But this is terrible!" cried the invalid, pressing his closed eyes together.

O how he longed to have some soothing hand upon his temples!—but he would not ask his wife, because he saw that she had snatched up her sewing and was again absorbed in its completion.

Hours passed, and the pulse leaped madly, the eyes grew strained and crossed with veins, the temples fluttered with the throbbing flesh, and strange words came thickly on the stillness of the chamber.

Mrs. Nash had been down stairs preparing supper; she had just laughingly said, in reply to a neighbor's question concerning her husband—

"O! going to die, as you men all are, if you happen to cut your finger."

Little she thought how true the prophecy she so unthinkingly uttered. In another moment her eldest son came into the room.

"Isn't it funny?" he cried, "pa don't know me. He called me Mr. Morris, and asked if I had that will all made out."

"What do you mean child?" His mother paused in the midst of her work.

"He don't know me, because I kept calling, pa, and he would look at me so strange, and keep asking me if I had that will all made out."

Her cheek paling a little, Mrs. Nash hurried up to the chamber above. Her husband was talking wildly to himself, and his appearance had changed frightfully. Now seriously alarmed, she sent for the physician, who was all wonder that he had been called at so late an hour.

"The man must have shown symptoms of more than ordinary distress, this morning," he said—"did he make complaints of nothing but an ordinary headache?"

The wife was forced to confess that the symptoms had been unusually severe, but he was so liable to these attacks that she did'nt think much of it. Her heart however condemned her. She was conscious that the moans and complaints of her poor sick husband had irritated her to an unusual degree, and that she had borne far from patiently with him. Now she was ready to make all amends. With tears and loving thoughts she hovered over that sick bed, accusing herself—as every wild cry for her rang out, still there was no consciousness, still he felt not the kind hand, saw not the streaming eyes—of being the cause of all his wretchedness through her selfish neglect.

Tears, hot and copious, wild prayers to heaven, sweet and fervent words of love availed nothing. The death-hour came, and with it consciousness. Arrows could not have pierced that sad heart as did the last words of that dying man, "Dearest you have been a good wife to me."

The meek face looked calmly white amidst the casements of the grave, but it was scarcely whiter than the face that bent over it. O! what would that wretched heart have given to recall those cold, careless words that were ringing in her own ears at every step. This was the thought that gave anguish unparalleled, as her trembling steps led her to his open grave—as she looked her last upon the dear, manly face that had ever had a smile for her. O! to live with this consciousness! to bear a burden so heavy—these were to be her punishment.

"If I had been tender to him that day"—she often sobbed out, as she accused herself—"if I had only kissed the hot brow, and bathed it more carefully—if I had only put down that feeling that I would not humor his fancied indisposition—I would give worlds." But the sorrow, dreadful as it was, has not been without its salutary influence. Now the widowed woman is the welcome visitor by the bedside of the sick. Her gentle voice soothes as the voice of a mother—her hand's touch is like the pressure of velvet, her very sympathy is as the sweetest cordial. And if ever she is tempted to think an impatient thought, or give expression to a selfish wish, there comes up before her the vision of a pale face that, but for her neglect, might be smiling on her now—and with the rebuke working patience in her heart, she goes about her Master's work.—Mother's Journal

INCREASE OF LONGEVITY.

—It is a prevailing impression among many that long life was more common in the time of our ancestors than at present. Facts would seem to prove otherwise. In the latter part of the 16th century, one-half of all who were born, died under five years of age, and the average proportion of the whole population was but eighteen years. In the seventeenth century, one-half of the population died under twelve years. But in the first sixty years of the 18th century, one-half of the population lived over twenty-seven years; in the latter forty years, one-half exceeded thirty-two years of age. In the beginning of the present century, one-half exceeded forty years. The average longevity of these successive periods has been increased from eighteen years in the 16th century up to forty-three, by the last reports. This increase in the duration of life is believed, to be the result of improved medical science, improvement in the construction of houses, drainage of streets, and superior clothing.

MARIAGES OF CONSANGUINITY

Are discussed in the last number of the Boston Medical and Surgical Journal. After a statement of the facts elicited by responsible medical observers, the editor says:

For ourselves, without the least partisan feelings, we can say that we have seen too many direct instances of evil consequences from the marriage of near relations, to doubt in the least the unpropitious influence exerted. We cannot think that, were the following questions propounded to any right-minded and well-instructed physician—Would you think it right to sanction a marriage between very near relations, say first cousins?—the answer would be anything but an emphatic No. Yet we have been told that such marriages are sanctioned by some physicians, when their opinion has been asked—or at least, that an adverse opinion has not been decidedly given. We do not, at this moment, recollect any such advisers ourselves.

FLAXEN RINGLETS.

Poets have often sung in raptures of blue-eyed, laughing, flax-haired girls, but Geo. Speight, of London, a thoroughly practical man, understands things better than those dreaming rhymsters who make sonnets to their sweethearts. He has just taken out a patent for making plaits and curls for head-dresses and other head-ornaments, and employs Russian or American hemp dyed to the exact shade desired, and glossed up with aromatic grease, and curled to adorn the head of some happy fair one either with flowing auburn or raven locks, as may be desired. When it is taken into consideration that long brown hair for making ladies' artificial curls cost from $10 to $12 per pound, Mr. Speight may be considered a sort of benefactor to all those individuals who are deficient in natural cranial ornamentation, although we think his invention will rather spite the girls in Normandy, who cultivate their hair expressly for our wig-makers.—Scientific American.

CONVERSATION.

The art of conversation is the finest of the fine arts; it is not the art of saying much, but of saying well. There are preaching men who talk, but listen not, or who speechify in private; or gossiping men, who think little and are never still, and yet they are not conversable men. The real art of conversation consists, not only in expressing your own thoughts freely, but in drawing out by encouragement the thoughts of others. You will never be liked for long talking by anybody; but you are sure to be liked if, by your talking, you encourage and stimulate others to think and talk in response to your thoughts. The art is a natural gift in the main. It is not only a gift of mind, but also of temper. It requires condescension, indulgence, patience, and many other accomplishments; refinement as well as power.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

AUGUSTUS JOHN BROWN died at his residence in Tallapoosa county, Alabama, on the morning of the 20th June, 1859, aged 65 years. For thirty-two years he was a useful member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. It is not our wish to recount his virtuous deeds. Our fondest tribute to his beloved memory is the epithet, Christian. Such was he in deed and in truth. Life's journey was finished, and with the trusting fondness of a child he went to sleep in his Savior's arms. His family mourn a father and friend, and the community a man who worked for the public good.

TRUTH OMNIPOTENT.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from A. W. Vesey, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of North Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, one that ought to go home to those in whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.
CONSERVATIVE OFFICE,
Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858.
Messrs. Wright & Co.—As any testimonial in reference to your preparations may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following, published at my request, in the "Conservative" of the 21st inst.
Col. Vasser was formerly associate editor of the "Conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity. Respectfully, J. W. VESEY.
[For the Conservative.]
Contemplated. ABERDEEN, Aug. 18th, 1858.
DEAR VESEY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untold sorrow in many a happy household.
On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 15 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and, having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a never-failing remedy against this terrible enemy of children, I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly, by the acquiescence of my family Physician.
On the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, save in quantity, being afraid to give the amount of prescription. I was unable to detect any impression occasioned by it until late in the afternoon of that day; and almost despaired of any good effect, when, about one o'clock the next morning I was aroused from my slumber to witness the incredible number of one hundred and thirty-six from one evacuation.
Before breakfast of the same morning, (Sunday) but one small dose was administered, which was followed by the discharge of fifty during the day. The next day, (Monday) none was administered; but still occasional discharges occurred during the day, varying in size and quantity as described.
On Tuesday morning following, one more small dose was administered, making in all five doses of a quarter of a teaspoonful instead of a half as prescribed by the label of directions. In all, the little creature has discharged to this date, the rise of three hundred worms, a majority of which will average five or six inches in length; and is running about as usual, with returning evidences of good health and spirits.
Having met with such astonishing effects in the case of my infant, I was induced to use the Vermifuge on six other children under my protection, varying in age from twenty years old, and in every case save one, that of the oldest, like happy results have been produced.
These facts are elicited, 1st, because of my antipathy heretofore to nostrums of every kind; and, 2nd, because my experience has convinced me that, in the experiment I have made with WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, it is due to suffering humanity, as well as the manufacturer of the medicine, to make public the results of my observation.
W. H. VASSER.

When Hygeia lent medicinal aid to man,
And taught him all his evils how to scan,
Not to a favorite few she showed the way
To stanch the wound and all its pain allay—
Not to the few who now claim physic heirs,
And think but what they give legitimate wares,
No! to all human kind command she gave,

We Dont Want Any Other.
Such is the language of all who use "WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE," when they call for that and any other is offered them; they have tried it, and from experience know it to be superior to all others; therefore when they are in want of a medicine of the kind, they purchase that which they know to be good and can be depended on. An Agent who called on us a few days ago, said "I find it difficult to sell any other Vermifuge when I have yours. I have had some in my store for a long time which I occasionally try to 'work off,' but no one will purchase it unless I warrant it as good as yours, this I cannot do." So it is, and so it will be, Winer's Vermifuge owes its unrivaled popularity to its own intrinsic merits, on this alone it has a ways depended, and were it not a fact that it is superior as a remedy for worms, it would ere this have shared the miserable fate of many other articles designed for similar purposes. To all who are in want of a medicine of this kind we say try it and judge for yourselves, we are confident that it will give entire satisfaction.

Beware of Calomel.
The public generally may not be aware that nearly all Worm Lozenges contain Calomel, and that the lives of children are thereby endangered. parents should remember this, for although medicine may be easily administered when in the form of Lozenges or Candies of any description, yet the danger that is incurred outweighs the advantages, besides Calomel very often fails in accomplishing the desired object, it is by no means to be depended on as a remedy for Worms, and it is not now so generally resorted to by physicians as it was a few years ago, they have become convinced of the danger of its use and of the uncertainty with which it acts, and have prudently and wisely resorted to other means by which these objections are obviate.
Physicians generally how use WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, this medicine is a simple vegetable preparation and can always be administered with perfect safety and confidence as to the result, as it will always destroy Worms and restore the patient to health.

Save the Children.
Of the multitudes of children that die before they reach their twelfth year, three fourths are believed to be the victims of internal worms, or of diseases arising from that cause. A medicine like WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, which will infallibly and rapidly cure the disease, is therefore of immense importance to every family. It is extolled in the highest terms by the faculty, and at this time when the mortality among children is greater than was ever before known, it is not safe or prudent for any household to be without it. Believing that the frightful increase of deaths among children is mainly attributable to worms and the disorders they produce, we recommend this specific to all who have charge of young families.

THE GOSPEL AND SLAVERY: NO. III.

BY A MISSIONARY.

What is my "entire scheme for going into and successfully conducting a work of this kind?" I am truly glad to have such a question propounded, and shall take great delight in answering it fully. Well, then, I have already told you, in the second item of the "plan" first laid down, that after your house is erected and set apart to the worship of Almighty God, you must provide competent moral and religious instruction. Now the cheapest rate at which this may be done is neither the best, most suitable, nor even the cheapest in the end. You want the labor expended to be found both now and "after many days;" and you therefore require a man of general intelligence and of varied and deep experience with human nature—especially with this African development of it—a man of ardent piety and of respectability to scholastic requirements—with unflagging perseverance in all the departments of his vocation. This man, in forty-nine cases out of fifty, will be a married man with a wife and children to provide for; and if he engages in this work at all he will be wholly dependent upon his work for their and his own living, because Heaven itself has arranged as to such a workman that he "is worthy of his hire." Well, you pay the manager of your temporal affairs (who is most likely a young man) $700, $800, $900 or $1,000 a year; and shall the man who assumes to tend the whole responsibility of caring for and managing the spiritual and eternal interests of your servants be deemed as deserving of less compensation or consideration while performing a work of such magnitude and importance? Surely not. But as the object is merely to live and not to make money by such a vocation, I will put this man with his family at a low figure of expense, and will say that a saitable dwelling house and $700 a year will enable him and them to live in some degree of comfort and respectability, so that he can at least be wholly given up to his work. As, however, you may not wish for the exclusive services of one man for your servants alone, only in conjunction with others, you can divide his time and expenses equally between yourself and one neighbor, and this will reduce the amount to you one-half, ($350) and for which you will receive a weekly service. Or, to benefit your neighbors as well as yourself, you can take in three of them into your arrangement, and this will give to each one service every two weeks, and reduce the expense of each to $175. In all these cases, however, each neighbor is supposed to have a chapel or meeting house on his own place, and also to meet his quota of the arrangement as to a dwelling house for the Missionary. And the reason for suggesting this method of individual places of worship is only an endeavor to accommodate the plan to the wishes or objections of those who prefer that their servants should not meet with others in a promiscuous assembly. But for reasons which I shall not now take time to enumerate, and because a promiscuous assembly looks more like a congregation hearing the gospel than a single family, or plantation, the best arrangement, in my judgment and experience, is for you and one or two or more of your neighbors (according to the first item of the "plan") to unite in building a chapel or house of worship in a contiguous and convenient spot for all your servants, to which the servants of each neighbor, under the usual leadership of the foreman of the crop, may go and unitedly hear the gospel of their salvation; and then after service, under the same orderly oversight, return immediately to their respective places of abode. This arrangement would also give two services a month, and has the additional recommendation of accommodating a large number of parties at a very trifling expense. If one neighbor unites with you your share would only be $87 50; if two unite with you, only $58 33; or if as many as three, then only $43 75. Or, should you three neighbors have but few servants and be unable to go into a weekly or semi-monthly service, you can reduce it to a monthly appointment, which, though insufficient, would be much better than none at all, and then the expense to each dwindles down to $27. Or, lower even still, embrace four others with yourself in your arrangement in this plan for the evangelization of the servants of all your neighbors, and the expense to each diminishes to $17 50. And yet farther, should the Missionary furnished under either plan prove unmarried, (a possible case, at least,) then half the amount of all the quotas here given would meet the entire expense of the charge. [Let not, however, I pray you, the desire of economy in any event become the ruling motive for adopting the cheaper plan—only the meeting of a case of necessity for the benefit of others.

Such a method of combination has this merit over all others, that it enables one man to do a great deal of good among his neighbors; and when carried out fully, which it must and ought to be speedily, will embrace every neighborhood throughout the length and breadth of our land, at an expense which is truly insignificant. You see, therefore, that by plan and arrangement the bringing of the gospel within the reach and hearing of your servants, and the freeing of yourself from responsibility in this important behalf, may be made to become to you individually, (under given circumstances,) almost without money and without price. And when by one united act of you and all such as are similarly situated with you, this simple plan for evangelizing the entire slave population within our borders shall have been fully set on foot and faithfully carried out, (a period and consummation which I hope yet to see,) then indeed shall every cause of reproach by our enemies be taken away; and though fanatics and pseudo-philanthropists may continue to upbraid and denounce us until the sound of the Archangel's trumpet shall have put an end to their uncharitable and senseless ravings; yet, having faithfully and voostantly carried out the Master's part of the relations of Master and Slave, as laid down in the Book of God, (and thereby met the just expectations of Heaven) we are well assured that these "ignorant and proud railers"† can neither touch, molest, nor even approach us; for God being on our side—which He always will be when we faithfully do our duty—He will be more than all that can be against us. And we shall then be able also to exhibit ourselves before the world as having carried the gospel to every creature in our midst—a measure of labor and of duty which those who defame us are not likely to attain to speedily, even with the comparatively few persons of the same color, in their midst, where they have never had any let or hindrance to engage in such a work.

The sum of what has been said is this: you are a shareholder, and Heaven has ordained and now requires of you to furnish your servants with all the opportunities and privileges of the gospel. Will you do this? or will you refuse after this friendly visit of mine to neglect it and thereby run the risk of having soon to answer to that Tribunal for your disobedience? If it suits your views, means and convenience, to unite with others in the performance of this duty, well. If not, neglect not, I beseech you, to accomplish it by yourself. It has long been neglected already, and time waits for no man. Whichever arrangement, therefore, best enables you and your neighbors to meet your obligations to Heaven, by engaging in this vitally important enterprise, let one candidly and earnestly resolve you that you yourself, with them, must arrange and determine all about it, before you

A BLIND MAN'S BOOK.

BY A CRITIC IN SPECTACLES.

Third Paper.

Here's a new face. You are introduced to the Rev. Wilson Pitner, familiarly known as Wils. Pitner. Swarthy as an Indian, litho and strong. Knows border lore, and is well read in wood-craft. He has some parts for a pioneer, withal. Can pick a squirrel's eye with a rifle ball at a hundred yards, guide you across an untracked prairie, follow a bee with unerring precision from flower to the honied hive in the hollow tree, and snare muskrat or otter against any trapper you please. Innocent of books in a great measure, but well-taught of nature. With a powerful voice, a matchless zeal, a brilliant eye, and a vivid nature, you might hear Wils. Pitner pour forth, at times, such torrents of fiery eloquence that no human sensibilities could withstand his appeals. Let him "swing clear" on a "sugar-stick," and not even Chrishmas Evans, the great Welsh orator, could surpass him in the power of his wonderful pulpit efforts. Original in exegesis, he ventured to differ from Paul and Wesley on the point that faith cometh by hearing; for, said he, "I once knew a man who was so deaf that he could not hear it thunder, and he had more faith than anybody I ever saw. Now, did his faith come by hearing?" When coming out of a fit of depression, he declared that his soul felt as if it were running horseraces in the grand prairies of divinity. Such was Wils. Pitner!

But we forget that we were not to particularize. We dismiss, therefore, the vivid characterization of the most remarkable statesmen of the day, A. H. Stephens of Georgia, and S. A. Douglas, of Illinois, commending their portraits to their respective admirers. We pass over, also, some worthy clerics that are strikingly reproduced in the Autobiography. Upon one name we linger a moment, because of the important influence of the individual in moulding and shaping the character and life of Mr. Milburn. We refer to his appreciative sketch of Rev. A. A. Lipscomb, D.D., ere-while of Montgomery city. But before we reenr to the portraiture, let us premise a little.

Mr. Milburn's residence in Montgomery marked an era in his life, for it was during his two years sojourn there that he ran a narrow risk of being hopelessly engulphed in the Maelstrom of German Neology, beyond the reach of any regurgitant wave of common sense or of vital religion. Having abundant leisure, and an insatiable thirst for reading, he plunged at once into the Ocean of Transcendental Rationalism. The main point was the heroic apotheosis of the sublime Ego. In ephemeral literature, his divine philosophy found fit media in the New York Tribune, the National Era, Westminister Review, and in the incomprehensible utterances of Emerson, or the phrenzied deliverances of Wendell Phillips and Theodore Parker. His greater luminaries, however, were Zoroaster, Aristotle, Plato, Thomas Aquinas, Des Cartes, Leibnitz, Kant and Fichte. By an easy net of contemptuous expatriation he adopted Germany as his Fatherland, donned cap and gown, in badge of naturalization, thrust a fuming Meerschaum betwixt his teeth, and held forth with amazing profundity about the wonderful Goethe. Indeed, he wanted nothing but the cognizzlement of tankards of lager-bier to make him as brave a Teuton as was ever befuddled at Tubingen, or befogged at Halle. Neander's "Life of Christ," Strauss' "Life of Jesus," De Wettes "Theodore" and "Commentaries," together with Lessing, furnished him with nutritious philosophic pabulum for a considerable heat. Per consequence, he grew wondrous wise; tolerated Shakspeare, and a few other books which German critics had condescendingly noticed; thinned out in flesh, eschewing food, that the soul might be dominant; discoursed learnedly of the "me" and the "not me," in such sort as would have delighted Sir William Hamilton; hermeneutically discriminated between the authentic and the suppositions in the Scriptures; patronizingly admitted the merits of David, Job, and Isaiah, through inferior to the Iliad, the Sagas of Norsemen, or the Hindoo Vegas; took huge disgust at the common affairs of life; dwelt serenely, self-contemplative, amid the glories of "Cloud-land, gorgeous-land," and ended by being clothed upon with "Theological Methodology," in place of the simpler robe of Wesleyan Methodism. But chief did he dote upon Thomas Carlyle. He devoured the man's books, as the heathen God, in the old myths, ate up his own offspring. He grew acquainted with Herr Teufelsdroeckh, conned the formularies of the Everlasting Yea, the Centre of Indifference, and the Everlasting Nay, and "hated cant and Sir Jabez Windbag with due intensity."

Jocosely as all this is said, there is something terrible in the heroic struggle of a true and noble soul, reaching, grasping, clutching out through the darkness of body and of mind for the truth that alone can satisfy, and for the faith that alone can save. His feet were in slippery places. He was sliding into the damnable pit. A few tottering, groping steps forward towards the yawning abyss and he would have plunged helplessly sheer downward into the palpable obscure of heartless, soulless, Christless atheism. Mark what saved the man! Through the gathering darkness rose up the calm, still faces of the old homestead; above the turbulent roar of these furious billows quivered the echoing voices of the unforgotten long-ago. He had seen father and mother walking in the furnace of affliction, and there walked with them one as it had been the Son of Man; and they had come forth without the smell of fire upon their garments. To them, he knew that Jesus Christ had ever been a merciful and a faithful High Priest. In infancy and youth he had been "taught to look upon Him as a comforter full of grace, truth, and tenderness." The simple faith of childhood triumphed over the "statuesque idioms of thought chiselled by the pure intellect." O, ye mothers! will ye not the more diligently teach the childish hands to clasp your knees, and the childish tongues to lisp: "Our Father who art in Heaven!" In his early ministry Mr. Milburn had associated intimately with Chauncey Hobart, whom he calls "one of the noblest of men." Now Chauncey could shout till your blood tingled, "Glory to God for the hope of everlasting life!" His trust in God was invincible. He was a thorough Methodist; revered John Wesleys' memory; loved the institutions of the Church; preached the doctrines with fiery ardor and unquenchable zeal; looking only for the final plaudit: "well done, thou good and faithful servant." In the midst of the fierce strife of these later years, doubt not the voice of Chauncey Hobart often sounded through the depths of "this poor man's" troubled soul, calling him back to the path from which he had so miserably strayed. And so the light went on, the past arraying its ever blessed, soothing memories, the present marshalling its grim spectral cohorts of doubt, and fear, and downright scepticism. But in the very thick of the contest God sent, as it were, "an angel to succor him." Going, in a spirit of decent conventionalism to a sister Church on a funeral occasion, he sat a critic "intrenched in his indifference." Soon, however, "the critic was driven out of his strong position," "admiring wonder gave place to tears, and a heart suffused with the glow of religious emotion." He left the Church feeling that he had never "listened to so wonderful a preacher," no opinion which he has seen no occasion to change, even after hearing the most renowned orators of Europe and America. Recognizing a congenial spirit Mr. Milburn sought an introduction to the minister, whose sermon had so powerfully affected him, and, thenceforward, until he left Montgomery, a portion of almost every day was spent in his society. "Such was the commencement," says he, "of my acquaintance with Andrew A. Lipscomb, whose influence ever me, together with that of Chauncey Hobart and Thomas Carlyle, forms the most significant and important chapter of my mental history during these ten years."

We would gladly copy his tribute to Dr. Lipscomb, if our space allowed. For ourselves, knowing as we do the sweet charities of the man, having learned at his feet how "like apples of gold in pictures of silver" are words fitly spoken, we accredit to the utmost his salutary influence in correcting Mr. Milburn's morbid intellectual and spiritual developments. Having himself breasted the waves of that bitterness, fog-encircled sea of German mysticism, and having planted his feet securely on the hither shore, upon the rock that is higher than we, the good Doctor was a guide that knew the cloudy pathway, and a helmsman that had held firmly to the rudder in many a tempestuous sea. What with the hallowed memories of his mother's knee, the remembered faith of Chauncey Hobart, and the cheery voice of his present helper, our storm-driven mariner came safe to harbor, a wiser, may be, a sadder man.

We had laid out to say something of Mr. Milburn's recollections of his six years sojourn in our midst; of his just appreciation of Southern character; of his hearty liking for Southern society; of his uncommon insight into the peculiarities of our slave population, and his excellent temper in speaking of the institution, the bare mention of which sends the pupils of Horace Greely's eyes careering upwards in a spasmodic twitch of saintly indignation. Although a Northern man, Mr. Milburn puts on none of the sour godliness of their Praise-God-Bare-Bones school of Methodist ranters. He sees clearly that the only true friend of Caffee is the Southern planter; the only true spiritual guide of the black man is the self-sacrificing missionary, carrying the message of life to the hut of the slave amid sickly rice-fields, malarious swamps, and wherever else a negro toils in furrow, brake, or forest. In this noble work he assigns, rightly, the front rank to Methodist preachers, enrolling in the number of such faithful evangelists, the names of venerable Bishops, reverend Editors, and grave Elders. Our author fell to loving the negroes for their "generous, gentle, docile characters," and with real unction treats us to several capital anecdotes of his colored friends, the which we read betwixt our laughter and our tears. Apropos of his notes on Southern society, two of his female friends, whose names he modestly withholds, furnish two of the most beautiful, quiet, home-like portraitures of refined, cultivated womanly character that it has ever been our good fortune to read. Our only quarrel with the author is that we are not permitted to treasure up in memory the names of the happy originals.

And so we lay away the Autobiography as we took it up, lovingly. We have left behind much that we would gladly have taken into the account—much of eloquence, much of poetry, much of pathos. But how otherwise, unless we reprint the book, which is too monstrous to be thought of in so meagre an article as ours.

It is a Methodist book: there is one of its chief excellences. It breathes throughout the Wesleyan spirit, the the old itinerant fire. There is record of suffering borne unmurmuringly, of privations accepted gladly, of kindness endured in a temper of good soldiership, of fights fought manfully, of victories won gloriously. It vindicates the Methodist policy of taking hold upon mere boys, with its hand of iron in the glove of velvet; of asking nothing but "hath the Lord called thee?" of thrusting them forth with Bible and Hymn-Book, to stammer it may be a disjointed exhortation, to offer a trembling petition in the congregation, to wrestle for the salvation of sinners upon the straw-covered ground of a Camp-meeting altar. It fitly comments upon the favorite saying, "though the workmen die the work goes on," for while it tells us of the heroes of early Methodism gone to rest long ago, it points us to the brightening galaxy of names in the Methodist horizon, such names in our Southern sky as those of Paine, Andrew, Pierce, Wightman, Summers, Myers, McTyeire, Neely, Hamilton, and a host of others. The work will do a service to the church by bringing persons in certain quarters acquainted with Methodism, who while they may not, like Sydney Smith, apply to Methodists the contemptuous epithet of "vermin," still feel privileged to consign our church, with all its appliances, intellectual and spiritual, to the limbo of "decent debility." When such men find genius, chastened by affliction, and purified by religion, devoting its energies to the loving exposition of Methodist principles, and the effective vindication of the Methodist economy, and that too in a form so attractive to the most cultivated intellect, it can scarcely fail to bring them to a healthier state of thought and feeling towards the once "despised sect."

Lastly, it is a manly book. Though penned by the fingers of his kind young friends; though it contains chapters from a life of deepest suffering, insomuch that the author might with truthfulness write "De profundis clamavi;" though a record of months and sometimes years of imprisonment from God's glad sunshine; though it recount how every part of his person, almost, bears sad witness to his infirmity, in some cut or bruise, or scar—though all this be true, there is not a line of murmuring in it, not a single line of whining complaint, not a single appeal to maudlin sentimentality, not a single stage-trick to elicit sympathy. It is the book, contrariwise, of the cheerful, hopeful, helpful spirit of a man who stands as erect in our presence as though the angel of sorrow had not laid upon his eyelids the shadow of his wings.

LETTER FROM BALTIMORE.

OCTOBER, 8th, 1859.

Many of our Churches are being favored with refreshing showers of Divine grace. In Hanover street Church, upwards of thirty have professed pardon. At Mount Vernon station, fifty have recently united with the church. Franklin street Church, Eutaw, Caroline, Hartford Avenue, High street, Columbia street, and other churches, are sharing largely in accessions to the church.

The recent session of the Local Preachers' Convention, held in this city, was a very harmonious one.—About a hundred local preachers were present, from different parts of the country. Many of our stationed ministers mingled with their local brethren in the convention. Rev. Henry Slicer presented some friendly and congratulatory resolutions passed at the Preachers' Meeting of this city. Local preachers were invited to occupy the pulpits of our stationed preachers on the Sabbath. The religious exercises of the Sabbath, in the Charles Street Church, were of the most interesting character. The Experience Meeting at 9 o'clock, was a happy one. Many of the local preachers testified of the saving power of Christ, in the pardon of their sins, and in the entire renovation and sanctification of their souls. The sermon by Bro. Tasker, of Philadelphia, was a good, sound, practical one. The exercises of the afternoon and evening consisted of short addresses, by the local brethren from different parts of the country. Rev. Dr. Sargeant conducted the services of the experience meeting in the morning, and holy communion in the afternoon.

The Convention occupied Monday in business matters. The adoption of a constitution looking to the organization of District and Conference Associations, also a National Association, to meet annually. Presiding Elders were respectfully requested to solicit the formation of District Associations, of local preachers, for spiritual and theological improvement, and for the expediency of electing delegates to the National Association. A committee of five was appointed to prepare an address to the General Conference. The same committee were elected as a deputation to the General Conferences of the M. E. Churches, (North and South.)—Committee.—Revs. J. P. Cook, Baltimore; C. D. Leigh, New York city; T. T. Tasker, Philadelphia; —— Riddle, Delaware; —— Gatchell, New Jersey. It was resolved to hold the next annual Association in Philadelphia, in October, 1860. It was also resolved to celebrate the Introduction of Methodism in America, next year—the Centenary of Methodism. The following were elected officers for the ensuing year: President, Rev. T. T. Tasker, Philadelphia; Vice Presidents, C. C. Leigh, N. Y.; J. L. Graham, Pittsburg; Dr. Roberts, Baltimore; J. W. Hancock, N. J.; Recording Secretary, W. H. Kincaid, Pittsburg; Corresponding Secretary, Dr. W. R. Munroe, Balt. Treasurer, J. P. Cook, Balt.

Rev. Chauncey Shaffer, a lawyer, from New York preached two powerful sermons in the Eaton Street Church, on Monday and Tuesday evening. He spoke with great effect in love feast, on Sunday morning.—Among other things, remarked that he had visited New Orleans and other parts of the South, on business, and had everywhere found the same warm-hearted Methodists, full of holy fire, and expressed his belief that Methodism, in this country, will ere long be united in one common brotherhood.

Rev. Dr. Buckus' new, fine Presbyterian Church, on Madison street, was dedicated on Sabbath last. Rev. Dr. Potts, of New York, officiated in the afternoon and evening. This new edifice is a most splendid and costly piece of architecture. It is estimated that the entire cost, when fully completed, will be two hundred thousand dollars.

M.

PREACHERS AND THE TEMPERANCE CAUSE.

A prevalent practice among certain orators of moral reforms and paragraphists of the popular press, of very questionable propriety, merits the attention of the thoughtful hearer and reader. Let any one of these valiant reformers begin an attack on any popular vice, and immediately forgetting his legitimate theme, he rushes pell-mell upon some supposed apathetic class of community, and at once all his vials of wrath are emptied with self-righteous indignation. In these attacks the members of the Church and the Ministry, especially the latter, are represented as chief delinquents. Illustrations of this are so numerous that every reader can recall them. Indeed, it is difficult to take up a printed speech on any reform movement, whether reported or prepared for the occasion, in which they do not occur.

An example is just at hand, and it affords opportunity to refer to the subject to show its injustice. It is a speech on the subject of temperance of eight pages, two of which are taken up in depicting the fearful evils of intemperance, and the remainder is a severe rebuke of the Church and the Ministry for their apathy. Speaking of the desirable results which would follow a prevalence of temperance, and of the causes which retard it, the orator names, as of "first importance and magnitude the apathy and carelessness of the Church of God and the Ministry," and after making an exception of some of the latter, whose "burning eloquence and best talents are ever ready to plead the cause of temperance," he declares that "the great body of the Church of God is not with us in our efforts." Their apathy is attributable, it is said, in some, to the love of the morning, noonday and evening potations; in others to profits resulting from its sale.

After this severe censure of the Church, he comes to the Ministry. "Surely," he exclaims, "they are with us. Alas! alas! for poor, weak human nature. Many drink themselves, others are kept from the advocacy of the cause by fear; others still because they think the cause beneath them." Now we most heartily object to these sweeping denunciations, one and all. They are unjust—they are mischievous—they are cowardly. They are uttered against a class of men, who, while their prominence makes them special marks, their character and position give them no opportunity to reply.

They are unjust. As a class, ministers of the gospel are unsurpassed for self-denial and temperance. As a class, they are, almost without exception, the advocates of temperance, and there is hardly a pulpit in the land in which the vice of drunkenness is not from time to time denounced, and its adjuncts and evils portrayed. Whenever opportunity serves, ministers of the gospel are in the front ranks in all efforts to promote the cause.

These attacks are mischievous. They are calculated to deprive the ministry of much of their strength. Public confidence to a certain extent is destroyed in them by such means as these, until it is almost a signal for defeat whenever they appear prominent in any special work of moral reform. Much that they do is done quietly and unobtrusively, because of the prejudices that have too often been fanned by these senseless declaimers against men whose excellencies they neither appreciate nor approach.

These attacks are cowardly. Many a spurging temperance speaker, who would quail before a searching and truthful response from one of the class he denounces, vituperates his second-hand denunciations for the want of something better, whenever he mounts the rostrum. We have on one or two occasions felt under the necessity of volunteering a word or two in defense of the cloth, and we have uniformly found a considerable lowering of canvass on the part of these fast sailors, and a striking of colors by no means creditable to the courage of the boasting voyagers.

The truth is, the temperance cause is more indebted to the Ministry of the land than to any other class. No decided advancement has been made which has not originated with them, with, perhaps, the exception of the Maine law scheme in New England. The ablest temperance tracts have been written by the Ministry; the most laborious statistics have been gathered by the Ministry; the first blows at the monster thirty-five years ago were struck by the Ministry. If the cause has languished, it is because it has too often been taken out of the hands of the Church by men intoxicated by the novelty of a position in which, with a very small mental capital, they could make a considerable show of indignant oratory. It is time the stupid nonsense should be abandoned. It ruined the Washingtonian movement—it has driven many a preacher from sympathy with the Sons of Temperance—and it is this day doing more harm than a thousand such temperance addresses as that now before us will ever do good.—Methodist Protestant.

MR. SPURGEON'S FATHER.

At the laying of the foundation-stone of Mr. Spurgeon's new Tabernacle, his father, the Rev. John Spurgeon, said among other good things:

"I always thought my son did wrong in coming to London; now you see that I was wrong. I always thought he was wrong in not going to college; I tried three or four hours with him one night with a dear friend that loved him, but it was no use. He said, 'No, I will never go to college, only to strict obedience to you as a father.' There I left the matter; and I see that God has been with him, though I thought it was a wrong step in him to go to London. * * I believe, under God's grace, his mother has been the means of leading him to Christ. You are well aware that I go and talk in the best manner I can to a few poor people on the Sabbath day, and God has blessed my labors. I thought, however, I ought not to go out on the Sabbath day, as God's people should train up their children in the best way they can. I thought I was neglecting my children, and as I came home one evening about seven o'clock, and went up stairs, I heard the voice of a mother pleading for her boy Charles, and talking to him and others, and pouring her heart out in prayer in such a way as I never did in my life, and as I never heard before. It is for the encouragement of mothers that I mention this, that you may pray for your children, for God is a prayer-hearing God. My heart is too full to say more. May God bless you and keep you, and may we be brought together when this building shall be finished and entirely out of debt.

FRANKLIN'S OPINION OF WHITEFIELD'S PREACHING.

The old Court-house of Philadelphia, then standing on Second and Market streets, had a balcony, which several years before the visit of Whitefield had been often used instead of a pulpit. In 1736 we find that Mr. Able Noble had preached "from the Court-house steps," on a Monday, to a large congregation standing in Market street, on keeping the Sabbath. In the same year Michael Welfare appeared there to give his "warning voice," and now, in 1736, it became one of the favorite preaching stands of the great Evangelist, Whitefield. Here he stood, surrounded by many thousands, even down to the side of the Delaware river, not a few bathed in tears, and inquiring after the way of salvation. Dr. Franklin said of Whitefield's preaching: "The multitudes of all sects and denominations that attended his sermons were enormous; and it was a matter of speculation with me to observe the influence of his oratory on his hearers, and how much they admired and respected him, notwithstanding his common abuse of them, by assuring them that they were naturally half beasts and half devils. It was wonderful to see the change soon made in the manners of our inhabitants. From being thoughtless and indifferent about religion, it seemed as if all the world was growing religious; so that one could not walk through the town in an evening without hearing psalms sung in different families in every street."

But not only does Franklin bear witness of Whitefield's eloquence as to his voice, but still more strongly to its persuasiveness. The following is his own account of an incident often alluded to. He says: "I refused to contribute to his orphan house in Georgia, thinking it injudiciously located. Soon after, I happened to attend one of his sermons, in the course of which I perceived he intended to finish with a collection, and I silently resolved he should get nothing from me. I had in my pocket a handful of copper money, three or four silver dollars, and five pistoles in gold. As he proceeded, I began to soften, and determined to give the copper. Another stroke of his oratory made me ashamed of that, and determined me to give the silver; and he finished so admirably, that I emptied my pocket wholly into the collector's dish, gold and all. At this sermon there was also one of our club, who, being of my sentiments respecting the building at Georgia, and suspecting a collection might be intended, had, by precaution, emptied his pockets before he came from home. Towards the conclusion of the discourse, however, he felt a strong inclination to give, and applied to a neighbour who stood near him to lend him some money for the purpose. The request was made to, perhaps, the only man in the company who had the firmness not to be affected by the preacher. His answer was, 'At any other time, friend Hodgkinson, I would lend thee freely; but not now, for thee seems to be out of thy right senses.'"

Both at Philadelphia and New York printers applied to Whitefield for copies of his sermons for publication, two were so issued, in the influence of which their author had cause to rejoice. In an after period, Benjamin Franklin printed "Whitefield's Journal in New England," still extant, a copy of which was sold at auction in Philadelphia, in 1855, for about thirty times its original price.

Watson, in his "Annals of Philadelphia," speaking of Whitefield's first visit to that city, tells us that he preached to a crowd of fifteen thousand persons on Society Hill (Second and Pine streets.) No less than fourteen sermons were preached on Society Hill in the open air in one week, during the session of the Presbyterian Church.

Mr. Whitefield died at Newburyport, Massachusetts, September 30, 1770, in the fifty-sixth year of his age. A monument is erected to his memory in the Church beneath which his remains are interred. [Belcher's Life of Whitefield.

HALLELUJAH.

We have at times been struck with the irreverent use of this word, as if it merely passed for an expression of joy or triumph. It is the most solemn form of praise in the Hebrew Psalms, or that was in use among that almost superstitiously reverent people. It is well for Christians to consider it. It is a compound word, made of halleloo, praise ye, and Yah or Jah, which is an abbreviation of Jehovah, the most awful name of the Supreme Being. Jah, or Jehovah is derived from hayah, the verb. to be, the verb of existence, and when God says, Ex. 3; 14, "I AM that I AM," he assumes the same descriptive title as in Rev. 1; 4, 8, "He which is, and which was, and which is TO COME;" i. e., the IMMUTABLE and ETERNAL ONE. The later Hebrews so reverenced this name that they never spoke it or wrote it, lest they should "take it in vain," as forbidden Ex. 20: 7, but wrote Adonai instead. The Lord said to Moses, Ex. 6: 2, 2, "I am JEHOVAH, I appeared unto Abraham, unto Isaac and unto Jacob, by the name of God Almighty, but by my name JEHOVAH was I not known to them." Other names of Deity are expressive of some attribute or office, and are sometimes applied to other beings, but this is expressive of the self-existent, incommunicable nature of God, and is never applied to any creature. We say, there is a special solemnity in this name, and let it not be thoughtlessly uttered, even by pious people, in their expressions of praise. Never say hallelujah, where you would not say praise ye Jehovah.

THE BENEVOLENCE OF NEANDER.

Neander's love of his fellow-men, and especially of good men, was ever active and self-sacrificing. His charities were unbounded. He allowed his sister to manage his domestic affairs, according to her pleasure; but in regard to his charities he was most decided. He would allow none to interfere here; and of the amount of his givings, he would never render any account.—Vast multitudes were benefitted by him, the particulars of which will never be known. One example may be given as a specimen. During the illness of a student, which proved to be fatal, he was unable to obtain all that was necessary in this condition. A friend went to Neander and informed him of his state. As he was entering into details, Neander suddenly interrupted him, and inquired how much was needed. The friend named the sum. Neander wrung his hands in agony; he had no money at his command. He paced the room, glancing eagerly at his books. At length he stopped before a large volume, splendidly bound, one of the most valuable books in his library; and the more precious, as but few had been printed and distributed by the author among his friends. He seized the book, put it into the hands of the student, and said, "I have no money, but take this and try to sell it. Do it secretly, I beg, nobody must know it."

A PRAYER-MEETING THIRTY MILES LONG.

A few days since some Christians of Philadelphia were returning home by the Pennsylvania Railroad, from a village in the interior. While talking among themselves of the things of the kingdom, they found that nearly all the other persons in the car, both ladies and gentlemen, were interested in the subject. It was proposed, therefore, to hold a prayer-meeting. No one in the car objected. Several passengers from other cars in the train, hearing what was to be done, came to listen and take part. They began by singing the stirring hymn, "Blow ye the trumpet, blow," to which the passengers all joined with great animation. The exercises were like in character to those in the Noon Prayer Meeting—prayer, reading, singing and exhortation. A most excellent spirit prevailed, and all seemed to feel that the time was spent in a manner as profitable as it was novel. All the time they were thus engaged in these acts of solemn worship, the tireless engine was hurrying them along over the iron track at the rate of thirty miles an hour!

TESTIMONIAL TO DR. CLARKE.

The Colerain Chronicle, Ireland, of Sep. 3, has a description of the ceremonies attendant on the inauguration of the monument at Portrush; also with laying the foundation-stone of a memorial church at Portstewart. The services consisted of a prayer-meeting and several addresses. A model statue, from which a bronze one is to be cast, was exhibited, and pronounced by all an excellent likeness. The Rev. Mr. Cather announced that the whole cost of the monument and the memorial church would be £2,250, and they had received £1,750, so that they wanted £500 more, which he knew they would get before the church would be finished. The Rev. Mr. Parker preached a sermon from the words—"Simon, Simon, Satan hath desired to have thee," etc, "from which he delivered an able sermon, which had previously been printed and published amongst his sermons."

How truly did Shakspeare say, "I am never merry when I hear sweet music." How often has a golden sunset or a silver night brought sadness to the soul—a sadness without pain; or the lapse of some free river, or the strains of some sweet tune filled eyes with tears that had no thought of sorrow.

In matters of conscience the first thoughts are best; in matters of prudence the last.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Terms—$2 00 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1859.

NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

The volumes of the Advocate will hereafter begin and end with the year; and it is very desirable that subscriptions should conform to the same rule.

Therefore, new subscribers, who do not begin with the year, will please send, not two dollars, but an amount sufficient to pay for the paper till the end of the year, at the rate of Four Cents a Week.

Thus, every subscriber will know, without being informed, that at the beginning of the year is the time to remit the subscription money.

Many accounts having been sent out before this arrangement was made, we shall not be able, until next year, to make the accounts of old subscribers conform to this rule.

Our Agents will please notice, and help us in this desirable arrangement. It is an approximation to the cash system, without its objections, and will obviate confusion in accounts.

PRAISE CULTURE.

There is a charm in the very idea of a hymn. The very word is melodiously spiritual. Religion is the highest life of the human soul, and praise is religion in bloom. Poetry and music are the finest of the fine arts, and their highest use is praise. Religion, to be mature, should reach the ripeness of praise; and the bloom of praise, to attain its highest beauty and fragrance, should have the highest service that poetry and music can render. Religion without praise is like a forest doomed to eternal winter—never permitted to bud and to blossom. It is a censer empty of sweet incense. And poetry and music without the spirit of divine praise, is like cold statuary—beautiful but lifeless. And praise without the charms of poetry and music, is like a beautiful spring-bird with the voice of a raven. Why should theology be studied altogether in prose? Why not set religion to music, as David did? Sacred song is "the gospel according to" the angels. The first Christian sermon was an angel's song. Why not have professorships of musical theology? Why is it that sermons should have the highest service of intellect and culture, and not "psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs?" Why is it that the delivery of sermons should require elocutionary study and practice, and yet the truthful and forceful rendering of grand old hymns in the great congregation be matter of little thought and culture? Why should Moses, and David, and Asaph, and Isaiah, as to their hymnic compositions, be enrolled among God's inspired classic artists, and yet the names of the melodious poets of Christendom, whose spirit-harps have intoned the praises of God at the breathing touches of the Holy Ghost, have scarce a place among the classics of the church? Very few hymn-writers have any fame, as such. Why should thousands upon thousands be annually spent upon the musical culture of the sweet-voiced daughters of the church, in Christian schools, so-called, and yet no increased revenue of divine praise be realized from the investment? It were far better to devote it to training the negroes to sing the hymns of Jesus, for then the investment would yield the Lord "his own with usury."

All high and true feeling seeks musical utterance; and even when not uttered, "there is music in the soul."—Christ sang a hymn in the interval between the Last Supper and the Agony in the Garden of Gethsemane. There is more true philosophy in the singing tones of Primitive Baptist preachers, in the pathetic passages of their sermons, than is credited. The unlettered African, when filled with feelings beyond the capabilities of his scant vocabulary, and akin to realms of which his simple lore has never taught him, pours forth his soul in song, with an instinctive faith in unseen audience and unearthly sympathies. The joyous enthusiasm of religious singing, it is not hard to believe, is the unworldly mirthfulness occasioned by happy communion between the souls of men and angels and "ministering spirits." Sacred singing is the most spiritual exercise of the soul. Sorrows and joys too deep for the prose of conversation, and above the sympathies of human communion, find a voice in song by which to speak "unutterable things" to the heavens. The instinct of song is a trait of immortality, and an aspiration towards its beatitudes.

Hymns constitute the "polite literature" of the heart—of the inner life. The intellect and the taste may revel in the sciences, the philosophies, the esthetics, the economics, the moralities of all books; but the homely human feelings native to the heart—the realities of experience, of joy and sorrow, hope and fear,—that freeze the spirit, or crown it with the glorious joys of a transfiguration,—these find their communion and utterance in song. Evil passions flee, and good affections visit the soul under the influence of sacred song. Saul was soothed of the evil spirit by the music of David. People cannot sing together and hate each other.

The sweetest memories of every sensitive and pious heart are musical memories (sweet memories are always musical in spirit), mellowed by the lapse of years, softened and deepened in tone by their passage through the valley of past sorrows, and yet instinct with an unworldly cheerfulness from the ripe sunshine of the aanumbered mercies and joys that have illumined the pilgrimage of life. The songs of the old and well-remembered mother, with which she lulled her babies to sleep—the songs of family worship in our early days,—or the rustic tunes upon which the praise of God was borne to Heaven from the log-chapel or the grand and glorious temple of the green-wood trees.

Hymns have been the best creeds to preserve "sound doctrine" amid heterodoxy, superstition and corruption. Romanism, in the dark ages, refused the common people the privilege of singing the praises of God; and the ancient Britons were not allowed by their tyrant ruler to sing their native songs; high testimony, in both cases, to the conservative power of song. One has said, "Let me make the songs of a people, and you may make their laws." Romanism hid the songs from the common people in Latin, and scientific composition, but when the Reformation dawned upon England, Edward VI. had "all the congregation" to sing, "men, women and boys singing together." Calvin and Luther devoted themselves to sacred music. Congregational singing broke out with the Reformation, like the singing of birds at sunrise; and all great revivals of religion have had the same accompaniment. Edwards and Whitefield patronized sacred music, and the Wesleys have filled the world with their glorious hymns. Thomas Von Celano is said to be the author of "Dies Iræ," and the great Charlemagne of the "Veni Creator," though others attribute it to Ambrose, Bishop of Milan. William the Conqueror died at sunrise, while the priests, in full choir, were singing in the Cathedral,

"Now that the sun is gleaming bright," etc.

And much excellent knowledge of the authorship, and history, and influence of hymns, is it not contained in the book suggesting this paper?

* Historical Sketches of Hymns, their Writers and their Influence. By Joseph Belcher, D. D. Lindsay and Blakiston, Philadelphia.

† We are glad to see that in our revised and enlarged "Course of Study" for undergraduates in our Annual Conferences, the Hymn-Book has a place in each year.—ED. A.D.

THE CHAMPIONS.—Dr. Stevens of the Christian Advocate and Journal, and Dr. Whedon of the Quarterly Review, of the Northern Methodist Church, are before the public, each in a pamphlet, designed to affect their General Conference next May, at Buffalo, New York—the first representing the stand-still, discipline-as-it-is, anti-slavery party—the other representing the ultra, slave-holder-exclusion-from-the-church, party. God forever defend our church from any such crusades and championships! The conservatives will win in this case, however, so far as we can see; and the fanatics will still have to endure a slave-holding church, or secede, which they have not the pluck to do.

"WE ALL DO FADE AS A LEAF."

OCTOBER has come and is going—is even now more than half gone. The sweet green of the infant grass-shoots of the early spring-time, as they peered above ground after the long sleep of winter, seeming to greet every passer-by with, "Here we are again!" was a joy then, and is a joy still, in memory; for "a thing of beauty is a joy forever," whether it live or die. The violets and plum-blossoms, and other avant-courriers of the regal May, as they breathed from their tiny lips somewhat of their delicate perfume upon the still icy breath of lingering winter, touching the olfactories like stray breezes of Araby amid Siberian wilds, affording strangely inspiring analogic prophecies of a wonderful world of joy not far from this mixed world, have had their day, and are now treasures laid up above. The glow and glory of gorgeous Southern summer-time have passed; Summer, serene in her splendor, mild and majestic in her magnificence, returned at her time, and reigned for her season, and has retired according to the covenant of God. Stepping off her temporary throne, she begins to lay aside her royal robe of green. The leaves begin to fade and fall. Russet-brown, mixed with green, in the crown of every tree, like gray hairs in a head of raven hue, betoken the grave change. The season is sober from age. The sweet air of spring, and the frolicksome breezes of summer, have given place to the cloud-nursed, damp-cool, low-moaning winds of autumn. They do not cool the brow, nor set the green leaves a-dancing, nor awake the enthusiasm of the song-birds, nor open the windows of the fragrant chambers of the sleeping flowers: they dry the skin, and shake down the sad and decaying leaves from the mourning tree, and heap them up in pitiful piles in road-sides, and fence-corners, and street-sides, and gradually dishonor them by driving over them the dull and remorseless sand.

And—"we all do fade as a leaf!" What more need be said? The lesson is complete. The text read, the sermon is ended. Amplication is unnecessary, well-nigh impossible. The divine artist said thus much, ceased, and left the speaking picture complete. Infancy unfolds into youth; youth springs into manhood and womanhood; they solver into age; and age fades, declines into the grave. The grave! It is cold, it is cheerless, it is sad, it is fearful. It shuts a door behind upon all that is beautiful—that is dear—that is sacred—that is of worth—upon all that is treasured in this life.

But spring will come again when the winter is gone and the resurrection morn will dawn upon the long night of the grave. No spring-time shall equal its beauty, no summer shall rival its glory, no autumn shall compare with its wealth. The light of the countenance of "the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world"—the light of the eye, of the mind, of the heart, of the imagination—shall pale the happy day-light, and the glory-flood of sunshine, and the rays of the moon and stars. Birds and bird-songs will be needless, for winged souls, millions of angel-infants, and holy and happy spirits who have "washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb," with heavenly voices, and the harps of God, shall awake the choral echoes of the universe with the world-thrilling tones of their wonderful music. No need of spring-time; for that shall be the day of "the restitution of all things." "Behold I make all things new," will then be an accomplished prophecy. Every enchanting vision of good and beauty indulged in the dream-prophecies and minor inspirations of this life, will be more than realized by million-fold; and every evil and grief will be more than recompensed by the same ratio. Let us be content, nor repine at increasing years, and fading youth, and the coming of grey hairs, and the approach of the time of our departure. "Death is the gate to enclose joy."

Forever with the Lord!
Amen! So let it be.
Life from the dead is in that word—
'Tis immortality.
Here in the body pent,
Absent from him I roam,
Yet nightly pitch my moving tent
A day's march nearer home.

My Father's house on high—
Home of my soul—how near,
At times, to faith's aspiring eye,
Thy golden gates appear!
Ah! then my spirit faints
To reach the land I love—
The bright inheritance of saints—
Jerusalem above!

MINISTERIAL PUBLIC READINGS.

Preachers should study, with great and prayerful diligence, to read well—so as to bring out the highest beauty and power of the hymns and lessons (and liturgy, when used) in public service. That anecdote about Booth, the tragedian, repeating the Lord's prayer with such wonderful power and pathos, fully illustrates what is meant in these remarks. The Episcopal liturgy, unequalled in the world by anything else of the kind, bating some things to be credited to less evangelical times, and of which the Methodist liturgy is an abridgement, while admired by literary men and divines, is distasteful to the masses of the people, from the formality and heartlessness with which it is too generally rendered in public service. And the same things may be said of most liturgies, the Scripture lessons and hymns of most religious services. We say nothing about rules, and elocutionary education. These are to be applied according to good sense, and the circumstances of each case. To have the meaning, and sentiment in the mind, and to have the heart in sympathy with the beautifully solemn and inspiring realities poetically pictured forth in the hymn—or divinely taught in the lesson—in short, to be intelligently in earnest—to read "with the spirit and with the understanding also"—these are the things of most importance. Artificialness is worse than negligence; earnestness lies above both. Hymns and lessons should be studied like sermons.

LAKE PROVIDENCE.

THE Lake Providence (La.) Herald is full of wrath against a correspondent of this paper, who writes over the name of "ANNOTATOR." Not having paid scrutinizing attention to the articles in question, we had not dreamed that the seeds of such a tempest lay hidden in what we had supposed a mere humorous "take off" of some of those vices and follies which are to be found in every village in the country. The editor of the Herald denounces and bitterly abuses "ANNOTATOR," who, whatever the editor may think of the propriety of his literary labors, is a gentleman—we vouch for that; while "ANNOTATOR, as we take it, had said nothing against the village proper, but simply described those things which all good citizens oppose. The same thing is done for New Orleans, by New Orleans papers, almost every day, and nobody thinks of "getting in a passion" about it. Why should good citizens go so far in their local loyalty as to fight for everything, good and bad, in their vicinity? Patriotism ceases to be a virtue in such cases. It is a burden we shall never assume, most certainly.

In addition to the editor's dashes at "ANNOTATOR," he allows one of his correspondents to attack this paper in a style too strong—much too strong—for the good of his cause. But it is not a serious matter with us. We shall not fret to our hurt, even if worse things be said. We do not seek to vindicate "ANNOTATOR." We know nothing of the merits of the case. Certainly, however, we had not seen that in publishing his articles we had given cause for such vindictiveness against ourselves. There may be local and personal causes for the bitterness manifested of which we know nothing. All parties, we take it, are friends of "our town," (we are, we know,) but occupy different "stand-points," as the transcendental philosophers say. Our advice to all concerned is, to quit their newspaper war, and be friends.

FUNERAL SERMONS AND OBITUARIES.

Rev. William J. Parks, well known as a "representative" man of the Elder School of Georgia Methodist preachers, writes some seriously sensible things to the Southern Christian Advocate about obituaries and funeral sermons. We would publish it, but for two reasons: first, all sensible men are agreed upon the propriety which should govern these things, but very few have the firmness to practice them—each, from some cause, being led into the delusion that the "subject" of his "notice," in funeral or obituary, is "a special case;" second, men who are not sensible seem to be incorrigible, after you make preachers of them. Dr. Parks thinks, however, that funeral sermons and obituaries, beyond mere notice of death, in religious newspapers, in the case of persons whose lives were not godly and of good example, decidedly objectionable. "Social qualities," "religious opinions," etc., as the staple out of which ministers of the gospel are expected to manufacture soothing and flattering funeral sermons, or obituaries for a religious newspaper, are justly objectionable with him. The public is misled, and religion scandalized. He says he once preached a funeral of a lady, all the knowledge he had of whom was received from her affectionate father, and found afterwards that he had, in the sermon, described an unreal character. After the funeral sermon of a departed son, the father wished to beat him, because he had said so little for his son, though he had said nothing against him. The lamented Rev. Harris Taylor, a local preacher of Talladega county, Ala.—one of the best men, and greatest natural pulpit orators we ever knew—being called on to preach the funeral sermon of a young man who had been thrown from his horse and killed in a drunken frolic, took for his text the following: "And in hell he lifted up his eyes, being in torment." He did not apply his remarks to the case, but preached a good sermon upon the text, merely saying, in the beginning, that the service of the occasion was the funeral of the deceased.

"THE SUMMER IS ENDED."

It has passed as a dream passes, and, with two many, has been as fruitless as a dream. City people, and many country people, of means and leisure, have been away to the watering-places—a very few for health—the majority for pleasure, we were about to say, but we pause to ask, for what? To escape from a most burdensomely unsatisfactory self, in most cases. But the same self has come back, more under par than ever. Money spent foolishly, the sweet stream of healthful life muddied by dissipation—in short, the folly and sin inseparably connected with what is called fashionable life—may not humble pride, but it assuredly lowers the tone of character and self-respect. The poor, from necessity, have stayed at home, and sought their joys by the humble hearth-stone. The servants have done the same. And many of the wiser of all classes have done likewise. Most ministers of the gospel have stayed by their flocks, at least those of them who did not go. A few of those things called "fashionable preachers" "followed the multitude." The "cent-get-nowhys" have had a delightful time. Home-life has not been turned out of its heaven-made channel to turn the machinery of fashionable folly. The cities have been healthy, and the country too. The breezes of the season have been balmy. Affairs have not been neglected. Autumn does not find them artificial blase fools. Many of them have been at camp-meetings, and in the midst of revivals. Souls have found the faith of Christ. The cause of God has prospered.—Yes, the summer of 1859 is ended. Another summer gone!

SHALL OUR MISSIONARY COLLECTIONS DECLINE?

We have some fears, from the Conference Reports already to hand, and from other information, that our Missionary Collections for the year are going to fall off. Shall this be so? In this great and rich country, with so much wealth in the Methodist Church; with a most prosperous agricultural season; with gracious revivals in every direction; with cheering indications of progress in every other department of the Church—a prosperous Publishing house, and Depositories, and periodicals and papers, and schools and colleges—shall this missionary department of a great missionary Church be allowed to languish? Let the prayers and labors of the ministers and people of God forbid it! Let none feel exempt from the responsibility. Every presiding elder and stationed preacher, and missionary to whites or blacks, and class-leader and steward, and Sunday school superintendent and trustee, and male and female member, is directly responsible to God, to the world, to the history of the Church, in this matter. Give, and get others to give. Let good reports come up to Conference from every charge. "The field is the world." "The world is our parish." Christ died for the world. The heathen world is opening her doors. Let us enter.

LIVING NEAR TO GOD.

One day a little girl, about five years old, heard a preacher of a certain denomination praying most lustily, till the roof rang with the strength of his supplications. Turning to her mother, and beckoning the maternal ear down to a speaking distance, she whispered:—

"Mother, don't you think that if he lived nearer God he would'n't have to talk so loud?"

Such a question is worth a volume on "Elocution in prayer."

While there is truth in the above "hit," which we find in the "sensation" papers, there is error—dangerous error. Earnestness is the life of prayer, and we must have it, whether loud or low in voice. Earnestness, in different men, breaks out like waters in different streams—with thundering power in some cases, with low-murmuring tones in others. One man's voice, naturally, at the highest pitch of earnestness, is mild and musical; and another's, in medium earnestness, makes the house tremble. Let piety first regulate the earnestness, and nature and good sense afterwards take care of the voice. A boisterous prayer, in the absence of earnestness, and as a cloak to cover it, is horrible. The little girl's premise, "living nearer to God," is sound, whatever may become of her conclusion.

INCREASE OF CHRISTIAN WEALTH.

Conversing, a few days since, with a distinguished member of the Mississippi bar, who is also a devoted and active member of the Church—a regular and punctual class-reader—he remarked that the present year was the most prosperous one, agriculturally and commercially, that had been recently known in this usually prosperous country; and that if the members of the Church were not now liberal toward those great benevolent enterprises, initiated for the good of the country and the world, they would be without excuse. And so it impresses us. We profess that Christianity requires the consecration of ourselves, our substance, and our influence, to the cause of God. We profess great interest in the cause of missions—in sending the gospel to the destitute whites, and unevangelized plantations of blacks—in sending missionaries to the millions of China and Japan, now so strangely open to us—and also to Oregon, California, and Spanish America. We profess great interest in the success of the Publishing House—in raising means for our Depositories, and to endow the Parent Concern. We profess great interest in the cause of Christian education—in the endowment of Greensboro, and Centenary, and Auburn, and Emory, and others. God has given us the means to do all this. He has blessed us with wealth and prosperity. Shall we live unto God—glorify him with our substance; or shall we live to vanity, and pleasure, and avarice? Let our people awake to these things before the Conference year closes.

WOULD YOU BE WOMAN OR MAN?

FANNY FERN is evidently sorry she is a woman. She ought not grieve much on that account, however, for, like the preacher, who, being reproached for conduct or manners inconsistent with his "cloth," naively remarked that he was "not a preacher to hurt," so Fanny may console herself with the reflection that she is not a woman to hurt. She says, in the Ledger:

"Hands of horror are raised, and uplifted eyes turned inside out, that a woman should exist so impious as to wish "she had been born a man." Was there ever a man who would honestly say he would willingly have been a woman? I have asked the question of every man I know, and never yet received other than a negative answer."

She, representing her sex, should always get a negative answer. Men do not desire to be women, because such a desire would be unnatural; and equally unnatural is it for a woman to desire to be a man. It is just as unnatural as for any one to wish a change of personal identity. None but perverted hearts ever have such wishes. Fanny says no man wishes to be a woman; and we say but few men would wish to marry Fanny. She writes beautifully, upon occasion, about wifehood, but more than writing is needed. May Providence deliver us and our country from those women who wish to be men, or who would fain not be wives and mothers. We are afraid of all such, and God, while he compassionates their souls, through Christ, does not love their characters, we are sure. The respective lots of men and women have each their glories, disadvantages, and compensations, and repining comparisons are the marks of fools and infidels.

DEATH OF PRESIDENT STARKS.

We were painfully surprised to find in our exchanges, a few days since, the announcement that Rev. S. G. Starks, President of State Female College, near Memphis, Tenn., was dead. It is stated that he had been for some time in declining health. Last winter he attended the Mississippi and Louisiana Conferences in the viger of health, and in the prime of life. He was well known, and esteemed and beloved, in Tennessee, Mississippi, and Louisiana, and in the South-west generally. He had in former years been a member of the Memphis Conference, but, for some time previous to his recent removal to Memphis, he had been President of the female college at Holly Springs, Miss. As an educator he had "a good name." He was also a good preacher. An excellent sermon from his pen is to be found in the "Methodist Pulpit South." And he was one of the most amiable of men. But he has gone, as we all must go. His memory will be precious with his brethren.

Since writing the above, we learn from the Memphis Advocate that his last words were: "I commit my wife, my children, and my friends into the hands of Almighty God. I die in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen!"

CHURCH BUILDING.

There is a movement among us in this respect which is far more extensive, significant and important, than has ever been known in the South, or than is now imagined by a careless observer. Churches are just completed or going up, all over the land. In the "News from our Home Work," we chronicle, almost every week, the commencement or completion of new churches—sometimes three or four in one circuit. Circuit preachers are enlarging their sphere of action. In addition to preaching, praying, singing, visiting, and administering discipline, they are building parsonages and churches, establishing Sunday schools; looking after our educational, missionary and publishing interests; circulating our papers and periodicals, and attending to the support of our worn-out preachers, their widows and orphans. This is as it should be. Let it increase.

SOUTHERN UNIVERSITY.

This institution opened its first session about the first of this month. Dr. Wightman delivered an inaugural address. The Faculty were all present. It was desired by the Faculty, we understand, that not more than twenty-five or thirty students should present themselves at the commencement for admission, as, by exclusive attention to their examination, etc., the tone of morals and scholarship could be fixed at a high standard; but about forty were in attendance, and the list will soon run up to fifty, we learn. The Faculty is of the highest character this country can afford. The building is said to be a most magnificent structure. The boarding department is of the completest and most satisfactory kind.

We had looked for a full account of the opening of this institution, in which the whole country is so much interested. We had requested, earnestly, that it be attended to. It has had no friend who seemed to appreciate the value of such a thing. We have gleaned what we could from the papers.

Greensboro' is representative of Southern wealth, refinement and hospitality. It is a proper seat for such an institution as the Southern University is designed to be. It was our own home once, and we know whereof we affirm.

AUBURN MALE COLLEGE.

By a letter we learn that between fifty and sixty students applied for admission at the recent opening of this institution, and that more were expected. They have a fine college building. The community and surrounding country has a virtuous and public-spirited population, and the devotion to the interests of the college is enthusiastic. They were taken by surprise by the number of students applying for board, but rallied, and made all satisfactory arrangements. President Sasilett is an eligible man for President, and is assisted by a first-class Faculty.

A new era in religious education in Alabama has dawned. Greensboro' and Auburn will henceforth be centres of education and literary culture. We wish them both God-speed.

CENTENARY COLLEGE OF LOUISIANA

This institution has opened with flattering prospects—with more than twice the number of students at the same date last year—one hundred and sixty having entered by the 10th instant, and more coming. It is expected that three hundred students will be in attendance during the session. Really Centenary is growing. It is pleasant to witness. With such fine buildings, such an able and industrious faculty, and such a country to support it, there is nothing, as it seems to us, to hinder its prosperity. Full health is its present condition.

WOFFORD COLLEGE.

Rev. A. M. Shipp, D.D., succeeds Dr. Wightman in the Presidency—an excellent selection. The College opened about the first of October. Twenty applicants for admission into the Freshman and Sophomore classes, increasing the number of students to twelve more than last year. The session has opened auspiciously. A professor to supply the place of Rev. Whitefoord Smith, D.D.,—the place declined by Dr. Doggett,—will be elected in November.

KENTUCKY CONFERENCE COLLEGE.

This is a new and important enterprize of Kentucky Methodism—the institution located at Millersburg. An excellent building, costing about $20,000, has been erected; $50,000 endowment has already been obtained. They have a Chair of Biblical Literature and Church History already endowed. The promise of Transylvania University is, at last, to be realized at Millersburg.

ALL WE KNOW ABOUT SHAKESPEARE.

He was born in April, 1565, at Stratford-on-Avon, was the son of John Shakespeare, tradesman, and at the age of eighteen was married to Ann Hathaway, then twenty-six years old. In 1586 he went to London, and there became a player; in 1589 he was one of the proprietors of the Blackfriars Theatre, and in 1595 was a prominent sharer in a large theatre called the Globe. He seems to have altered, mended, and added to the dramas of others before he wrote any himself. Between 1591 and 1613 he wrote over thirty plays, but the precise date of the composition it is impossible to fix. About the year 1610 he retired permanently to Stratford. He died on the 23d of April 1616. Such are the meagre results of a century of research into the external life of Shakespeare.

Outside of uninspired history, there is not such another instance of unsought fame—of fame arising solely from what was accomplished in the life, without any apparent effort to bring it before the attention of the world. It is like Abraham's fame, who simply obeyed God, and knew not that he was enrolling his name at the head of the list of God's chosen Old Testament worthies. It is like Paul's fame, who simply asked, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" and knew not that he was taking the same position in New Testament history that Abraham took in that of the Old. The repose of a life forgetful of fame, is fruitful of that power which is followed by fame.

GROWTH OF MEMPHIS.

Fifteen hundred houses have been built during the present season—costing $3,000,000. The city is about two miles long, and one mile wide. There can be no interior rival on the Mississippi, because there is no other eligible city-site between Vicksburg and the Ohio. The value of real estate in the city limits is $18,000,000. In 1821 the population of Memphis was 53; in 1825, 308; in 1832, 906; in 1835, 1,239; in 1840, 1,700; in 1846, 3,500; in 1850, 6,327; in 1854, 12,687; in 1859, 25,000.

DEATH OF FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE.—The London correspondent of the Manchester Guardian says: I am sorry to learn (apropos of military hygiene) that Miss Florence Nightingale continues to lose strength under her continued labors. The scenes and sufferings of the Crimea made a deep and abiding impression on her devoted and deep nature. She determined after her return to give herself up to the removal of the manifest sources of that evil which she had beheld in full play in the lazar-houses of Scutari, and under the dismal hospital marquees before Schastopol. Ever since the conclusion of peace she has been laboring at the work of barrack and hospital improvement, with a view to the amelioration of the health of the soldier and the increase of his comforts. She has persevered in this labor in spite of impaired health and failing strength, and she has told her friends, when they remonstrate with her and urge her to take repose, that it is her vocation; she must work at those objects till either she sinks at her work or sees it accomplished. She has all along been the right arm of the barrack and hospital comission, and, with them, has had to strugle against all the entanglements of red tape, and the obstacles of a vis inertiæ, and prejudice against improvements, which are difficult for civilians even to conceive.

THE London Times ON THE IRISH REVIVAL.—The London Times of September 17th, has a long article on the Irish revival, which it considers is a mixture of good and evil, to be accounted for on psychological principles. Excitement of the emotions in isolated cases passes unnoticed, but when, as now, whole multitudes are brought under conviction, the public notice is attracted. It thinks that a great many people have been benefited by such exercises, but takes exception to the making "a spiritual luxury and dramatic excitement of a principle which was implanted in human nature as a motive to action."

Nothing better could be expected from the Times, which follows the multitudes whether led by the world, the flesh, or the devil.

QUEEN VICTORIA AND THE TURF.—We learn from the Canada Christian Guardian, that at the solicitation of the Governor-General, Queen Victoria has granted a prize of fifty guineas to the Toronto Turf Club, to be run for at Toronto or such other place in Upper Canada as she may appoint. Diffusible, very. First, she paid for printing the sermon of a dissenter, Rev. John Caird, and now encourages gambling by a prize. We are sorry, for we admire the Queen prodigiously. Liberality and latitudinarianism are not easily distinguished, and less easily avoided, by any but those versed and "grounded" in the principles of the Bible.

OUR FOURTH PAGE has been honored of late. The press upon our columns has compelled us to insert many articles on that page, to the crowding out, partially, of the "children's column;" even then, small type had to be used to economize space.

Rev. A. B. Fly apologizes for his article. We are glad he does. Such articles may be necessary, but, if so, they are "necessary evils." They are not to our taste at all. Controversy between the churches is a sin. This paper cannot be its arena. But Mr. Fly is not responsible. They had better let him alone. He is a match for Graves any day.

Rev. H. A. M. Henderson's letter is on this page also. The children will be delighted with "Tallulah."

MORE NON-SECTARIAN UNION!—Zion's Herald, noticing one of the American Sunday School Union's publications, entitled "The Land of Mystery, or Scenes and Incidents in Central Africa," says: "As in the 'non-sectarian' publications of the American Sunday School Union generally, it is a little 'funny,' as a child would say, to see how completely Methodism is overlooked. Moravian Missions and the American Board are honorably mentioned, and even the Sandwich Islands Missions are lugged in, but no allusion, whatever, is made to the scores of Methodist missionaries in Africa. Whether the neglect is intentional, or from ignorance, does not appear."

THE Christian Examiner mentions as a remarkable fact, that in the splendid array of world-renowned German writers who, in the last hundred years, have so gloriously adorned and illustrated almost every field of human thought and fancy and research, there is not one who was not born and educated as a Protestant. It adds, "if we were to strike from the records of human intellectual action all that Catholic Germany has contributed to the general stock since the Protestant Reformation, the world would not be poorer by one great idea or even by one comprehensive fact."

THE Sunday School Times, organ of the American Sunday School Union, at Philadelphia, professing to be Catholic, and not sectarian, has a department headed "Ministers and Churches," in which "calls," "installations," "resignations," etc., of Ministers, and building and dedication of new churches, are recorded. Not a single item in the issue of Oct. 1, so far as we can see, indicates the existence of the Methodist Church. Where will this humbuggery end?

VERY LATEST NEWS FROM EUROPE.—Just as we go to press, we receive the advices by the North Briton, which left Liverpool Oct. 5th. Advance in Cotton, and war expected in Italy.

OLD DR. BEECHER AND SLANDERERS.

Let them alone. Dr. Beecher is said to be the hero of the following anecdote: While residing on Long Island he was returning home one evening from a visit to old Dr. Woodworth. Seeing as he thought a rabbit by the roadside, a little ahead, he said, "They are rather tender animals; if the fellow sits still till I come up, I think I could hit him with these hooks," a goodly bunch of which he had in his handkerchief. Hit him he did; surely it proved to be, not a rabbit, but a skunk. He returned to his family in anything but the odor of sanctity. In after life, being asked why he did not reply to a scurrilous attack made on him, he answered: "I discharged a quarto once at a skunk, and then I made up my mind not to try it again."

AMUSEMENTS DENOUNCED.—The Catholic Bishop of Montreal has addressed a circular to his clergy, calling upon them, as soon as posible, to pronounce from their pulpits "a strong warning against the opera, the theatre, the circus, and other amusements of a similar nature, which at the present moment are a real scandal to society and country districts."

Other things being equal, that priest will do to canonize after his death.

UNIVERSITY OF MISSISSIPPI.—The Oxford Monitor of the 6th says: The University of Mississippi commenced last Monday, and we learn that up to this time two hundred students have been admitted. This is about one-half larger than was ever admitted during the first week before. We stated a few weeks ago that five hundred were expected during the session, and the present appearances fully that number will be here.

MR. SPURGEON'S NEW TABERNACLE, the corner-stone of which was recently laid, will accommodate 6,000 persons. It has deep double galleries—a lecture-room capable of containing 800 persons—besides school-rooms and other lecture rooms in the basement. It will cost about $125,000, and is expected to be completed early in 1861.

THE Baltimore Christian Advocate of the Northern Methodist Church says, emphatically, that those it represents "will not submit," to any change in the general rule on slavery. It is a co-incidence, however, that this announcement was not made until Dr. Stevens announced in the Christian Advocate and Journal that from the votes in the annual conferences already had the day was saved.

"A BLIND MAN'S BOOK, by a Critic in Spectacles, is concluded in this issue, by a charming paper. It was too long, but it was so handsome that we could not consent to curtail it. The gifted author has let his pen rust to long. Three of his "five talents" have not been "put to the exchangers." Let us hope that he will continue to write for the Advocate.

JONES CHAPEL MEETING.—Having already published two accounts of this gracious revival—one from a lay and one from our friend and brother, Rev. S. Hawes, we think it unnecessary to publish another one, sent us by J. W. R., though well written.

EDUCATIONAL REPOSITORY AND FAMILY MONTHLY. This is the title of the proposed periodical of the Educational Institute. It will not succeed, and had better be abandoned. Those who are in it have much more important business to attend to—and this is the reason it will fail.

SIR JOHN FRANKLIN.—The Final Exploration Expedition of the devoted and heroic Lady Franklin, in the yacht Fox, Capt. M'Clintock, has returned, with full information and many relics of the long-lost Arctic navigators. They all sleep in the eternal snows. Sir John died in June, 1847.

A PREACHER should not, in reading, thinking, writing, and fashioning the Scriptures into sermons, forget to incorporate its truth and power into his character, and its precepts into his life. Every sermon should be adapted, and preached, to his own soul, first; thereby he will both save himself and them that hear him.

THE GAP of forty miles' staging on the Mississippi Central railroad line, will, in a few days, be reduced to twenty miles—the only break of the rail between New Orleans and New York—and that will be finished by January next, when three days and a half will be the travel-time between the two cities.

THE English papers announce the death, on the 14th ult., at St. James's Palace, in the 65th year of his age, Rev. Charles Wesley, D. D. sub-dean of Her Majesty's Chapel Royal at St. James's Palace, and chaplain in ordinary to her Majesty.

THE University of Alabama begins with over one hundred students. A happy effect from the fact "that the rigidity and tyrannical duties of the old system have been displaced by one less rigid and more republican in its tenets."

OPELOUSAS FEMALE COLLEGE, Rev. B. F. White sole lady, Principals, is to be opened on the first Monday in January, 1860. It is a fine locality for such an institution.

IT is said that the Hon. Edward Everett will supply the pulpit on Sunday at the South congregational Church in Boston during the absence in Europe of the Rev. E. E. Hale.

THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT demands of the U.S. Government explanation about San Juan Island, and returns thanks for the aid of Minister Ward and Com. Tatnall at the battle of the Pohoi.

WHEN, in a case of doubtful morality, you feel disposed to ask, is there any harm in doing this? please answer it by asking yourself another, is there any harm in letting it alone?

YOUNG MAN, instead of going out at night, for want of something else to do, subscribe for the Advocate, and have it on hand for a leisure hour.

"THE GOSPEL AND SLAVERY" which is concluded in this week's Advocate, should be generally read. The last number is especially valuable.

HON. EDWARD EVERETT has accepted an invitation to deliver an address at the Georgia State Fair, to be held in Atlanta from the 24th to the 28th of October.

A FEW CASES OF YELLOW FEVER are reported in the Charity Hospital, but it is a matter of no importance to the health of the city.

REV. J. U. GRANBERRY, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, at Washington City, has been appointed Chaplain to the University of Virginia.

OBITUARIES, several at least, as well as much other matter, have been crowded out this week. They will appear in next issue.

DUELS AND SUICIDES continue and abound. They are near of kin.

BATTLE OF PEI-HO.—Read the thrilling account on third page.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

OCTOBER 19, 1859.

DOLBEARS COMMERCIAL COLLEGE.—We desire to call the attention of all concerned to this institution, now occupying the upper floor of that splendid edifice—the finest mercantile building in New Orleans—the "Story Building." The advertisement speaks for itself. Read it.

CONFERENCE NOTICES.—See, under "Special Notices," the directions to Preachers attending the Mississippi and Alabama Conferences. Also, notices to undergraduates of Mississippi Conference.

PRINTERS' ROLLERS.—See the advertisement of Mr. P. Beaudlon, in fourth column of third page. We vouch for what he says.

JOB OFFICE.—Isaac T. Hinton, Book and Job Printer, has his card in fourth column of third page of this paper, to which we call attention.

NOTICE TO CONTRACTORS.—Pierce and Payne College is to be built. See notice to contractors in fourth column third page.

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

Arrival of the North Briton—Liverpool Dates to Oct. 5.

Liverpool Cotton Market.

LIVERPOOL, Oct. 5.—The sales of cotton for the three business days since the sailing of the Africa amount to 38,000 bales, of which speculators took 2000 and exporters 6000 bales. The market generally closed steady at the quotations of last week; Middling Orleans is quoted at 6¾; Middling Mobile 6¾; Middling Uplands 6¾. Holders offer their stocks freely, but show no disposition to press sales.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday noon, Oct. 5. The Cotton market closed steady at yesterday's quotations. The sales to-day, it is estimated, to amount to 8000 bales to speculators and exporters.

MINISTER MASON'S DEATH.—A despatch from Paris announces the sudden death of the American Minister, Mr. Mason, of apoplexy.

The Zurich Conference.

On the 3d inst., a full meeting of the Plenipotentiaries was held. Two representatives from each of the Governments represented at the Conference being present at this meeting, the articles of the treaty of peace, so far as agreed upon, were read, and other points discussed in a most conciliatory spirit.

The Paris Patrie says that the treaty will be signed in a few days, and will confirm the cession of Lombardy to Sardinia and contain the settlement of the Lombard debt.

The Patrie states that the general affairs of Italy will be settled by a European Congress.

It is asserted at Paris that Austria has consented to reduce the Piedmontese portion of the Lombard debt from 400,000,000 francs to a little more than 200,000,000 francs.

The San Juan Affair.

The London Times while rejoicing at the pacific mission of Gen. Scott, denounces Gen. Harney as a filibuster, and asserts that the Island of San Juan belongs to England.

Rifled Cannon in Demand.

Agents of the French, Austrian, and Sardinian Governments are in England soliciting from the various English founderies tenders of large quantities of rifled cannon, to be furnished with the utmost dispatch.

France.

The Emperor Napoleon was to leave Biarritz, where he had been sojourning several weeks, on the 10th. He intended to visit Bordeaux soon; where it was expected he would deliver an address.

It is announced that the French army of observation will winter in Italy.

The extensive preparations for the French expedition to China have been suspended, and there are other indications that France is backing down on the Chinese war.

Breakers Ahead.

Marshal Niel has joined his troops at Toulouse, and issued to them a very spirited order of the day, which has been construed into an admission that peace is not likely to last long. Preparations for war are heard on every side.

Gen. Changarnier has returned to Paris.

The visit of the King of Belgium to the Emperor Napoleon, at Biarritz, in relation to the Belgian debt to France, proved a perfect failure.

Italy.

The Sardinian Government has sent circulars to the various representatives of the European Courts, urging the formation of a kingdom in Upper Italy.

It is asserted that the Pope had ordered that passports be delivered to the Sardinian Minister for his immediate use.

It is reported that the announcement gave rise to a collision between the Swiss troops and the neutral force stationed at Catholica.

Insurrectionary movements are reported to have taken place at Palermo.

Garibaldi has issued a proclamation summoning the Italians of the Legations to arms, and threatens to free Italy of all strangers.

A collision is shortly expected.

The American Minister to China.

Since the battle with the Chinese, in their forts at the mouth of the Peiho, in which the English and French were defeated with the loss of over 500 men killed and wounded—the American Minister, Mr. Ward, and the commander of the U. S. Squadron, Com. Tatnall, being present, but taking no part, except some offices of humanity to the wounded British commander, Admiral Hope, and his sinking boats—there are conflicting rumors as to Mr. Ward's movements.

By the Africa, which arrived at New York on the 14th, having left Liverpool on the 1st, we learn that the steamship Indian, from Liverpool the 28th ult., brought advices from Hong Kong to the 10th August.

One of the Hong Kong newspapers received at London, stated that Mr. Ward, the American Minister, was still aboard his ship, and as little likely to obtain the ratification of his treaty as the English Minister was.

Another journal, however, spoke of the probability of Mr. Ward having gone on to Pekin, and a Russian dispatch, published at St. Petersburg, said that he had arrived in Pekin, but was kept in confinement.

The Africa reports that still later advices from China have been received at London, and they go to confirm the previous reports of the arrival of Mr. Ward at Pekin, and his virtual confinement there by the Chinese authorities.

The Paris Pays states, upon reliable information, that the American Minister, Mr. Ward, and his suite, had arrived at Pekin, and were well received and treated, except that they were confined to the residence that had been assigned them, and were not allowed to see anything of the city.

They were transported from the mouth of the Peiho to Pekin in an immense traveling-box, from which only the sky could be seen, all other parts of the vehicle being so closed as to prevent the Minister and his party from seeing anything of the country or the people. A military escort and a number of high dignitaries went with them.

Mr. Ward was to have an interview soon with the Emperor of China, after which he was to return to the sea coast in the same manner he had come.

Although treated with the greatest respect, the American Minister and his suite were thus virtually prisoners.

Italian Affairs.

The Paris correspondent of the Times says that the amended Zurich programme is stated as follows: A definite treaty of peace will be drawn up by which Austria cedes Lombardy to France, who will transfer it to Sardinia. The most difficult point in the double transfer is the Lombardy debt, and on this head it is believed that Austria will moderate her demands. The other documents respecting the Italian Confederation, the Duchies, &c., will be signed, the correspondent says, by the Austrian and French Plenipotentiaries only, as Sardinia utterly rejects their restoration and will not under present circumstances agree to the Italian Confederation. Austria, however, persists in her desire to keep an army in Venitia.

There appears to be, however, a feeling of irritation arising among the people of Italy most concerned in the treaty deliberations, that threatens to involve still further the complicated questions before the Conference.

The King of Sardinia, in reply to a deputation from the people of the Romagna, said: As an Italian Prince, I am reminded that Europe, having in view the state of the Romagnese people, who demand prompt and efficient measures of reform, has accepted formal obligations toward your country. I receive your wishes, and, strengthened by the rights conferred upon me, will support your cause before the great powers. You may rely on the generous love of our country, of the French Emperor, who will accomplish the great work of reparation he has powerfully begun, and who, assured of the gratitude of Italy, and seeing moderation which has characterized your resolution during the last moments of incertitude, will recognize that, in Romagna, the mere hope of a national Government suffices to put an end to evil disorders.

A decree of the King of Naples extends to June 1860, the period for the admission of wheat.

The Emperor Napoleon has emphatically denied the correctness of the reports, that he desires to place Prince Napoleon on any Italian throne.

The news from Italy is somewhat contradictory. One statement is to the effect that Sardinia and Austria are busily preparing for a warlike solution of the difference between them, while the French army in Italy is to be largely increased. Another statement is, that the Dukes of Modena and Tuscany have organized a large force, with which they intend attacking the army of the Italian League, under Ulloa and Garibaldi. Again, another statement is that the Duke of Tuscany is going to promise his former subjects universal suffrage, and by that means hopes to regain his throne.

Serious disturbances are reported to have occurred at Naples; but the official journals of that city contradict these rumors.

The Duke of Tuscany, in the prosecution of his claims, proposes to grant a Constitutional Government for Tuscany, and general amnesty to all political offenders. It is reported that the Princess of Parma is to have Modena, and that Parma is to remain annexed to Piedmont. The most sanguine partisans now abandon all hopes of emancipation from Papal rule. The Duke of Modena is at the head of 10,000 troops, backed by 5000 men under the grand Duke of Tuscany. Gen. Cullermattio had collected 10,000 men, one-third of whom were Croats and the remainder Swiss. It is reported that he goes to Vienna to organize the plan of attack against the army of Central Italy under Garibaldi, which is now concentrating around Rimini. The Archdukes would operate from the north. Piedmont is entirely preparing for the crisis, which seems near at hand. Ancona, in the Abburri, is in open revolt. Capria and other fortified places have been ordered to be placed on a war footing. It is rumored that the Pope contemplates abandoning Rome and taking refuge at Gaeta. Letters from Naples state that 25,000 men have been sent to the frontiers, and that 10,000 more are to follow.

General and Political.

Spain and England—Austrian Finances—King of Belgium—French Warlike Preparations—Zurich Conference—The San Juan Difficulty.

The proffer made by the English Government to act as a mediator between Spain and Morocco has been rejected by the former Government.

The report is again made that Austria is endeavoring to effect a loan in London.

The recent visit of the King of Belgium to the Emperor Napoleon, at Biarritz, it is now stated, had reference only to the debt due to France by Belgium.

It is announced upon what appears to be good authority, that several regiments of General Castellane's corps d'armee, in the Department of Lyons, had received orders to hold themselves in readiness to march.

Grand armaments are also in course of preparation in several other parts of France.

The French Government has purchased land at Bologna at a very high price for the purpose of erecting fortifications.

A floating battery is also to be constructed, to be navigated by steam and armed with rifled guns.

In the leading arsenals of France military preparations of a warlike nature are in active progress, whilst in the fortified harbors and naval depots, armaments and other movements of a similar character are pushed ahead rapidly and vigorously.

Prince Napoleon left Zurich, so late despatches state, without having an interview with the Plenipotentiaries of Austria and Sardinia.

The sessions of the Conference continued regularly, but nothing of the proceedings had transpired, the utmost secrecy being enjoined and observed.

The London Times, in an article on the San Juan affair, says that the seizure of the Island of San Juan by our Government originated in the assumption that England would not dare, to avenge the act, (!) and expresses the conviction that it is time for the British Government to "put a stop to such notions."

Gen. Serano superceded Gen. Concha, who is preparing to depart for Spain.

Battle of the Pei-ho.

Frightful Massacre of English Troops—British Rescued by the Americans.

The terrible engagement at the Peiho took place June 25th.

About the middle of May, 1858, an imposing fleet was anchored just where we are now; the vessels of England, France, the United States and Russia. England had some twenty; France, seven or eight; the United States two; and Russia, one. The ministers were here with the avowed object of obtaining an interview with the Emperor of China, and exacting treaties from him that should loosen the long-existing drawbacks upon the commerce of the world with China." There were two roads to its attainment selected. England and France, taking the past and their knowledge of Chinese character as their guides, came with the sword in one hand and just and reasonable demands in the other.

England and France, finding their demands avoided by cunning and procrastination, at once turned to war as the only alternative. They got up steam on a dozen or more gun-boats, crossed the bar, and commenced steaming up the river, on their way to Pekin. Arrived at a chain which had been stretched from bank to bank between the forts at its mouth, they were fired into by a hundred guns, returned the fire, and let go their anchors. Then was continued a well-contested battle, which, at the end of an hour and a half, was turned in their favor by a body of twelve hundred stormers, who landed and carried the forts at the point of the bayonet.

The Allies then steamed quietly up the river a distance of seventy miles and anchored off the city of Tein-sing, situated at the head of gun-boat navigation, and some seventy miles short of Pekin. Of course, the road was now open for the "holders of the olive branch," and the next day saw them also safely at anchor off Tein-sing, but undeniably under the protection of English and French guns, and consequently under the necessity of "taking up their beds and walking" as soon as these guns should be withdrawn.

The frightened Emperor now trembled in his threatened capital, and hurriedly commissioned three high officers to proceed to Tein-sing and check the advance of the hostile forces. Four separate treaties resulted from this action. Those of England and France granted all demands—that of Russia was perhaps nearly as fortunate; while that of the United States was little better than so much sheep-skin. And it was only saved from being virtual sheep-skin by the exertions of Mr. William H. Reed, our minister, assisted by the evident good understanding existing between himself and the representatives of England and France.

The four treaties being all thus formed, the Allied guns returned to the anchorage outside the forts, with the understanding that they, the treaties, were to be exchanged "a year hence at Pekin." Of course, the two olive branches floated down the river several hours ahead of the guns—a fact owing, perhaps, to their fear of being left behind.

The "year" being up, the English, French, and United States ministers arrive at Shanghai on their way to Pekin to exchange the ratified treaties. There they find the same commissioners (with one exception) that had treated with their predecessors at Tein-sing. The Allies are informed of nothing indicative of a change of feeling upon the part of the Emperor; but our minister is notified that the only right which the United States has to send to Pekin flows from "the most favored nation clause of our treaty," and that such right does not therefore exist, while, as yet, "the most favored nation (English) itself has not been received there. As for the Russian minister, report had long since told us that he had reached Pekin by the overland route and become permanently settled as resident minister near the court of China. Another rumor had spoken of vast fortifications that had arisen from the ruins of the Peiho forts; but this was laughed at, while the former was considered barely "possible."

Well, we arrived here, nine miles from the forts, on the 20th inst., and anchored in four fathoms water, with the English and French vessels around us, and with the forts upon the distant horizon. The Allies had already been at anchor for several days; had sent into the mouth of the river; found it ten times more strongly fortified than ever, three barriers (each sufficient in itself to stop a squadron) thrown across, and a very evident determination that nothing in the shape of a foreign ship should enter. Upon being informed at the forts that the English and French ministers were about to pass up on their way to Pekin, the reply was,

"You can not go to Pekin by this branch of the river. Go to the other outlet farther north, and wait there until the commissioners arrive from Shanghai. This river is not the Pei-ho, but the Nan-ho, and it is barricaded against an expected attack from the rebels, and we can not open it."

"Very well," replied the English Admiral. "This is the only road we know to Pekin, and if you do not permit us to pass, we shall remove the barricades by force. Give you until day after to-morrow to decide."

Upon being again visited at the expiration of the time, they replied:

"We will be very sorry if you attempt it, for we are ordered not to permit the passage of anything here, and shall be forced to fire upon you."

"I will give you until the 25th to re-consider the subject," now said the Admiral. "If on that day I do not find the river clear I shall attack the forts." And this was the position of affairs when we arrived on the 21st.

The threatened attack of the rebels was purely imaginary, and no chart indicates the existence of any other "outlet" to this river.

From the 21st until the 23d the rough state of the weather did not admit of boating, and all parties were consequently confined to their ships. After it had moderated, the Hon. John E. Ward visited the other ministers, and upon his return signified his intention of proceeding in the chartered steamer Toey-wan, with his interpreters, to the inner edge of the bar the next day, and thence to dispatch the latter in a boat to the forts to inform their commander that the American minister was at hand, and anxious to pass the barriers to Pekin.

Well, the next day came, and in went the Toey-wan with the Flag-officer, Minister, and suite, Captain of the ship, Flag-lieutenant, and the Captain of Marines. The English Admiral also went in force at the same time, to be ready for the struggle, which the next day was likely to witness. His entire attacking force numbered about thirteen hundred men, six hundred of whom were marines and seven hundred sailors, sixty of the latter being French. Thirteen steamers carried this army, and eight others, of too heavy draught to cross the bar, were left outside with just men enough to take care of them.

Arrived inside of the bar, the Toey-wan accidentally ran on shore under the very guns of the first fort, and the Admiral (who, with his fleet, had anchored well out of range), expecting to see her fired into every moment, generously sent a gun-boat to pull her into deep water. He begged also that, if she could not be got off, the flag-officer would host his flag at the gun-boat's main, the American ensign at her peak, and consider her as entirely at his service. This was an offer unprecedented in naval history, and was accepted so far as her assistance was concerned; it, however, proved unavailing, and the Toey-wan remained on shore until high tide. The interpreters were now sent in the flag-officer's barge to communicate with the authorities of the fort; arrived near which point, they were stopped at the mouth of the river by a number of ragged-looking Chinese, who asked their business.

"We wish to see the highest officer present upon the part of the American minister," replied our friends.

"There is no officer here of sufficient rank to communicate with you," was the untruthful reply.

"Where can he be found?" queried the interpreter.

"At a place about thirty li (ten miles) further to the north."

"How can we go there?"

"Outside. Fly the sea."

"Can you furnish us a pilot?"

"No."

"Can you provide us with sedan-chairs to go overland?"

"It would be useless; there is no road by land."

"We wish to leave our cards. Will you accept them?"

"We can not dare to do such a thing. Our rank is not high enough. We are only poor people from the neighborhood engaged upon the forts."

And here the interview ended. Comment is needless upon the above dialogue, as it has since been proved—as was indeed apparent to all at the time—to have been a series of lies. It is of great value, however, as the exponent of Chinese feeling toward Americans. It is not an unsafe prediction to indulge in when I say, that, in less time than five years, China will have so conducted herself toward our citizens resident along this coast as to draw down upon herself the hostility of the United States.

Saturday, the 25th of June, was a cool morning for even our latitude of 39 degs. N., and beautifully clear. The beautiful day grew older and older, and saw the English complete their preparations at 2.30 P.M. Then they were observed to be "hove short" upon their cables, while steam was allowed to escape slowly from their pipes, and while the guns' crews were ranged along their pieces in evident readiness for the Admiral's signal to "go ahead!" This was the greater part of the naval portion of the attacking force, the marines and only some two hundred blue-jackets having been transferred to some captured junks out of range of the forts, there to await a call for their services as a "reserve" or as "stormers" for the capture of a silenced fort.

A few minutes of breathless suspense, and then ascends the Admiral's signal, and every one proceeds to do his duty—up anchors and away at the enemy.—Soon the increasing velocity of the Admiral's gun-boat creates a breeze, and the flags blew out and show the assumed meaning of the signal. Gayly decked, as if for a holiday, they steam into the conflict. See the noble-looking Admiral, who even as he sits seems taller by a head than the boy-midshipman at his side. It is said to have been a grand sight to see him thus leading his men into battle against the fearful odds which he then knew he was about to encounter. The attacking squadron looked desperately formidable, but the silent forts towered over them like volcanic hills. Up to this time the forts had seemed perfectly devoid of life, the number of their guns even being concealed by hanging screens. It began to look as if they were not to be resisted. Not a Chinaman had been seen upon their walls, and an unnatural silence pervaded the atmosphere—it was the silence of sudden death to many brave hearts then full of life. No sooner had the little Kestrel grappled the first stake of the second barrier than the screens were elevated like the curtains of a theater, a hundred yawning muzzles became visible, and the next instant a hundred destroying balls were belched forth by flames and smoke.

The carnage that ensued was awful. Men fell as if a dozen huge scythes had been swooped along their ranks, some to rise no more, others to crawl slowly out of the way to die, and a few a very few in urbis painfully to fight in spite of their wounds. The engagement now became general. The gun-boats returned the fire before it had been well received, let go their anchors in position, and for more than seven hours kept up the unequal war. The Nimrod in particular covered herself with glory. Anchored nearly between two of the largest forts, with her propeller going, and her heavy guns working with the regularity of steam engines, she moved around as if upon a pivot, pouring first into one fort and then into the other her rapid broadsides. The Admiral, with his flag on board the Plover, sees his captain fall headless to the deck and takes the command himself. A moment later, and he also is down, severely wounded in the leg. He looks around the bloody decks and sees but three men remaining out of thirty-five. Was ever such havoc as this before?

Calling to him the boy-midshipman, he orders:

"Take a boat and pull to the American Commodore. Tell him that all of my men are shot down, and half of my gun-boats are disabled. I must have the reserves to take the places of the dead and wounded. If he can oblige me by towing them up against the tide it will be a great service."

Two boats were sunk under the midshipman before he reached the Toey-wan in a third. Begrimed by powder and bloody from a wound in the face, he gave his message, and told of the Admiral's wound. The flag-officer knew not what to do.

"If I tow up the reserves," he reasoned, "I at once engage in a hostile act against China, with whom my country is at peace. If I refuse, I leave the wounded Admiral and his handful of men at the mercy of ten thousand treacherous cowards. What shall I do?"

He was not long in answering this question. The increasing fury of the fire from the forts, and the slackened return by the gun-boats, told him that life was passing away, and that time was precious. "Away with every consideration save those of humanity! I cannot stand quietly and see such wholesale butchery. I will not see a wounded brother sailor, with crippled and exhausted crews and disabled sides, asking me in vain for aid. When I was aground under hostile guns he sent me help. I will help him now."

The Toey-wan hitched on to the boats filled with impatient sailors, and pointed her head against the stream. Two hours after the commencement of the battle she steamed with them in among the gun-boats, cast them off, dropped a little out of the fire, and anchored. The Flag-officer, accompanied by the Flag-lieutenant, now got into his barge to visit the wounded Admiral, who had in the mean time been removed to the Cormorant. His flag was still flying, and he directing the battle from his recumbent position. Round shot and grape tore the water along the boat's course, but did her no damage until arrived at the side of the Cormorant, when one of the former struck her on the quarter, wounded mortally the cockswain, and blew away the whole stern. As she filled the officers and crew climbed to the deck of the Cormorant. An awful scene of blood and mutilation, and desperate men contending against desperate odds was here spread out before them. The Admiral was stretched upon the quarter-deck, the scuppers were running blood, the dead block ed up the road of the living, the wounded glared fiercely at the fate which had stricken them down when their services were so much needed, and the unwounded jerked their guns in and out with the spasmodic strength of men whose every nerve seemed to have been braced to conquer as they died. Perhaps a more desperate picture was never painted by man's aroused ferocity. Let us follow it no further.

After an interview of several minutes the Flag-officer returned to his ship in an English boat, and towed up a second reserve. The general carnage had been so dreadful that the first had been at once absorbed, and they in turn were now thinned so much as to necessitate a second supply.

The day was now drawing to a close, but the conflict still raged with unabated fury. English courage would not give way before Chinese guns, and the latter could not be silenced, for as fast as a man fell his place was filled from their countless thousands. From the Toey-wan, with a glass, our party could see the Chinese throwing their dead over the walls of the forts, while the English were dodging the same from sides of their hospital ships. The Admiral determined to storm the apparently "silenced" fort, and to turn its guns against the others. This fort had not fired a gun for an hour, and was supposed by every one to be hors de combat. Subsequent events proved its silence to have been a mere artifice on the part of the enemy, to encourage a landing in force, that they might the more speedily and safely slaughter the foe they feared to meet, and six hundred doomed men got into their hands.

The shades of the Northern night were slowly closing around as the boats of the squadron, ladened to their gunwales with eager men, pulled heavily toward the low-water mark below the first barrier. When the boats grounded, and the eager hundreds sprang from them to the attack, they became merged in a dense and swaying crowd, in which the actions of no one man could be distinguished. And it was but one vast mass of human beings struggling through mud and water—over the walls, in many cases—to gain a dark-looking wall, which they were to scale or die. That dark-looking wall at this moment became lurid with the flames of death. A score of heavy guns, aimed leisurely and with fatal truth, cast forth their engines of death into the struggling mass of life, and swept away at one single discharge an eight of those who formed it.

The stormers staggered beneath the blow, but still rushed desperately toward the wall. Fearful of another discharge they separated into small parties, and thus rendered positions less certain to the Chinese gunners. But the forethought of their enemies had provided against this even; for they had scarcely reached the first ditch—over which they were forced to swim—when burning balls were thrown from the forts, which gave ample light to paint them out. Many of them crossed the first ditch with saturated ammunition. A few even got over the second, with clothes and limbs torn by the sharp spikes; and there were six or seven whose desperate energy, physical endurance, and good fortune, carried them up to the very walls of the fort. But the attempt failed; and leaving the third of their friends dead and wounded upon the muddy beach, the remnant gained their boats and retreated out of fire. There was no time then to take away their dead—hardly to assist the wounded. Such of the latter as were able crawled to the boats and dragged themselves painfully over the gunwales, and a few were picked up during the hurry of the retreat; the others remained with the dead, and were covered slowly—slowly by the rising tide, from which they could not fly.

There was one poor fellow, perhaps the bravest in the party, who met his sudden death before the landing had even commenced. Determined to be among the first, he stationed himself upon the bows of the boat, sprang forward a moment to soon and sank so deep into the mud that the waters gathered over him and he was seen no more.

I do not suppose that one who has never lost a battle upon the results of which was staked so much, can appreciate the brave old Admiral's feelings as he saw his stormers returning in bleeding and broken ranks from their unsuccessful attack. Himself badly wounded; with gun-boats sorely pressed and with his stormers beaten back, one would have looked for an immediate and general retreat. But this did not seem to enter into his calculations at all; for until late at night did he hold his ground and batter away at the unyielding forts. Then, with empty magazines and bleeding men, blinded by impotent rage, he nailed the English flag to the mast of the Cormorant, left her ant three other boats aground and half full of water, and, reluctantly retreated with the others. England owes honor to Rear-Admiral Hope.

All night long the survivors worked hard to restore things to a state of comparative order, and the following morning the sun came through a clear sky to look upon the picture of misery and woe spread out upon both land and water. Every moment the strong tide carried by a floating body, and upon looking to the point where the unfortunate stormers had landed, Chinese butchers were seen stripping the dead, killing the wounded, and cutting off heads, which were then put in bags, doubtless to be carried to Pekin as evidences of the victory. These are the people whom some persons call "the poor Chinese;" and those headless trunks were once the bodies of brave white men whom the same people call "the domineering English." When will the masses of the Western world arrive at a true idea of Chinese duplicity and wanton rascality? Cor. Harper's Weekly.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, October 17, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New Orleans Price-Current, ending on the 15th instant:

The past week has been a period of but little activity in the market generally, there being only limited transactions in all the departments except Cotton, which upon a lower basis of prices, has moved more actively within the past few days than at any previous period of the season, though the week opened very dull. Tobacco remains almost without demand, and Sugar has become dull and depressed since the arrival of a few parcels of the new crop. In the various articles of Western Produce the transactions are mostly confined to the home demand, but prices generally are well sustained.

European advices to 27th ult. from Liverpool, received per City of Manchester, reporting the sales at 8000 bales on that day, at previous quotations. Fair Orleans, 7¾d. and Middling at 5 16d—barely maintained. At Havre the week's sales were confined to about 3000 bales at easier prices, though the quotation was still 112f.

COTTON.—In the early part of the week the market was unsettled, with a general decline of fully ⅛c. per pound, and with sales for the first three days of about 21,500 bales. On Wednesday buyers came forward more freely, and sales were effected to the extent of fully 15,000 bales, prices being still irregular and rather more in favor of purchasers. These large sales left the market with but a moderate supply of desirable lists, and factors were inclined to ask rather more full prices at the opening of the market on Thursday, but buyers did not respond to their claims, and, with unfavorable weather, business fell off to about 6500 bales; and on Friday rainy weather caused an almost entire suspension of business, the sales being confined to barely 500 bales; and the total sales of the week sum up 43,500 bales; receipts during the same period amount to 64,758 bales; and the exports during the same period to 58,026. The stock remaining in presses and on shipboard, not cleared on the 14th inst. is 180,013 bales.

With respect to prices, we have already stated that factors, under unfavorable European advices and a considerable pressure of stock, were induced to accept the offers of purchasers in the early part of the week, which involved a decline of fully ⅛c. Since then there has been a struggle for a still further reduction, but it has been generally resisted, and it will be seen that a very good extent of business has been done, which has been mostly on the basis of the decline above stated. We have to remark, however, that much irregularity has prevailed, and also to state that it requires even running lists of a strong classification, of good staple and free from dust to command outside figures.

The receipts at this port since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas,) are 263,735 bales, against 202,800 bales to same date last year, and the increase in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 55,113 bales.

New Orleans Classification:

SUGAR.—The sales of the week amount to 500 hhds. We quote for Inferior and Refining —to —; Common to Good Common 3½ to 4; Fair to Fully Fair 4¼ to 4¾; Prime to Choice 5 to 5½; Centrifugal and Clarified 6¾ to 8 cents per pound. The above quotations apply to round lots, but small orders of 5 hhds and under, could not be filled without paying a further advance of ¼ to ⅜c per pound.

Of new crop, some 50 hhds. have been received; we are advised of the sale of 15 hhds. fully fair, in two lots—one at 7¼ and the other at 7¾c. and a lot of 7 hhds prime Centrifugal at 8c. per pound.

MOLASSES.—The old crop is almost gone. A few trifling lots were disposed of through the week. The quotations are: Inferior and Fermenting, 25 to 30 cents per gallon; and Prime to Choice Rebolled 33 to 36 cents. Of the new crop several lots have been received, and sold at fancy prices—from 45 to 55 cents a gallon.

GRAIN.—The sales of Corn during the week amount to about 2,000 sacks—the extreme figures of the sales ranging from 90 to 95c. and $1 00 for ordinary to prime mixed, $1 00 to $1 05 for yellow, and $1 10 to 1 15 for good to prime white. Oats sell at 56 to 58c. per bushel for ordinary to prime St. Louis. Bran is quoted at $1 00 to $1 05 per 100 lbs. Wheat sells at $1 15 per bushel.

PORK.—The sales of the week amount to about 2200 bbls. Mess. We quote Mess at $15 50 to $16 00, and M. C. at $11 to $11 50 per barrel.

BEEF. We quote Prime Mess at $11 00 per bbl, no extra brands.

SPECIAL NOTICES.

NOTICE. Persons having business with the NEW ORLEANS DEPOSITORY, will please direct to KEENER & PARKER.

Jackson, September 23, 1859.

To the Members of Mississippi Conference:

The Preachers and Delegates to the next Mississippi Conference, to be held in the city of Jackson on the 16th November next, will, on their arrival at Jackson, report themselves to a committee at the Methodist Church—who have been appointed to receive and conduct them to their homes. It is particularly requested that Delegates who intend to be present will notify me as soon as possible after their appointment, so that places may be assigned them in advance, and they be shown to their quarters without confusion.

The Legislature, the State Fair, and the Supreme, Federal and Circuit Courts will be in session; and, although the city will be excessively crowded, ample provision has been made for the entertainment of every member of and delegate to the Conference and such visiting brethren from a distance as may see proper to attend; but no provision could be made for preachers' wives or daughters, who might be disposed to attend Conference. Sorry for it; but cannot help it this time.

J. L. FORSYTH.

CONFERENCE NOTICE.

For the New Orleans Christian Advocate.

J. R. GRAVES.

Excuse me, Brother Gillespie, I would not introduce such a man to the readers of the Advocate if I did not believe that the cause of truth, under existing circumstances, really demands it. Immersionists, in the vicinity of Evergreen, La., have for some time been spouting about the "iron-wheel," "Infant sprinkling," "Communion," etc. Some time last spring, I touched them off lightly, denounced the iron-wheel as a libel against the Methodist Episcopal Church, South; and, that all Baptists who circulated and endorsed it, were participes criminis with J. R. Graves.

I told them, further, that unless they could prove themselves innocent, that public opinion would pronounce them guilty; as they were understood as endorsing it. A Baptist minister said that they endorsed it intoto; and could and would bring a man who would meet me in discussion, and establish their positions; and would give me six weeks' notice, so that I could arrange my appointments to suit the time. I gave them six months to get their champion. I heard nothing more from them.

A few days since, a friend handed me the Tennessee Baptist of July 16th and 30th; from them, with your permission, I will make a few extracts. It appears that Graves has been called on to defend the iron-wheel himself. In reply to Rev. Jno. Oquin and others, we find the following:

"We do not regard Mr. Fly, per se, as worthy of our consideration in debate. We met him, having been fully endorsed by his Conference as we understand, at Quincy, where he let fully down, and gave out his dinal proposition to his presiding elder."

Mr. Graves did meet me in discussion at Quincy; with that exception, every word in the above paragraph is false. There is not a shadow of truth in another word in his whole article. "The endorsement of the Conference," the "letting down," (unless he means that it was a "letting down" to meet him—which I admit) and the "giving out the last proposition to the presiding elder," was never heard of before.

But, Mr. Editor, Graves is master of his trade; there is but one being in the universe that can beat him at it—and considering his age, and that he is father of it, his old father has not much to boast of.

There are several other false statements, but as they are connected with the subject before us very remotely if at all, we let them pass.

It would seem that his slang did not quite satisfy his brethren; they still urge him to come.

In reply to Crawford, he says: "If possible I will visit you this fall, but must be excused from meeting in religious discussion such clerical buffoons as Fly and J. L. Chapman."

Once upon a time, "Asinus, indutus leonis pelle, superbe ebuccinabat, et reliquas bestias terrifabat," but the sound of his voice betrayed the secret, and showed that there was no real cause for the alarm.

But see how he evades the true issue between Baptists and Methodists. Hear his instructions to Crawford: "In all future discussions with Methodists, they should be called upon to affirm the following propositions: '1, Sprinkling water upon the head is alone scriptural and valid baptism; 2, The Lord's Supper belongs to all who are willing to partake of it, and is a means of grace; 3, Infant baptism is a scriptoral ordinance, and confers or secures the gracious work of the Spirit upon the heart."

That is, in plain English—Bro. Crawford, we cannot sustain our positions in debate with Methodists, as I know from very painful experience; yet, we will require them to affirm everything, even what we know they neither believe nor teach, and thereby raise a dust to cover our retreat; and then we will attack them as usual and banter the Bishops and Doctors of Divinity: we know they will never notice us, and we will take great care to avoid a conflict with those who are set for the defence of Methodism—especially such men as Fly and Chapman—for we have learned from past experience that a debate with either of these men is a calamity much to be dreaded by Baptists.

The following dialogue seems to leak out of the correspondence between Oquin and Graves:

OQUIN.—Brother Graves, I insist that you visit us; and that you defend our positions, especially this one: "The Baptist Church is the Church of God."

GRAVES.—Softly! Aside, my brother: I must be excused. Fly has been a man of war from his youth. I carry scars on my person from wounds inflicted by his sword, which I can never forget; his name brings in a train of unpleasant associations; when I think of Quincy, I am almost thrown into a fit of delirium tremens—my blood is chilled, cold drops stand on my forehead; I see strange things, hear frightful sounds, as if the scenes of Quincy were passing before me. I said then, I never would come in contact with that blade again; and, by the purity of the Iron-wheel, I never will.

OQUIN.—But, Bro. Graves, Fly has made his mark here. I have pledged myself to bring a man who will establish the charges that we have brought against the Methodist Church. Something must be done, and quickly done. Did not Fly "let down at Quincy, and give out his last proposition to the presiding elder?" If you can meet him here, and answer his arguments successfully, you will be worth more to the Baptist Church than a whole menagerie; we would go further to see such a man than we would to see the elephant.

GRAVES.—I never can forget what I have endured; a burnt child dreads the fire. I have proclaimed a victory, this is easily done; but to feel victorious, after such a castigation as I received at Quincy, is a difficult matter. I have said that Fly "let down;" but then, that was all for Buncombe. It is true that he let down some of the hardest arguments that ever fell on my pate. I know that I was not willing to test public opinion by a vote, because I felt that every body, except a few Baptists, felt that I was defeated. I am quite unwilling to face him again. I must be excused. Do not urge the matter, if you please.

OQUIN.—Don't get angry Bro. Graves; our case is urgent. We do not quite understand how it is; that if Fly is small fry, as you intimate, why have immersionists spent so much time in trying to silence him? We learn from your paper that Mr. Stodge, Mr. Tucker, Dr. Brown and yourself, have all tried this "little Fly." Now, pardon me Bro. Graves, but I must say, that if a small man in the Methodist Church can trouble our great men so much, and keep them in hot water so long, I would dread to see you come in contact with one of the "big men."

GRAVES.—My brother, you talk like the shell was still on your head. Do'nt you understand our policy? We debate with such men as we think we can manage; if we find that they are too strong for us, we then call them "buffoons," "small fry," etc., etc., and take good care always to keep at a distance.

OQUIN.—What shall we do, Bro. Graves?

GRAVES.—Oh I will propose to meet any Pedo-Baptist in Louisiana, the parties to be fully endorsed by their Churches—this will look fair; then, if we are taken up, they require me to be endorsed by the First Church, which I can't get. But I do n't think that they will accept the terms. As I have been excluded, and clandestinely reinstated contrary to Baptist usages, and contrary to my own positions taken in the Iron wheel, I cannot be expected to comply with my own proposition.

OQUIN.—Your proposition is accepted; the endorsement of the First Church, at Nashville, must come, or we are fairly cornered.

GRAVES.—Misery! Which way shall I turn, or turning, find relief? Well, at last there is hope. You will recollect, Bro. Oquin, that the items are to be settled by correspondence. Now, I assure you that I will never agree to any thing fair; but will keep up appearances till the itinerant wheel rolls our opponent to some other place, and then we will advertise him as a runaway. We will then have a jollification and crow largely as Shanghais. There now, Bro. John, aint I some?

John bows, and they separate.

Now, Bro. Gillespie, I came to this Conference to labor for and with my brethren; I have attended strictly to my own business; but immersionists have been firing at me all the while, have had my name in the papers for the last eighteen months, and more than a year before I said one word in reference to the points of difference between us. There is a point beyond which forbearance would cease to be a virtue. That point has been reached. Baptist ministers have circulated their Iron-wheel slang, and preached their exclusive sermons, in which they have denounced the Methodist Church as a despotism, and Methodist ministers as perjured rebels, long enough. I have asked the Baptists about Evergreen to cease their Co-manche warfare and come out into the open field; and if they really are "THE CHURCH OF GOD," to affirm it. I deny. They are pledged to do so. Will they? We shall see.

They appear to be alarmed. Graves advises Crawford to abandon the old grounds. Mr Lee, of the Louisiana Baptist, hopes that no Baptist minister will meet "Fly." A sensible suggestion that, Mr. Lee. Your system has a powder-magazine about it, you would do well to keep at a safe distance from sparks. "Prudence is the better part of valor." But, sir, if you should become so impolitic as to allow your creed to be examined before the court of public opinion, you will find that your exclusive claim to be the Church of God will vanish before the light of truth, like snow before the summer sun. I know that your pretensions are a humbug. Will you put me to proof? Never.

In conclusion, I will say to Baptists about Evergreen: if, gentlemen, you cannot redeem your pledge to sustain your proposition, just say so. I will then take the onus probandi upon myself, and affirm that the Baptist Church, on the principles assumed by Baptists, is not the Church of God, nor any part of it; and, that no such Church had an existence for fifteen hundred years after the birth of Christ.

Come, gentlemen, the "war is now carried into Africa;" Scipio is now before your gates; you sent an army to invade Italy, an enemy is now at your capitol. Such is the fate of war. "The Rubicon is passed," you would have it so. Rally your forces, the Romans are upon you. You would not be at peace, you have now trouble at home. "Speak or ever after hold your peace." If you will not face the music, cease your whining about the Church, Methodist Society, rebels, etc.; and learn to love and serve your Maker—do all the good you can, and let other Christians do the same. And, when all the devils are conquered, and all the sinners saved, then root up the tares if you are bidden. "As many as I love, I rebuke and chasten; be zealous, therefore, and repent." A. B. FLY.

LETTER FROM ATLANTA.

OCTOBER 6th, 1859.

On Monday, Oct. 3d, I left Lexington and went to Versailles, on a visit to Bishop Kavanaugh. I found him so much improved as to be able to walk his room and to ride out. He is now convalescent, and will, in all probability, be able to attend the later Conferences assigned him. He may be confidently expected to preside at the Alabama Conference. The whole Church should feel grateful that this faithful servant of God has been spared for future usefulness. The Bishop happily possesses a cheerful piety, which has sustained him in the painful ordeal through which he has just passed. Long may he live to edify the Church with his forceful eloquence, and win the hearts of lost sinners back to the favor of God!

Dr. McTyeire came down in the cars as far as Eminence, where he disembarked to pay that priceless amoeg women, Mrs. Teris, a visit, at Shelbyville.

Dr. McTyeire has made a favorable impression upon the Kentuckians, and they have made an equal one upon him. He has been visiting some of the best farms in Bourbon and Lafayette counties, and feasting his eyes upon neighing steeds, "big-uddered cows," and Baalam's saddle-horses.

On Tuesday morning I left Louisville for Nashville, and after proceeding 94 miles on railroad, staging 32 miles, and riding on a rail once again 72 miles, I arrived at Nashville.

In six weeks more the whole line of the railroad, from Louisville to Nashville, will be completed, and at once become the Grand Trunk Railway, from the South to the East and North. Running as it does within eight miles of the Mammoth Cave, it will increase the visitation to that natural wonder ten-fold. The road is the best made, and best ballasted road that I have ever traveled over—and, although built at an immense cost, must prove profitable to the stockholders.

I found all the hotels crowded with people in attendance upon the Legislature, a Democratic Convention, and the races, and was necessitated to camp out. There is no city in the Union that needs an ample, first-class hotel, more than Nashville; and such an one is being built at an expense of nearly one half million of dollars.

I strolled down to the Publishing-house, and found most of the "great officials" absent on business for the concern. Yet I found Dr. McFerrin, the Agent, and Dr. Summers the editor, in their respective offices, early in the morning. Dr. Summers showed me over the whole establishment. Who could wish a better guide? He is a perfect encyclopedia of all kinds of information, and, like all good-natured men, he is willing to communicate. As we looked upon the corded books, the hissing engines, the sweating presses, the vaults of stereotypes and electrotypes, the bindery, etc., I felt proud of our Publishing house. It increases one's interest in the concern greatly when he passes through and sees the completeness of the whole house.

The Press, next to the Pulpit and Sabbath-school, is the mighty engine of moral power, and our church has done well to inaugurate this enlightened enterprize as an element in the great economy of evangelization. It ought to be endowed liberally, so that sacred literature may be cheapened, and thus made accessible to the masses; and then will its influence be felt in the increased intelligence of the Church, a more enlightened ministry, and a revival of God's work in every department of our ecclesiastical system.

Let no one prophecy a failure for this House. It MUST succeed. It would be a burning shame if a publishing-house with more than 2000 itinerant agents, laboring among over half a million of people under Methodist influence, could not be sustained. Let all the preachers and people resolve that this establishment shall not only continue, but have a career as ceaseless as future time and as brilliant as the meridian sun!

A second edition of Dr. Rivers' Moral Philosophy has been found necessary, and is now being brought out in neat style. It is to become the text-book on moral science in all our Southern Institutions; and will, doubtlessly, be adopted by the more conservative schools and colleges of the North. The misfortune with former authors on this subject has been, that they had written as though their books were designed for philosophers. Dr. Rivers has written his for those who wish to learn to be philosophers. It is lucid in style, and, whatever may be thought of some minor views, it has the benefit of being unobjectionable as a system to any section of the country. A Northern publisher, sagaciously perceiving the necessity of such a work, has made tempting overtures to the author to secure its publication by his house; but, Dr. Rivers being a Southerner and Southern Methodist Preacher and President, has resisted the offer and left the book where it belongs, in the hands of the "Publishing-house, at Nashville.

"Theophilus Walton" continues to sell; and, wherever it goes, it is a sure antidote to a most insidious poison. Harrison deserves as much credit for furnishing it, as any physician would who should discover an unfailing preventive to the yellow fever.

In the Publishing-house I met with Fountein E. Pitte, the valiant soldier of Christ who hath won so many jewels for the crown of his Savior. He is evidently worn with the toils of long service, yet looks as though he might sound the clarion and lead the charge in many a battle yet.

Leaving Nashville, we stopped a short time at Chattanooga. A moon-lit view of the stern visage of Lookout Mountain repaid well for a short walk we took from the depot.

Soon I was again on the move; and this morning I find myself in the city of rails, Atlanta, Georgia. What a rush of passengers, clatter of wheels, and tooting of steam-whistles here! Atlanta is not an attractive city to the stranger—yet many feel here the heart-beat of an active business. Young cities, like half-grown boys, always present an awkward appearance. Years will give the grace of manhood to Atlanta. It must ever depend upon its rail-roads for its prosperity, since there is little else in the country around to support a matured city. It boasts a Medical College, in which Dr. Means, the Southern Gilfillan, has a Chair.

This morning, at 10½, I expect to leave for Montgomery.

H. A. M. HENDERSON

INDIA-RUBBER-AND-DUG-OUT CONFERENCE.

The southern portions of Louisiana and Texas abound in settlements of people commonly called "Swampers." According to the vulgar opinion that all human beings have souls, we may infer that these people have among them at least a few souls. Throughout the whole coast sections of these States there are also many settlements on diminutive rivers, lakes and out-of-the-way bayous, of poor people, living by hoeing or hunting, who may also be supposed to have a few souls among them. By an occasional accident one may here and there find two or three men camped on a little island, who, though living by fishing, may also be credited with a soul or two.

Now it happens that this large district is the occasional route of passage of the Conference above named, composed of one or one-and-weary preachers. This effective and laborious body is indefatigable in efforts to transact business, i. e., get through, scarcely taking time to indulge in the worldly thoughts suggested by the rich lands around them. They are careful to spend as few of Mr. Wesley's social hours as possible, constantly endeavoring to cheer themselves by "the hope set before them" of getting out. Indeed the attitude, or rather movings of this Conference are so novel a sight, that on occasion of even the shortest hour of rest, skiff, dug-outs and high India-rubber boots may be seen bringing their passengers in great numbers to gaze thereon, and intently listen for the dulcet notes of some stranger-land. This assembled divinity is not to be admired for the display of kids, the polish of leather, or the array of gilt canes, but on the contrary often presents rather a rough appearance. This, however, is excusable from the fact that more fashionable regions will soon be reached where the outer man will undergo a change that will make it presentable to eyes refined.

Now, considering that a few souls are found in this remarkable and almost unknown region, it is proposed that this Conference hold regular sessions and earnestly solicit transfers from the more populous ones. The country offers many inducements to transfers and the citizens feel that they have only to name them in order to receive numerous accessions to their present force. For instance, the transfers will be taught the useful art of handling the oar and paddle, initiated into the mysteries of swamp-wading, and thoroughly inured to chills and mosquitoes. They will also be taught how to obtain natural glories, which will in time prevent blistering by the sun, and may, if diligent, graduate in swamp geography. Another thing, valuable as it is appreciated, is that a few souls may be saved from being irretrievably swamped!

"Preachers of Louisiana and Texas Conferences! our lakes, bayous and swamps call loudly for the gospel! Will you not lay aside gloves and pumps, cease to hurry through these dreary regions, and learn to "stop a while" and talk about Jesus? So mote it be!

Children's Column.

"Suffer the Little Children to come unto Me."

For the New Orleans Christian Advocate.

The Little German Girls.

It is the custom, dear children, in some of our Sabbath schools, to have a committee of teachers, whose duty it is to go out into the highways and hedges and bring in the children that they may receive religious instruction—that they "may hear of Heaven and learn the way." Then, too, this committee call on strangers and invite their children also to come to Sabbath school. The members of some of these committees often report, at the Teachers' Monthly Meeting, interesting incidents connected with their mission.

Some years ago, while a committee of this kind were out rambling in the suburbs of our city for the purpose of gathering in scholars, they were attracted by a number of children, who were playing in front of a small red shop. As they approached and asked if any of them went to Sabbath school, the children looked glad and replied politely. The shop-keeper, hearing strange voices at her door, came out and appeared very much interested in the conversation which was going on, when one of the committee turned and asked if she would send her children. She smiled as if she felt complimented, and pointed at two little girls, who were between four and seven years of age, saying, "Take them—they are mine," while her broken English could scarcely be understood. And in the little girls could not speak a word of English save the monosyllables, yes and no. The committee were puzzled, for they had no German teacher in their school. After some hesitation they concluded to take their names; as they were strangers it might amuse them to see the nice little children who assembled in our infant class every Sabbath morning. Then, too, it might keep them from running in the street and learning bad words. On the following Sabbath morning a member of the committee brought the girls, Mata and Nancy, into the school-room and handed them over to the kind-hearted infant class teacher, who smilingly seid, as she took charge of them, "We will teach them to talk; being girls, they will soon learn." No wonder that she was inspired with the hope of success at the moment, for the little bright-eyed Germens looked up into her face and smiled so sweetly. To the astonishment of every one, in a few weeks their voices were heard to chime in with the other scholars' as they sang that beautiful hyme, "There is a happy land."

Each Sabbath morning found them occupying their seats in the class; never, as the manner of some children, coming in at a late hour, loudly trampling up the aisle, diverting the attention not only of those who were more punctual from their recitations, but greatly annoying the teachers. The little girls were also sent to a day school; for at that time the Methodist Church of this city had a free school under her fostering care, where many, many destitute little children claimed care and protection at the hands of kind-hearted, generous teachers. There the Germans soon learned the use of many English words and made great progress in their studies. Mata became so attached to her Sabbath school teacher that, after having found where she lived, she would walk every morning seven blocks out of her way, just to peep in at a window of the house where her teacher dwelt. To do this she had to take an early start from home, so as not to be marked as a truant from school. As soon as she had met the glance of her teacher, she would call out her name with such glee, and dart off again on her way to school, as if that smile was all her childish heart needed to gladden it through the day. She gave strong evidences of a renewed heart, and two years had passed briefly away, when the dark shadow from the wings of the angel of Death overspread our land! The homes of thousands were desolated by the dreadful epidemic. And the name of dear little Mata was among the first on the list of the City Sexton! Her redeemed spirit had gone to be an angel in "That happy land, far, far away,

Where saints in glory stand,
Bright, bright as day!"

Manners.

Young folks should be mannerly. But how to be so is the question. Many good boys and girls feel that they cannot behave to suit themselves in the presence of company. They are awkward, clownish, rough. They feel timid, bashful and self-distrustful the moment they are addressed by a stranger, or appear in company. There is but one way to get over this feeling, and acquire easy and graceful manners; that is to do the best they can all the time, at home as well as abroad. Good manners are not learned so much as acquired by habit. They grow upon us by use. We must be courteous, agreeable, civil, kind, gentlemanly and womanly at home, and then it will be a kind of second nature to be so everywhere. A coarse, rough manner at home, begets a habit of roughness which we cannot lay off, if we try, when we go among strangers. The most agreeable people we have ever known in company, are those that are perfectly agreeable at home. Home is the school for all the best things.

Four Little Children.

Four little children were playing together near some water, when one of them fell in, and would have been drowned, had not his brother jumped in after him and pulled him out. Another brother helped to carry him home, and their little sister followed them. A little while after, their father, who had heard what had taken place, called them into his study, that he might reward them as they deserved. He then asked the first, "What did you do when you saw your brother drowning?" "I rushed in after him and brought him out." "You did well: here is your reward. And what did you do?" turning to the second. "I helped to carry him home." "That was right: here is your reward. And what did you do when you saw your brother sinking?" speaking to the latter, being a little girl three years old, "I prayed, papa." "Well, that was all you could do; here is a book for you too."

A Word to Boys.

Begin in early life to collect libraries of your own. Begin with a single book; and when you find or hear of any first-rate book, obtain it if you can. After a while another, as you are able, and be sure to read it. Take the best care of your books, and in this way, when you are men, you will have good libraries in your heads as well as on your shelves.

The Family Circle.

"Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee."

LOVE A WIFE AND RULE A WIFE.

I wish every husband would copy into his memorandum book this sentence from a recently published work: "Woman must be constituted very differently from men. A word said, a line written, and we are happy; omitted, our hearts ache as if for a great misfortune. Men cannot feel it, or guess at it; if they did, the most careless of them would be slow to wound us so."

The grave hides many a heart which has been stung to death, because one who might, after all, have loved it after a certain careless fashion, was deaf, dumb and blind to the truth in the sentence we have just quoted, or if not, was at least restive and impatient with regard to it. Many men, marrying late in life, being accustomed only to take care of themselves, and that in the most erratic, rambling, exciting fashion, eating and drinking, sleeping and walking whenever and wherever their fancy, or good cheer and amusement, questionable or unquestionable, prompted; come at last, when they get tired of this, with their selfish habits fixed as fate, to—matrimony. For a while it is a novelty. Shortly, it is strange as irksome, this always being obliged to consider the comfort and happiness of another. To have something always hanging on the arm, which used to swing free, or at most, but whirl a cane. Then, they think their duty done if they provide food and clothing, and refrain (possibly) from harsh words. Ah—is it? Listen to that sigh as you close the door. Watch the gradual fading of the eye, and paling of the cheek, not from age—she should be yet young—but that gnawing pain at the heart, born of the settled conviction that the great hungry craving of her soul, as far as you are concerned, must go forever unsatisfied. God help such wives, and keep them from attempting to slake their souls' thirst at poisoned fountains.

Think, you, her husband, how little a kind word, a smile, a caress to you, how much to her. If you call these things "childish" and "beneath your notice," then you should never have married. There are men who should remain forever single. You are one. You have no right to require of a woman her health, strength, time and devotion, to mock her with this shadowy, unsatisfying return. A new bonnet, a dress, a shawl, a watch, anything, everything but what a true woman's heart most craves—sympathy, appreciation, love. She may be rich in the everlasting else; but if she be poor in these, and is a good woman, she had better die.

There are hard, unloving, cold monstrosities of women, (rare exceptions,) who neither require love, nor know how to give it. We are not speaking of these. That big-hearted, loving, noble men have occasionally been thrown away upon such, does not disprove what we have been saying. But even a man thus situated has greatly the advantage of a woman in a similar position, because, over the needle, a women may think herself into an insane asylum, while the active, out-door turmoil of business life is at least a sometime reprieve to him.

Do you ask me, "Are there no happy wives?" God be praised, yes, and glorious, loveable husbands, too, who know how to treat a woman, and would have her neither fool nor drudge. Almost every wife would be a good and a happy wife, were she only loved enough. Let husbands, present and prospective, think of this.—Fanny Fern.

FALL FASHIONS.

The observant traveler through the streets of our principal cities—through Broadway in New York, Chestnut street in Philadelphia, and Washington street in Boston—the great centres from which the fashions of the new world radiate—will notice a change in the tints of the goods displayed in the windows of the milliners and dry-goods men. As the deepening greens of our forests begin to assume a more brilliant hue, changing to purples, and browns, and yellows—colors of a richer hue and a warmer tone, so do the tints of the ribbons, and silks, and velvets also begin to assume a richer, a darker, and warmer hue. Cool colors are most agreeable to the eye in summer, while the warm and brilliant tints, which all Northeners are fond of, become pleasant in the winter. Red, the favorite color of England, is suggestive of a cool, damp climate; the inhabitants of the British Islands require warm colors in their clothing, to give them a feeling of comfort. English farmers generally wear red waistcoats, English hunters wear red coats as do English soldiers. The Lord Chancellor of England puts on a red robe when he takes his seat on the wool sack; the Speaker of the House of Commons also wears a red robe, and so do the majority of English officials. Welsh women wear red cloaks, and a "flame colored" livery of some kind is worn by all sorts of servants. Red in our hot, dry climate and clear atmosphere would be positively offensive to the eye, the greater part of the year. But red is sprinkled among the leaves of the forest in autumn; the berries of the mountain are a bright orange color, and the berries of the holly are crimson; and so we see sprinkled in the textures worn in the fall months, streaks of vermillion and crimson bows on ladies' bonnets. Fashion, though changing, is not so fickle as she is generally accused of being. There is method and philosophy in her seeming freaks. The fall fashions conform to fall weather.

THE SEPARATION OF FRIENDS BY DEATH

Is less terrible than the divorce of true hearts that have loved but have ceased to sympathize, while memory is still recalling what they once were to each other.

"WHY ARE YOU LIKE A CRAZY MAN, my dear?" asked a wife. "Don't know," replied the husband, scratching his head. "Why," replied the wife, hitching closer to him, and putting on one of her sweetest smiles, "I'm your other self, and you are beside yourself!"

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

REV. BREWRY FLOWERS, in the 79th year of his age, died near Slate Hill in Randolph county, Alabama, on 12th August, 1859. He was born May 1st, 1780, in the State of North Carolina, but was principally brought up in Darlington District, South Carolina, where he married Miss Katharine Sullivan, in the 21st year of his age; at twenty-six, he embraced religion, and became at once a warm-hearted, working member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was licensed to preach in his thirty-second year, was ordained Deacon by Bishop Asbury in his thirty-sixth, and Elder by Bishop George, in his forty-fourth year. He lived some time in Henry county, Georgia; and, subsequently, several years in Fayette county, in the same State; from which he was brought to Alabama several months ago, in a state of great physical feebleness, and mental alienation, where he lingered under the vigilant and devoted care of his venerable wife and their daughters, with their husbands; and, such devoted attention and nursing assiduity, as he received from them has seldom been witnessed in this world; his mental faculties were so much impaired, that he seemed to know almost nothing besides God, as a pardoning God. But when you spoke to him of experimental religion, he seemed to be himself again. He was the most perfect example of patience I ever saw, he never complained, was easily controled by any member of the family; and, whatever else he forgot, he never forgot to pray. I have often heard his tender, plaintive, pleading voice as it fell upon the stillness of the midnight hour offering up his accustomed prayer; that prayer is now lost in endless praise. Father Flowers, as a preacher, was acceptable and useful; as a christian, he had the confidence of all: and in all the relations of life he approached as near perfection, I think, as I have ever known any man to come. His life closed as calm and sweet as a summer evening.

W. D. MATTHEWS.

REV. LUKE CONERLY died at his residence in Sabine parish, La., on the 8th inst., in the 69th year of his age. He was born and raised in Duplin county, North Carolina, where he married Miss Rebecca Wilkinson, with whom he spent more than forty years of his life, and who now mourns the loss of one of the best of husbands. They emigrated to Marion county, Mississippi in 1822, and again to Sabine parish, La., in 1849. He embraced religion and joined the M. E. Church soon after moving to Mississippi, and shortly after felt it to be his duty to call sinners to repentance, and was licensed to exhort and subsequently to preach, and was a local preacher about thirty years—most of which time he filled the place of circuit and recording steward, and his house was the preachers' home. "Uncle Luke," as he was familiarly termed, was not a great man as the world estimates greatness; but only great as he was good. Modest and unassuming in his manners, and persuasive in his arguments, it seemed almost impossible to listen to his admonitions without falling in love with his counsels. He was not only more than ordinarily esteemed for his Christian virtues and moral qualities, but as a citizen he was highly respected. He was perfectly calm, retained his reason to the last, and expressed a willingness to depart and be with his Savior. L. LEWIS.

MARGARET EUPHRASIA STURDIVANT, wife of Wyatt S. Sturdivant, and youngest daughter of Samuel and Margaret Berryhill, was born in Choctaw County, Miss., August 20th, 1835, was born of God in 1850, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church South, in the year 1854; and died near the spot where she was born September 19th, 1859. A short time before her death, she requested that there should be no weeping around her, for after death she would be "better off."

TRUTH OMNIPOTENT.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from A. W. Vesey, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vassor, of Lowndes county, Miss., who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, one that ought to go home to those to whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

DEAR VESEY: Under the principles of justice and humanity, I am indined to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing no timely sorrow in many a happy household.

On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 14 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from Worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sovereign remedy against this terrible enemy of children, I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly, by the acquiescence of my family Physician. On the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, save in quantity, being afraid to give the amount of prescription. I was unable to detect any impression occasioned by it until late in the afternoon of that

THE CHINA MISSION.

ROOKS' WELLS, HOLMES COUNTY, MISS., October 10th, 1859.

MR. EDITOR: Sometime late in July I received a letter from the Rev. J. W. Lambuth, Missionary in China, and one from his excellent lady, both interesting and cheering as to their prospects in China; and, an acknowledgment of the amount of $538 00, less nine percent exchange, sent on by order of the Mississippi Annual Conference, for a Church in China. Also $100 from the estate of the Rev. S. Shepherd, bequeathed by him to buy one hundred Bibles and thus kindle one hundred fires in China. These letters I would have copied, or made extracts from and have sent them to you for publication, but I was not able to do so. For almost fourteen weeks I have been sick.

About two weeks since I received another letter from Brother Lambuth, and one from Rev. Andrew Liew our respected brother in Christ, the Chinese preacher, and his wife Mary. I send you these two last letters. You can publish them, or make extracts from them as you please. Liew's letter is in Chinese, but accompanying it is a translation, by Brother Lambuth.

On the day Mr. Lambuth left New York, for China, off Sandy-hook, he commenced a Journal, that contains all the interesting events of the voyage, in the Ariel; recorded every day at one o'clock, during a four months passage, including the latitude and longitude, the state of the weather, clear, cloudy or rainy, calm, windy or stormy, the course of the wind and the temperature of the air and water. A work perhaps never entirely performed by any one individual, and this was daily continued until they left the ship off Shanghai, after one o'clock, and his daily observations, and record of the same. This Journal I have long had in my possession, and in a letter from Prof. Henry of the Smithsonian Institute at Washington, it is suggested that I submit a copy of the scientific observations of Mr. Lambuth to Lieutenant Maury for inspection and publication. I have also received and caused to be sent to other Institutions than Madison College, Chinese Bibles, tracts and curiosities for their Libraries and Museums, sent by our excellent Brother Wm. Lambuth.

Now, Brother, let me say to the friends of Rev. Simpson Shepherd, deceased: A Bible, as bequeathed by him, has been sent by the American Minister to the Emperor of China, and as I see the Minister has arrived it has been kindly received, that Bible is at this time doubtless in the Emperor's possession. O if the spirit of the just can behold the transactions of this world! with what delight must the departed spirit of that saint of God behold the blessed effects of this last act of his life "Go thou and do likewise."

I cannot close, without asking every member of the Mississippi Annual Conference, that he will remember in his efforts, the China Mission. I received at the Kosciusko Conference a pledge from many brethren to try to raise each one hundred dollars, amounting to $3900, only $538 of this has been received and sent on, as originally intended for a Church at Shanghai. Come, brethren, to Conference prepared to redeem the pledge. Come, too, with the money to send another Missionary from the Mississippi Annual Conference to China. You have promised by a solemn vote to do it. This is not all. Let the young man come, with self-sacrificing wife, that is ready and willing to go, and go at once. The United States Government has a bold on Chinese feeling that opens our way to any part of China.

Come, too, ready to go to Mexico. I have evidence that Mexico is now open for missionary effort. The Macedonian cry is heard from that afflicted land as well as from Japan, and China: "Come over and help us." Although, dear Brother, in possession of more documents and regular information from China than any other one, so far at least as Brother Lambuth and wife are concerned, I have not for six years troubled you, or any editor, or your readers; and if you and they will forgive this I will not soon trouble them again; unless in better health, and duty should imperatively demand it.

Your Brother, T. C. THORNTON.

MR. LAMBUTH'S LETTER.

That plan of remitting funds (by mail) to China, is the safest and most speedy, and attended with decidedly less care and anxiety, than sending specie by ship. Anything which can be sent by mail is never advisable to send by ship, for it is often the case that six, eight, and ten months elapse before the arrival of ships at this port. But by mail it is here in two months and a half.

My health is very good at this time. I have recovered my entire strength, and I am now able to engage in my regular work. Thanks be unto God for His great goodness to me, an unprofitable servant. Pray for me, my dear brother, that I may give myself a living sacrifice to God. The health of my family is very good. It is certainly a cause of great rejoicing to us, for we feel daily that we are in the very midst of sickness and death.—Sister Jenkins' health is not good. We hope, if it be the good pleasure of God, she will not have to go home. I think it is probable they will have to go over to Japan for a few weeks, or to some part of China near the seacoast.

Bro. Liew sends a letter by this mail to you. He was much rejoiced to hear of your making him a life-member of the Missionary Society. He speaks of it in his letter, as you will see. The certificate you spoke of sending has not yet arrived, and I hope, for our our brother and sister Liew's sake, it will come, that I may hand it over to them as a proof of what has been done. In my report to the Conference I hope to have them—that is, all our native members—write a letter and sign their names, that the brethren in the conference may remember them in prayer to God. The treaty goes into effect on the 26th of this month, and we hope that the day has come when we shall no longer be prevented from preaching boldly the unsearchable riches of the Gospel. We hope you will all remember us in prayer to God, that we may not labor in vain for the conversion of this people. I cannot now speak of the efforts I have been making to obtain places in other cities in the interior where I can preach, but I will do so in my report in July. This is Monday; I have just returned from the country. On Monday of this week I expect to go again; so when I return I shall send my report to the conference.

Believe me over yours, in Christ Jesus,

J. W. LAMBUTH.

SHANGHAI, CHINA, 5TH MONTH, 8TH DAY, June 8th, 1859.

This letter I send to give you information.—

PRESIDENT THORNTON—Most noble and venerable teacher, in your much loved home you trust in God for protection, peace and everlasting blessing. I, at this great distance, have heard of your advanced age, over sixty, and that your body and strength still remain firm. Your whole heart is given up to the instruction of the youth and to the preaching of the inspired word of God. I, your younger brother, received on the 8th day of April, a letter which was written by your own hand, the words of which were entirely affectionate and manifesting a loving spirit. You, together with your friends, having willingly lent your aid to the Church of God, by giving forty dollars to make myself and wife life-members of the Missionary Society, I, therefore, certainly know you truly love and care for us; but I have nothing to return you for all this great kindness. This is the abundant grace of God our Heavenly Father, which has called all nations to love each other and serve Him.

First, I wish to thank God for His abundant goodness to me. Secondly, I thank you, my elder brother, and also all my brethren who did assist in making me a life-member. I, therefore, morning and night, unite with my family in solemn prayer for God's blessing upon His Church in America and in China. I also pray that the younger members may be confirmed by the grace of God so that they may be able to resist temptation and to give their whole hearts to believe the word of God. I pray God to bless and protect the elder members of the Church; and I also pray God to bless you and make you a living member of His Church, and give you everlasting life in Heaven. And I pray for the conversion of all in foreign countries and in China. I also remember in my petitions to God the particular church to which I belong, that it may daily increase, both here and elsewhere. Our church has now been in China for many years, and we are almost without strength, as the diseased body of a man, and no physician to heal it. It is because our missionary board have not built us a church; moreover, the preachers of the Word are too few, because God, by His loving kindness, has opened the doors of China, and now the Gospel can be preached in every place. Paul says: "He which soweth sparingly, shall reap also sparingly; and he which soweth bountifully, shall reap also bountifully." Therefore, if you have any relative or friend in your conference who is willing to leave his country, and, as it were, throw away his body for Jesus, and come to China and preach the holy doctrine of Jesus, it will be a good and glorious work. It would certainly be of great profit to the church, and our Heavenly Master would delight in such a one.

My elder brother, we are separated many miles apart. Some years back I never knew you; neither have I, as yet, seen your face. How are we now acquainted? It is that our Heavenly Father, having called us to believe in His Word, therefore we are not strangers to each other. Moreover, all who love Jesus are as one body. I hope you, my most excellent elder brother, will send me your likeness, that I may see it every day, and continually remember you. I pray God to teach my heart to listen to the instruction and admonition contained in your letter. I hope you and your household are all well, together with the brethren of your conference, and may peace be with you.

President Thornton, I daily desire to inquire after your peace.

ANDREW AND MARY LIEW
Send greetings to you.

THE AMAZON AND ITS PEOPLE.

It will be remembered that two years since an effort was made by the Board to distribute the Bible along this river. Mr. Robert Nesbit, who had before ascended it on secular business, was employed as an agent for distribution. As stated in the last report, he made a very auspicious beginning at Para and vicinity, putting in circulation over 2,000 Bibles and Testaments among those who were desirous of reading them. According to his original purpose, he then took a supply, and began to ascend the great river by a steamer bound for Nauta, on the borders of Para. Seldom had any one a finer prospect of success and usefulness before him. But the Lord's ways are not as our ways. He was early taken somewhat ill on the voyage, soon grew worse, and when he had ascended some 2,000 miles, his hopeful agency and his life were brought to a close.

Mr. Nesbit wrote some sketches of his voyage, particularly in regard to the people, climate, and productions of the Amazon valley, designing, when he commenced distributions in the upper country, and on his return, to furnish an account of his further Bible work. Such a work he was not permitted there to perform.

Having received, however, some sketches of the country referred to, we have thought it might be interesting to our readers to peruse a few extracts, which we now make. Though pertaining to a region now occupying but little of the world's attention, the time must come, and that rapidly, when millions will there find their home, and the Gospel, as we trust, have a wide and glorious triumph.

Brazil is emphatically a Romish country, yet the supreme government is very liberal in reference to other creeds. The emperor has not only given permission to the Protestant English and American residents to build a church in Para, but has donated the land to build it upon; but there is not interest enough among them to do so.

Schools are increasing in Para, as well as on the Amazon generally. The great drawback heretofore has been the scarcity of school books of every kind. For, excepting at Para, there is not a bookstore on the river Amazon, a length of 3,500 miles. I have been in schools on the upper Amazon, of thirty and forty children, with not an entire book in them.

There is considerable business done in Para, principally by a few foreign houses, English, American, German, French, and Portuguese. Upon these houses the jobbers depend, who supply the up country and river traders, and who receive in return, seringa, or India rubber, and other products of the Amazon valley. By the time the consumer gets his supply, the article has more than doubled in value. The climate of Para and of the Amazon valley generally is good. There are none of those sudden transitions of temperature from heat to cold, that we experience in North America. The thermometer does not vary more than ten or twelve degrees all the year round. From seventy-six to eighty-eight Fahrenheit, with always pleasant sea breezes in the afternoon and evening, with the nights so cool as to make a blanket acceptable. There are no alternations of the seasons as with us, but one continual Spring, in which you may plant every day in the year. The only difference is, that there is more rain in one half of the year than in the other. From December to May is called the wet season. There is no such thing as crops suffering from drought on the Amazon, for there is seldom a week without rain. The climate here is unlike that of Africa in the same latitudes, which is either scorching heat, or drenching rain.

In starting up the broad Amazon on the southern side, among the numerous islands, we notice first the Rio Guama, just above Para, with water enough for light draught steamboats, and many settlements on its banks, where sugar cane, and various articles for the Para market are raised, with seringa, or India rubber in abundance. But there is everywhere evidence of a lack of industry among the people, though there is plenty of excellent land for agricultural purposes, and splendid plantations might be opened with much less labour than is required on our western frontier. The Rio Tocantins empties into the southern extremity of the Bay of Marocciro, which at this point is ten or twelve miles wide. About forty-five or fifty miles from its mouth is the city of Cameta, containing about 20,000 inhabitants, and large quantities of cocoa, mandioca, rice, tobacco, and sugar cane, are raised, with oil from the andiroba nut, which is collected on the islands. The women paint gourds, which are used as drinking vessels, and manufacture vessels of white clay, which they fancifully ornament with various figures.

This region of country enjoys a fine climate, clear, good water, abundance of fish, with deer and game of every kind. There is a great deal of business done at Cameta, so much so, that the Steam Navigation Company have appointed one of their steamers to run as a semi-monthly packet between this place and Para. The Rio Tocantins is one of the most important branches of the lower Amazon. Amongst the mountains, at the sources of this stream, both gold and diamonds have been found, but the Indians are very hostile to the whites, and have murdered some venturous parties. The land is fertile, and is said to produce some of the best coffee that is raised in the Brazils.

The town of Monte Alegre is built upon an elevation of land overlooking the main river, and contains about 1,500 inhabitants. The range of mountains here extends back for a great distance, and are known to contain both gold and diamonds in abundance; and although several parties have from time to time gone to explore them, owing to the hostility of the Indian tribes, they have never returned to tell their tale. But the rich treasures of this magnificent country will not always remain undeveloped. Santarem, containing about 10,000 inhabitants, is the second town of importance on the Amazon. It is about 600 miles from the ocean, and about 450 from the Barra. Considerable business is done here in collecting the productions of the country. The people of Santarem are exceedingly hospitable to strangers. There is a semi-monthly communication between this place and Para, by the Amazon steamers, which has much increased its business and importance. The market of this town is better supplied with edibles than that of Para. Cattle are abundant, and of good quality. Many horses and mules are raised in this vicinity for the Para market. Santarem has a great advantage over many towns on the Amazon—there are no musquitoes there.

Obidos, about 150 miles from Santarem, contains about 2,000 inhabitants, and is a flourishing place. The Amazon Company have established a colony in the vicinity, which appears to work well. We saw Villa Nova on the right bank of the river. Between these points, several steamers empty into the Amazon, whose banks are covered with thick forests, inhabited by monkeys, parrots, wild hogs, etc. In fact there is a vast extent of tillable land everywhere, occupied only by the wildest denizens of the forest, capable of sustaining hundreds of thousands of the human race. In this country of the Amazon, health, comfort, and longevity, might be obtained on easy terms; there is so little cause of disease, that I must think it naturally a healthy region, for their miserable mode of living would cut life off very short any where else.

We of the United States know but little of this vast valley, either as to its fertility, health or natural resources; for it has never been explored, nor ever will be by its owners. Bible Society Record.

THEODORE PARKER.

THE Methodist Quarterly for October has, as its first book-review, from the pen of Dr. Wheden, the following notice of "Theodore Parker's Experience as a Minister, with some account of his early life and education for the ministry, contained in a letter from him to the members of the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society of Boston." The notice is a complete resume and exposition of Parkerism. Dr. Wheden says:

Theodore Parker lately informed us, in a sarcastic tone, that "orthodoxy is dyspeptic." We now learn from the same authority that heterodoxy is pulmonic. "Medical men" have bidden it "be silent and flee off for life to a more genial clime." It has availed itself of the opportunity of adding another item to its plagiarisms of the orthodoxy it abuses, by telling its "experience." That experience is more entertaining than edifying. It attracts by the peculiar power of the author's style; it fails to edify from the unhappy character of the system. It is strikingly variegated with strains of eloquence scarce unworthy of John Milton, and streaks of blasphemy quite worthy of Thomas Paine.

Mr. Parker, by his own chronology of life, has nearly closed his half century. Born of Unitarian parents, and attendant upon the ministry of Dr. Channing, he was thoroughly indoctrinated in the principles of natural right, but slightly tinctured with the principles of religious truth. The scanty creed of Unitarianism by natural progress, or rather regress, soon disappeared, and left him before manhood what he has since remained, a pure Deist. He settled very early in his own mind the primary dogma that miracles were impossible, and by consequence, that the inspiration and all the supernatural facts of the Bible were by anticipation falsities; and by this fundamental law of criticism the genuineness of those sacred records was to be tested and repudiated. Believing himself destined to be a preacher, he passed through the divinity school of Harvard, and thence to a country pulpit.

But in order to be a preacher it was necessary to have a religion. Harvard may abound in skillful chess playing, but is poorly endowed with piety. Being as poorly endowed in this respect as his Alma, Theodore was obliged to inaugurate a religion of his own. He identified, therefore, in the soul of man the "Three Intuitions" of Right, of the Divine or God, and of Immortality. These three fundamental intuitions are the basis, or, we may say, the entire substance of his Absolute Religion; so that his creed, if not his Piety, is triune. To this religion he made of himself a complete surrender, and felt rising in himself a vivified strength to act according to its dictates. Thus converted, dedicated and regenerated, he entered the pulpit, and the parody was complete.

At this point we may first suggest that Christianity, as we understand it, embraces these three intuitions, so that the absolute religion, so far as it is positive, is truly embodied in the theology of the Bible. God, immortality, and the Divine Law—are not these fundamental in the Scripture system? They there exist, sustained by additional proofs and enforced by higher sanctions than pure Theism can pretend; and all Mr. Parker attempts is to diminish those evidences and lower those sanctions. And second, in addition to these three intuitions, which afford the basis of Mr. Parker's system, it is quite competent for us to inaugurate a fourth, authenticated by equally valid signatures, namely, an intuition of the supernatural or miraculous, which may stand as the basis of the Incarnation and all the attendant miracles of the Christian Theology. These two germinal suggestions, we apprehend, properly expanded, would furnish a fundamental refutation of Parkerism.

Having entered the pulpit, Mr. Parker, after a period of moral misgiving, sent forth his blast of war against Christianity in language and temper worthy the whole line of her assailants from Celsus to Strauss. Let the following passage illustrate how his absolute religion can,

"Quack itself in oaths,
And fall to cursing like a very drab."

"I knew that I had thoroughly broken with the ecclesiastical authority of Christendom; its God was not my God, nor its Scriptures my Word of God, nor its Christ my Savior; for I preferred the Jesus of historic fact to the Christ of theologic fancy. Its narrow, partial, and unnatural Heaven I did not wish to enter on the terms proposed, nor did I fear, since earliest youth, its mythic, roomy Hell, wherein the Triune God, with his pack of devils to aid, tore the human race in pieces forever and ever."

When Mr. Parker issued forth his manifesto, results followed at which he seems to have been very much surprized. The friends of the Christian religion withdrew their fellowship, avoided his intimacy, and discouraged his publications. Mr. Parker's surprise at this is to us very surprising. How he could expect that a community who considered him as undermining the foundations of public morality, of rudely assailing our holiest feelings and noblest hopes, should not look coldly on him, is a problem whose only solution can be found in the depth of his personal egotism.

* * * * * * *

It was our fortune to read in close connection Mr. Parker's "experience" and Dr. Stevens's historical portraiture of Wesley. We thereby were led to bring into close comparison the Christian and the anti-christian Reformer. We must say that in the presence of the great, serene, reverential founder of Methodism our Absolute Religionist looks meager, limping, and bombastic. Great pretences does he make of originality, and haughty rejection of the faith and theologies of past ages. And yet he miserably fails in comparative depth and power. How infinitely less searching in his discourse to disturb the guilty conscience with the damnation of sin and the terrors of God! How feebly he arouses the scourge of remorse or the radical volition of repentance! What knows he of the rapture of pardon, of communion with God, and joy in the Holy Ghost? All these deep, solemn, glorious feelings he ignores, and substitutes old Stoicism, with its marble moral will and its desperate reliance on self. Hence, never, never can he stir the moral depths of the popular heart, and pour religious revival through the soul of the dying masses of men. No John Nelsons or George Storys spring up to his side. No Kingswood colliers grow holy under his discourse. No helpers rise by hundreds to carry the glad evangel to the common people of all the land. No impatient missionaries burn to herald his frozen Gospel to distant isles and continents. From the far hemisphere and antipodes no echo comes, making the heavens above him glad with the shout of redeemed souls rejoicing in a Gospel of peace.

A Southern paper thinks it would be hard to find anywhere "more lawyers, doctors, colonels, captains, majors and squires, more legislation and laws less understood, more migratory population, more half-cooked biscuit, harder corn dodgers, less care for expenses, more regard for females, more go-aheadativeness, more Bibles and more novels, more religion and more devils, more cleverness and liberality, more real independence, wilder oxen, more politeness and gawkiness, more dangerous steam boats, unsafer banks, more pitching horses and awkward dancers, than in our beloved and honored United States." Boston Post.

ANECDOTES ABOUT HYMNS.

Congregational Singing.

It would almost be an act of injustice were we to omit a reference to the general excellence of the African ear for singing, which is so commonly shown in many of the ordinary occurrences of life as to be a frequent subject of remark in every part of our country. Indeed, it has been stated, apparently on sufficient grounds, that much of our popular music can be traced to negro origin.

But most of all we do love to hear the hymn-singing of the African race, and entirely sympathize with the Rev. Mr. Kirkland, who writes, "You know how sweetly a congregation of plantation-negroes can sing the songs of Zion. Tell me not of city choirs. I would rather hear 'I am passing away,' or 'Give me Jesus,' sung as we sometimes hear them, out of full hearts, by hundreds of these poor people, than their best performances. It is spirit-stirring: there are life and soul in the air."

Lady Mary W. Montagne, in a letter to Dr. Beattie, thus gives her opinion of the influence of plain congregational singing on a worshipping assembly:—"I think psalms written with great and noble simplicity, and sung in the same manner, friendly to devotion; and it is almost an offence to call in the aid of insensible and inanimate things to praise the Giver of life and reason. A psalm decently sung by the congregation always excites my devotion more than the organ. I would employ musical instruments in a pagan temple, but only the voice of man in a Christian church."

We can easily imagine the scene presented at the Music Hall in Surrey Gardens, London, at one of the assemblies of from eight to ten thousand people worshipping under the guidance of the popular Charles H. Spurgeon, as described by one of our countrymen:—

"The prayer concluded, Mr. Spurgeon announced the well-known Psalm beginning—

'Before Jehovah's awful throne,'

He read it through, having first announced that the tune would be the 'Old Hundredth,' and then read each verse separately before it was sung. It is scarcely possible to give any idea of the sublime effect produced by those ten thousand voices as they swelled the massive harmonies of that grand tune with a fullness of sound rarely heard. After singing the first verse, Mr. Spurgeon said, 'I will read the third verse, and you will sing the fourth; and let the uplifting of your voices be as the sound of many waters.' His auditory responded to his wish. The words were—

'We'll crowd thy gates with thankful songs,
High as the heavens our voices raise,
And earth, with her ten thousand tongues,
Shall fill thy courts with sounding praise.'

Most magnificent was the shout of praise that now went up. Not a voice was mute, save where occasionally some one's nerves were overpowered by the massive rolling chorus that rose on every side. Never did we before so realize what congregational singing might become. It was an uplifting of voice and heart such as one can hope to hear only a few times in the course of a life. Much of this grand effect was no doubt owing to the majesty of the tune itself—much to the fact that all the congregation knew it—and perhaps not a little to the practice of reading each verse before it was sung, a practice we have always thought a very reasonable one, and commonly adopted in England, especially among the poor and and those who cannot read.

Though this is a striking instance of the grandeur of congregational singing, it was by no means singular. Gould very properly asks, "Who has ever attended a meeting of several churches, or some religious anniversary where there was a multitude of professors of religion, a great proportion of whom are always found able to join in singing, when they rise and sing a hymn at the celebration of the Lord's Supper, and has not felt the power of sacred music sung with both the spirit and understanding? How many who have been spectators only at the time have felt its power and been led to decide that it was something to them who were passing by, and from that time realized that unless they repented they never could join the angelic host, either on earth or in heaven?"

Even on occasions less solemn than these have vast effects been produced by singing. Was it not an impressive scene when, at the collegiate dinner-table at Andover, in 1858, upon an unexpected communication being made of the successful laying of the telegraphic cable, a thousand gentlemen spontaneously rose and, in the majestic sounds of "Old Hundred," sang the fine words of Bishop Ken?—

"Praise God, from whom all blessings flow!"

And, on a smaller scale, intense must have been the feeling among a number of converted sailors on board the North Carolina in the revival of 1858–59. They were speaking of the different countries in which they were born; and it was found that they represented ten different nations, the last man having said that he was born in Greenland. Unable to contain themselves longer, one commenced, and the others followed, in the hymn—

"From Greenland's icy mountains," which was sung with delightful earnestness.

Disorder.

It will scarcely be believed in coming generations that many Christians in the United States, in the middle of the nineteenth century, transferred much of the public singing of the praises of God in their houses of worship to choirs, while the members of churches sat in their pews, or, as a good old man in Boston expressed it, thanking God that they could hear singing, though public opinion prohibited their joining in it. Some few congregations in large cities went even beyond this, and, at an expense which exceeded the combined average salary of four pastors, employed four persons in their singing-gallery—generally performers at the opera-houses—to praise God for them. We attended, in 1855, the dedication of a house of worship in one of our largest cities, when one of these "Quartets" entered on the so-called duties. A programme had been published, and the first hymn was duly "performed in fine style;" but, most unfortunately, the excellent preacher required that the second hymn should be laid aside and that an old favorite of his should be substituted, beginning—

"There is a fountain filled with blood."

The "Quartet" got through the first verse very gracefully; but, when the second was begun—

"The dying thief rejoiced to see That fountain in his day," a voice was heard here and there in the congregation "spoiling the music" by joining in the singing; and, when the third line commenced, all bounds were broken, and, in a voice "like many waters," the vast mass of people, rising from their seats, burst forth—

"And there may I, though vile as he,
Wash all my sins away!"

No language can describe the scene or the feelings which it inspired. Some scientific gentlemen spoke of it as the grandest thing they had ever witnessed.

Mara.

Charles Butler, in his very interesting letter on ancient and modern music, introduces the following anecdote, relating to Mara, an Italian vocalist:

"Once, in a private society, in consequence of something that fell in conversation, she sang, without any accompaniment, the simple air, in Marcello's Psalms, 'In my distress I called upon Jehovah, and he did hear me,' with such exquisite taste and pathos that she entranced every hearer. To our infinite gratification, she repeated it half a dozen times, and every time more beautifully and impressively than before. A person observing that there was a violincello in the room, requested that she would permit the late Mr. Paxton, who was present, to accompany her. This was done. It was fine—very fine; but the charm was lost. 'This little circumstance,' says Butler, 'may be thought to strengthen Rousseau's hypothesis—that harmony is unnatural, and rather weakens than increases the effect of simple melody.' Mara was particularly distinguished for the manner in which she sang, 'I know that my Redeemer liveth.' It was beyond singing: it was eloquence. She opened it with great solemnity; hope was discernible—but it was only the dawn of hope. As she proceeded, it brightened and expanded; but when she came to the last repetition of the sentence, the firm and animated confidence with which she uttered the words 'I know,' and the jubilation of soul with which she pronounced the words 'and in my flesh I shall see God,' no language can adequately tell. The audience thought not of the air, or of the band, or even of the singer: they only felt the sentiment; and they felt it in all its sublimity."

God Save the King!

"Come, thou Almighty King," is a parody on the old English national anthem, "God save the King," and first appeared in that country some nineteen years after "God save the King had been first printed in the "Gentleman's Magazine," which was in 1745, where it was simply called "A song for two voices." It is now common among us under the disguise of "America." The first appearance of the hymn was in 1764, in a collection of Psalms and Hymns, extracted from various authors, by the Rev. Spencer Madan. From this fact it is often attributed to Madan's own pen; but of this there is no evidence: all believe the real author to be as much unknown as that of which it is a parody. It has ever since retained its place in most of our collections, with remarkable integrity and freedom from "emendations," and will probably do so till the Church loses its militant character.

Singing to the Stage.

We confess to a love of hymn-singing under all circumstances. The family, the social circle, any, in many instances the sick-bed itself, may profit by it. But we have a beautiful illustration now before us of the advantages of singing in apparent solitude. In Governor Hill's account of his stage-ride over the Alleghany Mountains, in a dark night, shut up with strangers, he tells us that, to get rid of the fear of robbers, he began to sing one of Dr. Watts hymns, certainly supposing that as a Christian he was alone. To his great delight, however, another plain New Englander responded in another hymn, and he was followed by another, who broke out in a popular camp-meeting air. The Governor was delighted to ascertain that three of the travellers out of the six proved to be New England Puritans. He threw his fears away to the winds, and the morning found them side beyond the dreaded haunts of the highway-robbers.

A Choir of 10,000 Children.

Few events in English history will ever be invested with a more touching interest than the fact that at the inauguration of a Beautiful park and public hall secured for the use of the working-classes of Birmingham, in the year 1858, forty-seven thousand Sunday-school children sang a hymn in the presence of her majesty Queen Victoria. The account given by a public reporter may be read with more than common pleasure. We give a short extract:—"Each section had its musical conductor, armed with a long white wand by way of baton, and assisted by a drummer and two cornets—the first to give the little singers the signal to begin, and the latter to play over the simple music of this wonderful children-concert. As her majesty passed, they sang, in a low, gentle manner—almost seraphic—a hymn, which moved the royal lady and thousands of others even to tears.

REBUKE INSTEAD OF COMFORT.

"I know your excitability of temper, and your morbid brooding over imaginary evils," wrote one to whom a person in great distress and anguish of mind had applied for help and comfort; and then followed a short, crisp lecture, and a few words of information and advice, all given in the most impatient and hard temper of mind.

The words that had been so waited for, so hoped for, those important words from a valued and long-trusted friend; words which were to fall like soothing oil on a troubled and wounded spirit, came like the harsh and sharp rattling of hail upon the house-top, and the recipient sank down and fairly groaned.

"There is neither justice nor sympathy on earth," said he. "To whom shall one in sorrow go for help or pity?"

Ah! to whom? Some of "the weary and heavy laden" of this world have discovered a Friend who never stands upbraiding when, almost broken-hearted, they turn to him for sympathy; but, compared with the multitudes who know not where to find Him, these are few, indeed. How is the world without a comforter! What a way hath the world of doing good, of being friendly. When you ask it to pity your distress, straightway it turns upon you, and rebukes you. What if your misery be the result of our own fault, you do not wish to be told of that when your heart is breaking; when your very life is being wrung out of you by remorse and shame. It is for the hard and unfeeling sinner that reproach and upbraiding are meet; not for those whose flesh is failing, and whose eyes are going out in tears. Oh! that men would learn that when one has had trouble after trouble until one really has become "morbid," and has fallen to miserably "brooding over" his sad and trying estate, it is no way to cure his malady to sternly tell him this, and refuse, therefore, to acknowledge his claim for sympathy. Would that they would learn that the nervousness and excitability of feeling of the sensitive, and the deep and tender-hearted ones of the world, are not likely to be made less by harsh rebukes, or by chilling indifference. What a cruel, ungodly thing it is to thrust from us with such treatment, with a spirit towards them as cold and hard as the neither millstone—the bruised and broken fellow-mortals who, from time to time, come to us, pleading for strength and cheer. Comfort ye, comfort ye, my people, saith the Lord.

MR. SPURGEON ON COMMUNION.

I am frequently receiving letters containing this question—What is my opinion upon Communion? And once for all, to save all further loss of postage to my transatlantic brethren, let me say, I am pastor of a Baptist church, into which none can be admitted unless they are believed to be obedient both to the doctrine and precept of the Lord Jesus. Our Lord, one faith, one baptism, is a brief epitome of our religious union. We altogether disapprove of churches which bear a divided testimony on so significant a point as Baptism. In this we are one, and hope ever to remain firm in our profession that the immersion of believers is the primitive Baptism of the church of Christ, and that none other is worthy of the name of Christian Baptism. We are, therefore, strict in discipline, and thus enjoy the blessed consequences of union in sentiment and heart.

But as for Communion, it seems to us that this is no more at our disposal that the blood of the Redeemer, which he has shed for all his people, whether immersed or no. We believe restricted fellowship to be impossible among the saints of God. With all the Church we do and must commune. The Spirit of the living God has established an irresistible Communion among all the regenerated, and no Church-act can limit or restrain the divine impulse. Respecting the consciences of those who hold a limited fellowship, we do most solemnly protest against their error. Every member of the visible Church of Christ is invited by us to show forth publicly his fellowship with Christ, with the whole blood-bought family, and with us who believe ourselves to be a part thereof. As often as we break bread, we have the pleasure of seeing Europe, Asia, Africa, America, and Australia, represented at the table, and members of all truly Christian communities are there also. This I mention, not as a matter of controversy, but simply in answer to inquiries. And I must add that a difference upon this point can never be sufficient to make me cease to love and commune with the most stern of my Baptized Brethren.

May the day soon come when all Pseudo-Baptism shall cease, and then the much vexed question of Communion must end also.

May the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of the Father, and the fellowship of the Spirit, be with all the people of God for ever. Amen.

Brethren, I am yours ever truly,

C. H. SPURGEON.

DEATH OF ISAMBERT K. BRUNNEL.

While every one was rejoicing on the success of the Great Eastern, her designer, the celebrated engineer, was lying on his death-bed. He lived long enough to hear of the triumph of his skill, and on the 16th ult., passed away from this earthly scene. He was the son of a French engineer, and was born at Portsmouth, England, in 1806, while his father was superintending the construction of the block-making machinery at that dock-yard. In 1826, he assisted his father in constructing the Thames Tunnel, and in 1833 he was appointed to construct the Great Western Railroad, from London to Exeter and Bristol; in this undertaking he developed extraordinary talent as an engineer, overcoming every difficulty with ease; and on this line he first placed the "broad gauge." He also built the longest suspension bridge in England, the one crossing the Thames at Hungerford mouth. He assisted Mr. Stephenson in elevating the tubes of the Conway and Brittania tubular bridges, and was engaged on the Tuscan end of the Sardinian railway.

Most of the large docks in England are either wholly or in part of his construction, and he designed the Great Western, the first mammoth steamship that ever crossed the Atlantic. That then famous ship was only 236 feet in length and twenty-five feet six inches broad, and she would now be considered a small ship. Mr. Brunnel was a member of the various learned societies and scientific bodies, and had the cross of the legion of honor presented to him by the late Louis Phillippe.

He will be much regretted by his engineering and private friends, for he was a good as well as a great man, and was ever ready to communicate his knowledge to others, and help young members of his own profession up the thorny hill of fame. He was kind and genial, and almost semed to be unconscious of his own greatness, preferring to work than to be flattered, and to follow up his own congenial pursuits without form, ceremony or affectation. Isambert Kingdom Brunnel has left a great name behind him which can never be erased from the tablets of human memory.

WHO KILLED TECUMSEH?

The Cincinnati Christian Advocate of the 17th contains an obituary notice by Rev. A. Wright, of the Indiana Methodist Episcopal Church, of Isaac Hamblin, Sr., who died at his residence near Bloomfield, Indiana, a few months since aged about eighty-six years. Mr. Hamblin was a man of deep piety and unquestionable veracity. He was in the battle of the Thames, and the writer gives the following as his statement in regard to the manner in which Tecumseh was killed:

He says he was standing but a few feet from Col. Johnson when he fell, and in full view, and saw the whole of that part of the battle. He was well acquainted with Tecumseh, having seen him before the war, and having been a prisoner seventeen days, and received many a cursing from him. He thinks that Tecumseh thought Johnson was Harrison, as he often heard the chief swear that he would have Harrison's scalp, and seemed to have a special hatred toward him. Johnson's horse fell under him, he himself being also deeply wounded; in the fall he lost his sword, his large pistols were empty, and he was entangled with his horse on the ground. Tecumseh had fired his rifle at him, and when he saw him fall, he threw down his gun, and bounded forward like a tiger sure of his prey. Johnson had only a side pistol ready for use. He aimed at the chief over the head of his horse, and shot near the centre of his forehead. When the ball struck, it seemed to him that the Indian jumped with his head full fifteen feet into the air; as soon as he struck the ground, a little Frenchman ran his bayonet into him and pinned him fast to the ground.

CROMWELL, NAPOLEON AND THE WALDENSES.

The fact is perhaps not generally known that when, in Oliver Cromwell's time, the Waldenses or Vaudois people, were so cruelly persecuted by the church of Rome, he called for a collection to relieve their necessities in all the churches of the Puritan Covenanters in Great Britain. So heartily was this responded to that a considerable surplus was left after their wants were met, which remained in the British treasury; and this fact having at length been brought to the knowledge of the Government, it was agreed that the funds being no longer needed for their original purpose, should be set apart for the support of the Vaudois pastors. Accordingly, each one of them, sixteen in number, received annually £40 from the Bank of England. The source of another part of their support is even more singular. When Napoleon conquered Italy, he confiscated certain properties belonging to the church of Rome, and made them over to the Vaudois. By the treaty of Vienna, after Napoleon's overthrow, this arrangement was permitted to remain undisturbed; and, in consequence of it, each of the Vaudois pastors receives £20 sterling a year. Taking into view the simplicity of their manners, and the circumstances of the country, the £60 or $300 thus provided for them, afford an ample support. It is certainly a remarkable fact in history to find Cromwell and Bonaparte united in producing such a result.—Banner of the Cross.

THE SON OF NAPOLEON I.

A popular error in regard to this unfortunate youth has been recently corrected by a writer in the Home Journal, who professes to have derived his information from a credible source in Vienna. The belief is general, throughout the world, that the son of Napoleon and his Austrian wife was purposely corrupted by his Austrian relatives, and encouraged to destroy himself by vice. The writer referred to, however, asserts, on the authority of an intelligent and trustworthy valet of the young prince, that he was most tenderly beloved by his grandfather, the Emperor of Austria, and by the imperial family; who bestowed upon his health and education every imaginable care. Nor is there any truth in the story that he was not allowed to hear or read of his father. On the contrary the young duke had in his library every work on Napoleon that ever appeared in any language, and had read them all and cherished the memory of his father with enthusiasm. He died as it appears, of consumption, and his death was hastened by the zeal with which he discharged his military duties. At the time of his death he was lieutenant-colonel of one of the Hungarian regiments of the Austrian army. In conversation with Prince Mellernich, he is said, one day to have uttered these words: "The essential object of my life should be not to make myself unworthy of the glory of my distinguished father." I hope to reach this point if I can only appropriate to myself any of his high qualities; taking care, however, to avoid the rocks upon which he split."

HOW OYSTERS ARE MANUFACTURED.

The bivalve in question, although scarcely an "invention," is surely a great "institution;" and as such, may properly receive our attention. The cultivation of the oyster, it is well known, has long been an important branch of British industry; and now it appears that the French government (which at once decides questions of international policy; legislates on the pitch or diapason of musical instruments, and provides for the gustatory enjoyment of its subjects,) has set to work to colonize the article on the coast of France. The place chosen for the experiment, is a part of the Bay of St. Brieuc, which, for an area of 30,000 acres, is

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1859.

NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

The volume of the Advocate will hereafter begin and end with the year; and it is very desirable that subscriptions should conform to the same rule.

Therefore, new subscribers, who do not begin with the year, will please send, not two dollars, but an amount sufficient to pay for the paper till the end of the year, at the rate of FOUR CENTS A WEEK.

Then, every subscriber will know, without being informed, that the beginning of the year is the time to remit the subscription money.

As many accounts having been sent out before this arrangement was made, we shall not be able, until next year, to make the accounts of old subscribers conform to this rule.

Our Agents will please notice, and help us in this desirable arrangement. It is an approximation to the cash system, without its objections, and will obviate confusion in accounts.

THE "GATHERING" OF A GREAT REVIVAL.

In our boyish days—and we feel boyish enough yet, in all conscience—the weatherwise old people prognosticated great rains when detached thunder-clouds began to "gather," as they termed it, in dense, dark masses, at a certain quarter of the heavens, and to move across the sky with a steady and increasing motion. The cloud no larger "than a man's hand" mentioned in scripture, suggests the same process. And these physical phenomena are not inapt illustrations of those general "refreshings from the presence of the Lord," when he sometimes comes to "rain righteousness upon" the earth. We have some cheering evidences upon which to found a hope that one of these times is not far from us. Our own columns teem with notices of glorious revivals attended with the ancient power. And our other papers, in our bounds, are full of similar glad tidings. Nothing, as we believe, is needed to obtain general help from heaven but general consecration of all to God, and to the salvation of souls. A general faith in a general revival, and a general use of all the means of promoting a general revival, would certainly be attended with a general and glorious out-pouring of the Holy Spirit.

Our brother editor of the Southern Christian Advocate writing on the same subject, says: The Lord works in Ireland, Scotland, Sweden; but no less in our own favored land. Some of the meetings reported through these columns have been marked by an extraordinary power; and in the minds of many of the old soldiers the memories of former times have been revived. We may reasonably hope that we have seen but the beginning of a powerful and extensive revival, that is yet to save tens of thousands of souls.

But there are churches which have not yet been made participants in this Divine visitation. For this there must be some reasons arising out of themselves.

We think it not difficult to give a prescription, which faithfully followed, will insure a revival. Let EVERY member of the Church begin by praying privately at least three times a day—praying for himself and for others, sincerely and in faith. And then let every member, not providentially hindered, be found statedly at all the meetings of his Church—with his class, at the prayer-meeting, love-feast, sacrament table, and in the Sabbath or week-day congregation. Then let every official member, local preacher, exhorter, steward, class-leader be at his post, and energetically at work; and let the preachers, taking the van of this vast working and praying army, in dependence upon the Holy Ghost, urge them forward to victory.

If the efforts now put forth by the few scattered and often unsustained soldiers of the kingdom can procure such results as we read of, what might we not expect to be accomplished, were all the Lord's professed followers to unite in the way indicated in pushing the battle against his enemies!

As sure as we have faith to believe that "Christ died for us," we may have faith to believe that he is to reign Lord over all, and to feel that to secure that result is now the one only work of Christians, under him, the great Captain of their salvation. It is not done, because the army is not put in array. Let the battle be commenced, in the way we have indicated, and carried on thus by every professed follower of Christ, if it be but for one year, and we risk nothing in saying, that the Church will have gained such a victory, as its fondest hopes have never supposed to be possible for this generation of Christians. What simple means for the attainment of so great ends! Let each reader resolve that if they are not attained, the failure will not be attributed to any neglect on his part.

DR. PIERCE'S CHURCH.

The second Methodist Church in this City was dedicated Sunday the 9th inst. Rev. Dr. Lovick Pierce preached the sermon for the occasion, assisted by Dr. Alfred Mann in the exercises. The church is a beautiful piece of architecture, and accommodates about five hundred persons. The pulpit is arranged with taste, and the rich colored glass in the window, in its rear, has fine effect. This congregation will have a choir, as the first Methodist Church, and the ladies and gentlemen will sit together. Rather an innovation upon the old established rules and customs of Methodism, but one which carries with it many advantages. Besides, it meets the sanction of all, and more especially the Pastor, Dr. Pierce himself, who has been a Minister of the Methodist Church for more than half a century. The second Church has been built, of course, from the pressing necessity of another charge for so large a congregation as that which worship from Sabbath to Sabbath in the old Methodist Church. In his sermon, on the Sabbath, Dr. Pierce was justly severe upon those visitors of a church who have so little regard for the convenience of the fairer sex, which has the want of gentility, as to spit streams of tobacco upon the floor. He is the Pastor until the assembling of the Conference.—The Methodists of this City are well pleased with their Ministers.—Columbus, (Ga) Times.

THE EXCLAMATION ARGUMENT.

The time was when the South, always opposed to sectionalism per se, said nothing on the subject of slavery, relying on the Bible and the Constitution, and argument on the subject was confined to a few fanatics at the North. At length, truth and necessity demanding it, the South was aroused to defend herself, and soon demolished the arguments against her. Then, for a while, mere assertion was launched at the South (like Dr. Stevens' assertion of the anti-slaveryism of St. Paul and the Primitive Church—a pitiful humbug). At length, however, the assertion artillery having failed to make any impression, the exclamation argument was the last resort. It consists in quoting the sentiments of Southern men on the subject of slavery, or stating some abuse of the "institution"—no more common than abuse of matrimony—and then placing one or more exclamation points at the close thus: or thus!! or thus!!! This kind of logical "ordnance" is superior to the French "rifled cannon," or the British "Armstrong gun," at least in one feature—the ease with which it is handled. To keep up the "notions" of a fight, and to keep ignorant adherents in countenance, it is superior to the old trick of placing painted pine logs on wheels, as make-believes for cannon.

The Mobile Register says:—We learn from a friend that the Rev. Jno. Quinlan of Cincinatti, Ohio, President of the Theological Seminary, has received the appointment of Bishop of the Catholic Diocese of Mobile and West Florida, rendered necessary by the death of the lamented Bishop Portier.

THE POPE A FUGITIVE.

Just before going to press, Tuesday afternoon, Oct. 25, 1859, telegraphic dispatches of the news from Europe, by the Ocean Queen, were received in this city, she having left Liverpool later than the Anglo-Saxon, in which we are informed that the Pope had fled from Rome. The dispatch is as follows:

The Pope had left Rome, and was to have an interview with the King of Naples, at the Castle of Gondalfo, where his Holiness would remain for the present on account of the agitation in Rome.

After the Pope left Rome, some 10,000 visitors left their cards with the Sardinian Embassador, in whose favor an enthusiastic demonstration was made.

After the desertion of Rome by the Pope, order was preserved in the city by the French troops.

From present appearances, it seems that the Italian nation, if let alone, will forever rid themselves of that political, intellectual and moral night-mare, "temporal power of the Pope." For, in Italy, at least, the temporal and the spiritual power of the Pope are one—with the former goes the latter. And it is the duty of the civilized world to see that they shall have an opportunity to try the experiment of self-government. Poland and Hungary, in more modern times, and other peoples earlier, have gone down beneath the superincumbent mass of brute numbers and despotic ambition. The conscience and humanity of the age have borne about as much as they will bear, in that direction, as we think. Italy may crush herself, but others will hardly be allowed to crush her. And we have a growing confidence in her ability to stand alone. Her moderation and conservatism during the late struggle have surpassed expectation. If England will be true to her traditional position and duty, and co-operate with Louis Napoleon, who, we believe, wishes the cessation of the temporal power of the Pope, Austria and Spain will be powerless to support him.—Let us begin to hope for the destruction of that libel of a thousand years upon the religion of Jesus—the Papacy.

PROTESTANTISM OF LITERATURE.

Rev. John H. Newman, D. D., the eminent Catholic divine, has recently published a volume of lectures and essays in London. Among the confessions made by the author, there is one which, as he remarks, there is no use in denying, namely, that the national literature of England is a Protestant literature, and that it must remain so, till the hypothetical period when Rome may again be potent in the British Isles. Dr. Newman says:—Whether we will or no, the phraseology and diction of Shakespeare, of the Protestant formularies, of Milton, of Pope, of Johnson's Tabletalk, and of Walter Scott, have become a portion of the vernacular tongue, the household words of which perhaps we little guess the origin, and the very idioms of our familiar conversation. The man in the comedy spoke prose without knowing it; and we Catholics, without consciousness and without offence, are ever repeating the half sentences of dissolute playwrights and heretical partizans and preachers. So tyrannous is the literature of a nation: it is too much for us. We cannot destroy or reverse it; we may confront and encounter it, but we cannot make it over again. It is a great work of man, when it is no work of God's.

FLETCHER HARPER.

This member of the great publishing house of Harper & Brothers, in New York, has embarked for Europe. A New York correspondent of the Philadelphia Press says: He proposes to be absent three or four months, during which time he will visit Constantinople, Alexandria, the Nile, Jerusalem, and other interesting localities in that region. Fletcher Harper is one of the remarkable men of the day. Not courting notoriety of any sort, and especially averse to the excitement and turbulence of politics, there are few men in the country possessing in a higher degree than he does those very qualities that secure distinction in public affairs. To great quickness of perception, resolution, indomitable energy, fertility of resources, forecast, and tact, he unites a practical sagacity and good sense, and the habit of grappling with and doing things on a large scale, that would obtain for him distinction in the most responsible positions of the Government. His aspirations, however, so far as any outsider knows (he is a reticent man, possessing Talleyrand't great virtue, a talent for silence), are not political. He appears to be quite content as a member of the largest publishing house in the world, enjoying the society of the most distinguished intellectual men, of all professions, in the country, and especially happy in those domestic and social relations, without which wealth, position, power, influence, fame, are the merest dross.

In this connection we will say, what we have long believed, that Harper's Monthly and Weekly are the leading publications of the kind in the world. They are worthy, and, happily, appreciated. The November number of the Monthly, judging from the advertisement on third page, fourth column, is to be a charming one.

ALICE CARY.

Some few years since, says the Christian Advocate and Journal, the chief critical periodical of France, the Revue des deux Mondes, pronounced Alice Cary to be one of the highest examples of American literary genius. American readers, however, do not read French criticisms, or doubtless Alice Cary would soon have been thought more of as one of our great writers, for how much have our best authors and artists still to depend for public favor on the verdict of trans-Atlantic authorities! The London Literary Gazette has recently given an opinion of Miss Cary which will probably prompt the recognition which she so richly deserves from her countrymen. The Gazette reviews her Pictures of Country Life. Many of these stories were first published in our "Ladies' Repository," but without any enthusiastic interest on the part of the reading public. We doubt whether the American edition of the book has paid the author a dollar yet, but English literary justice will redeem it, and Alice Cary, now that the English press has reviewed her, will probably be the lioness of our literary circles

ADAM BEDE.

A letter from England says: "Some two months since I related to you the gossip which was then in circulation, that Adam Bede was written by William and Mary Howitt, the Loamshire of the book being Nottinghamshire, and the Stoneyshire, Derbyshire. I have had no chance since that time of referring to the matter. You will, however, find in this week's Watchman an elegant and, as I think, a just criticism of the novel, in which the author is regarded as the exponent, in its best form, of the modern school of realism in poetry, fiction, and art. I may add that Miss Mary Evans is no Methodist, but, as I think might have been surmised from the volume itself, a spiritualist Unitarian, of the earnest and better modern school, of which school many would seem to be "not far from the kingdom of heaven." To much the same class, I suppose, must be referred the sentiments and sympathies of the el-devant Quaker, William Howitt, and his wife."

Edward Everett, whose oration on Washington has electrified the country, has delivered an equally grand one on Webster, at the inauguration of his statue. Two glorious subjects, and a great artist. The fine arts do not produce, in sculpture or painting, any thing superior to those great American orations.

All history, says Emerson, easily resolves itself into the biography of a few stout and earnest persons.

THE D.D. DISCUSSION.

Why is it that so much is said on this subject? And why is it that no body has any thing to say about it but preachers? And why is it that those preachers who discuss so much about the doctorate are all devoid of the distinction? What is it that gives such prolonged life, and such sustained interest to the discussion? Even good-natured people are getting tired of it. It strikes many as being out of taste. If there are mistakes, and faults of judgment about it, so there are in connection with every thing else. The disturbed ones should console themselves with the reflection that neither the safety of the country nor the salvation of the world is endangered, any way. There is no harm done. Ministers should neither seek titles, nor endeavor to disparage those who are honored. A minister who is worthy of the distinction in question, is not by any means in need of it. It does not elevate him; it only recognizes previous worth.

UNBROTHERLY SUSPICIONS.

The New York correspondent of the Western Christian Advocate, Cincinnati, says:—The article in Harper's Weekly, a short time since, on the subject, is supposed to be at least semi-official, and it is looked upon as a kind of manifesto from that side of the house. "Stop the supplies!" was the war-cry of the "Fly-sheet" disunionists in England a few years since; and it is remarkable how closely their example is to be followed on this side of the ocean. Probably the results in this case would be similar to those in that. Our Church property is in no special danger of foreclosures and forced sales; and should such a contingency become at all probable there is enough of genuine loyalty to Methodism among us to rally to the rescue. Your readers have probably many of them seen Dr. Whedon's letter to Dr. Stevens, in the Tribune—a production that seems to be very generally approved in these parts.

WESLEYAN METHODISM.

We give from the London Watchman the following general view of the number of members in society, and of ministers in connection with the British Conference, and and several affiliated conferences.

THE APOSTLES' CREED.

"I believe in God the Father Almighty," etc., was recently repeated by nearly two thousand people—Episcopalians, Methodists, Presbyterians, Baptists, Congregationalists, N. S. Presbyterians, Dutch Reformed, German Reformed, Lutherans, Moravians, Seceders, Covenanters,—at the great ministerial union prayer-meeting in Philadelphia, in which they could all join as expressing their faith. This grandest of all uninspired summaries of Christian doctrine, is all that is made obligatory, so far as a doctrinal test of church-membership is concerned, upon the consciences of those who join the Methodist Church. The unity of spirit platform, so much urged of late, is simply the old Methodist platform.

LONGING FOR OTHERS.

It is recorded of the devoted John Welch, that he used to keep a plaid upon his bed, that he might wrap himself in it when he rose at night for prayer. Sometimes his wife found him on the ground weeping. When she complained, he would say, "O woman! I have the souls of three thousand to answer for, and I know not how it is with many of them." Possessed with such a responsibility to God, and to the people of his charge, how can any true minister of the cross withhold himself from an earnest devotion to his work of arousing souls, and pointing them to Christ? He feels his momentous responsibility during the week, while preparing beaten oil for the sanctuary. It covers him like a garment. It haunts him in the silent watches of the night. It absorbs his thoughts, and breathes out in every fervid utterance of his closet.

THE ARCTIC EXPEDITION.

It appears that Lady Franklin sank, in the last expedition to the Artic regions, all her remaining fortune, and that her failing health now detains her in the South of France. An "Arctic Navigator," in letter to the Times, suggests that, besides refunding to the widow of the officer who fell in the execution of his duty, the sum she paid for fitting out the Fox and her crew, she should be offered a home for her declining days in the palace of Kensington. The same writer also suggests that Capt. M'Clintock should by order in council, be allowed seatime as a naval officer while he commanded the Fox, and receive his well-merited knighthood, and that the officers and crew of the Fox ought to get the remaining £10,000 reward for solving the fate of the lost expedition.

KOSSUTH.

The English papers publish an interesting letter from Kossuth, expressing the keenest grief at the Villa Franca arrangement at the moment when the deliverance of his country was within reach. He says he returns to England again a poor exile, only ten years older, from bitter pangs of disappointment. He derives some consolation however, from the events of the war, and is strengthened in the conviction that Hungary will yet be free. He states that he insisted on a double stipulation on behalf of the Hungarian prisoners of war who were enrolled under his banner, viz: that of amnesty, and that of exemption from further Austrian military service. France has obtained these conditions from Austria.

MR. BANCROFT'S NEXT VOLUME.

The eighth volume of Bancroft's History of the United States will be published in a few weeks, including the period elapsing from the battle of Bunker Hill to the final signing of the Declaration of Independence. Mr. Bancroft's first volume was published twenty-five years ago.—The seventh volume, published last year, is the first of a series of four, extending from the outbreak of the Revolutionary war to the peace of Paris in 1782. It is intimated in Harper's Weekly that beyond that date—the formation of the Union—Mr. Bancroft does not intend to proceed, inasmuch as our republican system since then is too much of an undecided experiment to be treated in a satisfactory manner by the historian.

HONOR TO EMORY COLLEGE.

In the class of 1845 at Emory College, Oxford, Ga., appears the names of William H. Chambers Esq, of Ala., Hon. L. Q. C. Lamar of Mississippi, J. Jenks Jones Esq, Mr. Thomas Hardeman Jr, and R. G. Harper Esq.

The first is the member elected to the Legislature from the County of Barbour, Ala., and a promising lawyer. The second is a Representative in Congress from Mississippi, and candidate for re-election without opposition. The three last are the Members elect from the 3d, 7th, and 8th Districts of Georgia to the next Congress. All honor to Oxford!—Columbus Times.

BECOME TIRED.

The St. Louis Advocate, in a notice of the Kentucky conference, has this significant statement: "Let it be stated that an entire congregation of 'Independant Methodists,' with their pastor, have joined us. Nearly three years since a congregation was formed in Lexington, known as the Independant, or Congregational Methodists. Two years since, Rev. S. L. Adams, of the Louisville conference, became their pastor. At the late session of our conference, brother Adams and his congregation again became identified with us, and now constitute the 'second charge' in Lexington."

THE LANDSMAN AND THE SEAMAN.

Man scarcely affords a wider range for developement in his intellectual than in his physical nature. There is hardly a wider moral difference between the mature philosopher and the school-boy than exists physically between the town-bred, lounging dandy, and the seaman, inured to effort, hardship, and danger from his childhood: the former suffers acutely from a scratch or bruise, the latter seems almost insensible to any external injury short of that which maims him; he has become, as it were, annealed in the fire of adversity, and is indifferent to sufferings that would be agonising to untried nerves.

GEN. JACKSON A SCHOOLMASTER.

Who would have thought it? It is nevertheless true, that old Hickory began his career as a teacher of an "Old Field School," in South Carolina, and in that vocation earned the money which supported him while he studied law. This is one among many curious and unexpected facts presented in Mr. Parton's forthcoming life of Gen. Jackson, the first volume of which is now in the hands of the printer. Many eminent Americans have begun life as teachers but we hardly expected to find the indomitable hero of New Orleans added to the list.

ANNUAL CONFERENCES.

We republish the times and places of the Annual Conferences yet to convene:

Memphis, November 16, Memphis, Tenn.
Louisiana, December 14, Franklin, La.
Arkansas, November 9, Searcy, Ark.
Virginia, November 16, Lynchburg, Va.
South Carolina, November 30, Greenville, S. C.
North Carolina, December 14, Beaufort, N. C.
Ouachita, November 2, Monticello, Ark.
Mississippi, November 16, Jackson, Miss.
Alabama, November 30, Eufaula, Ala.
Georgia, December 14, Rome, Ga.
Florida, December 28, Micanopy, Fla.
East Texas, November 30, Palestine, Texas.
Texas, November 16, Lagrange, Texas.
Rio Grande, November 9, Goliad, Texas.

Carondelet Street Methodist Church, in this city, is now enjoying a gracious revival of religion.—The meeting has been continued nightly for some time past, and is likely to continue for some time to come. The various pastors and ministers in the city, with the members of the other churches, assist Rev. J. B. Walker and his members in the good work; and brethren from the country business attend and participate. About 40 souls have been converted. May it continue all the winter, and absorb city and country.

An English friend writes to Dr. Stevens, of the Advocate and Journal, "I should not omit to add that a new, elegant, and very cheap edition of Fletchers' works is now in course of issue. This is another proof of your assertion, in the second volume of your History, that Isaac Taylor is utterly mistaken in saying that Fletcher's Works are now about forgotten. Your description of them will doubtless lead to their being yet more widely in request. We have now in this country editions equally cheap and elegant of the works of all the great masters of Wesleyan theology.

The following named gentlemen will take their seats for the first time in the United States Senate, on the first Monday in December next, on which day the first session of the thirty-fifth Congress will commence: Wm. Saulsbery, of Delaware; James W. Grimes, of Iowa; Lazarus W. Powell, of Kentucky; Kingsley S. Bingham, of Michigan; John C. Ten Eyck, of New Jersey; Thomas Bragg, of North Carolina; Henry B. Anthony, of Rhode Island; A. O. P. Nicholson, of Tenn; J. W. Hemphill, of Texas.

The Choctaw Mission of the American Board, embracing thirty men and women—preachers, teachers, etc., have been discontinued—that is, the Board have withdrawn support from them. The reason is that slavery exists in the Choctaw Nation, and the Board is abolition, and wish to preach and enforce their views, which is not allowed. What will become of the missionaries we know not.

The Berlin Volkszeitung denies the statement made by many German and English newspapers of the library of Alexander von Humboldt having been sold to Lord Bloomfield on account of the Trustees of the British Museum. The paper adds that several gentlemen are still busy making a catalogue of the library, which will not be finished before the end of December, the books turning out to be much more numerous than at first believed.

The Crockett (Texas) Argus, we see by the last number, is under the editorial management and control of our old friend and office-associate, John C. Hepperle, Esq. He is a sprightly editor, and has the typographical eye and taste essential to a handsome paper, which he always produces.

The Emperor of Russia has authorized the Jews to raise a fund, the interest of which is to be employed as prizes for the best literary works in the Hebrew language which shall be presented to the Academy of Sciences,—His Majesty has also founded five scholarships at the Technological Institute in favor of young Jews.

At the Episcopal Convention in session at Richmond, Va., the consecration of the Bishops, as announced by telegraph, will take place on Thursday next. The following are the reverend gentlemen who are to be consecrated: Rev. Dr. Odenheimer, for New Jersey; Rev. Dr. Whipple, for Minnesota; Rev. Mr. Gregg, for Texas, and Rev. Mr. Bedell, Assistant for Ohio.

We mentioned recently that the late Mr. George Brown of Baltimore had left in the hands of his widow $400,000 for objects of benevolence. We are pleased to learn that Mrs. Brown appropriates $30,000 of the amount to princeton Theological Seminary.—Presb.

Three of the most celebrated authoresses in this country are natives of Georgia.—Miss M. J. McIntosh, Madame LeVert, and Miss Evans, of Mobile, whose new novel Beulah, has rendered her famous in a few short months.

Senator Broderick, after receiving his mortal wound in a duel with Judge Terry, received the ministrations of a Catholic priest, and died in that faith and communion.

Quite a revival interest prevails at Newcastle, England, under the labors of Dr. and Mrs. Palmer. They have been welcomed by the Wesleyans, and are laboring with great success in the Wesleyan churches.

Rev. John C. Granberry, of Washington City, as we learn from the Richmond Christian Advocate, has been called, in the inscrutable yet wise and merciful providence of God, to suffer the loss of his wife, Mrs. Virginia S. Granberry, who died on the 17th "in great triumph and faith." The Lord comfort him—man cannot. May all preachers, wives, and their husbands too, and all the people of God, die "in great triumph and faith." And may all people become the people of God!

Rev. William H. Seat, of the Texas Conference, has lost his little daughter Fanny. She was one of the sweetest, most saintly, and most intelligent little creatures we ever saw. But from an incurable nervous disorder, from birth, she was entirely helpless. She long prayed to be able to walk, but at last resigned herself, after unknown struggles, to life-long helplessness. But God had "better things" for her.

Just as the stern features of manhood soften in slumber, just as the soldier upon the stained and trampled field saw his wife and children coming like angels in his dreams, and was father and lover again, so the turbulent spirit grows calm in dying, "the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest."

Seven Squares were consumed in one fire in this city on Sunday night last. It was because our city government has provided no water-works for the Fourth District.

Rev. Fielding Bell, of the Kentucky Conference has been transferred to the Louisiana Conference, instead of the Louisville, as printed in the papers.

It appears from the accounts of Messrs. Phillips, Sampson, & Co., that they have expended $75,000 in establishing the Atlantic Monthly, and that the maximum profits of that periodical in any one year have been $4,000.

Bishop Soule, Dr. Lyman Beecher, and Rev. Dr. Biggs, of Cincinatti, are the only survivors of the founders of the American Bible Society in 1816.

The Hon. Henry W. Hilliard will deliver the annual address before the Alabama State Agricultural Society, in Montgomery, Thursday evening, November 17th.

Donation to Florence University.—Q. C. Atkinson, Esq., of Memphis, Tenn, has given ten thousand dollars to endow a chair of Biblical literature in this Institution.

Denominational Book Publishing.—The property, capital and stock of the Methodist Book Concern in New York is estimated at $518,681 over all liabilities; and of that in Cincinnatti at $208,896.

Rev. Dr. D. Merk, D. Aubigne has written to Rev. Dr. Baird that he is well advanced in the preparation of the sixth and seventh volumes of his History of the Reformation of the sixteenth century.

Read the astonishing account of the Harper's Ferry Insurrection, on our third page. The devil is surely let loose for a season.

A Jewish Rabbi and his family consisting of his wife and seven children, were lately baptized in the Methodist Church in Quebec.

Rev. Father Chiniquy denies the report that he has entered the communion of the Episcopal Church, with his little flock of converts from Rome.

NEW BOOKS.

Historical Sketches of Hymns, their Writers and their Influence. By Joseph Belcher, D.D., Author of "William Carey: A Biography;" "George Whitefield: A Biography;" "Religious Denominations of the United States," etc. etc. Philadelphia: Lindsay and Blakiston. New York: Sheldon & Co. 1859. For sale by J. C. Morgan & Co., New Orleans.

This is a valuable and interesting book, and very opportune—needed by the times, and calculated to do good. Next in importance to a knowledge of the authorship and history of the different books of the Bible, is a knowledge of the authorship and history of the different hymns of the hymn-book. Sacred poetry is an important part of literature—its study necessary to a thorough, harmonious and refined culture. The knowledge furnished by this book will greatly enhance the interest and benefit of our "hymns, and psalms, and spiritual songs." A prominent place is given to the hymns of the Wesleys, and to Methodist singing. Every one should purchase this book, and also "Creamer's Hymnology." The lamented author of the book under notice died a few hours after finishing his labors upon it. May he sing in glory forever!

Beulah. By Augusta J. Evans. New York: Derby and Jackson, 119 Nassau St. 1859. For sale by H. D. McGinnis, New Orleans.

This book is by a young lady of Mobile, Alabama, who has heretofore produced a tale called "Inez." It is a history of intense, though natural interest. It is also a work of undeniable power—more like Jane Eyre than any American work we have read. The characters are strongly drawn, yet natural. You admire their naturalness, while you could wish them others wise; like you feel in reading scripture biography, where the good and the evil, the fortune and misfortune, are set down together. Whether nature, or the ideal, be the true model of high art, we stop not to inquire. Miss Evans adopts the former. Beulah is not an ideal woman—but she is a natural one, in most respects. In one—her long mastery of her heart by the mere power of the intellect—she is not a natural woman. In this feature, Miss Evans has evidently leaned toward her ideal. The successful life-struggle of an orphan-child—a female—will infuse energy into many a despouding spirit. The ultimate triumph of early implanted Christian faith over the seductive infidelity of the rationalism so interwoven with popular literature, is of excellent tendency. Beulah is a powerful work of art, and a sound religious book.

Tempea. A Novel. By Miss Marryatt, (daughter of Capt. Marryatt.) New York: Dick and Fitzgerald, publishers, No. 18 Ann St. 1859. For sale by J. C. Morgan & Co., New Orleans.

This is an English work, with English scenes and characters. But the subject—"Temper"—is universal, and the interest in its proper treatment in a good book universal also. What of it we have read is in pleasant style, and the narrative, and the philosophy thereof, interesting and beneficial. Of the book as a whole, we cannot speak. Of the evident design we can—it is good.

The Proselytes Defeated. By Incognito. Nashville, Tenn. Printed for the author at the Southern Methodist Publishing House. 1859.

The design of this book is apparent. As "Theophilus Walton," and similar works, are aimed at the immoralon dogma, this is aimed at the lamentably, shamefully prevalent practice of proselyting—one of the greatest nuisances of Christendom. Like "Theophilus Walton," it is in the form of a narrative, and like it again, a thorough treatment of the case. It is a book for the times, evidently. We shall examine it more thoroughly, and speak of it again.

The Methodist Quarterly Review—October, 1859—has reached our table. The following is its table of contents.

I.—Lewis' Biographical History of Philosophy, by Rev. Oliver S. Munsel, A. M., President of Illinois University.
II.—Hugh Miller, by Rev. R. H. Howard, Ashland, N. Y.
III.—Wesley as a Man of Literature (second article,) by Rev. G. F. Playter, Frankford, C. W.
IV.—Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, by J. F. Rosling, Esq., Trenton, N. J.
V.—Buddhism, by Herman M. Johnson, D.D., Dickinson College, Carlisle, Penn.
VI.—Cannibalism and Christianity, by Rev. Erwin House, Cincinnatti, Ohio.
VII.—The Rich Man and Lazarus (second article,) by Seneca Wieting, A. M., Fort Plain, N. Y.

NEWS FROM OUR HOME WORK.

"To spread Scriptural Holiness over these Lands."

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

Bistineau Circuit.—Rev. R. Parvin writes: A grand revival influence is still going on, on our Circuit. Our Camp-meeting will live long in the memory of those who were in attendance. We had to commence in the forest where there was but a stick amiss; with a few noble-hearted energetic friends, I tented the place while those friends were at work; it seemed like a large undertaking, but they said they had not "put their hands to the plow, to look back." I have never seen a better Camp-meeting. Surely the good Lord was with us. The word was preached with power by a company of able preachers. Twenty-six conversions, seventy joined the Church, colored and white. Our missionary collection went ten dollars over the assessment. May the good Lord continue to bless those who build on the Lake Camp-ground.

Farmerville Circuit.—Rev. D. P. Cullin writes: Our Camp-meeting is over. It embraced the first Sunday in October. Sixty-four professed religion. Forty-one joined the Church. A goodly number of those that professed had previously joined. The Presiding Elder and Local preachers were in attendance. About one hundred and fifty persons have joined the Church on this circuit since the Middle of July. Not less than one hundred have joined by letter and on probation during the present year; and not less than one hundred and fifty have professed religion. The Lord is with us.

New Iberia Circuit.—Rev. T. B. White writes: Our meeting held at Prairie Greigg, last Saturday, Sunday and Monday, we received, some fifteen into the Church, and there was a general baptism of the Holy Spirit. An interesting feature of the meeting was the social union and fellowship of the people. I never saw more decorum and genteel behavior. To behold how good and pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity.

Our new Church enterprise at that place is moving bravely.

Cadjo Circuit.—Rev. S. J. Hawkins writes: We commenced a revival meeting at Providence on Saturday last, which closed to-day. Thirty-one were born again, and twenty-two were added to the Church. At the close of the meeting the entire congregation were happy in the love of God, except one who was a penitant at the altar.

Grand Cane Circuit.—Rev. J. F. Scarlott writes: Success has attended our labors. We have had thirty-one conversions and nine additions by letter; thirty-four white and twenty colored have been received on probation. Our missionary apportionment—and more—has already been raised in part and subscription.

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

Holmesville Circuit.—Rev. J. B. Bowen writes: We have had several meetings at which the Lord has been with us in great power, and the general interest of the church seems on the gradual increase. About eighty have lately united with the church, and quite as many have made a profession of religion. We have just closed our best meeting at Summit, which resulted in the reorganizing of the church there with seventy members, thirty of which are colored; thirty-eight of this number joined during the meeting.

We have a subscription out to build a fine church. And the interest in this movement that we will be sure to succeed. There is also a strong move on the subject of securing a parsonage for the new preacher.

We are not neglecting the conference and missionary collection. Neither will the people forget to pay the preacher.

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Gadsden District.—Rev. E. Hearn writes: I am on my last round for the year. I commenced my fourth round September 2nd at a Camp meeting on the Harpersville circuit, we had some thirty preachers and the Lord made known his saving power. Upwards of thirty professed conversion, and joined the Church. The preacher in charge had a camp-meeting just before, with about the same success. He informed me that during the year he had joined in society about 100 up to that time. The week following we had a camp-meeting on the Jacksonville circuit, and also for the Jacksonville station. We had fifteen preachers, fine weather, good order, sixteen converted and joined the Church. In Jacksonville there has been considerable revival and increase to the Church. Much doing on the circuit. The next week held a camp-meeting on the Centre circuit. The weather was quite unpleasant. We had a good supply of preachers, some fifteen converted, twenty additions. The preacher in charge informs me that he joined about 100 in society during the year up to that time. The next week held a Camp-meeting for Lebanon circuit. We had fine weather, good preaching, but small success—not more than two or three professed and joined. From there went to the Black Oak circuit on the Saud Mountain where they have had but little preaching during the year, for two preachers have failed and I could not supply the work, so nothing done. I am now just closed my Camp-meeting for Cedar Bluff Circuit. The meeting was cold, but some good was done. Some ten to fifteen converts and six joined. On the Gadsden Circuit a good work is being done. At a protracted meeting some time since there was a rise of thirty professed and joined the Church. The Ten Mission and the Cross Plains Mission are both doing well. The Lord be praised for all the success we have had on the circuit. I am in fine health, have not missed one appointment during the year. I am now closing my forty-third year in the ministry, and have entered my sixty-sixth year of life. I feel as a dear Brother, as much bound to serve the Lord and the Church as I ever did. I feel quite cut loose from the world, so that I have nothing to divide my attention from the services of the Church. I hope to see you at our Conference. My love to all. I am in haste, your Brother in Christ.

Centreville Circuit.—A correspondent writes:—We have just closed our fourth quarterly meeting Conference. Over the deliberations of this body, Bro. Starr presided to the satisfaction of all. The report of members received from the last quarterly Conference was called for. Answer: Whites eighty-one, colored forty. This is a glorious in-gathering. Bro. Cooper is a good man wherever he may be sent; he has done faithful work the present year on the Centreville Circuit. There were three applications for license to preach, and while they were being examined as to their views on the doctrines of our Church, the entire Conference was made happy. Bro. Starr is a sound man on the doctrines of the Methodist Church, and I do hope that the Bishop will send him back to us again; our children all love him.

We had a glorious revival during the meeting, there was, I think, about forty conversions during the meeting.

Talladega.—Rev. T. P. Crymes writes:—We have just closed a protracted meeting at this place, which resulted in the conversion of some twenty or twenty-five persons or more, and an accession of twenty-two whites, and three colored to the M. E. Church in this place, among whom are several heads of families of promise to the Church.

We had an exceedingly promising meeting until the 12th inst., celebrating the advent of the cars to this place, which diverted the public mind.

REPORTS OF CONFERENCE SESSIONS.

KANSAS CONFERENCE.

Mr. Editor: Our Conference, fourth session, closed to-day. We had a very pleasant and profitable one, both to the preachers and citizens of Tecumseh. Bishop Paine presided with great acceptability, and endeared himself to every preacher and all the people. One Sunday he preached one of his best and happiest sermons. Dr. Taylor was with us, and greatly endeared himself to us by his merry face and good preaching. We organized a Sunday-school Society. Our reports are most encouraging in this department. I doubt whether any other Church is doing as much in the way of Sunday-schools as ours. Our work has been, all things considered, a handsome increase in the membership the past year, say three hundred. Every part of the Church is increasing, and the prospects brighter. There were no complaints from the preachers in regard to their appointments, but each seemed to go forth with pleasure in the signs of the times seem to indicate good success to their labors. So mote it be.—Nashville Advocate.

The following are the appointments of the preachers for the ensuing year:

Lecompt District—Nathaniel Scarritt, P. E.—Tecumseh Mission, H. C. Meek; Shawnee Reserve Mission, C. B. Ross; Shawnee Mission, J. Spencer; Shawnee I. M. L. School, Thomas Johnson; Paola Mission, N. T. Shalar, one to be supplied; Pottawatomie Mission, Arthur Hawkins; Fort Scott Mission, to be supplied; Dry Wood Mission, John Hale; Sac Agency Mission to be supplied.

Council Grove District—William Bradford, P. E.—Council Grove Mission, H. H. Craig; Verdigris Mission, Tennison; Neosho Mission, James E. Bryan; Forest Hill Mission, to be supplied; Big Blue Mission, John O. Stevenson; M. Robbins; Santa Fe and Pike's Peak, to be supplied.

Leavenworth District—Thos. Wallace, P. E.—Potawatomie Mission, Wm. Barnett; Delaware Mission, Chas. Bonnelle; Leavenworth City Mission, L. B. Stateler; Kickapoo Mission, H. H. Hedgpeth; Donlphan Mission, to be supplied; Pleasant Mission, D. C. O'Howell; Nimehs Mission, P. M. Williams; Grasshopper Mission, E. S. Arrington, Vincent Jones.

The works that are left to be supplied are provided for, in general thing.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

OCTOBER 26, 1859.

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

MEXICO.

Gov. Vidaurri a Fugitive.

The army officers in Monterey have deposed Gov. Vidaurri, who, with Gen. Zuazo, have left for the United States. He had amassed a fortune of $500,000, it is said, during his governorship. And so ends the fame of the great patriot leader of Northern Mexico.

Capture of Durango by Robbers.

The city of Durango, capital of the State of Durango, was recently captured by two hundred robbers, who, with some disaffected citizens, sacked the houses of thirty principal citizens, formed a provisional government, and were in turn driven out by State troops.

The Brownsville Outrage.

Cortinas, and his guerillas were encamped in Cameron county Texas, threatening death to lawyers and others who, they alleged, were combined to cheat them out of their lands, but securing all others of safety at their hands.

This is a mere "buncombe," as Cortinas is a noted thief and murderer.

The Late Attack on Brownsville.

BROWNSVILLE, Oct. 10, 1859.—You will receive, by the steamer Indianola, the proclamation of Nepomuceno Cortinas, who is at this time at Matemoros, feted and lionized by principal citizens there, we are told, as a hero. As to the promises not to visit us again, which we put no faith in, they are spoken of by him and by them as made out of regard solely to our helplessness.

And when you reflect that we have 12,000 people here, in our neighborhood, much nearer to us than the people of Ureina and Algires to New Orleans; that of these not over 300 men, women and children sympathize with Americans, as such, no matter what their extraction; and when you are assured that under a polite exterior the deepest, settled hatred exists in the Mexicans mied towards us, running far back, but intensified since the late war with Mexico; you will understand how great reason we have to be in a state of the utmost trepidation. The massacre of our citizens is not alone to be feared, nor the destruction of property, but the outlaws spare neither child nor woman, whose fate is far the most dreadful; and what is more, there are not over fifty American citizens, native or naturalized, here whose origin and sympathies are not Mexican. The conspiracy is thought to be wide spread.

The combinations Cortinas makes are all idle and untrue. There is no suit existing against him or any of his family. On the contrary, his mother and brother, who have been among us, were kindly cared for and sent home without injury. The brother is an assessor and collector of taxes.

The Mr. Glavaicke of whom Cortinas speaks is connected by marriage with his family, and their quarrel is wholly a family one. There is no respectable Mexican on our side of the river openly in his favor, but we have every fear that the mere hatred of the Gringos, as all Americans are called by them, will unite them in the common design of blotting out our unfortunate city and its whole population.

On Saturday last, the Mexican National Guard left here for Matamoros, greatly to the relief of most of our people, who had great dread of them, fearing them to be more likely to turn against us than otherwise. They were escorted to the ferry by all our citizen force, and the officers duly speechified and embraced by our Committee of Safety.

You will perceive the high encomiums in the paper published here on the people of Matamoros, the soldiers, the officers, and note too how carefully even Cortinas is mentioned. This may be very well for we are over a bed of burning coals, and are is necessary to get off from so dangerous a position. Had a party left to attack Cortinas at any time while he was entrenched above, not one of them would have returned, and our town would have been laid in ashes. Here we are separated by a region of country almost without a settler one hundred and seventy miles from the Nueces, and wholly at the mercy of the people of Matamoros. On the day Cortinos entered no two men could have assembled together, no man could have appeared on the streets with arms without being shot down, and few were the who had arms did not have them loaded. It was only by the interferences of Gen. Carvajal, who told the Mexican authorities that they must put a stop to this, or vengeance would fall on Matamoros, that laterposition was had and we were saved from destruction first by defail and then universal. "Death to the Gringoes." "Death to all the Americans." "Long live Mexico," wera their cries.

We keep up now an armed guard of 22 paid men always on duty, and 25 heavily armed citizens patrol the place from 9 P. M. to 6 A. M. This work will soon break us all down. For God's sake urge the Government to send us relief. Let the great guns again watch over our dear sister Matamoros, and the soldiers of Uncle Semuel keep marauders here in check, or practically the line of boundary between the United States and Mexico must be moved back to the Nueces. Already one of our principal merchants is offering his entire property, stock, and everything, at 33½ per cen. discount to be onabled to leave; and many others are prepared to follow. Cor. Pic.

United States Treasury.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 20.—United States Treasury receipts for the last week amount to $1, 021,000. Amount in Treasury subject to draft $5,677,000. Increase on the balance of the previous week $108,000.

Death of Governor Dunlap.

BRUNSWICK, Me., Oct. 20.—Ex-Governor Dunlop, of this State, died to-day.

The Texas Frontier Troubles.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 20.—Official advices have been received from Gen. Twiggs, of the Military Department of Texas, informing the Government that he had ordered two companies to Brownsville, and that a body of Cavalry had been sent out to scour that region of the country in pursuit of the marauders.

St. Louis Oct. 21.—A dispatch from Leavenworth to the Daily Republican, states that Easterbrook has been elected as Delegate to Congress from Nebraska Territory, by forty-eight majority.

Gold from Pike's Peak.

St. JOSEPH; Mo., Oct. 20.—A party of Pike's Peak miners arrived in this city to-day, with $100,000 in gold dust.

LEAVENWORTH CITY, Oct. 20.—The Leavenworth and Denver City Express of the 12th, has arrived in this city, bringing $7000 in gold dust. The accounts from the mines continue avorable.

San Juan Island difficulty.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 24.—The State Department is in receipt of telegraphic advices brought by the Anglo Saxon, at Quebec, to the effect that the despatches sent out in reference to the San Juan Island difficulty were very favorably received by the British Government, and our statement of the case was considered fair and honorable.

The reply to their first dispatches received from the English Government on the same subject, was sent out by the Liverpool steamer of Saturday last.

The London Daily News says there is good reason to believe this difficulty will speedily be amicably settled. The language of the American Government on the subject, in its communications with the British Ministry is firm, but at the same time indicates a desire for an early and honorable settlement of the question, on a basis just to both sides.

Dr. Livingstone's Expedition.

Letters have been received in England from Dr. Livingstone, the African traveler. At last account he was at Expedition Island, having witnessed various battles between the Portuguese and the natives of the country, in which the latter were badly defeated. In one case the natives were found in possession of many pieces of bronza cannon. He had a very narrow escape from death by drowning, and expected to leave soon for Tete. In his letter he speaks of having seen some curious and remarkable people.

GREAT RIOT AT HARPER'S FERRY.

The Kansas Banditti of Pita Head—Plunder and Bloodshed—The Abolitionists the Ground Instigators—Terrible Excitement in Virginia—The Insurgents Captured—The Notorious Brown of Kansas Captured and Shot—Many Killed and Wounded—The Arsenal Attacked and Carried.

BALTIMORE, Oct. 18.—A formidable riot broke out last evening at Harper's Ferry.

The United States Arsenal was seized, and all the railroad trains, East and West, were stopped by the mob.

The arseal town is in the possession of 600 or 700 men, a portion of whom are negroes.

It was first alleged to be an abolition movement, but it is now supposed to have been instigated and organized by employees on the Government dam at that place in consequence of their having been cheated out of a portion of their wages recently by an absconding contractor, and that they have taken this method of getting at the funds in the Government pay-house.

The President has ordered United States mariners and troops of Washington to proceed thither and force a passage across the railroad bridge, at all hazards. The Governor of Virginia has also sent troops from Richmond.

Further Particulars.

BALTIMORE, Oct. 18.—In addition to the troops sent from Washington and Baltimore, troops were also sent from this city and from Frederick, Va., to Harper's Ferry to quell the riot.

The authorities of Washington City and Alexandria are much alarmed for fear of an incursion by the rioters from Harpers Ferry.

The wires of the telegraphic lines communicating with Washington were cut last night.

A dispatch from Washington states that a gentleman who arrived there last night from Frederick, thinks the negroes only participated in the riot by compulsion.

A dispatch from Harpers Ferry, dated three o'clock this morning, states that several military companies arrived from Charleston and Shapardstown, Va., and from Frederick, Md. had taken possession of the town. Upon the approach of the troops the rioters withdrew to the arsenal, and entrenched themselves in the Armory.

The insurrectionists are commanded by the bandit Brown, of Kansas notoriety, and originally numbered only seventeen white men and five negroes.

The rioters hold several of the citizens prisoners, among whom are Messrs. Washington and Laperfield. Several of the banditti were shot in the attack which was made by the troops on the armory, and two men of the Martinsburg company were killed while charging on the armory.

A portion of the banditti had previously left under the command of a leader named Cook, who, with a large party of slaves, is supposed to be moving towards Pennsylvania.

A man named Allen Evans, of New England, one of the band, was shot, and when dying he confessed that the scheme was gotten up by Brown, who represented to those he wished to induce to follow him that the negroes would rise by thousands and Maryland and Virginia be made free States, this being the chief object they had in view.

Mr. Fountain Brenkman, the R. R. Agent, was shot dead from the armory. There are three of the ruffians lying dead under the bridge.

Capt. Cook is second in command of the band, and is said to be posted in a school-house a few miles distant, with a large body of runaway slaves.

The armory was taken possession of by the outlaws on Sunday night about nine o'clock, and was done so quietly that the citizens knew nothing of it until the railroad trains were stopped.

Col. Lee, who commands the United States troops, thinks there is an abundance of troops here (Harper's Ferry), to capture all the rioters.

Brown had routed a farm four miles distant, which he occupied as a rendezvous for his negroes and outlaws. Cook had lived in the vicinity formerly and taught school.

None of the other whites are yet known, but it is supposed they were most of them connected with Brown in his Kansas outrages.

It is reported but not confirmed that the rioters carried off a considerable sum of Government funds.

The attack upon the armory was successful, most of the outlaws and negroes being captured, together with Brown and his son.

Brown claims easy terms because he did not pillage the town or insult the females.

A severe conflict occurred between the outlaws and the military on the bridge, which resulted in the loss of several men on both sides. Among the killed is Evan Dorsey, a conductor on the road.

Mr. Rowman and Mr. Hollet were badly wounded.

It is supposed the rioters will be tried under martial law and hung on the spot.

Brown threatened to hang all his prisoners if he was attacked by the troops.

The armory was taken with the rioters about eight o'clock this morning, after a desperate resistance. The rioters shot three marines during the assault. When the ruffians were brought out of the armory the greatest excitement prevailed, and it was almost impossible to restrain the armed militia.

Brown and his son were shot in the affray, the latter having died and the former is dying.

Detailed Report from the Spot.

BALTIMORE, Oct. 19.—The insurgents at Harper's Ferry entered that town and took possession of the United States Arsenal, on Sunday night. They were under the personal command of Capt. Brown himself, but only constituted a portion of the force he had collected. The people of the town fled in every direction, and the arsenal was in no condition to offer resistance.

Immediately after the incursion became known, messengers were despatched in every direction for assistance, which in all cases was promptly rendered.

Before daylight the next morning United States troops from Washington and a number of volunteer companies from the surrounding country were on the spot.

During the night, however, the insurgents had strongly intrenched themselves in and about the Arsenal; nevertheless, no sooner had the troops arrived than preparations began to be made for the attack, which was made about eight o'clock on Monday morning.

Report of an Eye-Witness.

The following are the particulars of the whole affair, as detailed by the editor of the Baltimore American, who was on the spot from the beginning, an eye witness of every thing that was done:

"Harper's Ferry, six o'clock A. M.—Preparations are now being made by the United States troops and volunteer military for an attack on the armory, in which the rioters have fortified themselves. Soldiers are posted all around the grounds of the arsenal to prevent any attempt on the part of the outlaws to escape.

"The rioters have the following persons in custody, as prisoners: Messrs. Armstead, Hall, Draughtsman, Benjamin, Mills, Master, John P. Danderlich, Paymaster of the armory, Clarke and Louis.

"A negro, named Lewis Leary, who has just died, confessed that the plot was concected by Brown, at a fair held in Ohio, two months since.

"The rioters have sent a flag of truce, with message to the effect that if they were not protected by the soldiers, they would hang all the citizens they captured."

Later—Storming the Arsenal.

HARPER'S FERRY, 8th A. M.—The armory has just been stormed, and taken after a determined resistance.

The rioters shot three of the United States mariners during the assault.

The rioters were all taken and brought out of the armory, amidst the most intense excitement.

"Many of the volunteer military are trying to get an opportunity to shoot them before they reach a place of confinement, and it is with the greatest difficulty that they are restrained from taking summary vengeance on the banditti.

"The notorious Brown and his son have been shot. The son is dead and Brown is dying.

"Brown, says his name is Ossawatimmie Brown, and that his whole object was to free the slaves. He justifies his actions as those of a philanthropist. He declares that none are engaged in the plot but those who accompanied him."

Pursuit of the Insurgents.

BALTIMORE, Oct. 19.—The Harper's Ferry insurrection continues still to absorb public attention, and intense excitement prevails throughout this and neighboring communities.

In pursuance of instructions from the Governor, General Stuart has communicated orders to General J. W. Watkins, of this city, to equip a body of mounted men immediately for service in the mountains near Harper's Ferry, where many of the insurgents who were under Cook have taken refuge, and the troops left yesterday afternoon.

Three artillery companies from Fort Monroe arrived in this city yesterday morning, and are quartered at Fort McHenry awaiting orders.

A despatch from Harper's Ferry, dated Tuesday noon, says only two of the insurgents escaped without being wounded, viz: Edwin Coppich, white, and Childs Green, colored. They are both from Iowa. The party originally consisted of only 22, of whom fifteen were killed and two were mortally wounded on Monday, soon after the storming of the armory and capture of the band.

Something took place from the hills on the Maryland side, which is supposed to have been Cook's parting salute. The fire was returned, but the party were too far distant for the fire to prove effective.

Volunteers also have gone from the neighborhood in pursuit of the fugitives.

There are now probably a thousand armed men concentrated at Harper's Ferry, and reinforcements are pouring in from all quarters.

Action of the U. S. Government.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 19.—A telegraph despatch was yesterday transmitted from the Secretary of War, to Col. Lee, at Harper's Ferry, stating that District Attorney Ould would forthwith proceed to this place, and at once institute legal proceedings against the prisoners.

The despatch also states that orders had been given to get a train ready at once to convey horses and men from Washington to the scene of the riot, and to pursue the rioters into any State or locality in the Union.

These orders were given by the President, at the request of Gov. Wise.

Military Commission of the Insurgents.

HARPER'S FERRY, Oct. 17.—One of the insurgents, who was killed, had in his pocket a captain's commission, belonging to one Capt. T. H. Seeman, purporting to be issued under the authority of the Provisional Government of the United States. It was dated October 15th, 1859, and signed by A. W. Brown, "Commander-in-Chief."

The Harper's Ferry Insurrection—Discovery of Arms and Ammunition—Further Development of the Plot—Prominent Abolitionists Implicated—Gerritt Smith and Others Furnished the Funds—Hundreds of Abolition Letters Found—Brown not Dead Yet.

HARPER'S FERRY, Oct. 19.—The Baltimore Grays started in pursuit of Cook and the fugitives under him, on Monday night.

On their way the Grays stopped at the farm which had been hired by Brown, as the rendezvous of the traitors, where they discovered several wagons loads with arms and ammunition consisting of rifles and pistols bearing the stamp of the Massachusetts Manufacturing Company, of Chicopee. Also a large number of spears, and bowie-knives attached to poles, indicating that a large number of men were to be supplied with arms for their murderous work.

It is supposed that these munitions were brought through Pennsylvania.

The insurgents did not attempt to rob the Paymaster's department at the Armory, in which there was a considerable amount of money.

Brown, when he was supposed to be dying, declared his sole object was to free the slaves from bondage.

He also declared that no other person than those about him were connected with the movement, and that he did not expect aid from the North.

He made the above statement in answer to questions propounded to him.

He also insisted that what he had done was right, and that he ought to be treated as a prisoner of war.

On Tuesday evening, a party of United States marines and volunteers visited Brown's house, and found, in addition to the arms above mentioned, a large quantity of blankets, shoes, clothes, tents, fifteen hundred pikes, with large blades affixed to them, and various documents indicating that their plans were deeply laid, with ramifications through several States.

The troops also discovered letters from several prominent Abolitionists; one from Fred Douglas, containing ten dollars from a lady, to aid the glorious cause; also a letter from Gerritt Smith, about money matters, and a check or draft on a New York bank, from Gerritt Smith, for $100, indorsed by the old hero.

Governor Wise has taken possession of all these papers, and has offered $1000 reward for the capture of Cook.

A large number of armed men are in hot pursuit of Cook and his men.

Action of the Authorities.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 20.—The excitement in relation to the Harper's Ferry revolt is subsiding.

The question of jurisdiction in the matter between the Federal Government and the State of Virginia has been the subject of much discussion between Gov. Wise and the United States Attorney, but it has finally been settled thus: The local authorities are to try the prisoners for murder, and the United States authorities are to proceed against them for treason.

Killed and Wounded.

During the riot five citizens and fifteen of the insurgents were wounded and five were taken prisoners.

The prisoners have been committed to the Charleston (Va.) jail, to await their trial.

Brown's Confession.

The wound inflicted upon Brown, shortly after the storming of the Armory, has not proved fatal. He is now improving; and states further, that he never had at his farm more than twenty-two men at any one time, but had reason to expect reinforcements from Maryland, Kentucky, North and South Carolina, an other parts of the country.

He says he had provided arms for fifteen hundred men, including two hundred revolvers and two hundred Sharp's rifles, which were stored at his farm.

He thinks he prevented reinforcements coming to him, and caused the failure of his schemes by the mistake he made in stopping the railroad trains on Sunday night.

Further Discoveries.

A thorough search of the farm house and premises occupied by Brown has been made and resulted in the discovery of an immense number of letters from all parts of the North. One dispatch says a bushel of letters have been discovered relating mostly to money matters, and informing Brown from time to time as to the amount of money raised for his patriotic work.

One of Gerritt Smith's letters informs Brown of money having been deposited in a New York Bank to the credit of J. Smith & Son, which it has been ascertained is the assumed name by which Brown transacted the financial business of the enterprise.

Further Disclosures of the Harper's Ferry Insurrection.

BALTIMORE, Oct. 20.—Dispatches from Harper's Ferry state that the outlaw Brown, while conversing yesterday, in the presence of Senator Mason, the Hon. Mr. Faulkner, the Hon. Mr. Vallandingham, and others, answered various questions which they put to him, which clearly demonstrated the complicity of numerous persons in the Northern, Western, and Eastern States, in the disgraceful outrage, recently perpetrated at that place.

Brown refused to answer whether he had conferred with Giddings, of Ohio, in relation to this Virginia expedition, but admitted that he (Brown) had numerous sympathizers in all the free States.

It is believed that Cook has escaped and reached Pennsylvania.

United States Attorney Ould has left Harper's Ferry for Washington, thus relinquishing the prisoner to the authorities of Virginia.

Governor Wise ridicules the people of Harper's Ferry for allowing themselves to be captured and imprisoned by a handful of men.

Brown is in no danger of dying from the wounds he received.

Gerritt Smith's letter to Brown is written in obscure language, informing Brown of what he had done, and promising to do what he could to keep Brown "at his Kansas work."

Gov. Wise takes the Responsibility.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 21.—Gov. Wise has arrived in this city, and made a speech on the steps of the capitol in relation to the late insurrection at Harper's Ferry.

He said he had taken the responsibility of placing a guard to protect the citizens and Government property at Harper's Ferry, and it was also his intention to distribute arms at all accessible points in the State of Virginia where such attacks might be made.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 24.—A number of the letters found at the farm-house, where the Harper's Ferry insurgents rendezvoused, and brought to this city, directly implicate Joshua R. Giddings, formerly abolitionist representative from Ohio, in the late insurrection. They will be published in the Constitution newspaper to-morrow.

PHILADELPHIA, Oct. 24.—The Hon. J. R. Giddings has published a card in which he denies ever being consulted by Brown concerning the late Harper's Ferry insurrection, or upon any other matter whatever.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 24.—The Secretary of War has just received an insolent letter, purporting to come from Cook, of the Harper's Ferry insurgents, dated at Chambersburg, Pa., in which he threatens to take Harper's Ferry and Charlestown, Va., with an army of several thousand men. He also says in his letter, that he will throw open all the jails and liberate all the prisoners.

BOSTON, Oct. 24.—The Abolitionists of Worcester, Mass., propose contributing a sum of money for the purpose of employing able counsel to defend Brown at the coming trial in Virginia.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, October 24, 1859.

We condense the following statement from the New Orleans Price Current of the 22d instant:—

We have no important changes to notice in the general market since the date of our last report. The transactions in nearly all departments are on a limited scale, and must continue so until more ample receipts shall afford scope for operations for export, the exception to the general dullness being our leading staple, Cotton, which, it will be seen, has met with very ready sale, at firm prices.

COTTON.—With respect to prices, we have to remark that no quotable change has taken place, though the advantage has evidently been on the side of sellers for some days past, especially in Middling to Strict Middling descriptions, which are still the qualities most in demand, and for which the market closes very firm.

The receipts at this port since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobila, Florida and Texas,) are 332,989 bales, against 255,122 bales to same date last year, and the increase in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 70,371 bales.

New Orleans Classification.

Inferior	—@—	Good Middling	11¼@11⅝
Ordinary	—@—	Middling Fair	11⅝@11⅞
Good Ordinary	9¾@ 9¾	Fair	—@—
Low Middling	10⅛@10⅜	Good Fair	—@—

SUGAR.—The sales of the week amount to 800 hhds. We quote for Inferior and Refining —to—; Common to Good Common 6 to 6¼; Fair to Fully Fair 6¼ to 6¾; Prime to Choice 7 to 7½; Centrifugal and Clarified 7 to 8 cents per pound. The above quotations apply to round lots, but small orders of 5 hhds and under, could not be filled without paying a further advance of ⅛ to ¼c per pound.

Of new crop, some 50 hhds have been received; we are advised of the sale of 15 hhds, fully fair, in two lots—one at 7½ and the other at 7¾c. and a lot of 7 hhds prime Centrifugal at 8c. per pound.

MOLASSES.—The old crop is almost gone. A few trifling lots were disposed of through the week. The quotations are: Inferior and Fermenting, 25 to 30 cents per gallon; and Prime to Choice Rebolled 33 to 35 cents. Of the new crop several lots have been received, and sold at prices ranging from 41 to 45 cents a gallon.

FLOUR.—About 7,000 barrels have been sold during the past week, at from $5 to $5 25 for superfine, $6 12½ to 6 75 for ordinary to good extra, and $7 00 to $8 00 per bbl. for small lots of choice extra brands.

GRAIN.—The receipts of Corn continue light. About 3,500 sacks have been sold at from 55c to $1 05 for ordinary; and $1 20 to $1 25 for old white. Oats have been in good request at 55c to 57c per bushel for good to prime St. Louis. Bran sells at 85c to $1 05 for ordinary to choice lots. Wheat sells at $1 15 per bushel for prime red.

PORK.—The principal sales reported through the week were at $15 50 to $16 00 per bbl. for Mess.

BEEF.—We quote Prime Mess at $14 50 per bbl. for extra brands.

BACON.—Shoulders 8½ to 8¾; Hibbed Sides 11¼ to 10¾; Clear Sides 12½ to 12¾; Sugar-cured Hams 13 to 14 cents per pound.

LARD.—We quote 11¼ to 11½c for prime to choice prime, in tcs. and 12 to 12c. for kegs.

BUTTER.—Western generally selling at 12 to 15 cents per pound, according to quality; and Cheese 8 to 9c.

BAGGING AND BALE ROPE.—We quote Kentucky Bagging at 12¼ to 14¼ cents per yard; India Bagging, 11¼ to 12¼c Bale Rope, hand spun, 6¾ to 7¼, and machine made, 7¼ to 7¾ cents per pound.

GUNNY BAGS.—Limited parcels sell at 10¼ cents for light and 12 to 12½c. to heavy and extra heavy bags.

COFFEE.—We quote fair at 11 to 12, and prime at 12½c. per pound.

The present Number closes the Nineteenth Volume of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE. In the introductory Notice prefixed to the first Number the Publishers announced their intention to present a periodical "which no one who had the slightest relish for miscellaneous reading, or the slightest wish to keep himself informed of the progress and results of the literary genius of his own age, would willingly be without." And they intend to publish it at so low a rate, and to give it a value so much beyond its price, that it shall make its way into the hands of the family circle of every intelligent citizen of the United States."

How far they have succeeded in carrying out their design the 114 Numbers of the Magazine already published will show. Each of these contains as much matter as any ordinary octavo of 400 pages, costing, if illustrated in the style of the Magazine, at least three dollars. The Nineteen Volumes of the Magazine are thus equivalent to a library of more than a thousand Volumes, comprising the best productions of the foremost Novelists, Historians, Essayists, and Poets of the day.

Without entering into a comparison with other American periodicals the Publishers may be permitted to say that HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains 75 per cent. more matter than Blackwood's, or the Dublin University Magazine. While giving place to many of the best productions of European Novelists and Essayists, HARPER'S MAGAZINE regularly furnishes a larger amount of original matter than is contained in any other similar periodical, whether European or American. It has published articles for more than Two Hundred American writers residing in every section and in almost every State of the Union, by thus welcoming contributions from every part of the country, the Publishers have effectually prevented the Magazine from assuming a sectional character, or becoming the organ of any unnatural sympathy, clique or party.

As an Illustrated Magazine, HARPER'S is wholly without a rival. The volumes already published have contained more than Six Thousand Engravings, most of them executed in the highest style of the art, from Original Drawings by DARLEY, PARSONS, HOPPIN, FREDERICKS, WALLIN, TOWNSEND, HOPKINS, CHAPIN, LOSSING, YOUNT, BRYANT, MCLENAN, SCHOTTER, ROGERS, HALLAS, and other Artists. For these the Magazine has paid not less than One Hundred and Twenty Thousand Dollars. The cost of its literary contributions has considerably exceeded this amount. HARPER'S MAGAZINE has therefore, in less than five years, paid more than a Quarter of a Million Dollars to American Authors and Artist.

The Publishers gratefully acknowledge that this large outlay has been remunerative beyond their most sanguine expectations. They hoped from the first that the Magazine would make its way into the hands of the family circle of every intelligent citizen of the United States," but the number of these readers have proved far greater than they anticipated. They believe that the circulation of the Magazine will continue to increase with the growth and population of the country for the spirit and manner in which it will be hereafter conducted, they can offer no better guarantee than the contents of the Volumes already issued.

CROAKERS AND FAULT-FINDERS.

I do not say croakers or fault-finders, for the terms are not precisely synonymous. Croakers are those who grumble or censure unreasonably, but fault-finders are they who simply censure or object, and possibly may sometimes be in the right.

The croaker is a habitual, discontented, sore-headed, caviller; the fault finder is not necessarily accustomed to murmur. But both the croaker and the fault-finder are often, perhaps generally, characterized by a bad or a bitter spirit. The fault-finder bears the relation to the croaker of the egg to the chicken, or of the tadpole to the frog. Need I say the chicken comes from the egg, and the tadpole fault-finder is in danger of becoming the vile frog croaker?

Alack, what a disgustful variety there is of these hoarse musicians! There are your croakers against providence, the weather croakers and fault-finders—there is always for them too much rain or too little, it is too hot or too cold, or each too long continued. Not considering that there is nothing less under man's control than the arrangement of seasons and weather, and therefore that it is not only unreasonable but actually impious to fret and fume and find fault about it—they go on most presumptuously with their censures and pestilent discontent, as if they ought to have the management of the whole affair. I verily believe that there are many of this class of grumblers who would not be satisfied, if they were to make a thousand bushels of corn to the acre, and cotton and all other produce in proportion. The agricultural yield would then either be too much for them, or else not quite enough.

Then again we have our mercantile croakers, our war croakers, our political and social croakers—croakers of health, of religion, of science, literature, art—croakers about wives, husbands, children, servants, tradesmen, neighbors, friends, preachers, and last but not least, the croakers and fault-finders against editors and school-masters and teachers. The mercantile croaker never has trade right, always apprehends a crash sooner or later, somebody is always to blame. The war croaker frequently prognosticates war—can give you the most extensive criticisms on the profound strategy of the greatest generals, knows more about what they ought or ought not to do, or to have done, than the generals themselves; the war croaker often apparently thinks there ought to be war, and seems to desire nothing so much—blames others for their supineness, and even cowardice, when, perhaps, if his actual military service were required, he would think "discretion the better part of valour," and would exhibit practical proof of the distich (slightly but immaterially changed) that,

He who croaks and runs away,
May live to fight another day.

The political croaker is an animal of varied hue—and varying as the chameleon, but not so harmless. Sometimes he is found among the ins, and sometimes among the outs. He is great to scent corruption—no wonder, since he is always so near to it, or it to him. This sort, also, appears as the demagogue in office—who so grandiloquent and self-important as he? He vaunts Atlas's shoulders of pomposity and bombast. Once he was the dear people's servant; but, being elected, he is now the plebean crowd's master; he is a true representative of the antarchy of the demagogue. Whatever his public and ranting professions may be, there are not wanting indications of heart to show, that, nothing will express better the true sentiment and character of the man, than the language of Louis XIV., l'etot c'est moi: in plain English, I am the state. He croaks at every thing which oppose that proposition.

It is not my intention to delineate all the classes of croakers at this time. A few more will suffice.

It is painfully amusing to see how the newspeper croakers sometimes pitch into the corps editorial. There are some specimens of this class who have no idea of letting mercy rejoice either against or with judgment—they have no "mercy on the editor" at all. A grenouille of this breed lately saluted one of our accomplished editors with a belligerent serenade. The Doctor with astute politeness proffered him to enter his parterre, and heard his song out with consummate sang froid, and when the strain was ended, the Doctor quietly picked up his editorial lance with which striking his fresghip a great blow on his big green head just between his two impudent goggle-eyes, knocked him clear out of the doors back into his obscure mud-paddle pond. These censurers demand that the newspaper shall suit everybody by suiting themselves exclusively.

But, perhaps, the most curious kinde of the grumbling batrachian are those who display their spirit and abilities upon the corps of educators.

These have an common sense appreciation of Sam Slick's motto, applicable to other subjects as well as to horses, "I'd rather keep a critter whose faults I do know, than swap him for one whose faults I dont know." Their standard for the teacher is, that he must be a perfect, infallible paragon, possessed of all possible and impossible knowledge, and incapable of any mistake. The elements which constitute this immaculate standard are in the meantime, composed of all the caprices, whims, and fastidious fooleries of the various masculine and feminine individuals whether old or young (men, women, and children) that make up the class. Amongst the patrons of every school or college, and in every board of trustees, there is a greater or less number of these croaking rascals. They always manage to excite and to keep up some sort of disturbance. They are never entirely pleased—the fact is, they can only be pleased by being displeased. They have not brains enough to perceive that it is a thousand times better that an association or body of juveniles (at least) should be governed by one will and mind, even though sometimes making mistakes, rather than that such association or body should be attempted to be ruled by a dozen or more conflicting and absurd wills and opinions. But a truce to the stuff and folly of all such perverted and distorted specimens of human nature.

After all I cannot say but that these pesterers have a use, though not by their own design—a use something like that of the wicked for the day of slaughter. They remind one of Crockett's lightwood knot. Davy was traversing a road and heard a terrible noise in the bushes; he immediately went out there to see what it was which was making such a big fuss, when lo! it was a lightwood knot so crooked that it could not lie still. The only difference between Davy's knot and these butrachians of ours is, that the latter are so "crooked" they will not lie still—and so contorted are they that their throats are not strait, and the creaks which come out thence are worse twisted than the forked lightning. Lightwood knots when burnt make a light blaze, and as bacon is a grand fuel for the steam engine; but if our frog dons and dames were burnt, it is doubtful whether they would be so useful. They might give out a little light to warn the unwary—they would hardly afford any warmth, as frog-blood is allowedly cold, and they would be likely to send forth a baleful light without any heat.

In conclusion, the time is devotedly prayed for, when the wickedness of the wicked shall come to an end, and the follies of the wise, no less than those of fools, shall cease.

GRAPESHOT.

LETTER FROM TEXAS. No. IV.

Hempstead, no doubt, is a very clever little place. I can speak of it only from a rail-road acquaintance, and what the state of society may be I am not prepared to say, but from the general survey that I was able to make of it, I am inclined to think that it is a place, at which one would not be disposed to live, if it were equally convenient to live any where else. There we left the cars for the stage, and there we sat down to one meal—dinner, when I was forced, for the second time that day, to fall back upon my favorite position of "sweet potatoes"—fortunately, this vegetable is very good, if you will just let the fire cook it without intermeddling in any way. With the dessert came in a more hopeful state of things; and I felt as if I could say of the small piece of lemon last brought me, as Sir Walter Raleigh said of his wine: "It is very good if one might abide by it;" but whether my plate, knife, and fork were being washed, preparatory to the second course, or whether they were waiting for the last to be done, I could not say; I only know that my piece came at the last extremety, when the stage was waiting at the door; but inwardly addressing the waiter, I said: "My friend, if there is any Gil Blas trick in this I cannot permit you to 'profit by it;" so I immediately swallowed the last, though it was as hot as a patent cooking stove could make it.

From flying over the prairie, like birds of passage, we found ourselves packed into a mail coach and digging along through the dust and sand at the merest snail's pace. Fortunately for us, our company consisted of agreeable intelligent gentlemen, and the tedious way was shortened by lively conversation. One of the gentlemen had been to California, and entertained us for some time with an account of the country and its resources. Among other things he mentioned the "red wood" of California; identical with the wood, if I mistake not, of which cigar boxes are made, and which possess the valuable property of not shrinking—a property which is likely to be appreciated by persons whose houses are as quickly built, if they are not as magnificent, as the palace of Aladdin.

This gentleman had also been in search of the "Gold Lake" in California, and had found it beautifully situated upon the top of a mountain. It was, indeed, not a sheet of liquid gold, but of what is called in poetry "pure crystal," though not available as such, in commerce.

While we are talking, we are moving almost noiselessly down toward the Brazos. The wheels cut deep into the rich light earth; forests of oak, with their graceful covering of moss, are on each side of us, and the scene is made gay with the bright red flower of the Spanish apple, the root of which, I was told, is an excellent substitute for slippery Elm. Towards evening we passed some very fine cotton plantations, and in a short time the pretty little town of Chapel Hill was presented to our view. The whole landscape is attractive, with gently rolling hills, and whitening fields of cotton, and green foliage and white houses shining upon the hillsides.

We stopped at the Hotel, and in a few minutes I saw at the door the bright and welcoming face of Dr. Wilkes, who had come to invite us to his hospitable mansion. We had scarcely started when I saw a buggy coming down the street containing a lady and gentleman. I looked at the lady and said to myself: "Certainly I have seen the daguerreotype of that face;" and so it proved to be. It was one of my Texian cousins, and her father, Rev. Mr. Kenney, who has been living in Texas now somewhere about thirty years, longer perhaps than any other Methodist minister in the State. After our greetings were over, we proceeded to the house of Dr. Wilkes, where we found his wife going through all the duties attendant upon a large household, with a face as placid as a picture of the Virgin. Just here a story of the Doctor's little son occurs to me. He is about four years old. One day he said to his mother: "Mamma, what does Pa preach for?" His mother replied: "To make people good." "Well," he replied, "what has Mr. —— and Dr. —— and Mr. —— been doing that is bad, that Pa has to preach to them?" The matter being sufficiently explained, the conversation ceased. A few days after, however, the mother found it necessary to punish the child, for some fault. Before she had yet had time to inflict the chastisement, the little fellow proposed a compromise measure. He said: "Mamma, don't whip me, but wait till Pa comes home and let him preach to me." Whether a rigid sermon with a direct personal application would be preferable to a whipping, I cannot determine.

Soon after our arrival at Dr. Wilkes', we had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Perry, the preacher stationed at Chapel Hill. He was in one sense no stranger, for I had heard his praises from the lips of a mutual friend in South Caroline, so that it was only necessary to say to me: "This is the face and person which belong to the character that you already know." Amid a multiplicity of arrangements it was at last arranged that we should accompany Mr. Perry to the house of Mr. Kezee, with whom he and Mrs. Perry were boarding. Here we met a most kind welcome, and found ourselves as pleasantly situated as possible. After tea, Mr. Perry, Mr. Cross, and most of the family went to preaching; Mrs. Perry and I sat and talked of friends in South Carolina, and Georgia, until we almost forgot how many miles separated us from them. After awhile, however, the fatigues of the day overcame the interest of the conversation, and I found myself forced to retire. To sleep, however, was another matter. The "little sand man" had surely come, but with him had come such a phantom host of centipedes, tarantulas, rattlesnakes, copper heads, moccasins, spreading adders, and all the horrors of which these Texians tell you so coolly and laughingly, that to sleep was utterly impossible. There I lay, in a pleasant room, on a comfortable bed, feeling as if I were upon the rack, sleep "weighing my eyes down," centipides and tarantulas (i. e. the fear of them) keping them open. Every moment I grew more nervous—it was the first night I had slept in the interior of Texas—the faculty of reason was altogether a superfluity. Suddenly I thought a centipide might be crawling on the headboard of the bed; I arose to see, and with me arose my shadow at the foot of the bed—"angels and ministers of grace defend us!" What new horror is that? Seeing instantly what it was, I laughed at my own silliness, and fell back on the bed with the determination just to let the centipides sting on if they chose. Thus I slept.

Truly, JANE T. H. CROSS.

A PLEA FOR THE BEARDLESS.—In the year 1586 the young Constable of Castile was sent by his sovereign to felicitate Pope Sixtus V. on his exaltation to the papal throne. The Pontiff, displeased that so young an ambassador had been deputed to him, could not help saying, "And well, sir, did your master want men, by sending me an ambassador without a beard?" "If my sovereign had thought," replied the proud young Spaniard, "that merit consisted in a beard, he would have sent you a goat, and not a gentleman."

Good breeding is a guard upon the tongue; the misfortune is, that we put it on and off with our fine clothes and visiting faces, and do not wear it where it is most wanted—at home!

THE easiest way to appear good, is to be good.

For the New Orleans Christian Advocate.

KEEP YOUR TONGUE.

With the import of these three words far a subject, and the thirty thousand readers of the Advocate for an audience, we bespeak a respectful reading

We do not mean to insult you by the command, and therefore, hope you will hold in abeyance your rising anger, when we simply request you to keep your tongue.

Depend on it, there is no needed necessity for you to do so, or else we would not presume to make the request.

For if you do not keep your tongue secure with the anchor of moderation, you cannot have a calm and clear conscience.

If you would not be tossed and driven out upon the great sea of strife and trouble, keep your tongue:—

From excessive talking. Wordy, persistent talkers, whose tongues run like a race horse, are booked as sinners by the Bible: "for in the multitude of words there wanteth not sin."

The wise man, in his day, recognized this chattering, babbling class as very foolish people, and sententiously declared, "that the mouth of fools poureth out foolishness."

But when this excessive talking assumes the habit of scolding, and a man becomes the fretful, peevish, or common brawler, or a woman degenerates into a common scold, then the truth will not be questioned that, "it is better to dwell in the wilderness, than with a contentious and an angry woman," or man.

Tumults, anger, revenge and strife, ever follow in the train of such uneven tempers.

And when, as the old sailor would say, 'it is blowing great guns' about the head, men, with a peculiar look, will quote the proverb: "it is better to dwell in a corner of the house-top, than with a brawling woman in a wide house." And doubtless, some men would gladly betake themselves to the garret, if they could only compromise a peace by so doing. And many a sweet tempered, and heavenly minded woman, would hide herself in an inner chamber, if she could only save herself from a rough, crabbed, or dram-drinking husband.

Has the subject found you out? Do you begin to assume a defensive attitude? Then there was a necessity for the request, keep your tongue.

We beseech you not to throw the paper down. We did not intend to make you angry, only with the habit of talking and scolding so much. You are a man of too much sense, and you are a woman of too much character to fly into a pet, and therefore, we make still another request of you, and that is:

Keep your tongue from slander.

What! slander? Yes. Does not the very word itself sound keen, pungent, devilish?

But you do not intend to charge me with slandering any one? Well, keep your temper and read on. You will agree with us, that almost every community is more or less afflicted with such characters.

Did you ever whisper a story, report, or tale, in the ear of your neighbour in the utmost confidence, with a pledged seal of secrecy upon the lip, which, if it should come to an open exposure would damage character? Did you ever say, with an expression of righteous innocence, to another, "well really, I am so sorry for Mr. B, that he should have been guilty of so detestable a thing; I could not have believed it, but 'it comes so direct from Mrs. Tattle, that I am troubled about it?'" And thus, you let fly the keen and polished shaft, from the bow of slander, and the poisoned arrow went hurtling forth to accomplish its direful results

The fact is, if we come to a severe examination, it will come to pass, that almost all of us, are more or less, guilty of slander.

Floating upon the vexed current of gossip in every community, you hear of orphaned remarks, fatherless reports, and motherless speeches, all derogatory of character, to a greater or less degree, and each one feels entitled to pass these slanders and charge them, when questioned, to that mysterious person, "they say!"

And it would seem that in some places this great firm of "They Say & Co," are carrying on an immense wholesale and retail trade of whispering, babbling, backbiting, talebearing and slander in all its forms.

What bitter fountains are thus opened in thousands of hearts and homes!

"Adders poison is under their lips," said one whose whole life smarted under their stings; and thousands echo the bitter experience.

We sound it out with thundering emphasis to the thousands who form our audience—keep your tongues.

Ah sir! Ah madam! you may tame the wild beast of the forest, or civilize the savage from Africa, but never, never will you be able to arrest the progress of that cruel word which you uttered so carelessly yesterday morning or last night.

The Bible clearly intimates that the repeator of slander is alike guilty with the originator. The learned Dr. South, we think, says, that the teller and the repeater of slander ought both to be hung; the one by the tongue and the other by the ears. And if sympathy should go so far as to cry out, "cut them down," let it be done, but with the loss of the tongue in the one, and ears of the other. If such a sentence were to be executed now a days, what a tongueless and earless race we should have.

Persecution by the sword and fiery faggot has ceased, but is there not a persecution by the sharp and fiery tongue raging fiercely, cutting down and consuming its victims?

Let the motto then be rung out over the land and through the Church: Keep your tongues! So endeth the first reading.

NOTA BENE.

THE EIGHTH WONDER OF THE WORLD.

THERE used to be but seven wonders of the word.

These were:—1st. The brass Colossus of Rhodes, 121 feet in height, built by Ceres, A. D. 288, occupying twenty years in making. It stood across the harbour of Rhodes 66 years, and was then thrown down by an earthquake. It was bought by a Jew from the Saracens, who loaded 900 camels with the brass.

2nd. The Pyramids of Egypt. The largest one engaged 360,000 workmen, was thirty years in building, and has now stood at least 3000 years.

3d. The Aquednets of Rome, invented by Applas Claudius, the censor.

4th. The Labyrinth of Psammetichus, on the banks of the Nile, containing within one continued wall 1000 houses and twelve royal palaces, all covered with marble, and having only one entrance. The building was said to contain 3000 chambers, and a hall built of marble adorned with statues of the gods.

5th. The Pharos of Alexandria, a tower of Ptolemy Philadelphus, in the year 282 before Christ. It was erected as a light-house, and contained magnificent galleries of marble—a large lantern at the top, the light of which was seen nearly a hundred miles off; mirrors of enormous sizes were fixed round the galleries, reflecting everything on the sea. A common tower is now erected in its place.

6th. The walls of Babylon, built by order of Semiramis, or Nebuchadnezzar, and finished in one year, by 200,000 men. They were of immense thickness.

7th. The Temple of Diana at Epheene, completed in the reign of Servius, the sixth King of Rome. It was 450 feet long, 200 broad, and supported by 126 marble pillars.

8th. Yes, now we have eight world's wonders—the Great Eastern Steamship

THE METHODIST CHURCH APOSTOLICAL.

Many have been the claims for likeness and identity to the Apostolic Churches. We wish to examine whether the Methodist Church has any claims to present for this honor. Likeness may be expected in three particulars—doctrines, ordinances, and polity. The Methodist Church teaches, that Christ and the Holy Spirit are equally divine with the Father; that the atonement, or provision of mercy, is universal; that justification is by faith alone, and regeneration a necessary qualification for heaven; that, (aside from grace,) men are totally depraved, and hence all ability to turn to God is derived from grace; that men can improve this grace and be saved, or abuse it and be lost; and that future rewards and punishments will be eternal. These doctrines are certainly apostolical. Thus far, likeness is clearly discerned. Let us now look for the ordinances. A scriptural ordinance, is an institute of divine appointment and of perpetual obligation. Of such, the New Testament teaches but two, baptism, and the Lord's supper. These do for us two things: 1. They introduce us into God's household and covenant, and 2. Bind us to duty. We hold them to be signs, or symbols, and not necessarily possessing or conveying inherent grace. We try to use the ordinances according to their spiritual import, without reference to mode, as mode is no where taught as essential to duty, and if it is essential to one duty it is to all. Hence we allow the right of private judgment to candidates for the reception of the ordinances. These views we think the scriptures clearly sustain. The last feature of likeness to be sought is polity. This, in the New Testament, we find in general principles only, and no where framed up into fixed form. Here is one of the strongest evidences of the unerring wisdom of the Christian Legislator, and of the inspiration of the Christian system. The gospel was to be preached under all kinds of civil government, from democracy to monarchy. If the gospel system had a fixed polity, it would be in constant collision with civil government somewhere, and in every age of the world, which would seriously retard, and often completely bar its success.

The polity of the New Testament is neither a democracy, aristocracy, or monarchy. It has properly no legislative or judicial departments. All its laws are already made—its powers are wholly executive.

But suppose we apply the terms of civil to ecclesiastical government; then, the latter is a monarchy, in that Christ is its sole Lawgiver; it is an aristocracy, in that the word and ordinances are administered by Christ's appointees; it is a democracy, in that the discipline of the Church is administered by the ministry and laity together. Now we see it in operation. The apostolical ministers were certainly itineronts—so were the prophets before them. Were Christ and his Apostles ever settled pastors? Never. It is said, "He went about doing good." To his ministers he said, "as ye go, preach!" They were sent to seek for the people, and not to wait for the people to seek for them, as is the case in all Congregational and similar Churches. The Apostles were not sent to fill vacant churches, but to prepare materials, and build new ones. A settled pastorate has its advantages no doubt, but itinerancy has this adventage, that it is scriptural and apostolical. While the church was under inspired teachers, they were itinerants without exception. Many, designing to popularize church polity, demand its conformity to the State. Can any sensible man suppose that a fixed church polity could assume every possible form of civil government? This delusion is ancient.

"When christianity came to be fully settled in the world, they contrived to model the external government of the church as near as might be to the civil government of the Roman Empire. As every city had its temporal magistrate, so every city had its bishop; as every province had its proconsul, whose seat was in the metropolis, so also the church had its metropolitan or Archbishop; and as every diocese had its vicarii, so the church had her primate." Why is the Romish Church blamed for demanding that the state should conform to the church? Is it not as reasonable that the state should conform to the church, as to require the church to conform to the state? If inspiration has given us a fixed form of church polity, it is certainly the safest to be governed by inspiration, and hence the better reason to make the state conform to the church. Then we conclude that itinerancy is Apostolical. The Father sent the Son, the Son sent the Disciples, and the Apostles sent Peter and John—Acts 8, 14: and 13, 3: We think therefore, that the likeness between the Methodist and Apostolic Churches is clearly made out.

THE MISSIONARY COLLECTIONS AT CONFERENCE.

MR. EDITOR: The Board of Managers of the Alabama Conference Missionary Society has abolished the practice of taking up collections at our anniversaries, which, with all deference to their superior judgment, I think deleterious to the interests of missions. We have been in the habit of raising from five hundred to one thousand dollars at our anniversaries, in addition to the collections on circuits and stations, the whole of which is lost by the present policy; and not only does the missionary cause lose what might be raised at our anniversaries, but the example is being followed by other conferences, and, should it prevail throughout the connection, it would amount to the loss of thousands of dollars annually. I know it is argued that the most of what is contributed on such occasions is paid by the preachers, and if they will contribute on their circuits and stations the loss will not be so great, and they will stimulate others by their example. In reply I would say that the preachers pay none the less on their work, because of their conference contributions, but, on the contrary, are stimulated to greater zeal and liberality thereby. They learn both how to give and how to collect, for the cause of missions, at the anniversary, where they have the example and the experience of our ablest men on this subject. But, if necessary, let the preachers be admonished to be less lavish at the conference anniversaries, but do not, by any means, set aside the collection, which is an important element in all our missionary meetings.

What will avail all the light imparted on the importance of missions, and all the convictions of duty that may be inspired, if they result not in corresponding sacrifices of ease and self-indulgence in order to their promotion? I have no doubt that many persons have had their first impulses in the cause of benevolence imparted by their donations at missionary anniversaries.

It is said that the principal reason for discontinuing the collections at our conference missionary meetings is, that the levity which is often engendered, and the unsanctified motives appealed to, and the undignified and inconsistent measures resorted to, in order to swell the collections, is disgusting to thinking men and disparaging to the cause of religion; and it is better to dispense with the collection altogether than to subject ourselves to such mortifying scenes.

I admit that sometimes such things occur, and they are to be deprecated; but can they not be discontenanced and corrected without so great a sacrifice to the missionary cause? I think a judicious selection of platform speakers and a few words of admonition from one of our bishops or venerable fathers in the ministry, at the commencement of the exercises, would correct this evil, and not only the addresses but the collection itself would become a means of spiritual profit, and promotive of the spirit of consecration and enlarged, benevolence.

If the imprudent manner in which collections are taken up is a good reason for abandoning our anniversary collections, it would be equally valid in regard to collections on circuits and stations, seeing that the evil is not confined to conference collections for missions exclusively. I hope that our excellent Board of Managers will reconsider their action, and let us have our annual collections for missions at conference, with the amendment in the manner of taking them which their wisdom and prudence may suggest.

LOCAL PREACHERS.

There is a great deal of talent in the ranks of the local ministry, which, to a great extent, is inoperative. Were this actively at work, as far as circumstances will permit, it might accomplish a great deal. Cannot some plan be devised which will render it more available for good than it now is?

We would not have them, as has been sometimes suggested, received into conference. I admire and love the real itinerant system too well to see it destroyed in that way. There is too much of the local element already mixed up with it. I do not think a local ministry need come in conflict at all with the itineracy, occupying, as these two classes should, different and distinct positions in the body ecclesiastic. But the local itinerant system is utterly inconsistent and incompatible with the real itinerant system. It is even now stabbing it to the death. This local itinerancy, as a system, I "love to hate;" while I have a high regard for many brethren who occupy this unfortunate position. It combines all the disadvantages of an itinerant and a settled pastorate and possesses not one of the advantages of either. Keep the two classes—local and itinerant—separate and distinct; and in their different spheres there is certainly work enough for all. On large circuits it is impossible for the pastors to attend to all the interests of the church, as it regards pastoral visiting, class-meetings, Sunday Schools and Bible classes. And at the same time much of the material that would have made good class-leaders and Sunday-school superintendants, has been worked up into local preachers; and these two most important Interests are wofully neglected. Now, would it not be better to assign, annually, to each local preacher one, or at most two churches, where, in addition to preaching, he shall attend to the duties of class-leader and Sunday-school superintendant? In a word, combine local preacher, Sunday-school superintendant, and class-leader in one person. Or, if you please, make him a kind of sub-preacher in charge over the one or two appointments that may be assigned him. Much of what the local preachers do is thrown away, because it is scattered about from place to place without any regularity or system. This plan would concentrate their efforts. We lose much because our children are not instructed, nor our young converts taken care of. It would remedy these two evils. Indeed, I have thought it quite probable that, as a body, local preachers might be more useful than they now are, by industriously attending to Sunday schools and class-meetings, without pretending to preach. And let no local preacher be offended at this remark, for the writer is one of them. But they can do both; and thus attending to the one will increase their usefulness in the other.

ANNOTATOR.

Houston, Miss., Oct., 1859.

N.B.—I wish it understood that I am not that "Annotator" who, some time since, wrote a description of his town, &c. Our town is a very different place from his. Here we have no grog-shop, nor can distilled spirits, in any quantities, be sold, except as a medicine, in three miles of our corporate limits. As a consequence, a drunken man is rarely seen in our streets. We have elegant churches, large congregations, excellent academies, a splendid Sunday-school, an occasional revival, and a high-toned moral and religious community. A.

RELIGION IN ETHIOPIA.

A writer in the Jewish Chronicle gives the following curious information respecting the religion of a people found in Ethiopia:

"In the highlands of Ethiopia, Major Haris found a so-called Christian kingdom, a national establishment dating from the earliest ages. By this Church saints and angels are invoked, the Virgin and St. Michael are made scarcely subordinate deities, a crowded calendar of saints receive honors, and half the year is composed of fasts and festivals. It enjoins also confession to the priest, whose curse is dreaded by the people as the last calamity, while they confidently rely on the alms-giving and penance he imposes as an expiation of sin. Its most extraordinary peculiarities are certain usages and ceremonies, either borrowed from the Jews or retained from the Ethiopic faith. Their churches, which are generally small and mean, resemble precisely the Jewish temple: they are divided into three parts; the innermost is the holy of holies, and may be entered by the priest alone. The service is in a dead language, and dancing is one of the ceremonies. They keep in the same manner, and with equal strictness the seventh day and the first—the Sabbath of the Jews and the Lord's day of the Christians. They observe the Levitical prohibitions as to unclean animals; they wash their cups and platters as a religious duty; they will not eat with Pagan or Moslem, nor eat any flesh that has not been slain in the name of the Trinity. They practice circumcision, not asserting it to be obligatory, yet rigorously imposing it on every Pagan convert to Christianity. They allow of concubinage. They are all baptized once every year, commemorating the baptism of Christ at the Epiphany by a religious procession to the river, into which men, women, and children enter in a promiscuous and shameless crowd. Fasts of extraordinary frequency are observed with unexampled strictness, two every week, on Wednesday and Friday; while reckoning all the holy days together, one entire half of the year is thus occupied."

GREATEST WANT OF RUSSIA.

The greatest want of Russia is a free press. People living there, can find out very little of what is going on in the rest part of the world, and still less of what takes place in Russia, excepting what each sees with his own eyes. Transient papers are strictly prohibited, and only a selected few regular papers from abroad can be subscribed for, and these must be obtained through the government, which pays the publishers their regular rates, and charges the subscriber nearly three times as much. Even these regular papers are read by the public censor before delivery, and if any article be displeasing to him, it is blotted out with a kind of ink that is blackness itself. The two small daily papers published at St. Petersburg, are as barren of news, as a weekly country paper published in central Illinois would be to a Boston merchant. The subscription price of one of them, I notice, is sixteen rumbles, or twelve dollars a year. Previous to the 1st of January last, single copies could be obtained at the office for sixty kopecks (forty-five cents) each. The price was then reduced to twenty-five kopecks, which is taken to be an indication of progress.

Springfield Republican.

DEATH OF JOHN ANGELL JAMES.

THE patriarch of the English Independents has been called to his rest. The venerable and beloved pastor of Francis st. chapel, Birmingham, whose name for more than half a century has been identified with the religious history of that city, with the Congregational Churches and Colleges of Great Britain, with enterprise of Christian reform for the United Kingdom, and with missionary movements in behalf of the British colonies and of the unevangelized portions of the earth, and the savor of whose piety has been diffused through his writings wherever the English language is known; a preacher of almost Apostolic presence and power, a pastor faithful to every interest of his flock, an author gifted with the rare faculty of imparting to the written page the earnestness and directness of spoken address, a counselor whose voice was wisdom and peace, a friend whose words were truth and love, has gone to the home and the reward of Christ's faithful servants, and is joined to the spirits of just men made perfect, in the presence of God and of the Lamb.

He had for many weeks past been evidently ripening for glory. His mortal and material frame had for many months been undergoing a visible change in strength and vigor, and his increasing weakness was visible everywhere but in the pulpit. Indeed, until the last he continued to preach, with all his wonted energy, once every Lord's day, and preached with much energy his last sermon in Francis street chapel. His corporeal powers had, however, for many months undergone a great change. It was with difficulty, and frequently with much pain, that he could walk even a short distance, and latterly even carriage exercise was painful. Still he was ever at work for the press.

His health, however, gradually and almost insensibly gave way—though through the last three or four weeks the process was more visible. On Friday his weakness seemed extreme. He passed rather an unquiet night, but at six in the morning a visible change took place, and exactly at seven o'clock he fell asleep. His departure was most gradual, apparently without any pain; he literally "fell asleep in Jesus."

Mr. James was about 76 years of age. The jubilee of his pastorate at Birmingham—his first and only settlement in the ministry—was observed in 1855;—his age was then 72. The republication of his Sabbath-School Teacher's Guide, first brought him prominently before the churches of America. Since then almost every issue from his pen has been widely circulated here. We need only mention his "Church Member's Guide," his "Faith, Hope, Charity," his "Anxious Inquirer" and "Christian Progress," his Counsels to Young Men and Women—to awaken in thousands of minds the most grateful recollection of an instructor, counselor, and guide. Mr. James was a warm friend of America, and manifested a special interest in the revivals of religion and the various moral and social reforms which have been types of our religious progress. He devoted himself earnestly to the temperance reformation and to revival movements in Great Britain. The cause of missions engaged his warmest sympathies, and one of the ablest productions of his pen was an appeal for China, written after he had passed his seventy-fifth year. His death will be lamented throughout Protestant Christendom; but the many American Christians who have enjoyed his frank, affable, and elevated conversation, will mingle tears of affection with those of his kindred and his flock, at the grave of their venerated friend. The memory of the man as he was in his own house, helps us to conceive of the saint as he is in our Father's house on high.—Independent

MILTON.

MR. KEIGHLY gives the following account of the domestic habit of Milton:

At his meals he never took much wine or any other fermented liquor, and he was not fastidious in his food; yet his tastes seems to have been delicate and refined like his other senses, and he had a preference for such viands as were of an agreeable flavor. In his early years he used to sit up late at his studies, and perhaps he continued this practice while his sight was good; but in his later years he retired every night at nine o'clock, and lay till four in summer, till five in winter, and, if not disposed to rise, he had some one to sit at his bedside and read to him. When he rose he had a chapter of the Hebrew Bible read for him, and then, with of course the intervention of breakfast, studied till twelve. He then dined, took some exercise for an hour—generally in a chair, in which he used to swing himself—and afterwards played on the organ or the bass-viol, and either sang himself or made his wife sing, who, as he said, had a good voice but no ear. He then resumed his studies till six, from which hour till eight he conversed with those who came to visit him. He finally took a light supper, smoked a pipe of tobacco, and drank a glass of water, after which he retired to rest. * * *

Like many other poets, Milton found the stillness, warmth, and recumbency of bed favorable to composition; and his wife said that before rising of a morning he often dictated to her twenty or thirty verses. A favorite position of his when dictating his verses, we are told, was that of sitting with one of his legs over an arm of his chair. His wife related that he used to compose chiefly in the winter, which account is confirmed by the following passage in his life by Phillips: "There is a remarkable passage in the composition of Paradise Lost which I have a particular occasion to remember: for, whereas I had the perusal of it from the very beginning, for some weeks, as I went from time to time to visit him, in a parcel of ten, twenty, or thirty verses at a time, which, being written by whatever hand came next, might possibly want correction as to the orthography and pointing; having, as the summer came on, not been shown any for a considerable while, and desiring to know the reason thereof, was answered that 'his verse never happily flowed but from the autumnal equinox to the vernal, and that whatever he attempted (at other times) was never to his satisfaction, though he courted his fancy never so much;' so that in all the years he was about this poem, he may be said to have spent but half his time therein.

Milton's conversation is stated to have been of a very agreeable nature. His daughter Deborah said that he was 'delightful company, the life of the conversation, and that on account of a flow of subject, and an unaffected cheerfulness and civility.' Richardson, to whom we are indebted for the preservation of this testimony, adds that, 'he had a gravity in his temper, not melancholy, or not till the latter part of his life, not sour, not morose, or ill-natured, but a certain severity of mind; a mind not condescending to little things."

THE "INNOCENT" YOUNG LADY.

She is very petite, holds her head on one side, and peeps out of her eye "squirrel fashion." She approaches you with a hop, skip, and jump, which she imagines is immensely fascinating, and giggles out a silly little laugh, which she fancies is musical. When company is in the parlor, she runs across the room, stopping in the middle of it, with her finger on her lip, (a favorite attitude,) as if she were trying to remember something; then she tosses back her head, smiles deprecatingly at herself, and scuttles back again to an ottoman, with the hand her bracelet is upon, uppermost on her lap, and relapses into a pretty little reverie. Delicious small lamb! How interesting it is! One feels like tying a blue ribbon round its neck and—strangling it!

In the neighborhood of the innocent young lady lives an innocent young man. They meet, the guileless creatures. They love; and the coarse, unfeeling world, eat and drink—eat beans and cabbage, all the same, as if their daily fare were not honey-dew and roses. Heart-rending, but true. The scissors-man and "pine and" man, screech under this angel's window. The vegetable man yells 'neath her casement, "tomattoes and cucumbers." Vulgar carts rattle by, laden with odious fore-quarters, and hind-quarters, of pig and cow. The ash-man dumps down the dismembered barrel of her unsympathising "parient" opposite her area-door, dawling, as he does so, his questionable jacket-sleeve remorselessly across his pug-nose.

No doubt the early martyrs had their trials; but a star wandered from its heavenly sphere when Arminta alighted on "this orb" planet. FANNY FERN.

THE POPE'S PAY.—It is said that his Holiness the Pope, receives out of his States, some $3,000,000 a year. Of this, $600,000 goes to his private affairs, and $2,192,000 to pay interest, $2,700,000 goes to support the army and police, $600,000 to maintain the princes, $24,000 to schools. Other expenses in proportion. The yearly deficiency is $1,800,000. The [illegible] own $160,000,000 worth of real estate; and [illegible] the fat offices. The State debt is $27,000,000.

THE average income of the Mexican Church is twenty-five millions a year, while the revenue of the national government of the Republic is only fifteen millions.

NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

The volumes of the Advocate will hereafter begin and end with the year; and it is very desirable that subscriptions should conform to the same rule.

Therefore, new subscribers, who do not begin with the year, will please send, not two dollars, but an amount sufficient to pay for the paper till the end of the year, at the rate of Four Cents a Week.

Will every subscriber will know, without being informed, that at the beginning of the year is the time to remit the subscription money.

Many accounts having been sent out before this arrangement was made, we shall not be able, until next year, to make the accounts of old subscribers conform to this rule.

Our Agents will please notice, and help us in this desirable arrangement. It is an approximation to the cash system, without its objections, and will obviate confusion in accounts.

REAL UNITY OF SPIRIT AND THE "UNION" HUMBUG.

There are two things common among modern Christians against which we have felt it our duty to lift up our voice. One is, the warfare between the different churches, either in pulpit or newspaper controversies. It is a sin and a shame. In short, we contend for the "unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." Another is, the rage for "union" associations, operations and publications.—The largest and most Christ-like charity, with the most distinct and energetic individuality, is our motto in regard to these things.

Our idea of the "unity of spirit," is happily illustrated by the following account, of which our readers have already heard: A number of clergymen of Philadelphia, of various denominations, some time ago signed a paper expressive of their concern at the division existing among Christians, and proposing a concert of prayer for catholic unity, to be held on the first Monday in October.

The meeting took place in the Church of the Epiphany, and was attended by about one hundred and fifty members of the different denominations. The Rev. Mr. Cracraft, Rector of the church, presided. President Nott, of Union College, was one of the speakers; the Rev. Albert Barnes was another, besides other well-known clergymen.

The most interesting incident of the meeting is thus graphically described by the Philadelphia Bulletin:

Dr. Nevin, of the Presbyterian Church (O.S.), rose and stated that the Apostles' Creed was one of the symbols of his branch of the Church, and might be of all the branches represented, and proposed that Mr Cracraft should repeat it as the creed of the meeting, all standing and joining in it. Instantly every individual of the vast assemblage sprang to his feet. The chairman began, "I believe in God, the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth." Every voice joined him. Nearly two thousand people—Episcopalians, Presbyterians, (Old and New School,) Seceders, Covenanters, Dutch Reformed, German Reformed, Baptists, Methodists, Lutherans, Moravians, Congregationalists, Independents—all repeated with the simplicity of children this grand old formula which has come down to us on the stream of ages:

"I believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth; and in Jesus Christ, his only Son, our Lord; who was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary; suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead, and buried; the third day he rose again from the dead; he ascended into heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of God the Father Almighty; from thence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead. I believe in the Holy Ghost; the Holy Catholic Church, the communion of saints; the forgivness of sins; the resurrection of the body; and the life everlasting. Amen."

Even a calm spectator, not easily excited, and standing aloof from any enthusiasm of the moment, says the Bulletin, could not but be moved. As the "Apostles' Creed," so called, is the only uninspired summary of Christian doctrine in which all these Churches believe, it seems like an act of union of the Church universal.

John Wesley, in preparing his liturgy for American Methodism, threw out all other creeds, but retained the Apostles'; and Methodists are already, therefore, on this platform of unity. Addresses and prayers followed, from Dr. Newton, of the Episcopal Church, the venerable Mr. Kennard, of the Baptist Church, Mr. Alfred Cookman, of the Methodist, and Mr. Taylor, of the Reformed Dutch. Mr. Cookman made the excellent remark that the points in which the evangelical Churches agree are facts, while those on which they differ are for the most part, theories. The last speaker was Mr. Wilday, a missionary from India, who dwelt upon the interest which would be taken in this scene by the missionaries all over the world. The large assembly was then dismissed with the benediction by the Rev. John Chamberlain, the meeting, instead of lasting an hour, having been prolonged to nearly two hours, and a half. A meeting in pursuance of the same circular was held at Jayne's Hall, at four P. M. At this all were invited to take part, the meeting in the morning being specially for clergymen, through others were invited to be present. The afternoon meeting was immense; it can only be numbered by thousands. The floor, platform, boxes, galleries, were nearly everywhere filled with people. The exercises, in their general tone, were similar to those in the morning.

Now we turn to some illustrations of the Union humbug.

The "American Board" is a "union" concern. It has, for years, been torn by dissensions about continuing its missions among the Choctaws, some of whom hold slaves. At last, on this account, it has cast them off. And now we find the following in the Presbyterian:

THE CHOCTAW MISSION.—At the meeting of the Synod of New York, the Rev. Dr. Spring offered a resolution, that in case the funds of our Board of Foreign Missions should not admit of their taking charge of the Choctaw Mission, recently cast off by the American Board, the Synod of New York will pledge itself to provide the required means. The resolution was carried unanimously, and apparently with great heartiness.

Wonder if that or a similar direction will be given to other "union" concerns when they explode, though, during their "union" existence, they got much money and countenance from the churches generally, on the ground of being a joint interest with all? When the "American Tract Society," and the "American Sunday-school Union," explode, where will the "proceeds" go? To whose benefit will the results accomplished enure? Ask yourself that question when you are called upon to defraud your own church by patronizing these "union" humbugs. We do not censure the Synod of New York—we applaud their action. We only cite the fact as illustrative of a philosophy that ought to be understood.

The following remarks from the Presbyterian are true and to the point: "A favorite cry now is Union, and destruction to all barriers which keep denominations apart! Fraternal union we hail; union in essentials, forbearance in non-essentials, charity in all things. Still we like sincerity in all such professions. A man who is given to proselyting, and thinks more of seducing members from sister denominations than of converting them from the world, should be the last to shout out for union unless he candidly confesses that he means the union of all others with himself. At a late union meeting, which was styled a glorious one, we noticed one prominently engaged, of whom we heard it said that, in encouraging a proselyte from another denomination to use all her efforts to bring over her whole family, he stated that this was the course he had pursued with his own family connections, until he had succeeded in persuading every one of them to leave the church in which he and they were born and educated. Now of all such we say, Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes."

In this connection, we publish some remarks from "AN OLD MAN," in a recent letter. He says: In your issue of October 19th, I find the following editorial—

"The Sunday School Times, organ of the American Sunday School Union, at Philadelphia, professing to be catholic and not sectarian, has a department headed, 'Ministers and Churches,' in which "calls," "installations," "resignations," etc., of ministers, and building and dedication of new churches, are recorded. Not a single item in the issue of Oct. 1, so far as we can see, indicates the existence of the Methodist Church. Where will this humbuggery end?"

"Well, sir, I will tell you where it will end. It will soon cease to be a "Sunday School Union" even in name, and has long ceased to be such in spirit; and will place in possession of the Calvinistic churches a vast amount of money I have, for some time, been surprized that Methodists will patronize the concern. It is only Calvinism "galvanized," and those Methodists who wish their children to imbibe "the sincere milk of the Word," had better send them somewhere else. The books are hard to be understood, and the teachers are at liberty to put their own constructions upon many of the subjects presented, thereby giving the pupil a good or bad bias, as the case may be. As an instance, I relate an occurrence which transpired in a Sabbath-school of the union kind, in my own neighborhood. My little daughter was a pupil, and the following question was propounded: "Who are the Redeemed?" The class were puzzled by the question, and the teacher gave the following as the answer: "The people of the Lord." The answer, though somewhat ambiguous, was intended to make a Calvinistic impression. Upon her return home she asked me for my definition, which I gave, as a matter of course, and Bible reasons with it. Can you tell me where one of that kind of schools exists independent of Calvinistic influence, and control, if possible? So far as my observation extends, they are inseparable, and the sooner Methodists come out from among them the better. They will sow some seed that will produce a deadly fruit.

"Let us look back some forty years, and see the antagonistic position taken by all Calvinistic denominations toward Methodists. Why, my dear sir, they would have blotted us out of existence, had it been in their power. How common it was to hear us branded as being Pharisees, Hypocrites, Pelagians, etc., etc. We, as a denomination, have possibly extended our benevolence a little farther in this matter than we should have done; and I may here say that this thing is characteristic of us. We are not as cautious, perhaps, at all times, as we should be, and thereby get humbugged badly. I would not be understood as intimating now that because we have grown powerful every way, that we should withhold Christian courtesy to any orthodox people, but we should show all that we had an independent origin, and that we can and will maintain an independent life, literature and organism. We can, we should, and we must have independent Sabbath Schools everywhere. If we do not, we shall find the world only the harder to evangelize; but if we shape the notions of the rising population in reference to the plan of salvation aright, we shall have the less error to overcome, and our work will only go on the more gloriously."

THE SOUTHERN UNIVERSITY AND EAST ALABAMA MALE COLLEGE.

The history of the establishment of these institutions within the bounds of the Alabama Conference, is well known to the readers of this paper, especially to those of Alabama, who are principally interested in this article. Both opened their first sessions about the first of October, notices of which appeared in this paper. Since these notices, we have received the following letter.

Greensboro', Oct. 25th, 1859.

REV. C. C. GILLESPIE:

Dear Brother—In the last Advocate, in referring to the opening of the Southern University, you remark: "We had looked for a full account of the opening of this institution, in which the whole country is so much interested. We had requested, earnestly, that it be attended to. It has had no friend who seemed to appreciate the value of such a thing."

You are mistaken in your conclusion. It has many friends who duly "appreciate the value of such a thing;" but they feel a delicacy in taking the kindness of those not particularly interested in the success of the institution. If it has a particular friend in the Advocate, we have done it injustice; and it is due you, that I should briefly give you the wherefores for the assertion.

Once upon a time, the Alabama Conference resolved to establish under its patronage a literary institution of high order, within its bounds. We were invited to offer inducements to have it located here. It appointed a committee of location. That committee located the college at Greensboro'; and recommended the conference to locate a college at Auburn. We demurred to this recommendation of the committee, and appealed from their action to the conference. We refused to submit to any compromise, and distinctly placed the issue before it; one college, or none at Greensboro.' After mature deliberation, the conference located the college here; and repudiated the action of their committee, by refusing to locate a college at Auburn. By this renewal of its compact with us, pledging itself to one college, and believing that the pledge now solemnly given us would be carried out in good faith, we procured a charter placing the Southern University under its absolute control. A charter was also granted the East Alabama Male College, but in no way acknowledging the authority of the conference or the Methodist Church.

This is a part of the history of the conference of too much importance to be forgotten. But with these facts before you, time and again you have by your editorials and admitted communications permitted the impression to be made that the East Alabama Male College was under the patronage of the conference, after its rejection at Eutaw. Is this the act of a friend of the S. University? Owing to this course of the Advocate, certain questions were sent to it for publication, asking the ecclesiastical status of the East Alabama Male College. The importance of the questions was admitted, but it was suggested, that the conference was the place to ask them. At the conference at Eutaw they were asked, and most emphatically answered, and it was to remind you and your readers of this fact that they were again propounded. As the editor of the Conference Organ it was deemed your duty not to permit any communication calculated to mislead the church to find a place in the Advocate, particularly where the interest of its University and the honor of the conference was involved.

You refused to publish these questions because, "the old feeling between Greensboro and Auburn should not be stirred up." Nevertheless this has been done, and the friends here of the University give the Advocate a chief agency. You not only refused to admit the questions referred too; but a certain communication informing the friends of Methodism that our Supreme Court had sustained our charter, which prohibited the sale of all intoxicating drinks within five miles of Greensboro.'

Was this the act of friendship? It is a noticeable fact, that the S. University has never been alluded to in the Advocate, unless the East Alabama Male College was lugged in before your conclusion, or received some eulogistic notice in the same paper, thus continually impressing your readers, that both institutions occupied the same relation to the conference, when you must have known that the latter had no legal connection with it.

From the relation sustained by the University, and the Advocate, to the conference, we had a right to expect its interest to be sustained above every other institution. In this we have been disappointed. Rather than stir up sectional strife in the conference, we have submitted in silence, trusting that the conference would remedy the injustice done us. If it should not, and discussion and division come, be the result what it may, we shall have the consolation to know, that our every pledge has been redeemed, and our honor and good faith will stand unimpeached. Therefore, if unkind feelings be engendered, and division come, let the responsibility rest on those who have invited it.

Yours respectfully,

WILLIAM T. WEBB.

Dr. Webb, the writer of this letter, is an old friend of the editor of this paper, of fifteen years standing, and a prominent and influential member of the Board of Trustees of the Southern University. We had published, without being asked, an editorial notice of the approaching "opening of the University, with imposing ceremonies, the inaugural of Dr. Wightman," etc." Afterwards, Dr. Webb, in connection with another esteemed friend, and Member of the Board of Trustees, sent us another notice—an official one—and we published that also. In a private letter in reply, we earnestly requested, as above, a full account for publication, of the opening. It did not come, and in our own notice, voluntarily made up from gleanings from the secular papers, we made use of the remarks above attributed to us, which we now reiterate. In our desire to help the University at its opening, we did more than our duty—asked to have a full account sent us—whereas our duty required us only to publish such an account when sent. The letter above is the response to our complaint that it was not sent.

In one respect it is no more than we deserve. In our simplicity, we had thought that our manifestation of sincerely-felt Methodist joy at the initiation of such a grand educational Institution of Southern Methodism, and our desire to spread an account of it before our thirty-thousand readers, and, through the press generally, before the people of the Union, would have been appreciated—at least received kindly. We find, however, if we are to take this as a "representative" letter, that we were mistaken. We offered services unasked, and find ourselves very properly "snubbed." We have not felt so young and verdant in a long time, as since awakening from this dream of Methodist-preacher simplicity. We console ourselves, however, with the reflection that the lesson will be invaluable. We have always desired to feel that we were "grown," and could not; but this will help us. We begin to feel "venerable" already.

"A decent respect for the opinions of mankind," however, makes it necessary to notice somewhat the implied charge that the Advocate is not a friend of the University. Candor compels us to say, however, that we regard our good friend, Dr. Webb, as representing himself alone. All who have read the Advocate with any thing like regularity care, and candor, know that there is not the slightest foundation for his complaints. On the general complaint of want of friendship to the University, we have simply to say that we are a Methodist preacher, and have been for seventeen years—ever since we have been a man—and never wish to be any thing else. If such men are not friends of every interest of the Church, the Church has no friends. A charge to the contrary would be an insult, did it not proceed from "zeal without knowledge." Many such complaints have been made against the Advocate by those whom it has most benefitted. Such things make us sorry, but no power on earth can prevent them. We have been long enough in the editorship to know that. Whether believed by Dr. Webb or not, we are a better friend of the University than those who complain of us. An injudicious friend is a practical enemy.

But the Doctor appeals to facts, and we are glad he does. He cites the history of the College controversy. With that we have nothing to do. That is the business of the Alabama Conference, which he has undertaken to rap over our knuckles, and which we do not intend to allow him to do. The Conference is competent to define the relations of its educational institutions; it is not our business. That such a thing should be required of us, is truly surprising. Who made us "a ruler or a judge" over the Alabama Conference? Regarding the relations of Greensboro' and Auburn settled before we took charge of this paper, we have tried, sincerely and earnestly, to represent them both as they really stand connected with the Conference.

He says we declined to publish certain questions as to the ecclesiastical status of the East Alabama Male College. We did, and feel satisfied with the correctness of our decision. The Conference is the place to ask such questions. When the Alabama Conference declares that she has no interest in Auburn, the paper will conform its course to such action. The Conference has been, and will be in future, responsible for the course of the paper in this matter.

He says we declined to publish the decision of the Supreme Court touching the liquor restriction in favor of the University. We did not; it is published in the issue of August 31st last.

He says: "The Southern University has never been alluded to in the Advocate, unless the East Alabama Male College was lugged in before your conclusion, or received some eulogistic notice in the same paper, thus continually impressing your readers that both institutions occupied the same relation to the Conference." This is a mistake in whole and detail. The first number of this paper we brought out, contained a commendatory notice of the University, and so did the second. The Auburn College was not noticed for nearly a year after. Since our editorship seventeen "editorials and admitted communications," in behalf of the University, have been published, and only eight or nine in behalf of Auburn. Then we have always spoken of Greensboro' as the SOUTHERN UNIVERSITY, "the only thing of the kind attempted by Southern Methodists;" while we have spoken of Auburn as the East Alabama Male College. In short, a more unfounded, mistaken, injudicious, unjust letter we have never yet been called upon to publish.

MAFFITT.

A correspondent of the Richmond Advocate takes up the suggestion of the Nashville as to building a monument over the remains of J. N. Maffitt, and waxes eloquent. He thus closes his letter: "When in New Orleans a few years ago we became acquainted with a pious sister, who was a bright seal to his ministry, and who gave us the following—a printed copy of his last words, and a poem composed by a friend:

THE LAST WORDS OF J. N. MAFFITT.

Here I am, alone—no sympathizer but my poor, broken-hearted, and crushed sister. None else in this goodly city, in the house or out of it, have extended a hand, or poured a drop of comfort into my drugged cup. Hallelujah! I can stand alone, with God on my side! I have no fears that my bark will outside the storm, the waves, and the pirates, who are desirous of robbing me of my dearest jewels.

Alone I stand, amid a heartless throng,
With bitter mem'ries of a better day
Scaring my brain! It can not now be long
Till I shall burst these bonds and ide away!

O! then the soothing, the most rapturous thought,
Comes o'er me like fresh dew upon the flowers—
That, though, while "in the flesh" I'm deemed as nought,
Angels will bear my spirit to their bowers!

It can not be, but that kind, pitying Heaven
Will look with some allowance on the man,
Who, erring oft, prays oft to be forgiven—
Aiming at good—though his can ne'er attain!

Then, farewell world—farewell to sin and shame—
To anger, malice—to revenge and hate!
Poor, sorrowing sister, too!—and be thy aim
To meet thy dying brother at heaven's gate!

TRANSCENDENTALISM OF GENIUS.

NEARLY all men of genius, especially of the more highly intuitional and imaginitive order, (and is not genius always intuitional and imaginitive?) often use words of a strange and uncertain application—words which are the representatives of conceptions and impressions, which, though real, and perhaps sublime, are, at the same time, vague and indefinite. Whether this is a habit or a necessity, we do not propose to decide. Logical, practical, matter-of-fact minds never bloom forth in these flowers of strange color and fragrance. As a rule, these manifestations are connected with the higher orders of mind. It is a sort of transcendentalism—constitutional, but not necessarily philosophical or doctrinal,—that is characteristic of genius, especially of genius of the metaphysical and poetical caste. The same thing is characteristic of mind under the influence of heavenly inspiration. Revelation abounds in instances of this character. Thus showing that genius and inspired mind, though by no means the same, nor to be confounded, are, to a remarkable and mysterious extent, akin to each other.—

For instance, the words "lively stones," in Scripture, are of the strange and indefinite character of which we have been speaking. According to usual definitions there is neither meaning nor propriety in the combination, "lively stones." Indeed, it seems a contradiction in terms. A lively stone is a natural impossibility. Of course, "lively stones," of which "are built up" Christ's "spiritual house," are intended to mean living Christians. The figure is said to take its origin from the seeming life of radiant stones, whose gleams and flashes have the seeming, at times, of will and life. When John described the New Jerusalem, he saw the courses of the walls to be made up of all the rare and precious stones. "The building of the walls of it," he says, "was of jasper, and the city was pure gold, like unto clear glass. And the foundations of the walls of the city were garnished with all manner of precious stones."

Henry Ward Beecher, in a recent sermon, the first of a series now appearing in the New York Independent, and which was delivered in Plymouth Church Sabbath morning, September the fourth, very beautifully says: "A man is said in the Bible to be more precious than the gold of Ophir; and of a woman it is said, "Her price is far above rubies." These were common comparisons.—There is something in the glow of precious stones that peculiarly fits them to serve for spiritual figures. There is about them a subtle light—a brilliancy—that burns without fire; that consumes nothing, and requires no supply; that for ever shines without oil; that is ever living, unwasted, unchanged by any of the natural elements. A diamond that glows in the sunlight, flashes yet more brilliantly in the night. No mould can get root upon it; no rust can tarnish it; no decay can waste it. The jewels that were buried two thousand years ago, if now dug up from royal and priestly tombs, would come forth as fair and fresh as they were when the proud wearer first carried them in his diadem. Such stones seemed to the ancients, and are, fit emblems by which to represent spiritual qualities, and the beauty and imperishableness of Christian virtue. And a company of holy men, resting upon the Lord Jesus Christ, may well be compared to a palace built upon broad foundations, and sparkling to the very summit with living stones which throw back to the sun a differing flush through every hour of his rise or fall, through the long day." A holy person is such a "lively stone" in the glorious temple of Christ. Reader, what sort of a stone are you?

The idea of this divine transcendentalism is most beautifully illustrated in the article on Dr. Arnold in the last number of the Southern Methodist Quarterly Review. The gifted writer, whose genius itself is of the character above alluded to, very happily says: "Nothing in the oratory of the world, so far as imaginative beauty and splendor are concerned, can be placed beside the wonderful outbursts that signalize the names of Bossuet, Massillon, Jeremy Taylor, Irving, Hall, and Chalmers. Nor is this surprising. That form of genius which delights in the symbols of the imagination, interprets scenes and sounds, superadds the new language of things to the language of words, and pours forth its abounding soul until the mute universe is vocal with its rapt utterances, has nowhere such inspiration as in the themes of the pulpit. For its sublimest exercise, the imagination needs definite truth in indefinite connections. Within a certain scope it must see clearly, while beyond that scope it must see obscurely. By means of the former, it can enter into alliance with reason; by means of the later, it performs its more exclusive functions, awakens our deeper instincts, and stimulates those sensibilities which seek the fellowship of mystery and grandeur. Christianity affords such a field to the imagination. Its fundamental facts are simple and concise. Its great doctrines are plain and palpable. The personality of Christ lives in its ordinances and sacraments, and, through the strange power of that transforming Presence, what would otherwise be abstractions come before us as the most real of all realities.

But Christianity transcends its own revelations' it opens outlets toward the Infinite, assuring us of things seen through a glass darkly, presenting faint glimpses of wonders above wonder, and, as it were, forsaking the intellect and descending far down into those depths of our being out of which rise the mystical shapes that haunt us as the dreams of our waking hours. Man is indeed a world in himself. But beneath the world, in which he breathes, thinks, prays, lives; beneath the world, which his consciousness can measure and define, what a strange and mysterious chaos lies slumbering! A ray of light struggling through the thick darkness, sometimes escapes; and from the formless mass, brooded over by the Spirit, swells up the dim outline of fair islands and broad lands; and waters, in the flickering and unsteady radiance, roll their fathomless tides; but where is the tenant and the lord? A true insight sees in this heaving chaos the world of the future, and although it shrinks back into gloom, if we try to represent it to consciousness, yet faith accepts it as the storehouse of those materials out of which the immortal nature is to draw its resplendent youth, and its angelic glories. Imagination is thus provided with whatever is needed to call out its activity and intensify its warmth, while, at the same time, with that wisdom which guards against excess, Christianity restrains it within those boundaries that the well-being of our nature requires. It is rare for the pulpit to exhibit the higher qualities of imagination, but let it be remembered that great excellence is not a common phenomenon. Our aim is simply to show that Christianity offers a magnificent range to the mind, and that the pulpit, taken with all its defects, presents the most natural, earnest, and impressive display of intellectual power that men are permitted to witness.

GARIBALDI IN ITALY.

A recent letter from Florence says: Wherever Garibaldi appears in his progress through Romagna, he sends an electric spark though the hearts of all the Italian youth. Every one who sees or hears him becomes a soldier. The language of his harangues is short and uncouth, but it is to the purpose. "The priests and the foreigners," he says, "have always been and are at the bottom of all our evils. It is time to settle accounts with them, and to make short work of it. Let every one who counts himself an Italian stand up and follow me. I have seen both the French and the Austrians face to face more than once. They have brave troops, both of them, but are no more than men, and men we are, too. Their ranks are numerous, but we have a just cause and God on our side. I offer myself as your guide. Those who come after me will be at no loss to find where the enemy is."

TENNESSEE CONFERENCE.

This body met October 12th, and closed October 20th. The session was pleasant and profitable. The venerable Soule was present. His last words addressed to the Conference before adjournment were, by vote, made a part of the record. Bishop Early presided with great satisfaction to the conference. The Editor of the Nashville Christian Advocate, we are happy to see, is as popular with his brethren of "Old Tennessee" as any Tennessean. The Book Agent was "at home." The other Nashville officials were on hand. The Book and Tract Society Agents had raised during the year, in cash and subscription, $45,335. They intend to finish the $100 000. By the way, we trust the Alabama Conference Agents will have their $100,000 finished by their next session. A Conference Sunday School Society was organized—a step forward in this cause. Revs. Y. J. Allen, of Georgia, and M. L. Wood, of North Carolina, were ordained, preparatory to embarkation for China. A gracious revival prevailed during the session. Missionary money collected during the year, $6,896! Two thousand dollars less than last year! Alas for glorious old Tennessee! Why, Louisiana can beat that! Membership in the bounds of the Conference, 44,847—decrease, 286. Sixteen preachers were admitted on trial; three readmitted. There were eight who superannuated, and eight who located. A Conference Historical Society was initiated. The following action was had on Ministerial Education:—

Wherens, In the judgment of this Conference, measures ought to be taken for the purpose of improving the literary attainments of our ministry, and of applicants for admission into the travelling connection, sent up from the Quarterly Meeting Conferences within our bounds: Resolved, therefore, That we request, in all cases when a brother shall present himself before a Quarterly Conference for a recommendation for admission into the travelling connection, that such applicant be subjected to an examination, either by the Conference directly, or a committee appointed by the Conference for the purpose, into the literary attainments of such applicant; and if he be found destitute of a good English education, you shall not recommend him to the Annual Conference; but that the Quarterly Conference take measures for the education of such applicant; and in the event that the applicant shall not be able to obtain an education for the want of means, in that case the Quarterly Conference shall render such applicant any aid in obtaining an education that may be convenient.

EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTE PERIODICAL.

We have always been a friend of the Educational Institute. At their last session they decided to establish a paper—the "Educational Repository and Family Monthly." Not at all opposed to it, but doubting its success, we expressed that doubt in few words, in these columns, a few weeks since. An esteemed and valued friend, and a distinguished man, writes us the following letter. We hope he is right and we wrong. We spoke from experience, however. We make what reparation we can, by publishing the letter, and assuring the friends of the proposed Journal of our good wishes. They may apologize for us on the ground of "ignorance," or any other ground, as they choose. We hope they will not have to make a similar apology for themselves after a while. We suppose every "Institution" in the land will have a paper in time.

DEAR BRO. GILLESPIE: I hope you will forgive whatever of presumption there may be in the conception of this letter. The general character of all that I have seen in the N. O. Christian Advocate has pleased me so well, that I feel more keenly the disappointment of a cruel little notice that I find in the issue of October 19. Cruel, I call it, in its effects; not, I hope, in its design. I refer to the notice of the Educational Repository and F. M.—the proposed paper of the Institute.

My colleagues here in Macon agree with me that your utter ignorance of the circumstances of its projection, is the cause and the apology for the article. I was a member of the session of the Institute which resolved upon the affair. Bro. Sassnett and myself tried hard to prevent the inception of the matter before next year. Finding that we would be overcome in this point, we insisted upon its being started upon such a basis as should secure it against failure. A subscription list of $3,000 has been raised to guarantee that it shall succeed for the first year. The most of us are minded to subscribe $100 to it every year, until it pays its own way. We had hoped that, with the countenance of all who are in favor of progress and improvement (and foremost among these our editors), it would so succeed as to pay its own way in two or three years. What will be the effect on this hope of such an article as yours, you yourself can well imagine. Even if it does not induce some subscribers to the guaranty to withdraw their names, it will make us all pay for two or three years' longer probation than otherwise.

It is possible that you may have killed the enterprize. If so, you have also killed the Institute; at least, such was the general voice of those in attendance last July. I am very sorry that you spoke without due information on this matter—very sorry. And now, having done unto you as I should wish you to do unto me in like case, assuring you of my continued fraternal regard, etc.

ACTION ON THE ONDERDONK QUESTION.

A private letter to the editors of the New York Express, from a relative of one of the bishops, gives authentic accounts of what was done in that body with reference to the case of Dr. Onderdonk, the suspended bishop of New York.

A motion to postpone the whole subject was lost, three to one. A motion for unrestricted and unconditional restoration was defeated, 26 to 8, the Provisional Bishop (H. Potter) of Dr. Onderdonk's diocese excusing himself from voting. The Bishop (Gadsen) of South Carolina moved that the memorial of Dr. O. could not be entertained without the previous resignation of his jurisdiction. The Bishop (Whitehouse) of Illinois offered as a substitute for this that Dr. Onderdonk should be restored to office and to the exercise of all the functions of the sacred ministry; but not restored to the exercise of his jurisdiction. This would leave it in the power of the House to restore him to the exercise of jurisdiction also, at any future time, should they find it advisable. The New York delegation unanimously accepted of this, as the best that could be done for the time being. But even this was not permitted them. Bishop Whitehouse's proposition was defeated 23 to 9, two bishops absent, and one not voting. (Bishop DeLancey) of Western New York then moved to restore, on condition of resignation, which was tabled, 19, to 11; and the upshot of all was (as announced already by telegraph) that the suspended bishop had leave to withdraw his memorial. This disposes of the matter, for three years at least.

THE HIGHEST MOUNTAIN.

It was for a long time supposed that Mount Washington, of the White Mountains' group, was the highest peak east of the Rocky Mountains. But this honor must now be definitely conferred upon Smoky Mountain, belonging to the Black Mountain group, and situated in Jackson county, North Carolina, near the Tennessee line. Professor John Le Conte, of South Carolina College, accompanied by Mr. Clingman and Mr. Buckley, has made accurate barometric observations of the various heights composing this group during the past summer. These gentlemen, and Professor Guyot, have ascertained that North Carolina has no less than fifteen peaks higher than Mount Washington. According to Captain Cram, of the United States Coast Survey, the height of Mount Washington is 6293 feet. The elevation of Smoky Mountain is 6737.

ZION'S HERALD GIGGLES OVER HARPER'S FERRY.

Zion's Herald, in giving an account of the Harper's Ferry disturbance, takes pains to say, twice, without an item of evidence upon which to base it, that "the affair has produced a terrible panic all through the South." A more deliberate, unfounded, profitless, pointless, pitiful falsehood, was never perpetrated. A local excitement necessarily existed, such as would be caused by a fatal steamboat or railroad disaster—nothing more. But the South has not had a pulse quickened. Zion's Herald had not a fact to justify a different statement—it was a sheer fabrication, "out of whole cloth," showing that "the wish was father to the thought," and that the only difference between the editor of Zion's Herald and Gerrit Smith, is a difference in outspoken honesty and plain "Ossawattamie Brown" is a saint, compared to those orators, preachers and editors, secular and religious who have purposely fomented such hideous incendiarism and villainy, and secretly fanged to see it successful, but are ready to condemn it, if it fail. Poor Brown will hang, but his neck is no more richly claimed by the halter than many a one now encircled by a white cravat.

CONFERENCE REPORTS.

Every itinerant pastor among us should have full reports ready at Conference on all subjects embraced in the requirements of the discipline or the resolutions of the Conference to which he belongs. Negligence here is criminal, little as is thought of it by some. A human in these respects is not fit for an Itinerant Methodist preacher. The very history of the Church, in future times, will be marred by his conduct. It is evidence of lukewarm love of the cause, of lax principles and sense of duty, of disjointed thought and character, and of a low state of grace. The impression made upon the Bishop and upon the earnest-minded men of the Conference, by the unsatisfactory responses of these men at the annual session, is, that "they are of no account"—worthless as preachers, however pleasant as men.

SOURCE OF THE NILE.

The great problem of the source of the Nile, which has occupied the attention of the world during so many ages, may now be considered as definitely solved. Captain Speke, who has just returned to England from an extended tour in Central Africa, in company with Captain Burton, discovered a lake, called by the natives Nyanza, but by the Arabs Ukerewe, which appears to be the great reservoir of the Nile. It extends from 2 deg. 30 min. south to 3 deg. 30 min. north latitude, lying across the equator in east longitude 33 deg. Its waters are the drainage of numerous hills which surround it on almost every side. The new lake washes out the Mountains of the Moon, as at present existing in our atlases.

THE MOST CURIOUS BOOK IN THE WORLD.

Is one that was produced in France about three hundred years ago. It is entitled "Liber Passionis Domini nostri Jesu Christi," and is neither written nor printed. The letters are cut out of vellum, and being interleaved with blue paper, may be read as easily as the best of print. The material is of the most delicate and costly kind, the workmanship is exquisitely exact, and the labor necessary to complete the work must have been immense. In 1640, Rodolphus II, of Germany, offered for it 11,000 ducats, nearly equal to 60,000 ducats (or dollars) at this day

OREGON CONFERENCE.—We have received, says Zion Herald the minutes of the Seventh Session of this Conference, published at Portland, Oregon, in a pamphlet of thirty-two pages. There are sixty preachers, of whom fifteen are probationers, one is a supernumerary, and five are superannuated. The number of members is 2150, probationers 546, local preachers fifty-two. Churches thirty-four valued at $76,171, parsonages twelve valued at $11,500, camp-grounds deeded to the Conference six valued at $8000. Besides the above property they have six seminaries of learning, valued at $28,000. The total Church property within the limits of the Conference is valued at $117,000, having increased during the last two years $35,891. The circulation of the Pacific Christian Advocate is 1588, of which 100 are free papers and exchanges.

REV. DR. HOLDRICH has returned from England, arriving in Boston on the 21st inst. He has visited England, in behalf of the American Bible Society to confer with the British and Foreign Bible Society on their common mission; and has also visited Paris, Geneva and Bremen, and other places on the Continent of Europe, to examine into the operations of the committees who distribute the Bibles furnished by the American Society. He brings back satisfactory intelligence, the demand for Bibles and the facilities for their circulation everywhere increasing.

YELLOW FEVER.—This disease has visited several of our Gulf cities, without attacking New Orleans, during the present season—Key West, Galveston, Houston, Brownsville. It was formerly supposed that until it made its appearance in New Orleans, the other Gulf cities and towns were safe. This, it is now evident, is a fallacy. It has done considerable damage in Galveston—among the deaths are some of our old friends. In Houston it has been very severe. In Cypress City, it has been devasting.

OUR FIRST PAGE.—Several articles on our first page have been on hand some time, having been received during our absence in the summer, and therefore overlooked. Age, however, has not diminished their value. It is due our friends, however, to know that they were not intentionally delayed. We trust they will write again, soon. The same remarks apply to "Humboldt," on the fourth page.

A FINE CUSTOM.—The late Rev. Dr. J. W. Alexander observed the Moravian custom of selecting a "year-text" or motto. In one of his letters he wrote: "My sentence for 1859 is 'God, my exceeding joy.'" Happy selection, since 1859 admitted him "to see the King in his beauty!"

SINGULAR OMISSION.—A religious journal, under this heading, says: "When our brethren send us an account of a revival, it is singular and unaccountable that they should omit to send a list of new subscribers." A word to the wise is sufficient.

"WE learn from Rome," says the Bulletin de Paris, "that Prince Lucien Bonaparte is likely to obtain the Archbishopric of Ravenna, vacant by the death of Monseigneur Fuleoniori."

PREACHERS OF MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE will remember that they are required to report at Conference the following items: Allowance; Amount Received; Amount of Bishop's Collection.

APPLICANTS FOR ADMISSION into Mississippi Conference must meet the Committee at Jackson, at 10 A. M., Tuesday, November 15.

THE London Morning Post, Lord Palmerston's organ, declares in favor of the Italian States choosing their own rulers.

"OSSAWATTAMIE BROWN" has been found guilty of treason, insurrection, and murder.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

NOVEMBER 2, 1859.

MILBURN AND BEULAH.—Derby and Jackson, the publishers, advertise in this paper, third page, fourth column, "Ten Years of Preacher Life," by Milburn; and "Beulah," by Miss Evans. They are both highly valuable and interesting works.

THE ECLECTIC MAGAZINE.—This periodical, which gives the creme de la creme of the leading English quarterlies and monthlies, is advertised on third page, fourth column. Be sure to read it carefully. We indorse every word of it.

LESSONS ON PIANO.—See advertisement in fourth column of this page.

REMOVAL.—See notice by Artemon Hill, fourth column on this page.

REPORTS OF CONFERENCE SESSIONS, 1859.

TENNESSEE CONFERENCE.

COLUMBIA, Tennessee, Oct., 13th, 1859.

MR. EDITOR: The forty-eighth session of the Tennessee Conference is now in session at this place, Bishop Early in the chair, in very fine health—Brother Wm. C. Johnson, as usual, Secretary. Bishop Soule is present not in good health. His venerable appearance however, as he sits on his seat, gives additional solemnity to the occasion.

The Conference is full, nearly all the members being present. Death has made a considerable levy upon this Conference during the past year. Seven have been taken to their long home, viz: Martin Clarke, John Page, Justinian Williams, Sion Record, Thos. W. Randle, Joseph Willis, and Wm P. Nichol.

Last night I met the Committee which had charge of Publishing Interests, when we blocked out the substance of a report which has just been read by Dr. Henkle, and as we desired, is made the order of the day for tomorrow morning. This report and the action which will no doubt take place under it, is intended to make up a new interest and really turn over a new leaf in this department of our labor, particularly in reference to the circulation of our periodical literature.

For my own part I am not ashamed to avow that I am ashamed of the condition of our circulating literature. I know as well as I know any thing not demonstrated, that we can, if we will, double, treble, quadruple, these issues among the people. I should not be surprised if we may not have set measures on foot which will look largely in this direction. We are doing, largely, just at this point. We have no paper, the circulation of which might not be doubled and more in the very next year. I hope we will do something in this way before another year rolls round.

The Tennessee Conference is in some respects a central Conference. The movement at the recent session gives pretty fair evidence that a new leaf is going, right now, to be turned over in the circulation of our Church Periodicals.

I know the New Orleans Christian Advocate, the Home Circle, Quarterly Review, and Sunday-school Visitor can have four times the circulation they now have in the Louisiana Conference, with ease, with ease.

And I will tell you how I know. I find that in all the Conferences I have visited—over half those in the Church—only about one fifth or one sixth of the preachers do anything, or think of anything, in this department of ecclesiastical labor. And very frequently that one preacher, with no better opportunities than eight or ten others around him, sends up more Ecclesiastical money than they all. I find frequently, two circuits, or by sthe, equal in every respect—one preachers sends up five or more of periodical money, and the others $3 or $5. The largest amounts sent up by any one, is about $250 or $300, and they tell me they have made very little effort, could easily have got much more—intend to do better next year.

We have all of us got into the habit of going along about at the present pace—some doing something, some a little and some nothing. Now, the question of increasing these matters manifold is not the question of improving a little, or of passing common place resolutions, but of entering, anew, upon a course we have scarcely touched before.

It is beyond all question next to certain that any preacher receiving an appointment in any Conference, saving by possibility some rare exceptions, can if he will—if he will regard it a matter of duty and intend to perform it—send up at least $50 a year of money for periodicals.

Not one of our papers, weekly or otherwise, has a circulation anything like respectable. Only a small fraction of our people see one. Secular competitors beat us; Northern Methodists beat us. The truth is something unpalatable, though it may be unprofitable.

Now, I ask the preachers in good earnest—what are we going to do? Just go along as, or perhaps improve a little?—or what?

These are questions worthy of our most serious consideration. A moderate supply of our periodicals amongst our own people, four times what it now is, would in twelve short months elevate and deepen the principles of Methodism in the land greatly.

Again, one of the regular duties of every preacher is, "to see that all the people within the bounds of his charge be duly supplied with our books and periodicals."

Will this important duty go longer unperformed?

Yours very truly, R. ABBEY.

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

Otopasa Camp-meeting.—MR. EDITOR: Friday the 7th last. was the day appointed a year ago, for the commencement of Otopasa Camp-meeting, and when the time rolled round, the good people, true to their interest and that of their neighbors, repaired to the Camp ground with the prerequisites for the support of a Camp-meeting. Really, if there are any people who deserva the thanks of the great mass of the people who attend Camp-meetings, they are the "teuters." These whole-sound people labor from the beginning of the meeting to the end, for the comfort and refreshment of those who are there without these means, often depriving themselves of the advantage of hearing the gospel preached, rather than suffer any worthy person to go unprovided for. They will surely reap their reword in due season. They perforated their parts nobly, and well deserve the thank of all who shared their hospitality.

But the spiritual feast is what gives greatest reason to be thankful, for truly it was a time of "refreshing from the presence of the Lord." The meeting was well supplied with preachers, and they labored zealously in the cause of their Master, and their labors were crowned with success. Often during the preaching of the word, was the sound, "Glory to God" heard from some joyful heart, while from others the tear of penitence was seen forcing its way down the crimsoned cheek. It was almost impossible to ascertain the precise number of conversions, but the most reliable authority fixes it at about seventy-five. Thirty-five joined the Church on probation, mostly young people, all white but six. Many appeared to be as happy as they could be in this life, and if that is the meaning of sanctification (as expressed by one good brother) of course many were sanctified. All agree in saying that it was the best meeting ever held at Otopasa, and many consider it the best they ever witnessed at any place. The presence of the Holy Ghost was an manifest, and his effects so powerful, that one was forcibly reminded of the memorable day of Pentecost. One young man was converted, who said he was called to preach, and like Peter, he began to tell the people to repent and be converted. The congregation on Sunday was variously estimated by different persons, at numbers ranging from 3000 to 5000. It surpassed any congregation ever before assembled at that place. A joint Missionary collection was taken on Sunday for Holmesville and Pearl River Circuits but I did not learn the result.

The fourth Quarterly Conference for Pearl River Circuit met on Saturday, and its proceedings were characterized by brotherly kindness. The subject of a parsonage was brought before the Conference, and a board of Trustees elected to attend to it. Pearl River Circuit will have a parsonage before long.

Holmesville Quarterly Conference met on Monday and was conducted in the same Christian spirit. A German preacher was recommended to the Annual Conference for a German Mission.

The state of the Churches on Holmesville and Pearl River Circuit is very good, and brothers Bowen and Nicholson must have the consolation of knowing that they are in a better condition than they found them at first. They have had some good meetings at the different Churches, but I cannot particularize now, as my letter is growing too long.

There was some disorderly conduct among "out-siders" on Saturday night, such as rolling buggies around the encampment, but I have not heard of any serious damage that was done. The devil has agents all over the world, and they will happen to be at Camp-meetings. One Brother who had been looking around remarked to me that, the devil himself was displeased with such conduct.

There will be another Camp-meeting at the same time and place next year. The people about Otopasa place a high estimate upon them, and no wonder when they enjoy them so well.

Summit, Miss., Oct 15th 1859. W. L. NICHOLS.

Olive Branch Camp-meeting.—MR. EDITOR: We have just closed our Camp-meeting at Olive Branch in this Circuit. It commenced on Friday the 7th inst., and closed on Wednesday morning the 12th. Many prophesied that we would have but few at it, on account of the new plan recommended, of all persons living in the neighborhood supporting themselves; but it worked admirably, and the tent-holders, numbering ten, found plenty to do in providing for the hundreds and thousands of strangers that thronged the grounds. The number was estimated at from three to four thousand persons, and, doubtless, many who had not entered the sanctuary, nor heard a sermon in years, were attracted by the novelty of this meeting to attend its ministrations and we trust much good shall yet come from the seed sown in their hearts and now scattered throughout the whole eastern portion of our state.

Every body seemed pleased and happy, the weather was very fine though a little cool and dry; and many said it was the best meeting they had seen. It seems, from the best judgment, some twenty or twenty-five were converted; thirty-five or forty joined the Church; the membership of the Circuit much revived, and a good prospect now for a revival at all our appointments on the circuit, had we time to hold meetings at them all before the session of our Conference. There was also a great work among the children and youths from whom God has perfected praise.

But we apprehend and hope that the chief good lies in the fact that the heavenly seeds are sown in hundreds of hearts where it will yet take root, spring forth and produce much fruit to the honor and glory of God. Here perhaps is the main benefit of Camp-meetings. Many persons are discouraged that they do not see the ripened fruit at once. But as it is in nature, so it is in grace. The fallow ground of the human heart has to be broken up, the seed sown, then the blade, and finally the full grown ear on the stalk. And although God, often by the miracles of his grace, produces perfect fruit at once; yet ordinarily the bread must be cast upon the waters and be seen after many days.

The tent-holders, a noble band, gave unusual satisfaction. May heaven bless them a thousand fold. The order, bating a slight disturbance at a fruit stall or two near the ground, on Saturday night of the meeting, was very good; and should we live another year we want to remedy this matter. The ministers we expected from a distance, with one exception, not arriving, we had to depend principally on preachers from the adjacent works. This was made a blessing, as the "itching ears" for strangers being not gratified, they could head themselves more earnestly to the work of the heart. Brothers Strickland, Hamilton, Clinton, Merrill, Simms and Townsend, assisted by the Presiding Elder and the Preachers of the Circuit, made up the principal laborers. Honorable mention should be made, also, of a few aged and war-worn veterans of the cross who were present; among whom were Father Tabor, 8[illegible] years old, always on the mount, ready to witness the glory of the upper world where he may abide forever; Father Holmes, aged 78, still strong in faith and frame; "Father James," of old Bethel; Rev. J. H. Higginbotham, and Brother R. Pipes, who left from Indisposition. These are our old men who prayed for us—the ripened sheafs of the harvest and the pillars of the Church. God bless them, and do them good in their inter days and may we who are younger, when they fall, be qualified to take up the ark of the Lord upon our shoulders and stand also in our place in the latter dey. Amen.

It was determined, should God spare us, to hold another Camp-meeting next year at the same place; the time to be set hereafter. By which time we hope to be able to have a good shed erected for the congregation, and obtain the power and protection of a corporation. It is also thought that the meeting should commence at the middle of the week, and also to continue the meeting at least one week. Yours. G. T. V.

East Feliciana, La., Oct. 14, 1859

Amite Circuit.—Rev. E. R. Strickland writes: Our Camp-meeting at Adams' Camp ground, resulted in about fifty conversions; about the same number joined the Church; eighteen professed sanctification at one service. The congregation was large and well behaved. Uncommon solemnity pervaded the crowd in attendance. The preaching, singing, praying, groaning, crying, shouting, rejoicing, will live in the remembrance of the present and coming generations forever.

Amite Circuit has paid about $600 to the preachers; raised some $2000 to build and finish Churches; contributed more than their shares of Conference funds.

Sea Shore Circuit.—Rev. J. W. McNeil writes: We have just closed our last Quarterly meeting, which was, as many other meetings that we have had during the year, very interesting. There are three appointments on this work, and up to this time there have been seventy-three accessions, a number of conversions, and one flourishing Sunday School established. We trust that the people will keep up a lively interest during the absence of a pastor and that the next preacher will have still greater success.

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

The Harper's Ferry Affair.

Cook has been captured, and sent to Virginia for trial.—Geo. W. Hoyt of Boston is counsel for the insurgents.—Correspondence has been discovered with Gov. Chase, Senator Seward, Amos Lawrence, and other prominent politicians.—The Massachusetts Emigrant Aid Society, and Dr. Howe of Boston, are implicated. Gov. Chase had contributed money, Gov. Fletcher had contributed arms, and Amos Lawrence had promised $7000 as soon as hostilities commenced.—A letter from Gerritt Smith to Brown, dated June 4, 1859, inclosing a draft for a large sum of money, says, four times, that Brown must be kept at his "Kansas Work." Brown had not been in Kansas for a year, and did not expect to return; hence he must have been fully committed to the proposed insurrection.—The religious abolition and Republican journals, though they have heretofore favored insurrection openly, now try hard to ignore Brown, and to shield themselves. The New York Independent, however, while condemning Brown for rashness, intimates that a successful rebellion of the slaves, would be as worthy as the American Revolution.

A General European War Feared.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 28.—The European mails by the Persia being advices from our Minister in England and from our Legations on the Continent which represented that the sovereigns of Europe are beginning to despair of any peaceable settlement of the complicated questions involved in the reconstruction of the Italian Governments, and are fearful that a general European war is not far distant.

They represented that England cannot depend upon any power but Germany to sustain her policy, and England being favorable to the reform movement in Italy, finds it difficult to determine what course of action to adopt between the two parties.

The Russian Government has so far held itself in abeyance, reserving the privilege of adopting such a course of action as circumstances may dictate after the position of the other great powers has been fully determined on.

The Emperor Alexander has ordered his Ministers at the principal courts in Europe to meet him at Warsaw, for the purpose of gathering from them personally the exact position of affairs at the various capitols in relation to the Italian and other questions, and to instruct them how to act in view of the present condition of Europe.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, October 24, 1859.

We condense the following statement from the New Orleans Price Current of the 29th instant:

The past week has witnessed a good degree of activity in our leading staple, Cotton, and it will be seen that an improvement in prices has been realized, but the general operations of the market are still on a limited scale, and must continue so until free receipts of the new crops shall give more ample scope for operators who ship to other markets. Tobacco continues almost wholly neglected, but the moderate receipts of Sugar and Molasses are quoted readily disposed of at well-sustained prices, and the rates for Western Produce are generally firm, upon light receipts.

COTTON.—With respect to prices, we have to remark that an improvement of fully an eighth has been realized in the early part of the week, and since then very full rates have generally been obtained, especially for clean Cottons of the Middling to Strict Middling grades, but no further marked advance has taken place.

The receipts at this port since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas,) are 307,332 bales, against 309,173 bales to same date last year, and the increase in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 91,475 bales.

New Orleans Classification.

Inferior	— @—	Good Middling	11¼@11⅝
Ordinary	9 @9¼	Middling Fair	11¾@12
Good Ordinary	9¾@10	Fair	—@—
Low Middling	10⅛@10⅝	Good Fair	—@—
Middling	10¾@11	Good and Fine	—@—

SUGAR.—The sales of the week amount to 1200 hhds. We quote for Inferior and Refining — to 5¾; Common to Good Common 6¼ to 6¾; Fair to Fully Fair 6¾ to 7¼; Prime to Choice 7¼ to 8; Centrifugal and Clarified 7¾ to 8¾ cents per pound. The above quotations apply to round lots, but small orders of 5 hhds and under, could not be filled without paying a further advance of ¼ to ½ per pound.

MOLASSES.—The old crop is almost gone. A few trifling lots were disposed of through the week. The quotations are: Inferior and Fermenting, 25 to 30 cents per gallon; and Prime to Choice Rebolled 33 to 35 cents. Of the new crop several lots have been received, and sold at prices ranging from 41 to 45 cents a gallon.

FLOUR.—About 6,500 barrels have been sold during the past week, at from $5 12½ to $5 25 for superfine, $6 to $6 50 for ordinary to good extra, and $7 00 to $8 00 per bbl. for small lots of choice extra brands.

GRAIN.—The receipts of Corn continue light. About 3,800 sacks have been sold at from $1 00 to $1 05 for ordinary, and $1 10 to $1 15 for old white. Oats have been in good request at 51c to 54c per bushel for good to prime St. Louis. Bran sells at 95c to $1 00 for ordinary to choice lots. Wheat sells at $1 15 per bushel for prime red.

PORK.—The principal sales reported through the week were at $15 50 to $16 00 per bbl. for Mess.

BEEF.—We quote Prime Mess at $14 50 per bbl. for extra brands.

BACON.—Shoulders 8¼ to 8¾; Ribbed Sides 10¼ to 10¾ Clear Sides 12¼ to 12¾; Sugar-cured Hams 13 to 14 cents per pound.

LARD.—We quote 11¼ to 11¾c for prime to choice prime, in tcs. and 12 to 13c. for kegs.

BUTTER.—Western generally selling at 12 to 15 cents per pound, according to quality; and Cheese 8 to 9c.

BAGGING AND BALE ROPE.—We quote Kentucky Ragging at 12½ to 14½ cents per yard; Indie Bagging, 11½ to 12c Bale Rope, hand spun, 6½ to 7½, and machine made, 7¼ to 7½ cents per pound:

GUNNY BAGS—Limited parcels sell at 10½ cents for light and 12 to 12½c. to heavy and extra heavy bags.

COFFEE.—We quote fair at 11 to 12, and prime at 12½c. per pound.

15 PORTRAITS IN JANUARY NUMBER.

THE ECLECTIC for January begins the XLVI. volume of this standard periodical. The attention of every intelligent lover of choice reading in the varied departments of literature—biography, history, poetry, philosophy, science, travels, etc., is invited respectfully, earnestly, confidently, to the character, contents, beautiful portrait embellishments, and sterling literary value of the ECLECTIC MAGAZINE.

In the judgment of many eminent men, and in the widely expressed opinions of the press, it is unsurpassed; if not unequaled, by any other monthly periodical as a treasure house of choice reading, containing the various and diversified subjects and articles which appear in the periodicals of England.

The choice articles in the ECLECTIC are carefully selected from seven British Quarterlies and nine Monthlies, giving the cream from them all. The sixteen cost about one hundred and twenty dollars. The reader gets the cream of them for five dollars. He gets also five dollars worth more in portraits. That is, the reader gets what is worth ten dollars for five dollars.

We say, thus, emphatically, by any fair estimate of its contents, the ECLECTIC is the cheapest and best Monthly. It is economy in time. It is economy in money. You save time in reading. You save money in the purchase.

More than half the contents of the British Quarterlies are local or abstract—of little or no value to the American reader. The amount of reading matter in the ECLECTIC in one year is nearly equal to three entire British Quarterlies, carefully selected from more than SIXTEEN British PERIODICALS, from the ablest pens of Eng and.

Forty-five steel portraits of eminent persons embellish the ECLECTIC in 1859. These forty portraits at twelve and a half cents each, equal the price of the work for the year, besides the eighteen hundred pages, double columns, of the cream of literature.

No intelligent family, no young lady, no young gentleman, will wish to be without its rich treasure of knowledge when once examined.

Its instructive, educational influences on the mind are worth ten times its cost.

We say, then, to all of cultivated minds, you can not find, in the whole range of periodical literature so much that is truly valuable, so varied, choice, select, so safe in moral sentiment for yourselves, your families, your sons and daughters—so comprehensive, instructive, and desirable in the different departments of knowledge, as is found gathered into this three yearly volumes and eighteen hundred (1800) double columns, of the ECLECTIC, from these seven Quarterlies and nine Monthlies.

15 Portraits of Shakspeare and his cotemporaries in the regular number.

Fannie Peebles.

DEAR LITTLE FRIENDS:—It is with a heart of sadness that I am called on so soon to record the death of little Fannie Peebles who was the dear friend and neighbor of little Sue, of whom I wrote you not long since.

Oh, how can I guide my pen in writing of so sweet and angelic a being!

Well do I remember the night when the boat whistled for her departure, I bid Fannie a last farewell, impressed a kiss on her cheek, and pressed her tiny hand. Little did I then think that I never would see her bright face again. She was on her way, with her mother, to Mississippi, to spend the summer with many dear relatives, but ere the time came for her to return she "was not, for God took her."

How desolate and lonely that home is where once was heard her joyous voice and seen her smiling face! How disconsolate and afflicted those hearts which once embraced her as the richest treasure of earth! Ah, we would "bind up the broken hearted" by pointing them to a bright angel extending her hands and saying, "Come!"

How true it is that

"Death loves a shining mark."

Fannie, often, just before her death, conversed with her mother and wept about dying. On one occasion, when talking upon this solemn subject, a friend remarked that the probability was, that Fannie's mother would pass the solemn ordeal of death before she would. "No," said she, "my mother shall not die before I do."

On another occasion a lady showed her a miniature of a deceased daughter. After gazing at it intently for a moment, she exclaimed, "I will know her when I meet her in Heaven!"

Her mother visited Cooper's Wells during the summer. While there, many of the children who had not plous mothers insisted that Fannie should dance. "No," said Fannie, "I am a Methodist; I am afraid you will write to the preacher about it." Said she, "I can waltz," and did a moment; then remarked, "Now you see I can." Instead of joining in the merry dance of sinful pleasure, her musical voice was often heard to sing:—

"I want to be an angel,
And with the angels stand,
A crown upon my forehead,
A harp within my hand."

Little Fannie felt a great solicitude in behalf of our new church. She scrupulously saved her money to give to the preacher to help build the church. And now our new pulpit will be graced with a handsome Bible and Hymns which was purchased with her savings. Though Fannie's sweet voice will never join with us in the hymn of praise in that church, yet she has already joined in a sweeter song of a nobler strain. Truly, "out of the mouths of babes and sucklings Thou hast ordained praise."

Fannie was a sweet, intelligent, and handsome child. None knew her but to love her. Her memory is fondly cherished.

May the Good Spirit console the bereaved parents and relations, and bring them all and us to join her in the home of the blessed!

Mary Frances Peebles was born May 16th, 1854; and died September 25th, 1859, in Hinds County, Mississippi, at the residence of her grandfather, Mr. Jos. D. Peebles.

The Pirate.

I send you the following true narrative, says a correspondent of the New York Chronicle, as a little incident showing, among a thousand such, the power of true religion, and the friends of the Peace Society will see in it a confirmation of their doctrine. The narrative is given by the captain:—

Twenty-seven years ago, the ship I commanded was on a mission of mercy. Laden by the generous contributions of a New England city, she was bound to the Cape de Verds with bread for the famine-stricken and dying.

It was the fourteenth day out, in the first gray of the morning, that the sun aroused me with the startling intelligence that a suspicious vessel was in sight. With the first ray of light the glass officer had descried her, and she was so near as to render out of the question any run on the deck in an instant.

The sinking of the stranger almost dispelled the fear that such a alarm had created.

"Why, Mr. Larkin," I said, laughing as I spoke, "there's no suspicious or foul-looking craft. She is a Portuguese—one can't call."

"But looks like that build," the mate answered, "but look at the mast in her deck."

The glance at the telescope was enough to satisfy me the mate was right.

"It's no business, Mr. Larkin," I said; "but she may not be for all that. One need not be surprised to fall in with—"

"Pirates, sir?"

"Having three new guns on her deck, instead of water-casks."

At it to put an end to her speculations, the suspicious vessel had spread more canvas, and as she gathered away the freshening breeze, they ran up to her foremast a flag, which, opening to the breeze, unshook its folds in the wind. On this I said we saw the terrible insignia of the freebooter, a death's head cross-bones, painted in diabolical black.—We made all the sail we could, but escape was impossible. A gun from the pirate, and a ball whistling over us, speedily proved the fact. The pirate came quickly along, like a panther, and, as he crept, was in no great hurry to seize it. The moment they came within speaking distance, he hailed, and ordered me to launch a boat and come on board. We got out the boat, and the instant a launch was swung over the rail, into it leaped twenty savage-looking rascals, armed to the teeth, swore, and pulled towards us. Ten minutes afterwards they were on board of my vessel and began clearing away the main hatch.

The leader, a swarthy fellow, whose square compact frame, and whose quick, black and hazy, and half concelled by the lids, cruelty and cunning, approached the cabin hatch, and addressed me in very fair English.

"Are you the captain of this vessel?"

"I am."

"Your cargo?"

"Provisions."

"Where from?"

"Where to?"

"Cape de Verds."

"Why, they're all starving there," he said, opening his eyes, and looking full at me.

"Yes, and the flour in my vessel was freely given by good Christians to feed those starving people."

The rascal continued his deliberate gaze a moment, and then turned towards his men, who by this time had broken into the cabin lazets, and in a rough, commanding tone, spoke a few words in English, which I could not make out. The men looked up in astonishment, and then withdrew to the side, where they stood gazing cautiously toward their captain, for such was my conjecture. He thrust his hand behind him, and walked to and fro quickly for five minutes; then he said, sharply turning to me:

"You Americans are all heretics—why should you send flour to feed Roman Catholics?"

"Because they are our fellow-men, and their Saviour is our Saviour," I answered, astonished at the remarkable conduct of the man.

"If you lie to me," he cried, with a fierceness that startled me, "if you lie to me, I'll nail you to your deck. Is this cargo the free gift of your countrymen to the starving?"

"I'll prove it to you by my papers," I answered.

"I don't want to see your papers—swear by the Savior whose name you have just pronounced." As he spoke he crossed himself devoutly.

"I swear it by the Holy Trinity," I replied, solemnly.

The pirate lifted his cap and bent his head devoutly, when I mentioned the Trinity. He stood still with his head bent over, while one might have moderately counted fifty. When he raised himself up, it seemed to me there was less ferocity in his countenance. His eyes were no longer half closed, but open and clear in their depths. I looked steadily at him.

"Captain," he said, courteously, "can you supply me with two or three casks of water?"

I gave the order, and the water was lowered into the boat. A word from him sent his gang ashore over the side; but he lingered behind, and after a moment's hesitation, approached me with his hand extended.

"God bless you!" he exclaimed, as he felt my grasp, "and may you where the starving are praying for bread."

The next moment he was gone.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MISS SUSAN MAGRUDER, was born during the year 1772. Her mother, Jane Edwards, emigrated from England to Maryland when quite young, and married Alexander Magruder, to whom she bore six children. They resided about two miles from the Patuxent river, in Prince George county, in the vicinity of the "Black Swamp." The educational advantages they could afford their children were small; though the deficiency was to a great degree supplied by intellectual and social advantages, and an ardent desire in them for improvement. The family afterwards removed to Washington; there, and in adjacent cities, Miss Susan made many acquaintances and valued friends—many of them among our early and devoted Methodists—our Bishops—and among her personal friends Messrs Lyell, Brand, Bissel, and other pioneers. She united herself to the Church when young, and appeared at one time to [illegible]. Though always occasionally despondent. Naturally of a superior mind, industrious and persevering; in household accomplishments she excelled: was an interesting correspondent, and when cheerful, an agreeable associate in almost any company. Unfortunately however, she was prone to look on the dark side of life's picture, which tendency greatly [illegible] her fortune. After her father's death, herself and mother went to live with her only remaining brother, Nathaniel, near Rockville, Montgomery county, where she was much called in attentions to her aged and declining parent. In [illegible] relieved her from this duty. She afterwards resided [illegible] of the sons in the family of Col. W. D. Beall, till after his death and the dispersion of his children. Then for some years [illegible] family, now united daughter, Mrs. E. H. Hanson, in Fredericksburg, Virginia, where she remained till May, 1857—and then accepted the cordial invitation of her sister, the widow of Capt. [illegible], and took [illegible] her in 1858 to this place. In less than two years her sister left her for that country where the inhabitants shall no more say "I am sick!" Her last removal was to the house of Mrs. R. M. Drake, in Jefferson county, more than twenty years before her death. Till the age of seventy there was no perceptible diminution of her natural force. From that time there was a very gradual decline. Her sight and for several years no returned, that she could read without glasses. Her varying appetite for food and emaciation of body were the strongest symptoms of decay, till her last attack; whether that was summer fever, or the giving way of nature's mysterious machinery is uncertain. She was attacked by chills and some fever, attended by loathing of food, and lingered for more than two weeks, apparently suffering little pain, till the 17th of August, when her spirit was withdrawn from the earthly house without a struggle. She had numbered eighty-seven years—yet they were like a weaver's shuttle. In spiritual, as in earthly things, she was not hopeful—attended the ordinances while she was able—said she had repented and asked forgiveness. Often when the family retired, was her voice heard in plteous accents addressing a throne of grace. The responsive amen was earnestly uttered, when prayer was offered by her bedside. We leave her in the hands of Him who is touched with the feeling of our infirmities and cannot err. She was laid by her sister.

P.

CAPT. O. D. KEARNY died on his plantation, in Madison county, Mississippi, Oct. 13, wanting thirteen days of being thirty-nine years old. He was a native of Tennessee, and received most of his scholastic training in that state. While at the University of Nashville his ardent temperament was aroused by the recruiting officer, and induced to enlist as a volunteer to fight the Florida Indians at the tender age of sixteen, serving through the term of his enlistment. Though highly favored religiously as it respected his parentage, after he had acquired maturity, he was neglectful of the one thing needful. In the year 1841, at Pleasant Grove, he fully espoused the cause of Christ, and identified himself with the people of God as a member of the M. E. Church. He was united in marriage to Miss Mary L. Harris, of Warren county, on the 9th of May 1840, which proved to be a union of hearts, consequently conducive to the happiness of both. She survives him with five most interesting pledges of their mutual love, to cheer and solace her widowhood. Since his public profession he has not been known to waver in his devotion to the Christian religion. He had a tender regard for the comfort and well-being of others, considerate of their feelings, and studious to promote the social enjoyment of all with whom he associated. He possessed the rare faculty to properly command his household, his discipline with his children was such as secured the most implicit obedience with the most clearly marked filial affection. Of a quiet retiring manner, he was unobtrusive as a Christian, attending however to these duties which he considered were obligatory.

He lingered under the influence of Pulmonary Consumption for several months, and enffered much—the cheerful uncomplaining and patient manner with which he endured it all, gave ample proof of the genuineness of his trust. When first convinced his disease was incurable, he became deeply impressed with a sense of his situation, instituted the most earnest inquiry into his religious state; the result of which at first was that he could trust in God; after some severe mental conflicts he gained the victory; thereafter, until relieved by death, he appeared to enjoy very regular, if not uninterrupted foretastes of the heavenly inheritance; writing at times on his slate when he had lost his voice, "when it pleases the Lord to take me, I am ready."

HANSFORD E. MILLER.—At the late commencement of the Wesleyan University, Florence, Alabama, a young man entered a plea for Christianity. His theme was "Christianity the Pioneer of Civilization." He was earnest, interesting, eloquent. His fine, clear voice, his distinct articulation, his graceful utterance, together with his sentiments of deep piety, marked him out as one upon whom the Church might rely in after years as an able advocate of our holy religion. His pious and excellent father, brother, and his gentle and accomplished sister, had come away from their distant home, to listen to his graduating speech; with almost infinite gratification they listened to the address which gave such pleasure to the assembled multitude. In a few days he left his Alma Mater to meet with loved ones at home. He arrived to die. Hansford Miller was the son of our excellent Brother and Sister, Carrie A. and J. H. Miller of Barbour county Alabama. He had been with us for five years. He was a docile, respectful, obedient pupil. He was more than this, for he was a deeply experienced and pious Christian. He was the class leader of the college class; beloved, honered and useful. I learn by a letter from my afflicted brother, that during his last illness he was patient and meek, and that his death was triumphant. It is seldom that we have met his equal. It is pleasant to dwell upon his many Christian virtues. May God bless the afflicted.

MRS. SALLIE A. WILSON, wife of Jock R. Wilson, was born, Nov. 10, 1832, and died Sept. 15, 1859, near Walker Springs, Clark county, Alabama. She was for several years an exemplary member of the M. E. Church. Her death was as sudden and unexpected, that she said nothing as to her future prospects, yet her consistent walk and her godly conversation, give her friends the brightest evidence that she "sleeps in Jesus." She was a lady of great decision of character—had a clear head and a warm heart, and was greatly esteemed by all who knew her. She was a devoted wife, a kind and affectionate mother, and a faithful friend, and her unexpected death was a very severe affliction to her husband and friends. May it be sanctified to his and their good, and may all prepare to meet her in the "better land."

JESSE ENLOW died Oct 2d., 1859 of inflammation of the lungs, in Wilkinson county, Mississippi, in the fifty-second year of his age. He was born in Kentucky, his parents emigrated to Louisiana, Concordia parish, when he was about one year old—from thence to Mississippi, Adams county, when he was a small boy; from thence to Wilkinson county. He has left a wife and four boys, and many friends and relatives to mourn his loss, and the Church to lament the loss of a Brother, who, for nine or ten years had been an ornament. HIRAM ENLOW, L.E.

SARAH M. OWINGS, died at her father's residence, near Columbus, Mississippi, of Typhoid pneumonia on the 10th Sept. 1859, after an illness of four weeks. She was the youngest daughter of Rev. W. B. and S. A. Owings, aged eleven years, five months, and nine days. Sally sought and found the Lord about two weeks before she was taken sick; her conversion was a very clear one, and, while she was permitted to remain with us, her godly conversation testified to all the beauty and loveliness of the religion which she not only professed, but possessed. She died in full prospect of a blessed immortality.

C. and Catharine Brooke, aged one year, eight months and fourteen days. O, he was beautiful, amiable and good, and deserved all the love which he received. But he is now in heaven and wears an angel's crown, given by Him who wears the crown of immortality and glory forever and forever.

HUNTSVILLE FEMALE COLLEGE, HUNTSVILLE, North Alabama.

PROPRIETORS—Rev GEO. M. EVERHART, A. M., President;
Rev. A. R. ERWIN, D. D., Principal of the Literary Department.

This Establishment offers the following Inducements to Southern patronage.

1. Huntsville is the nearest mountain location to the South and Southwest; and is proverbially healthful. The social elegance and beautiful scenery to be found here, are great auxiliaries in the formation of character.

2. The edifice is large and elegant—supplied with gas-light; and water in the greatest abundance by pipes, from a mammoth Spring in the town. It is 164 by 52 feet, three stories high, and well furnished.

3. The domestic arrangements are such as to secure not only comfort, but the social and domestic training of the pupils. Frugality, politeness and grace, as well as the virtues of the heart, are habitually cultivated.

4. The facilities of Instruction are unsurpassed. There are fifteen teachers and attaches, some of whom are distinguished educators. The large patronage, from among the best families of nine of the Southern states, attest the good-will of the Institution.

5. Arrangements are made to accommodate Southern pupils during the Summer Vacation, and to furnish them with such instructions in the extra branches as may be desired. Pupils received at any time.

GREENSBORO' HIGH SCHOOL—REV. J. W. N. Mears, A.M. M.D.

The exercises of the third session of this school will commence on the first day of September next.

The session comprises nine months—including the usual holidays—and is divided into three terms of three months each.

French will be taught for a small extra fee.

The Principal will take a very few boys under his immediate supervision in rooms adjoining his own. The amusement and labors of such boys out of school will be under the direction of the Principal.

Those parents who have sons to board out, will, it is thought, at once recognise the advantage of such an arrangement.

The play-grounds are ample and pleasant, and the house commodious and furnished neat neatly and comfortably.

Young men can prepare to enter the Junior class in any of our Colleges.

Miss E. D Mears takes a limited number of young ladies on whose education she bestows particular care. All the branches essential to a polished education are taught.

The attention of parents is especially invited to this Department.

TRUTH OMNIPOTENT.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from J. W. Vasser, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of North Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, one that ought to go home to those in whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

CONSERVATIVE OFFICE,
Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858.

Messrs. Wright & Co.—As any testimonial in reference to your preparations may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following, published at my request, in the "Conservative" of the 21st inst.

Col. Vasser was formerly associate editor of the "Conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity.

Respectfully, J. W. VASSY.

[For the Conservative.]

Communicated.

ABERDEEN, Aug. 19th, 1858.

DEAR VASSY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing unnecessary sorrow in many a happy household.

On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 15 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sovereign remedy against this terrible enemy of children, I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly, by the acquiescence of my family Physician.

On the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, save in quantity, being afraid to give the amount of prescription. I was unable to detect any impression occasioned by it until late in the afternoon of that day; and should not then, but for the discharge of some thirteen worms, varying in length from two and a half to six inches. This I thought a remarkable number for a nursing infant. But, to my great amazement, about one o'clock the next morning I was aroused from my slumber to witness the incredible number of one hundred and thirty-six from one evacuation.

Before breakfast of the same morning, (Sunday) but one small dose was administered, which was followed by the discharge of fifty during the day. The next day, (Monday) none was administered; but still occasional discharges occurred during the day, varying in size and quantity as described.

On Tuesday morning following, one more small dose was administered, making in all five doses of a quarter of a teaspoonful instead of a half as prescribed by the label of directions. In all, the little creature has discharged to this date, the rise of three hundred worms, a majority of which will average five or six inches in length; and is running about as usual, with returning evidences of good health and spirits.

Having met with such astonishing effects in the case of my infant, I was induced to use the Vermifuge on six other children under my protection, varying in age from two to ten years old, and in every case save one, (that of the oldest) the like happy results have been produced.

These facts are elicited; 1st, because of my antipathy heretofore to nostrums of every kind; and, 2nd, because my experience has convinced me that, in the experiment I have made with WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, it is due to suffering humanity, as well as the manufacturers of the medicine, to make public the results of my observation.

W. H. VASSER.

H. T. HELMBOLD.—Dear Sir: I have been troubled with an affliction of the Bladder and Kidneys for over twenty years. I have tried Physicians in vain, and at last concluded to give your Genuine Preparation a trial, as I had heard it highly spoken of. It afforded me immediatere lief. I have used three bottles, and I have obtained more relief from its effects and feel much better than I have for twenty years previous. I have the greatest faith in its virtues and curative powers, and shall do all in my power to make it known to the afflicted. Such is the language of all who use "WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE," when they call for that and any other is offered them; they have tried it, and from experience know it to be superior to all others; therefore when they are in want of a medicine of the kind, they purchase that which they know to be good and can be depended on. An Agent who called on us a few days ago, said "I find it difficult to sell any other Vermifuge when I have yours. I have had some in my store for a long time which I occasionally try to 'work off,' but no one will purchase it unless I warrant it as good as yours, this I cannot do." THE GERMAN CABIN BOY.

BY G. T. V.

About the year 1810, there came to the city of Philadelphia, in the capacity of cabin-boy, a blue-eyed youth named John Reipschandt; and having gotten tired of the novelties and dangers of the sea (to experience which he had unkindly run away from his father and mother, in Germany), set out in the city to find something to do, which would expose him to less fear and storm than the ocean promised him.

Proceeding from street to street, he at length arrived on Callow-hill, and perceiving a German sign over a window of a grocery and provision store, went in, and found, to his great satisfaction, a good man, who could converse in his own language and had come from his own country. Mr. Schellmeyer, for this was the name of the grocer, when he learned the purpose of John, agreed to take him in his store as porter; and he, running down to the ship, made out to slip away his little stock of clothing, and murmuring a thanksgiving to God for being able to leave the waves and the sea, pursued his course to his new employer's.

Years sped on, but the smartness and business habits of John had soon raised him to the chief clerkship of the establishment, with prompt and increasing salaries each year. With the economy and saving proverbial to the German, he had acquired and put into the savings' bank quite a snug sum, drawing interest. About this time, the premises of Mr. Schellmeyer being too small and cramped for his increasing business, he obtained a larger and more commodious house down the street; and John, by the aid of a friend, bought out his employer's old stand, and set up for himself.

Fortune smiled upon the young man. His business prospered and increased, and he paid his friend, and soon had money for investment or bank again. But knowing the uncertainty of banking institutions, he laid out his money in real estate. It so happened that in the purchases which the thriving German had made, was one of a small farm and dairy, four miles west of the city, on the Germantown road; and finding some difficulty in getting it managed, he sent his clerk out one day to try and had some one of his own countrymen to manage the dairy farm.

About this time it was customary for ships to bring in immigrants to our country, and sell them into servitude long enough to repay their passage money. At length, the kind and good-hearted German merchant, hearing a ship had just arrived from Germany, dispatched one of his clerks to it to see if he could buy an old man, without a wife, to attend to his little farm, manage it, and sell the proceeds.

The clerk returned, and told his employer there was a very good old man down there, and that he understood farming, but that he had a wife, and could not think of being separated; but added that he seemed to be so intelligent an old gentleman that I would advise you to go down and see him, for I think you will take him.

The merchant gathered up his hat and started for the newly-arrived ship; and when he got to the immigrants standing about on the wharf, he soon discovered the old couple, and walked immediately to them; and addressing the old man, whose features seemed kind and familiar to him, said:

"Are you the man that understands the management of a farm and dairy?"

"I understand the management of a farm," he said, "and my wife here," tugging his better half, "is well-skilled in dairy matters."

"But," rejoined the young merchant, "I desire to have a man alone, for that will save my buying or paying the amount of passage money for two."

"God bless you, sir. If you purchase me, do not separate me from my good old companion, who is my only solace and comfort upon earth; you look as if you were able to purchase us both, and we promise to be faithful, if God spares us; you shall lose nothing by your kindness to us."

Upon this he got a view of the old woman's face, and continued:

"What part of Germany did you come from?"

"From the village of Rastan, three miles from Elberfeldt," replied the old man.

"What is your name?" rejoined the merchant.

"Jacob Reipschandt, sir, is my name."

"What is your wife's name?" asked the young man.

"Elizabeth is her name," answered the immigrant.

"Have you no children?" inquired the merchant.

"We had three; two died, and the other was enticed off by some shipmaster to come to America, and we have never heard of him since."

"Do you remember his name?"

"Yes, it was John."

"My father! my mother!" and the young man fell upon their necks, embracing them with cries and tears; and the old folks got down upon their knees before the wondering multitude, and gave thanks to God for His mercy, before the son could pay their passage and order a vehicle to convey them to his home.

REV. CHARLES WESLEY, D.D.

A few weeks since, the New Orleans Christian Advocate contained an announcement from the latest European advices of the death of Rev. Charles Wesley, D.D. From the London Watchman we learn that he was the eldest son of Mr. Samuel Wesley, the eminent organist and composer, by Miss Charlotte Louisa Martin, daughter of George Martin, Esq., senior Surgeon of St. Thomas's Hospital. He was the grandson of the Rev. Charles Wesley, 'the sweet singer of Zion,' whose hymns remain a monument of his sincere piety and poetical talent. He was born September 20, 1794. He was intended for a surgeon, but he had, when still a very young man, a strong bias to the study of divinity, and before he was sixteen wrote an essay on Christianity, which was the means, under God, of converting a blasphemer and scoffer into a sincere Christian. Preaching seems to have been a constitutional bent of the Wesley family. His grandfather, Charles Wesley, declined the temporal position to which he, who was afterwards the celebrated Duke of Wellington fell heir. He studied divinity zealous and became, while yet a strippling, a sincere and sound divine. He relinquished physic, and sought to support himself by teaching; but fortunately becoming acquainted with her Majesty's Chaplain at the German Chapel, the Rev. Dr. Kuper, was, by his generosity, sent to Christ's College, Cambridge. He shortly after received ordination at the hands of Dr. Fisher, then Bishop of Salisbury, and first officiated as a deacon at St. Paul's, Convent Garden. He next began lecturer at Charlotte Chapel, Pimlico, and at Foury Chapel, Chelsea, where his preaching increased the congregation greatly. He was then elected from among many competitors as minister of St. Mary's Chapel, Fulham. While officiating at Fulham, the late Bishop of Louden, Dr. Bloomfield, accidentally heard him preach, and was so struck with his style of preaching that he appointed him one of his majesty's chaplains, and Sub-Dean of the Chapel Royal, which offices he retained under her present majesty until his death. He continued to officiate here until the close of his life. As a preacher he was powerful, energetic, and devout, and had he chosen might have risen to a more elevated position, but his diffident and modest spirit shrank from the responsibility, though few were better able to support it. He was made Secretary of Zion's College, and Clerical Secretary to the German Hospital at Dalston. Dr. Wesley wrote a 'Guide to Syllogism,' which, after passing through many editions, is now out of print. It continues a class-book at Cambridge. He has hardly been heard of before, though between sixty and seventy years old when he died, and a learned and eloquent man. Had he been a Methodist, like his grandfather, after whom he was named, he would have been a largely useful man, and might have been as well known in this country as Bunting, Newton, Hannah, or Arthur.

THE NEW CRISIS IN ITALY.

ALLOCUTION FROM POPE PIUS THE NINTH.

The following is the text of the allocution of the Pope delivered at the Consistory of the 26th ult:

Venerable Brethren.—In the address which we delivered to you in June last, with our heart overcome by grief, we deplored all that had been done by the enemies of the Holy See at Bologna, Ravenna and elsewhere, against the civil sovereignty which legitimately belongs to us and to this Holy See. We moreover declared at the same time, that they had all incurred the ecclesiastical censures and penalties enacted by the sacred canons, and we decreed that all their acts were null and void.

We indulged in the hope, however, that those rebellious sons, moved and affected by our words, would return to their duty; they all knew the kindness which we have always displayed since the commencement of our Pontificate, and with what love and zeal, in the midst of the serious difficulties of the present times, we have always directed all our care and all our thoughts to secure the prosperity and tranquility of our people, both as regards their temporal and spiritual interests. Supported by counsel, by instigation, by assistance from abroad, and feeling their audacity strengthened by that circumstance, they have not hesitated at any attempt; and carrying disturbance into all Emilian provinces, subject to our Pontifical power, they have withdrawn them from our sovereignty and from that of this Holy See.

The standard of defection and of rebellion having been raised in these provinces, and the Pontifical government being therein overthrown, there were at first established dictators of the Sub-Alpine Kingdom, who afterwards took the name of Commissioners Extraordinary, and then that of Governor General. Audaciously arrogating to themselves the rights of our supreme power, they dismissed from public functions those persons whose well known fidelity toward their legitimate Prince, made them regarded as incapable of joining perverse designs. These men have not even feared to usurp the ecclesiastical power, by subjecting the hospitals, the orphan establishments and other institutions of that kind to new laws. They have gone so far as to ill treat the members of the clergy, by sending them into exile or throwing them into prison. In their declared hatred against the Apostolic See, they called together on the 6th of this month, at Bologna, an assemblage which they styled the National Assembly of the people of Æmilia, and there promulgated a decree full of lying pretexts and accusations, by which, falsely alleging unanimity of the people, they declared, in contempt of the rights of the Roman Church, that they would no longer be subjected to the Pontifical government. On the following day they made a fresh declaration, stating as is now the custom, that those provinces wished to be annexed to the domains and kingdom of the King of Sardinia.

In the midst of these deplorable attacks, the chiefs of the party incessantly labor, by all the means at their disposal, to corrupt the habits of the people, particularly by distributing books and journals, printed either at Bologna or elsewhere, and in which they encourage every kind of licentiousness, insult the person of the Vicar of Jesus Christ, mock the practice of religion and of Christian piety, and turn into ridicule the prayers commonly offered up to the Most Holy and Immaculate Virgin Mary, Mother of God, either to do her honor or to implore her powerful protection. Even in theatrical representations there is no respect for public honesty, modesty or virtue, and the persons devoted to God are held up to derision and contempt.

This is what is done by men who call themselves Catholics, and who declare that they are full of respect and veneration for the supreme spiritual power and authority of the Roman Pontiff. Everybody sees how deceitful such a declaration must be, for the authors of these acts conspire with all those persons who wage relentless war on the Roman Pontiff, and on the Catholic Church, and who spare no effort to root out and extirpate from all hearts, if that were possible, our divine religion and its salutary teaching.

That is why you particularly, venerable brethren, who participate in our labors and share our pain, easily understand, in what affliction we are plunged, and what sorrow and indignation we feel, in common with you and all well intentioned persons.

In the midst of such great bitterness of heart, what consoles is that the great majority of the populations of the provinces of Emilia detest these culpable enterprises and stand aloof from them with horror, preserving their fidelity to the legitimate Prince, and manifesting firm attachment to our civil authority and to that of the Holy See; also that the clergy of the same provinces, worthy of the highest eulogium, have nothing so much at heart amid these troubles and agitations as scrupulously to discharge their duties, and to show in a striking manner their firm faith, and the respect with which they are animated towards us and the Apostolic See, by braving and despising all perils.

And now, since we are bound by the gravest of our duties, and by a solemn oath to support unflinchingly the cause of our most holy religion, to protect firmly against violation the rights and possessions of the Roman Church, to defend our civil authority and that of this Apostolic See, and to transmit it intact to our successors as the patrimony of St. Peter, we cannot refrain from raising our apostolic voice, in order that all the catholic universe and particularly all our venerable brethren, the bishops—from whom we have received, in the midst of bitterest sorrows, to the great joy of our heart, so many remarkable and illustrious testimonies of faith and love, and of attachment to us, this Holy See, and the patrimony of the blessed Peter—may know with what energy we disapprove of everything which these men have dared to accomplish in the provinces of Emilia subject to our Pontifical sovereignty.

That is why we entirely reprove, and declare null and of no effect, all the acts of which we have spoken in this august assembly, and all acts encroaching on the power, ecclesiastical immunities, our civil sovereignty and that of this Holy See, principality, power and jurisdiction, whatever may be the name given to these acts.

No one is ignorant that all those persons who, in the provinces above named, have given their support, counsel or assent to the acts which we blame, or have in any way promoted the accomplishment of them, have incurred the ecclesiastical penalties and censures which we alluded to in our allocution mentioned above.

And now, venerable brethren, let us throw ourselves with confidence at the foot of the throne of grace, in order to obtain from divine assistance the consolation and the strength necessary in the midst of such great adversities. Let us not cease to address to God, who is rich in mercy, fervent and humble prayers, in order that by His all-powerful virtue He may bring back the guilty, some of whom, perhaps, know not what they do, to better thoughts, and to the paths of justice, religion, and salvation.

AN EUROPEAN LADY IN JAPAN.

A letter from Jeddo, the capital of Japan, dated 11th July, gives an amusing account of the arrival of Mr. Alleock, the English Minister, in company with his wife, who was the first European lady who had visited Japan. The letter says:

When the distinguished party landed, they were met by several officers, who escorted them to their residence, followed by a crowd of at least three thousand Japanese. The lady of Mr. Alleock attracted their attention more than all the rest of the party, she being the first European lady that ever stepped foot on Jeddo soil, and to them, when her crinoline spread out, and gaily trimmed bonnet, she was eyed by all the crowd, who would run ahead of her so as to look her in the face; some of them took hold of parts of her dress, and this ungentlemanly conduct she very properly resented by giving them a pretty heavy blow over their heads with her parasol. Mrs. Alleock had been a long time in Canton before she proceeded to Japan, and she was prepared to meet the Japan heathen.

DANIEL WEBSTER'S CONFESSION OF FAITH.

Dr. Smith of Concord, New Hampshire, has put into our hands, says an exchange paper, the following letter of Daniel Webster to the Rev. Thomas Worcester, formerly pastor of the Congregational Church in Salisbury New Hampshire, which is accompanied with a confession of his religious faith, both of which are in his handwriting. We have seen Mr. Webster's name in the records of the Church in Salisbury, enrolled among its members, if we mistake not, about the time the letter below bears date. He remained a member of that Church till his death. The letter and confession were never before published: They are as follows:

BOSCAWEN, August 8, 1807.

Dear Sir—The other day we were conversing respecting confessions of faith. Some time ago I wrote down for my own use a few propositions in the shape of articles, intending to exhibit a very short summary of the doctrines of the Christian religion as they impress my mind. I have taken the liberty to enclose a copy for your perusal. I am sir, with respect, yours, &c.

D. WEBSTER.

I believe in the existance of Almighty God, who created and governs the whole world. I am taught this by the works of nature and the word of revelation.

I believe that God exists in three persons; this I learn from the revelation alone. Nor is it any objection to this belief that I cannot comprehend how one can be three, or three one. I hold it my duty to believe, not what I can comprehend or account for, but what my Maker teaches me.

I believe the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments to be the will and word of God.

I believe Jesus Christ to be the Son of God. The miracles which he wrought established in my mind his personal authority, and render it proper for me to believe whatever he asserts; I believe, therefore, all his declarations, as well when he declares himself the Son of God, as when he declares any other proposition. And I believe there is no other way of salvation than through the merits of his atonement.

I believe that things past, present, and to come, are all equally present in the mind of the Deity; that with him there is no succession of ideas; that therefore the relative terms past, present, and future, as used among men, cannot, with strict propriety, be applied to Deity.

I believe in the doctrines of foreknowledge and predestination as thus expounded. I do not believe in those doctrines as imposing any futality or necessity on men's actions, or any way infringing free agency.

I believe in the utter inability of any human being to work out his own salvation without the constant aid of the Spirit of Grace.

I believe in these great peculiarities of the Christian religion—a resurection from the dead, and a day of judgment.

I believe in the universal providence of God, and leave to Epicurus and his more unreasonable followers in modern times, the inconsistency of believing that God made a world which he does not take the trouble of governing.*

Although I have great respect for some other forms of worship, I believe the Congregational mode, on the whole, to be preferable to any other.

I believe religion to be a matter not of demonstration, but of faith. God requires us to give credit to the truths which he reveals, not because we can prove them, but because he declares them. When the mind is reasonably convinced that the Bible is the word of God, the only remaining duty is to receive its doctrines, with full confidence of their truth, and practice them with a pure heart.

I believe that the Bible is to be understood in the plain and obvious meaning of its passages; since I cannot persuade myself that a book intended for the instruction and conversion of the whole world should cover its true meaning in such mystery and doubt, that none but critics and philosophers can discover it.

I believe that the experiments and subtleties of human wisdom, are more likely to obscure than to enlighten the revealed will of God, and that he is the most accomplished Christian scholar who hath been educated at the feet of Jesus, and in the College of Fishermen.

I believe that all true religion consists in the heart and the affections, and that, therefore, all creeds and confessions are fallable and uncertain evidences of evangelical piety.

Finally, I believe that Christ has imposed on all his disciples a life of active benevolence; that he who refrains only from what he thinks to be sinful, has performed but a part, and a small part, of his duty; that he is bound to do good and communicate, to love his neighbor, to give food and drink to his enemy, and to endeavor, so far as in him lies, to promote peace, truth, piety, and happiness in a wicked and forlorn world, believing that in the great day which is to come, there will be no other standard of merit, no other criterion of character, than that which is already established, "By their fruits ye shall know them."

AUSTRIAN PLAN OF THE SETTLEMENT OF ITALY.

Article 1. All the States of Italy, the Papal States, those of the King of Sardinia, the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, Venetia, Tuscany, Modena and Parma, shall form a confederation.

Art. 2. The confederated States propose to unite themselves for to secure the maintenance of the external independence, and the internal safety of the whole of the Confederation, and of each of the confederated States in particular.

Art. 3. The members of the Confederation are and shall remain, as such, equal in right. As to the advantages and the charges of each of the States, they shall be fixed according to the respective resources of each.

Art. 4. The honorary presidency of the Confederation devolves on the Pope; the effective presidency shall be exercised alternately by the King of Naples and the King of Piedmont. The Diet shall sit at Rome.

Art. 5. The Pope shall have two votes; Naples and Piedmont three each; Tuscany and Austria two each; the Duchies of Modena and Parma one each.

Art. 6. All organic provisions, and all decisions relative to the constitutive principles of the Confederation, must be voted unanimously; in other cases the votes will take place by a majority of two-thirds, and will be obligatory for all members of the union.

Art. 7. The States of the Confederation reserve to themselves the right to treat individually with foreign powers, but they cannot conclude any engagement incompatible with the fundamental conditions of the federal compact.

Art. 8. The said States shall submit their mutual differences to the arbitration of the Council of the Confederation.

Art. 9. If the territory of the Confederation be threatened from without, the members of the Union engage, collectively and individually, to co-operate in the common defence, with all the forces which form their respective contingents in the federal army.

Art. 10. The federal contingents shall be formed exclusively of national troops.

Art. 11. The fortresses of Mantua, Piacenza and Gaeta are declared federal fortresses. Venetia shall furnish half of the garrison of Mantua, Piedmont shall furnish half that of Piacenza, and the kingdom of the Two Sicilies half that of Gaeta. The remainder of the garrisons shall be furnished by the Confederated States in the proportions to be determined according to the strength of their federal contingent.

Art. 12. Each of the Confederated States shall have the right, in the event of International disturbances, to call for assistance of the Confederation.

Art. 13. In order to secure the harmony of views and efforts, the allied government engage to take for their rule of conduct in their international administration, the principles most in conformity with the objects of their alliance, and to devote all their care to the improvement of the legal institutions.

Art. 14. There shall be municipal and provincial institutions, founded on the principle of election, in each State of the Confederation, and councils shall be established, invested with the mission of voting taxes and regulating the management of finances.

Art. 15. In cases of any differences with the sovereigns relative to the rights above stipulated, the parties interested in each State may refer the question to the Council of the Confederation, which shall advise on the means to be adopted.

Art. 16. The Council of the Confederation shall occupy itself at its first meeting with the military and customed organization.

MASON AND DIXON'S LINE.

The following is extracted from a historical work now in press, written by James Veech, Esq., an eminent lawyer of Pennsylvania, and is a very beautiful allusion to the southern boundary of Pennsylvania:—

"The southern boundary of Pennsylvania exhibits several striking peculiarities. Its eastern end consists of a considerable arc of a circle, which, springing from the river Delaware, connects itself with the latitudinal part of the line by a deep indentation or notch, so as to resemble what in architecture is called a bend. From the initial point of the latitudinal line, near the circle, it stretches away to the west, through field and forest, latent only upon preserving its course, without being deflected by either the channel of a river or the crest of a mountain. Climbing obliquely the summit of the Alleghanies, it turns its back upon the fountains which feed the Atlantic, and rushing down into the Ohio valley, stoops in its pathway to drink of the crystal waters of the Youghiogheny. Rising refreshed, and with its eye still fixed to the west, it hurries on, regardless of the intersecting line of a sister sovereignty; and stalking across the Cheat and the Monongahela, stops amid the Fish Creek hills, within half a day's journey of the Ohio, as if exhausted by the rugged route it has traversed, and unable to reach that great natural boundary—recognized by every other State than Pennsylvania—which its current loves.

"Upon a closer inspection it will be seen that it is equally regardless of the established lines of admeasurement upon the earth's surface, conforming to neither of the limits of a degree of latitude, nor to any of its easily comprehended parts; and this without being forced into its anomalous position by any object or obstacle of nature. For at neither end does it terminate, nor in any part of its extended course does it touch upon any prominent natural landmark. It is wholly, in every part, and in all its forms, an artificial, arbitrary line, without a model or a fellow upon the continent; and yet it is, perhaps, more unalterable than if nature had made it, for it limits the sovereignty of four States, each of whom is as tenacious of its systems of law as of its soil. It is the boundary of empire.

"Whence came these peculiarities—this palpable disregard of the plain provisions of nature and science for divisions of dominion? Is this singular line the result of compulsion, or of compact—of noisy strife, or of quiet agreement? How old is it—what its ancestry—whence its name? These, with many other curious questions which spring from the subject, take hold upon the past, and find their solution only in history. Strange subject, too, for a history is a line defined to be "length, without breadth or thickness." Yet this line has a history of a hundred years' duration, spreading out evermore than half the old thirteen States, and sinking deep into the very foundation of their being. It abounds in curious conflict of grant and construction, in bold encroachments upon vested rights, in artful remedies for inconvenient limitations. Kings, lords and commoners, English, Swedes and Dutch, Quakers and Catholics, figure conspicuous in the narrative with dramatic effect. Upon much of the disputed margins of the line have been enacted scenes of riot, invasion, and even murder, which want only the funeral pen of a Scott or an Irving to develop their romantic interest. In the strife and negotiations which led to its establishment, endurance and evasion were put to their highest tests; in tracing it, science achieved one of its most arduous labors. In intricacy and interest, if not in importance, the subject is inferior to none in American history."

THE ASSASSINATION OF COL. ANVITTI IN PARMA.

The Paris correspondent of the N. Y. Herald writing on Oct. 11th, says:

The Moniteur of this morning is ominously silent on a subject with which the columns of all the other Paris journals are filled—the massacre of Colonel Count Luigo Anvitti, on the 5th inst., at Parma.

The accounts from Italy differ little, and only confirm the previous intelligence conveyed by telegraph. They all agree in condemning the act in the strongest language.

It would seem that Col. Anvitti had formerly been the odious instrument of that mad Duke of Parma, the husband of the present Duchess, who, for his atrocious cruelties, was assassinated in his capital. Persons of every age and sex were, by this wretched Prince, subjected to the bastinado, and their tortures augmented by the bitterest taunts and revilings. Of this foul work Anvitti was the willing agent. Even after the assassination of his master, he is said to have induced the Duchess Regent to continue for some time these opprobious punishments.

Well, it appears that Anvitti like Lord Normandy, was firmly convinced that the revolution in the duchy where he had so much distinguished himself only required the presence of a bold man to stop its further progress, and accordingly set out from Anaconda on the 5th by rail, in order to arrive at Parma. At Enna, near the Modenese frontier, the passage of the railway was interrupted in consequence of a bridge having fallen, and the passengers were therefore obliged to proceed either on foot or in a carriage for some little distance to the other side of the stream. Here it was that Anvitti was recognized by two persons belonging to Parma, who spread the report the moment the Count arrived at the station. The Independeote of Turin says:

"He was in plain clothes, with a brace of double-barrelled pistols in his pocket, a poignard, a passport from the Papal Government, several letters and a considerable sum of money."

As soon as it became known throughout the city he appears to have been arrested by the police or some soldiers, and taken to the barracks of the carbineers, where not more than some ten or a dozen men were at their post. The gate was soon forced open by the mob, the prisoner seized, massacred with stones and bludgeons, and finally laid down in a coffee-house, where he had his head cut off. Other accounts say, that the wretched man having been killed by stabs from poignards, the body was dragged to the principal square, and the ceremony having taken place, the head was placed on the top of a column, and that afterwards the body, for the space of two hours, was dragged about the streets. This took place about 9:30 A. M., on the 5th, and on the following morning the Intendant General Cavalini, issued the annexed proclamation:

"Citizens—Last night your city was saddened by an event which can never be sufficiently deplored. A villian appeared among the people whom he had cruelly offended. The fever of vengeance seized upon some unhappy men, blinded and maddened them, and made them dye their hands in blood. Had he been the most perverse of men, it was for the law alone to punish him."

A NEW LECTURER IN THE FIELD.

The lecture season, at the North and East, has set in. Holmes (autocrat Holmes); Emerson, Theodore Parker, Bayard Taylor, Milburn, and others, are announced.—But another Richmond is in the field.

A very original and amusing lecture was recently delivered in Philadelphia, by the Rev. Peter Cartwright, the famous "pioneer preacher" of the West. He is seventy-four years old, has been preaching fifty-six years, and is yet hale and vigorous. The lecture was delivered without notes, and occasioned infinite merriment among the audience. The following extract from a report given by one of the Philadelphia papers, will give some idea of his style:

"In those early days—I do not say this by way of reproach or fault-finding—we had men that dared brook difficulties; men of strong, robust constitutions, that came among us to plant the gospel. They could live upon very poor fare; they could camp in the fields by night or by day; they could swim rivers, and thread the unworn paths of the desert, in order to bring poor wandering sinners home to God. Of late years, my friends, another breed of preachers is transferred to us. These are the hysterical, dyspeptic, sore-throat, blue-gingerified sort of preachers. [Great Laughter. A voice on the platform, 'Hit him again.'] They travel among you; they are unacceptable; they are useless lumber; and lo! their zeal all at once moves (like a seventy-four rigged for England) to go to the West, and 'help the West.'—We don't want any such cattle. [Loud laughter.]—Thank God Almighty, we have some good old stuff to stand by the work yet; and we have as fine a brood of young men rising up to shake the world as any Conference in the United States can boast of. [Applause.]

"I tell you now, in my seventy-fifth year, I can outpreach and out-work dozens of these old dyspeptic things. [Laughter and applause.] Why, they say to me, 'Brother, are you never going to locate?' My reply is, 'If the devil will locate, I'll locate.' [Applause.] 'Are you never going to wear out?' 'No, I never intend to wear out; I may do it, intention or no intention; but I never intend to wear out in the service of God.'"

THE EMPRESS OF THE FRENCH.

If the Kirkpatricks, from whom the Empress Eugenie is descended, are of the family of Closeburn, it remains yet to be ascertained when and how they diverged from the ancient tree. Thomas Kirkpatrick had a small property called Knock, in Dumfriesshire. His second son, Robert, married Henrietta Gillespie, and was father of William Kirkpatrick of Conheath, in Dumfriesshire, who married Mary Wilson, by whom he had several children. One of his sons settled as a merchant at Malaga, and married the daughter of a foreign consul there, by whom he had three daughters. The eldest, who was very beautiful, attracted the notice of the youngest son of the great family of Montijo, grandees of Spain of the first class. The daughter of the Scottish merchant was considered a mesalliance for a young man of so distinguished a family, and her inferior birth was stated as a reason for consent being refused. An application was made hereupon by the friends of the family of the late ingenious Mr. Charles Kirkpatrick Sharpe, a gentleman who, from his wit and fondness of virtu was called by Sir Walter Scott the Horace Walpole of Edinburg.

Mr. Sharpe undertook, with considerable zeal, the task of supplying his fair countrywoman with a long and flourishing genealogical tree, in which the dagger dripping the heart's-blood of "the red Comyn" made a conspicuous figure. The pedigree was beautifully drawn up and sent to Spain. When it was submitted to King Ferdinand VII., he indulged in a joke on the occasion. Looking at the document where the origin of the Kirkpatricks seemed lost in the midst of ancient Caledonia, his Majesty said, "O by all means let the young Montijo marry the daughter of Fingal." The husband of Miss Kirkpatrick eventually succeeded to the titles and estates of his family, and left two daughters, of whom the elder espoused the Duke of Berwick and Alva, representative of the Marechal Duc De Berwick, natural son of King James II., and the younger, long celebrated for her beauty and grace as Countess De Theba, is now Eugenie, Empress of the French. Until within the last two years a Miss Kirkpatrick, grandaunt of the Empress, inhabited a very small house in the thirdrate Scottish town of Dumfries; and her Imperial Majesty has several first cousins of the name of Kirkpatrick, sons of her mother's sister, who married her cousin, holding respectable mercantile situations. One of them was not long ago settled in trade at Havre.—From Sir Bernard Burke's "Vicissitudes of Families."

DEFEAT OF THE AUSTRIAN CONCORDAT.

On September 1st the Austrian Emperor signed the long-expected decree concerning the constitution, the schools, the instruction, and the legal position of the evangelical Churches in Hungary, Coratia, Sclavonia, Servia, the Banat, and the military frontier. This decree, although far from granting all the petitions of the Protestant population, redresses some of their grievances, and concedes to the Churches in some points the right of self-government. The Ultramontane court party in Vienna had made desperate efforts up to the last day to prevail on the Emperor not to sign the decree. But the Emperor yielded to the advice of those of his statesman who represented that a longer delay might involve serious dangers for the empire. The Univers publishes the Vienna correspondence of the Ultramontane Gazette de Liege of Belgium, which gives vent to the feelings of the extreme Church party. "The Concordat," it says "is dead. There can be no longer any doubt about it. Even if his Apostolic Majesty should not repeal it formally, it will remain a dead letter. The only rights obtained through it, which the Catholics considered as a real gain, have been sacrificed. The Catholic Church is no longer the State Church." The article makes other important admissions, as, for example, that the attempts of building up a Catholic press have proved an entire failure; that the two or three hundred subscribers to the only two Catholic papers of Vienna give to them hardly the character of journals, while a number of anti-Catholic dailies have a circulation of from 10,000 to 30,000 copies, and that there is not a public place in Vienna in which a Catholic paper can be found. So it would seem, that the great struggle of the Roman Church in Austria for the re-establishment of her supremacy by means of secular force has entered into a new phase, and that she considers herself for the present as defeated.

THE FORTY PLANETS.

The existence of forty planets revolving around the sun at distances closely allied to each other, and differing from all the other planets in their diminutive size, is one of the most singular phenomena in our solar system. This fact appears still more striking when the orbits of all the known planets are considered in their proper proportions. It is then found that, while the orbits of Mercury, Venus, the Earth, and Mars are quite detached from each other, and the orbits of Jupiter, Saturn, Uranus, and Neptune are separated by intervals which the imagination can with difficulty grasp, between Mars and Jupiter is a cluster of bodies whose orbits are so interlaced as to suggest the apprehension of frequent and inevitable collision. These forty small planets sustain to each other, as appears by their orbits, a relation different from that of the other members of the solar system. There is also a family likeness running through the entire group, which has suggested the idea of a common origin—the theory being that they originally constituted a single planet, which had been broken into fragments by the operation of some internal force.

In the support of this view it is urged that, if the earth should be broken into fragments by the operation of some internal force—such, for example, as that which causes the eruption of a volcano—the fragments might be projected in various directions, and with very unequal velocities; but each would describe an ellipse, of which the sun would occupy one of the foci—if the extreme but possible case be excepted of a fragment projected with such a velocity as to carry it beyond the limit of the sun's attraction, and these ellipses would all have a common point of intersection.

THE PROTESTANT MISSIONARIES IN ABYSSINIA.

According to the last letters of the Protestant missionaries in Abyssinia, the prospects for the evangelization of the Abyssinian Church are very promising. The four missionaries of the Society of Basel, whom Bishop Jobat sent to that country four years ago, still possess the confidence of King Theodorus, who admires their piety, their strong faith, and their eagerness to diffuse among his people useful knowledge. In 1858 the Society of Basel sent two more missionaries, who were received with equal favor. The king himself distributed the books which they had brought. He commanded the Abyssinian priests to instruct the children in the Bible, and raised the missionaries to the rank of Abyssinian noblemen! As the people do not understand the old Ethiopian language, in which divine worship is at present conducted, the king makes great endeavors to substitute for it the Amharic language, the present language of the people. The head of the Abyssinian clergy, the Abuna, who many years ago was himself instructed by Jobat in the doctrines of the Bible, has become jealous at the increasing influence of the missionaries, and is no longer their patron; but it is hoped that he will not be able to injure them. Good prospects for the spreading of Christianity open also among the numerous Jews of Abyssinia, who are called Felashas, and who show in general a great susceptibility for the reception of the Gospel. Their children are well educated. The missionaries are waiting only for greater pecuniary means in order to extend their operations, especially by establishing more schools.

OSSAWATIMEE BROWN.

A holder or worse man than that same Ossawatimee Brown the world never know. His single virtue, "linked with a thousand crimes," was bull-dog courage. Fanatic to the highest degree—a pupil, in politics, of the Giddings school—he has been taught to believe that the killing of a slaveholder was an act which God would approve.—When in this city last spring, in his lectures he told of his stealing negroes and running them to Canada, of his stealing horses, which he then had with him for sale, of his shooting down slaveholders, and of other acts equally atrocious. And now, said Brown, "I wish to know if the people of Cleveland approve of what I have done. Those who approve of my acts will say aye," and more than half of his audience, composed of abolitionists, shouted, "aye," whilst not a single "nay" was uttered by any one present.

Such approval as this, and the question was put at all his lectures, gave Brown confidence that his party would sustain him in whatever he might do against the men of the South, and thus emboldened the miserable wretch, by servile insurrection, sought to overthrow the government and bring himself to its head.—Cleveland Dem.

KOSSUTH IN ENGLAND.

The London correspondent of the New York Times, writing by the Persia says: M. Kossuth has returned to England. He has recovered his equanimity, and speaks without asperity of the French Emperor. He acquits him of bad faith to the Hungarians, but of course treats the peace of Villa Franca as for the time ruinous to the hopes of his country. He does not, perhaps, say, (but I am assured by one who has seldom misled me about any matter of fact in which he speaks confidently) that at the last interview M. Kossuth had with Louis Napoleon before the battle of Solferino, the Emperor said, emphatically, "Remember, I can not bid you tell your countrymen to rise in revolt until I get to Venice, for I do not know whether I may not have to conclude the war before I am half way thither." It is stated that the French were to send 40,000 men into Hungary when they had obtained possession of that city.

There are letters in town from Count Cavour, who writes in high spirits. He was asked the other day to become President of the Commission about to be named, to report upon a new Electoral Law for the lately annexed territories. His reply was, "This or anything else you like to put me to do, by which I can serve the cause for which I have toiled so constantly and so long."

There are rumors of the army of the King of Naples being ordered to enter the States of the Church, in order to co-operate with the Papal troops in an attack on Bologna. Garibaldi and Fanti express their hopes that they may commit so palpable a blunder, which would at once justify them in throwing an expedition into the Two Sicilies, and raising there likewise the standard of revolution.

MARTYR TO A PRINCIPLE.

Dr. Wentworth writes: "The heathen have no Sabbath. Christian nations are the only ones that keep the Christian Sabbath. Sunday in China is just like any other day. The natives think it very queer that we 'rest' one day in seven, and say that they should starve if they did it. We ask them to compare themselves with those who rest on the Lord's Day, and see who are best housed, best fed, best clothed, those who worship God and obey the fourth commandment, or those who worship idols and work all the time to keep idols' feast days. When a Chinaman begins to listen to the Gospel, the first thing he does is to put away his idols, and the next to break off labor on the Sabbath. A few months ago a young man living in the country became convinced of the truth of Christianity, and ceased to labor on Sunday. His father said, 'very well, if he won't work on Sunday he shan't eat on Sunday,' and for weeks the boy has fasted from Saturday night till Monday morning. The Chinese make staunch Christians when once converted.

NUMBER OF JOHN ROGERS' CHILDREN.

The old perplexing query, "How many children had John Rogers?" has at last been definitely and historically settled. At the late celebration in Norwich, Chancellor Walworth spoke to the sentiment relative to the first settlers of the town as follows: "Chancellor Walworth said it was sixty years since he left the town of Bozrah. He named the original settlers of Norwich—Dr. Theophilus Rogers among them, fifth in descent from the famous John Rogers, the martyr. The Chancellor settled the long-pending dispute about the number of John's children ('nine small children and one at the breast,' the primer says—were there nine or ten?) by exhuming from some old history a letter or address, from John to the government, in which was a passage to this effect: 'I would that my worthy wife might come to see me, she has with her ten children, which are hers and mine, and I would comfort her somewhat.'"

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS ASSOCIATION.

The receipts of the Gustavus Adolphus Association, whose object it is to assist newly founded Protestant congregations in Catholic countries, have risen during the past year to 130,000 thalers. In 1858 they amounted to 107,000 thalers, in 1857 to 101,000. This growth of the religious associations is one among many proofs that a greater interest in religion is beginning to pervade all classes of German society. The Catholic counter-association of St. Boniface is in vain making extraordinary effort to awaken a similar interest in behalf of the Catholic congregations in Protestant countries. Its income does not rise above 30,000 thalers.

EPISCOPAL TRIENNIAL CONVENTION.

After a protracted session, the convention adjourned on Saturday night, the 22nd inst. Sundry alterations and amendments were made in the Canons. A committee of laymen, one from each State, was chosen, to whom was confided the responsible business of maturing plans to increase the efficiency of the Church, and to enlarge the sphere of its operations. In addition to the consecration of four bishops, two missionary bishops were elected for new territories in the West. The statistical reports from all the dioceses, give an aggregate membership of 139,807. At the Triennial Convention in 1856, the return was 110,000—showing an increase in three years of 20,000 members.

EIGHTH CENSUS.—We are informed that the statements which have appeared in several papers respecting the early appointment of assistants to take the census, have originated in a misconception of the true state of affairs in connection with that work. It is not contemplated, as we learn from good authority, that the instructions of the Marshalls will be issued before February; and it is not expected that these officers will anticipate the directions of the Secretary of the Interior, by the appointment of their subordinates in advance. As the work of taking the census will not be commenced before the 1st of June next, there exists no necessity for the appointment of the assistants of the Marshals much in advance of that period.—Nat. Int.

MAZZINI'S LETTER.—

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Terms—$2 00 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1859.

NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

The volume of the Advocate will hereafter begin and end with the year; and it is very desirable that subscriptions should conform to the same rule.

Therefore, new subscribers, who do not begin with the year, will please send, not two dollars, but an amount sufficient to pay for the paper till the end of the year, at the rate of Four Cents a Week.

Then, every subscriber will know, without being informed, that at the beginning of the year is the time to remit the subscription money.

Many accounts having been sent out before this arrangement was made, we shall not be able, until next year, to make the accounts of old subscribers conform to this rule.

Our Agents will please notice, and help us in this desirable arrangement. It is an approximation to the cash system, without its objections, and will obviate confusion in accounts.

OUR WESTERN HALF.

The size of the territory of the Southern Methodist Church is but imperfectly conceived by those who have but little geographical knowledge west of the Mississippi river. It has been too customary to think of that fatherly stream as constituting the western boundary-line of our really substantial interests, not forgetting, however, some colonial dependencies in Texas, with some outposts that probably ought to be abandoned in Kansas and California. That these things have affected the views of leading men, and also the policy of the Church, is perfectly plain to those who have lived on both sides of the "great river," and more so to those who cultivate that part of the heritage on the far Pacific cost. It is even felt by those who are permitted to make the Mississippi their point of observation.

For years, it has been our sober conviction that the prosperity of the Church—the largeness and vigor of its missionary character and operations—the breadth and power of all its plans and purposes, legislative, administrative, and otherwise—depends upon such an enlargement of the ecclesiastical horizon as is indicated above. Our leading men must either give their official telescopes a higher pitch, so as to be able to see entirely across our territory, or they must take their stand in the middle, so as to bring both sides equally within their range of vision. The truth is, we have more territory west of the Mississippi river than east of it. And it is fully as productive in all that constitutes the prosperity of the Church. It is newer—that is the only difference. In that, however, after admitting all inevitably attendant hardships and difficulties in its spiritual conquest, there are glorious compensations.

In this great West, the rich and prosperous Church of the East is to be reminded of the rock whence she was hewn, and the hole of the pit whence she was taken, by seeing enacted over again the heroism which first planted her in the uncongenial soil of New England, the resisting Carolinas, the wilds of Georgia, the savage wildernesses of what was then called the West—Alabama, Kentucky, Missouri, Mississippi, Tennessee. A second Asbury has opened to him a field as large as that of the first, and requiring the same energy of character and depth of devotion. Would that God might raise him up and give him the choice spirits of the time to support him! Old-fashioned "circuits" and "districts, in their original proportions and characters, are not "clean gone forever." There is verge and scope enough for any desirable number of them. "Circuit-readers" have no need to fear that their "occupation is gone." There are yet miles enough for the horse, and grass enough for him to eat, and need enough for the spurs, the "leggings," the cloak, and the saddle-bags. O for another levy of the old guard! O for another army, like the first, of the saddle-bags men!

And truly, many of them are in the field. Texas, the first feeble Conference in which was organized by men who are yet in the prime of life, has now three Conferences, and the Church is striding to a strength there unimagined by those who have never been there. The Texas Conference will soon be as strong as that of Alabama; East Texas is prospering and growing; and the Rio Grande, under the lead of Boring and Cross, and others, is rapidly rising. The growth of the Church in Texas, within the last five years, has been rarely surpassed in the history of the Church. An ably conducted newspaper organ circulates all over that broad and beautiful land—a bond of sympathy between its widely separated sections—firm and sound in its religious teachings, bringing the inspiration of religion and thought, and the refinements of literary taste to the home of the farthest frontier. The very same may be said of our Californian organ; although our Church there is weaker than in Texas in other respects. Yet she is beginning to grow apace. Two such papers, one in Galveston, the other in San Francisco, are significant facts. For years we have advocated a vigorously aggressive policy toward this vast Western domain. Texas we know, having lived and labored within its bounds for four years, and traveled extensively through it; and California and Oregon we know through Texas. All our available power should be brought to bear in the strengthening and development of our interests in these regions. But, look! Not a Bishop, not a General Conference officer, with the exception of two editors, resides west of the Mississippi river. The head-quarters of every department of the Church are far on the eastern side. This has always borne heavily on Texas, and still more so on our Pacific brethren.

We simply need an Asbury, with a suitable ministerial corps, to take charge of the country indicated by the following central points: New Orleans, San Francisco, St. Louis, Salem, Oregon. Bishop Pierce, for instance, could quadruple the power of his life by devoting it, principally, to this great region.

A few weeks since, in an article on our Pacific possessions, we quoted from the Pacific Methodist a laconic description of the kind of men needed for the reinforcement of our ministry out there—"men of mind, of power, of singleness of eye." Rev. J. C. Kolbe, who has the honor of being the first "circuit-preacher" of our Church in Oregon, writes back to the Texas Advocate, "Send some strong men out here." Now, a little plain talk at this point seems demanded. Here is an occasion in our ecclesiastical history. Shall we be equal to it? Strong men are needed. The "open and effectual door" for great usefulness in preaching the Gospel, is right before us. Such a field for men of pulpit power is not elsewhere to be found. The Pacific coast is a great, wide-spread, glorious country—a magnificent Western empire. We have the men—plenty of them. Our thoughts, at this moment, rest upon some eloquent preachers of the older conferences, of great pulpit power, whose labors on the Pacific would be an investment of incalculable value to the Church. And there are many who might go. Vacancies in the ranks can be filled here, but every man counts on the Pacific. And now is an auspicious time. Bishop Pierce has stirred the soil, which is now ready for the seed. He is now about returning, is well acquainted with the wants of the country, could appoint them to the right places, and his sanction would ensure the success of efforts to raise means for their support. If the right men would go, and cast in their lives and energies into all needed labor, friends on this side would see them supported. As we conceive, they want no officers on the Pacific, but preachers. Will not enough of them volunteer? Will not the Bishops send them—"compel them to come in?" Let all be assured that "now is the day of salvation" for the Pacific. The people have rebuked fanaticism in Church and State.

PRAISE CULTURE AGAIN.

THE TEXT-BOOK.

When we spoke, some time since, upon the importance of "Praise Culture," suggested by Dr. Belcher's "Historical Sketches of Hymns," we knew not that our own Publishing House had a text-book ready, in order to its prosecution. We are gratified—exceedingly gratified—by its appearance. It is a book whose ultimate value cannot readily be conceived. From the examination we have given it, we are rejoiced to believe that it is well adapted to the condition and wants of the Church in the premises. Every hymn in the hymn-book has a tune specially adapted to it, and many others suited to its metre. When the tunes are all learned, as they may be very soon, and ought to be, any hymn in the hymn-book may be used in service; thus unlocking for general use that immense and rich treasure of musical theology and devotion so long shut up in that part of the book whose many grand hymns have heretofore had no tunes in popular use adapted to them. This is the more gratifying from the fact that very many of the Wesleyan hymns are in the unusual metres.

Then, the hymns and the tunes adapted to them are to be found on the same pages, at every opening of the book, with but few exceptions, the convenience of which arrangement needs no setting forth. Again, though there are two tunes at every such opening, one of them is invariably an old standard tune, presumed to be generally known, at least by those who have any knowledge of tunes. A book with nothing more than this would be of incalculable value. It will be a great thing when all the old tunes are generally familiar, sung correctly, with all the four parts. When such a thing is accomplished, these old tunes will make the grandest congregational music in the world. And the new ones, as they are learned, will give satisfactory variety. We are glad to observe that there is nothing eccentric, whimsical, or fantastic, in the notation; every thing is natural, and after the easiest manner.

Now, we suggest that all our preachers and members procure this book. Let not this attempt to improve the singing in our Church partially fail on account of the indolence, want of enterprize, or want of taste, of our people. It is notorious that while the Methodist Church has the greatest singing power in the world, in the way of the largest number of fine, powerful voices, she has, as a rule, the poorest actual singing in the land. The preachers have, generally, powerfully developed voices, if they only had a sufficient variety of fine tunes at command, and if they were prepared to sing them correctly, as to notes, time, and modulation of voice. How often is a fine tune vehemently and savagely murdered! But there will be no excuse after this. The preachers, especially, should obtain and master this book. Such is the value of the ability to sing well, especially in circuits, that it ought, almost, to be a condition of acceptance in the travelling connection. A preacher who cannot sing loses at least thirty-three and a third per cent. of his usefulness.

Good singing is the finest kind of preaching, and for revival exhortation it has no peer. After a sermon, before inviting penitents to the altar of prayer, a tender hymn of gospel invitation, sung in a sweet pathetic tune, by a melodious and powerful voice, is a grander exhortation than ever Whitefield uttered. A few weeks after a certain yet living preacher had been licensed to exhort, attending a camp-meeting, where there was also a quarterly conference, in Western Georgia, Rev. Willis D. Matthews, Presiding Elder, all the preachers were compelled to attend quarterly conference during the eleven o'clock service on Monday, except Rev. Mr. Steagall, who was a visiting preacher, and the exhorter. Mr. S. was appointed to preach, and the exhorter, a mere boy, to "conclude." During the sermon—a powerful one—the exhorter was in an agony of fear. "What shall I do? I can't exhort before such a congregation as this. I never tried but two or three times, to small congregations, and then could say but little. What shall I do? I am resolved what to do. I will sing. I can do that." At the conclusion of the sermon, when the preacher ought to have invited the penitents himself, though he did not, the youthful exhorter arose, and, in a voice developed in the woods and hills, and then unbarnised by labor at camp-meetings and singing in the open air, commenced a song every verse of which concluded with a line celebrating the "loving-kindness" of Christ. It was a glorious time. The sermon had been cogent, solemn, impressive; the exhortation (in the hymn) was tender, beautiful, inspiring. At the conclusion of the hymn, amid scores of shouts on every side, the exhorter stretched out his hands and cried, "Come to the altar of prayer!" And they came! Passing through the crowd afterwards, the following remark was heard, "What a tremendous exhorter that young fellow is!"

This book is elegantly bound, the paper is good, and the type is clear and beautiful. It is of convenient size. The Ritual ought to have been bound with it.

After a little, let the publishers bring out an edition in patent notes, for the benefit of "the million." The difference between round notes and patent notes to the masses, is just the difference between Latin and English. The professors of music and the musically educated, as a rule, all deny this, but there is no use denying it. It is so. The least imaginable study will enable those not at all acquainted with the science of music, to use the patent notes, while the round notes require more study than the masses of the American people, and especially Methodists, will ever bestow. The use of patent notes, once learned, is never forgotten; the use of round notes, without constant study, is soon forgotten—just as soon as French and Latin. The masses of the Methodist people can sing too readily "by ear," in their own way, ever to sing any other way, at least for generations to come. To correct their "ears," is the great thing to be "deiderated," as Dr. Summers would say. Therefore, put the tunes in "English" before their eyes. There are hundreds of Methodist preachers, and others, all over the land, who, with patent notes, can sing correctly, by a little practice, almost any tune in the book, however new; while there are but few who can do so with the round notes. We care not what musical professors may say. They understand the science and art of music better than we do, but we understand the singing of the masses of the Methodist people better than they do.—We have sung with them, from the "glory hallelujah" songs at backwoods camp-meetings, to the best trained choirs in the cities; and we know what we are talking about. If they would make the tune-book available for the general improvement of our Church music, and if they would sell fifty thousand where they will now sell five thousand, let us have an edition with potent notes. Where a congregation has a musically educated instructor or leader, the necessity for the patent notes will hardly exist; he can teach them the use of the round notes. But the great majority of our congregations have no such instructor.

But, as it is, let every preacher and congregation buy the book, and form musical classes, and learn all the tunes correctly as soon as possible; and we shall soon have fine congregational singing throughout the land.—Let every congregation, in city and country, use our own book. If any hard-headed leader be found who seeks to make himself important by affecting to find greater excellencies in his own favorite "Lutes," "Psalmists," "Lyres," "Harps," "Harmonies," and the like, let him be "labored" with, rebuked, and, if impenitent, "put out of the synagogue." This is our own work—prepared for us, in our own latitude, and is to be judged

LAY REPRESENTATION AND LAY CO-OPERATION—THE CLINTON RESOLUTIONS.

The following resolutions were adopted by the quarterly conference of Clinton station, Miss. conference:

1st. Resolved, That the admission of lay representatives in the Mississippi annual conference is a step forward in Methodism South. That it has cemented the bonds of union between the clergy and laity, and made them co-laborers in the great field of righteousness and truth.

2nd. Resolved, That we urge upon our annual conference the importance of calling the attention of the next general conference of the Methodist E. Church South, to this subject, and, through their representatives, of urging the general conference to admit lay representation into that body.

3d. Resolved, That Judge McVea, our lay delegate, be instructed to lay these resolutions before our next annual conf.

R. J. Bowman, Sec. H. Pipkin, P.E.

We publish the above resolutions because of our high respect for the brethren by whom they were adopted.—At the same time we regret to find them so singularly erroneous in conception and loose in statement.

1. The resolutions assume "the admission of lay representation in the Mississippi Conference" as a fact; whereas it is not a fact. "Lay co-operation," according to the provision of the last General Conference, has been adopted by the Mississippi Conference, and it is working well.

2. "The bonds of union between the clergy and laity" of our Church have never been "fin-cemented," so far as we know; and they have always been "co-laborers in the great field of righteousness and truth."

3. The General Conference has long ago had its "attention directed to this subject," and has provided the very plan which the resolutions eulogize in its working in the Mississippi Conference, though they call it "lay representation," when they should say "lay co-operation."

No fault is to be found with Quarterly Conference resolutions expressing opinions on any of these subjects; but they should be true to history, just to the General Conference, and good for edification in style.

OUR ADVOCATES.

The East Tennessee correspondent of the St. Louis Christian Advocate says: The Advocates, South, are deserving of all honor. Dignified, courteous, conservative, alive with intelligence and piety, they visit the thousands of our Israel in their homes, and shops, and counting rooms, in town and country, and everywhere leave a lasting impression for good. Fathers, and mothers, and children, and preachers, and people unite in "God bless the several editors and keep their hearts in perfect peace." United in aim and effort, these editors are doing a glorious work. Toiling and suffering in common with other servants of God and the Church, they are laying up good treasure against a time to come. They may sow in tears, but doubtless they will have their sheaves in the great harvest-day. What an influence they are wielding can never be known in time. Judging from my own experience and observation it is exceeding great. The Advocate, regularly read by me when a little boy, made an impression which time will never wear away; and its influence over me now, as I read it from week to week, is by no means inconsiderable. The case of multiplied thousands is similar. Said a worthy local preacher to me the other day, "The Advocate and the Preachers have made my family." And a more worthy, influential and enterprising family you will hardly find. Every father should see that his wife and children (and himself) should be provided with an Advocate. I had rather be a good editor of a good and widely circulating religious paper, than be King, Emperor or President. I think the chances for a better world would be more in the former case than in the latter. Every Advocate office South, is at present a fountain whence issue healing influences, which, intermingling, spread o'er all our land. And I never knew a period when these influences were purer than they are to-day. And to this fact may, under God, be attributed the remarkable unanimity and progressive conservatism of the Church, South.—Esto perpetua.

THE TERRY-BRODERICK DUEL.

The Californio Christian Advocate, (Northern Methodist,) which has shown a bitter partisan spirit in its comments on the Terry-Broderick duel, and under cover of denouncing duelling, really denounces Judge Terry and the political party he represents, makes the following remark: "We know of but one professedly religious paper in California, that winks at the vile and bloody duello. That one we need not specify."

We regret to say that we cannot take the word of the Advocate in this instance. We do not believe there is a professedly religious paper in California, or elsewhere in this country, "that winks at the vile and bloody duello." There is need that the Advocate "specify." Let us have the name of the paper.

The course of our own paper on that coast, the Pacific Methodist, in relation to this sad affair, is in gratifying contrast with that of the Advocate. The Methodist is impartial, calm, and dignified, the Advocate partisan, bitter and unjust, eulogizing Broderick, denouncing Terry. Broderick and Terry were equal in guilt—both fought willingly—Broderick was killed, and Terry escaped. Had Terry been killed and Broderick lived, the guilt of each would have been just what it now is; but there would have been a wonderful difference in the tone of this professedly religious sheet, as well as in the abolition papers generally. With all their furious righteous indignation against duelling, it is lamentably plain that their greatest grief is that Terry was not killed instead of Broderick. We oppose duelling as much as any of them; it is nothing but murder. Every duellist is a murderer, whether he kill his man or not. But to witness such a pitiful perversion of the sanctions of the holy gospel as is manifest in the partisan use of them in the California Advocate, is truly humiliating. It has brought the vestments of the sacred ministry much lower in the dust of desecration, than has Judge Terry the ermine of the Bench.

PAPAL CONTROVERSY.

The Pope's speech delivered to the Cardinals on the 26th of September is the subject of a great deal of discussion in the French newspapers. In that speech he declared null and void all the acts of the provisional authorities of his revolted States. He complains that morality, religion and the authorities of the church have been held up to contempt by the haters of the Apostolic See. The speech holds out no prospect of the relaxation of the Papal system of government. The Journal des Debats takes exception to an intimation made by the Pope, that he knows how to manage his affairs quite as well as France or either of the other powers may be supposed to know. The Siecle classes the Pope and his councillors with the old retrogrades who have forgotten nothing, nor learned anything, and charges them with confounding temporal things with spiritual things. It denies that the administration of the government enjoys the favor of the people in any of the States. The Univers, however, sustains the French bishops who have offered up prayers in behalf of the Pope, that he may be supported against the assailants of his power. L'Ami de la Religion attacks the Moniteur for publishing the declaration of the King of Sardinia, that he is willing to accept the revolted States without rebuking the King's purpose.

BIOGRAPHY OF MAFFIT.

Mr. Editor.—Seeing an article from the Mobile Tribune in respect to "a monument to Maffit," and that certain ones are interesting themselves in regard to this very desirable end, I take the opportunity to ask the friends of that orator and eminent genius to aid in a different way than that proposed by them in making known his name to posterity. While I heartily concur with that proposition, and shall certainly contribute my mite thereto, I have, sometime since, proposed within myself to write the biography of John Newland Maffit. I have various reasons for this which I need not name here. But certainly he may be made the subject of a most useful and important biography; and the peculiarities of his character and constitution afford the most prominent and useful stand-points for the observation of character, usefulness, etc.

I therefore ask all persons who have manuscripts, or published accounts of his travels, revivals and doings, if consistent with their own feelings, to send me such, or write to me giving account of such, and they will oblige me very much. The friends of that illustrious speaker who reside in the vicinity of New Orleans and Mobile, know more about the circumstances of his last days and death than any other people; hence I hope that those especially who respect and love his memory will interest themselves and send on such materials as will aid in giving a true reflection of his character in addition to what we may obtain elsewhere. I have some of his manuscripts, but not sufficient to be of much aid yet. My address is St. Louis, Mo.

I shall be glad to hear from Rev. Mr. Andrews of St. Francis street Church, Mobile, on this subject.

Chambers street Station, St. Louis. J. DITZLER.

IS THERE SUCH A CASE?

Ma. Editor:—Do you, or any of your readers, know of a single instance, where a minister has taken upon him the solemn vow to devote himself "wholly" to the ministry, and then has located, and engaged in worldly avocations, in the absence of providential embarrassments which he could not surmount, and has continued in that course, who has not sooner or later, become deeply involved in financial, family, or personal troubles? If so, I should like to have the case named. I know of none. I thought for years that I had found an exempt case, but the disaster has come in earnest. Ah! what horrible narratives have had their origin in the phrase, "I located!" What would not many give, had that phrase remained unspoken. Will not men be warned? D.

An American Route to China and Japan.—One of the most noteworthy features in the news by the Baltic, from California, is the reception of nearly 4 months later news from Japan. The schooners Lewis Perry and San Diego, from Petropaulovski, arrived at San Francisco on the 23d ult., the one having made the passage in twenty-three days and the other in twenty-four. Had these vessels connected with the regular mail steamers we should have had news from Japan in forty-three days—as fast as it comes by the European route. But, suppose the communication between Hakodadi and San Francisco was direct, and by a line of steamers connecting with the Atlantic ports, or, as it may be, at no distant day, with the trains of the Pacific Railroad, would not all our news and most of our light trade go and come by that route? It is fair to presume that it would, and in connection with this subject it may not be inopportune to inquire what is to be done with the fleet of American steamships collecting in the Pacific, unless some of them are applied to this trade. Our Commodores have done more astounding things than would be the opening of this new route to China.—N. Y. Herald.

The Revival in Wales.—This awakening was first felt in the neighborhood of Aberystwyth, Cardiganshire. Two local preachers of the Wesleyan and Calvinistic Methodist Connections were instrumental in originating it. It spread through Cardigan and Montgomery, Merioneth, Brecon, and Carmarthen; sparks of the heavenly fire descended on several churches in Monmouth and Glamorgan, and whole districts of the county of Carnarvon are in a blaze. About 15,000 have been added to the different denominations in Cardiganshire; the additions to the Independent churches in the parish Aberdare alone exceed 1,200. Besides these there are hundreds of churches in several districts of South and North Wales, to which additions of from 50 to 100 each have been made since the beginning of this year.

The Revival in Scotland.—The revival movement is spreading in this country. It appears fairly to have taken hold of Glasgow. Some hundreds have already been struck down, most of whom after a season of deep distress have entered into peace. The United Presbyterian and Free Church clergy are zealous in the work. Across the border, too, in Newcastle-on-Tyne, the work has broken out among the Wesleyan Methodists. Their large Brunswick Chapel in that town, holding 2000 people, is open for prayer-meetings, three times every day. In the evenings it is crowded, and hundreds have already been quickened into newness of life. The Rev. Robert Young is guiding the movement, but he is very ably assisted by Dr. and Mrs. Palmer of New York, who are now on a visit to the old world.

Sir Bulwer Lytton is receiving the honor usually deferred to a posthumous occasion, in the appearance of a uniform library edition of his novels, in the same style as the well-known editions of Scott. It is now in preparation by Messrs. Blackwood, of Edinburgh, each novel to be comprised in two volumes, the whole set to extend to forty-three volumes, issued at monthly intervals. The literary fecundity of the honorable Baronet is remarkable. As originally issued, these novels must have filled nearly seventy-five volumes, and his miscellaneous writings, poems, reviews and magazine articles would, if collected, certainly extend the number to 150 volumes; and these from a man who has filled no inconsiderable position in the social and political world, and who is still, as people count in England, far from "the sere and yellow leaf," and fully capable of great intellectual activity.

The California Conference of the M. E. Church, North, met at Petaluma, September 15, and held five days, Bishop Baker presiding. Missionary money raised during the year, $2,300. Eleven received into full connection in the Conference, and nine on trial. Near ninety preachers were stationed. All the proposed new rules on slavery were non-concurred in. Resolutions were passed in favor of changing the pastoral term from two to three years, by the next General Conference, and in favor of the residence of one of the bishops on the Pacific coast. The number of the membership is not stated.

Bells.—One of the leading features of the recent State Fair, was the splendid display of bells made by Messrs. Meneely's Sons, of West Troy, N. Y. The sizes varied from that producing the "church going sound" to the shrill tone of the locomotive bell.

We are pleased to learn that the committee awarded to the Messrs. Meneely a first premium on the beautiful church bell exhibited, weighing 2112 pounds (sold to Trinity Church, Geneva,) as also the first premium upon their Steamboat, Factory, and Locomotive Bells.—West Troy Advocate.

Two new volumes of the History of the Reformation by Dr. Merle D'Aubigne are said to be about to appear. These, which will be volumes V and VI of the work, will cover the 16th century. The work will probably be completed in about eight volumes.

Bunyan.—Masson's "British Novelists and their Styles" places John Bunyan at the head of British Novelists, as the first original writer of prose fiction in England, those who preceded him having been mere imitators of foreign authors. The American Baptist, with respect to the classification of Pilgrim's Progress as a novel, says, "We really think the works of Bulwer and Bunyon are articles too essentially different to be labelled with the same name." Masson, if in error, makes no greater a mistake than those who label anti-slavery invectives as "sermons."

The Free Colored People.—The National Intelligencer says it is proper to be mentioned, among the other incidents of the time, that on Tuesday last, when the excitement on the subject of the Harper's Ferry insurrection was at its highest, a committee which had been deputized by the free colored population of Georgetown waited upon the Mayor of that town, and respectfully proffered him their united and thorough co-operation in any service in which he might see fit to employ them in the preservation of the public order and peace.

The Author of "The Diamond Wedding."—Mr. Edmund C. Steadman, author of this clever quiz on the Oviedo nuptials, which has so excited the "parent" of the bride, the New York Evening Post says has for some time been engaged in the preparation of a volume of poems of a more finished character, which may appear in the course of the ensuing year. Mr. Steadman's stepfather, the Hon. William B. Kinney, is well known as the editor of the Newark Daily Advertiser, and his mother, since her husband's residence in Italy, has been the author of the Florentine correspondence in that journal, so extensively copied by the press.

The Pope and General Goyon.—Mr. Gaillardet, writing to the Courrier des Etats Unis, from Paris October 12th, reports a rumor to the effect that General Goyon, Commander of the French troops in Rome, tried to dissuade the Pope from his projected tour to Castle Gondolfo, telling him with military frankness, that if he quitted Rome he ran a great risk of never re-entering it. Nevertheless Pius IX. departed for his chateau, escorted by the General. From Castle Gondolfo, the Pope goes to Porto D'Anzio, to meet the King of Naples. He has since returned to Rome.

Alabama Railroads.—The Alabama and Tennessee River Railroad is now finished, between Selma and Talladega, over which the planters of that rich cotton growing portion of the State are rejoicing greatly, as well as the merchants of Mobile.

The brig Golden Lead arrived at Mobile on Tuesday, from Philadelphia, with two locomotives and tenders, complete, for the Mobile and Ohio Railroad.

Pilgrim's Progress.—A story is now current that some antiquarian has made the discovery that Bunyan did not write the Pilgrim's Progress after all! A Miss Cust, of England, has just published from a French manuscript in the British Museum, the "Pylgremage of the Sowle," by a minister of the Church of the fifteenth century; and she claims that the work bearing the name of the immortal dreamer is nearly a verbatim copy! Nonsense!

A Generous Congregation.—An exchange says the financial managers of the congregation of which the late Rev. Er. Alexander was pastor, some years since insured his life for $5,000, which, in addition to his savings, makes an aggregate of about $12,000 for his widow and children. The members of the Church, however, not satisfied with this amount, have determined to raise a fund of $25,000 or 30,000 for the support of the family, and are now perfecting a plan for that purpose.

Russian Demand for American Books.—The New York Evening Post observes that few people have any idea of the extent to which some of our book publishers are interested in the Russia trade. Last week the Appletons filled an order for three hundred dozen American works, chiefly of American authors, with a few reprints, for St. Petersburg. These American books go to stock a circulating library in the Russian capital.

The Rev. Mr. Guinness, who has attracted vast crowds in Ireland, Scotland and England, is about to visit this country. "The only object for which he comes is to preach the gospel to the people, and we are sure that he will be hailed with joy and he heard gladly." Mr. G. is highly esteemed as an evangelical as well as a very eloquent preacher.

Recantation of Dr. Forbes.—The Rev. John Murray Forbes, D.D., formerly rector of St. Luke's Protestant Church, has addressed a letter to Archbishop Hughes, in which he announces his withdrawal from the Roman Catholic Church. He does so, he says, because experience and observation have convinced him that he has committed a grave error, which, publicly made, should be publicly repaired.

Population of California.—A city paper says that the population of California in 1831, was a little over twenty-three thousand; in the early part of 1849, twenty six thousand in 1850, one hundred and seventeen thousand; in 1852, two hundred and sixty-four thousand; in 1857, five hundred and thirty-eight thousand, and at this time it is over six hundred thousand.

The Late Major Neighbors.—A Washington letter says it is ascertained from official papers that Major Neighbors anticipated assassination; and, with a view to escape it, had intimated his intention of resigning his Indian Superintendency in Texas, and of removing to Arizona.

Governor Willard, of Indiana, brother-in-law of Cook, accompanied by J. E. McDonald, Attorney General of the same State, and D. W. Voorhees and M. M. Randolph, arrived at Charlestown, Va., on the 28th ult., and had a long interview with Cook.

Cost of the Leviathan.—It is said that the cost of the Great Eastern steamship, when completed, will be about five millions of dollars. The interest on this large sum, it is thought, will far exceed her receipts, however excellent the business in which she may be engaged.

Finances of Alabama.—The Montgomery Advertiser learns from the report of the State Treasurer that the entire receipts for the fiscal year of 1858–59 was $1,327,235, 90, and the disbursements $685,556 90, showing a balance in the treasury on the 1st inst., of $631,679.

A writer in Fraser's Magazine says that the father of Dr. Chalmers carefully locked up the weekly letters he received from his son. By the time a number of letters had accumulated, his son came to pay him a visit, and then he broke all the seals and had the writer of the letters read them.

Mr. Bowen, the African missionary and explorer, identified the "corn songs" of the natives of Africa, with the negro melodies which are so widely known and popular in our country. It is remarkable that the only music which has been thought purely American in its origin, thus appears to have been brought over centuries ago from Africa.

Distressing Condition of Brownsville.—The news from Brownsville, on the Rio Grande, is deplorable. A miserable expedition was gotten up against Cortinas, which was defeated, or ran away leaving cannon and ammunition in the hands of the robber-chief. The Americans are few, and they are paralyzed by the impression that the thousands of Mexicans on both sides of the river sympathize with the robbers. The mayor of Brownsville has appealed to New Orleans for help.

Maternal Influence.—The Rev. Dr. Leland, of South Carolina, stated recently in the prayer-meeting in Saratoga Springs, that of one hundred students in the Theological Seminary at Columbia, he had ascertained by personal inquiry that ninety-nine received their first religious impression from pious mothers.

Schamyl, whose capture by the Russians has been announced, was born in 1788, being the child of poor Tartar peasants. He was forty years of age when he commenced against Muscovite domination the war which he has since carried on with such perseverance and courage. Not only he but all his family have been made prisoners.

There are now in the United States 28,000 miles of completed Railroad, and 16,000 either under construction or projected, requiring $400,000,000 for their construction. The total cost of completed roads up to 1859 was 365,152,070, of which large sum it is supposed one-third has been wasted in construction.

Sons in the Gospel.—During the twenty-one years of the pastorate of Rev. Dr. Kennard in the Tenth Baptist Church, Philadelphia, twenty-one brethren have been licensed to preach the gospel by that church—one for every year.

Another Victim.—F. J. Merium, of Boston, who had some connection with the affair at Harper's Ferry, but who escaped before the taking of the Arsenal, has since died of his wounds. He was hurriedly buried in Pennsylvania by fugitive slaves.

By the will of the late Francis Perkins, of Fitchburg, Mass., the sum of $8000 is bequeated to the American Unitarian Association, to be used for the purpose of educating destitute young men for the Christian ministry.

The Central Christian Advocate, in its "Church Items," places the Baltimore Christian Advocate under the head, "M. E. Church, South."—A very natural mistake.

Bishop Baker arrived at New York in the Baltic, on the 24th ult., in good health, having been less than twenty days in coming from San Francisco.

Southern Steamers.—A new line of steamers has been established successfully between New York and Washington City, stopping at Old Point Comfort and Alexandria.

Bishop Ames was lately robbed of $100 at Galena, Ill., by a rogue who got into the room where he slept. The bishop was in attendance at the Rock River Conference.

Jacob Gruber.—We learn that Dr. Strickland, of New York, has in course of preparation a "Life of Jacob Gruber." It is to be issued by the Harpers.

The Pensacola Observer says that all the stock is taken, and arrangements made, for a line of telegraph between Pensacola and Mobile.

Dr. Luther, on the 22d ult., at Bilk, near Dusseldorf, discovered the fifty-seventh of the asteroids, between Mars and Jupiter.

Intelligence has been received at Boston of the death of Mrs. Marsh, one of the missionaries of the American Board at Mosul.

A Heart worth Having.—Church's Heart of the Andes, is worth $40,000.

The King of Siam is said to have named a son George Washington.

The Red Man.—The whole number of Indians at present in the United States is estimated at 350,000.

The putting an end to hunting is the first step in the progress of civilization.—Rev. Jona. Boucher.

NEW BOOKS.

The Southern Methodist Almanac for the year of our Lord 1860. Being Bissextile or Leap Year, and the Eighty Fourth of American Independence. Calculations by W. Ferrell, A. M. Edited by T. O. Summers D.D. Nashville, Tennessee, Southern Methodist Publishing House. 1860.

This is a good Almanac, as such—containing much useful information not to be found collected elsewhere. For reference, as to our general Church organization and progress, it is invaluable. It contains (what ought to be among its highest recommendations) a full Catalogue of Southern Methodist Books and Miscellaneous Publications. Of this, we let the Financial Secretary, Rev. R. Abbey, speak, as it is peculiarly in his line. "The Publishing House has now, for the first time, issued a catalogue of our books and business in quantity some what adequate to the necessities of the case. It is issued in connection with, and forms a part of, the Southern Methodist Almanac. One hundred thousand is, I believe, about the number to be put into circulation. They are not to sell, but to circulate. Let everybody bear this in mind.

"Now, one word, right here, to the preachers and any others who desire to do good, and at the same time make a little money. With the use of the catalogue you can sell vastly more books, without advancing money or incurring the risk of having books lie on hand, than in any other way.

"This is the way: Supply every family with a catalogue. When you have time to do so, look it over with them, and, having first made yourself familiar with it and the books, recommend this, that, and the other, and receive orders for such as they want. When you get round, or half round, send to the Book Agent for the books, deliver them, and receive your pay, and remit back to the Publishing House; and so, in every thirty or sixty days, you have completed the transaction. You have neither advanced money, nor incurred an uncertain liability; but, by using the catalogue, you sell the books before you buy them."

The Corner Cupboard; or, Facts for Everybody. By the author of "Inquire Within," "The Reason Why," etc. Large 12mo, 400 pages, cloth. Illustrated with over 1000 engravings. Gilt side and back. Price One Dollar. Embracing Facts about:—1. Things not generally known; 2. Things that ought to be known; 3. Things worth knowing. The Food we consume; the Clothes we wear; the House we live in; Facts from the Arts and Sciences, as well as from Literature, Manufactures, Commerce, Anatomy, Physiology, the Garden and the Field. The whole forming a complete cyclopædia of useful knowledge. Dick & Fitzgerald, Publishers, No. 18 Ann-street, New York. For sale in New Orleans by J. C. Morgan & Co.

Here is an amount of valuable and interesting knowledge brought together in one book, which could not be obtained by ransacking for years the largest libraries in the land.

Henry St. John, Gentleman, of "Flower of Hundreds," in the county of Prince George, Virginia. A Tale of 1774-'75. By John Esten Cooke, author of "The Virginia Comedians," "Leather Stocking and Silk," "The Last of the Foresters," etc., etc. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1859. For sale in New Orleans by J. C. Morgan & Co.

Esten Cooke, the brother of Pendleton Cooke, who died in the dawn of literary fame, is a rising Southern author who promises to do honor to his country. This book has been pronounced a charming one by all who have read it. No better time and scenes could be chosen for a romance—the dawn of the revolution in the Old Dominion. Virginia chivalry and character, unsurpassed by the world, especially in early times, may here be studied to better advantage than in Thackeray's "Henry Esmond" and "The Virginians."

Parlor Theatricals, or Winter Evenings' Entertainment, containing Acting Proverbs; Dramatic Charades, for Drawing-room Pantomimes; Musical Burlesques; Tableaux Vivants, etc., etc.; illustrated with descriptive engravings and diagrams. By the author of "The Magician's Own Book," "The Sociabia," "The Secret Out," etc. New York: Dick & Fitzgerald, Publishers, No. 18 Ann-street. For sale in New Orleans by J. C. Morgan and Co.

The title of this work explains it fully. The theatre, and similar amusements, are falling into disrepute among refined people, and domestic recreations are taking their place—a healthful symptom.—This book is intended to promote such recreations

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

NOVEMBER 9, 1859.

DOLBEAR COMMERCIAL COLLEGE OF THE CITY OF NEW ORLEANS.—We are requested to say that the object of the charter (which is a perpetual one) was to build up in this city an institution that would stand, for ages, and not merely the life time of any individual. It will be entirely under the control of the ELEVEN Trustees, six appointed by the Legislature, and five by the Stockholders. Mr. Dolbear requests us to say that his individual interest is merged in the chartered institution, and that whenever the Stockholders are not satisfied with his management of it, the Trustees can elect any other person in his place, and make it a permanent institution of the South. Students from the country are desired to enter as soon as convenient.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.—On third page, fourth column, of this paper, will be found the advertisement of Mr. Bennett, Agent for this city, whose office is at 33 Camp street. Those wishing sewing machines will find a full account of them in this advertisement. The success of I. M. SINGER'S machines has been wonderful—$175,000 having been sold by this one agent. What man with a soul in his body will continue in his family the tyranny of the needle, when the liberty of the sewing machine is so nigh?

SOULE'S COMMERCIAL COLLEGE.—Mr. Soule has his advertisement in this paper, third page, fourth column. We have reason to believe that young men going there for instruction, will come out thoroughly prepared for business. Mr. Soule is practically acquainted with all he teaches, and devotes himself wholly to the business. Read his advertisement.

CARPETING.—J. D. Dameron whose fine carpet store is on Canal street, has an advertisement in this paper—third page, fourth column. Nothing better of the kind can be obtained in this city than the carpets and other house furnishing articles he has for sale. We have experience, and speak advisedly. Beautify your home—it is an important part of the education of your children.

MILBURN AND BEULAH.—Derby, and Jackson, the publishers, advertise in this paper, third page, fourth column "Ten Years of Preacher Life," by Milburn; and "Beulah," by Miss Evans. They are both highly valuable and interesting works.

THE ECLECTIC MAGAZINE.—This periodical, which gives the crème de la crème of the leading English quarterlies and monthlies, is advertised on third page, fourth column. Try one to read it carefully. We indorse every word of it.

THE WESLEYAN HYMN AND TIME BOOK is advertised under Special Notices. Let every body send and get a copy.

NEWS FROM OUR HOME WORK.

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

Homer Circuit.—REV. T. J. LACY writes: The Lord has done great things for us whereof we are glad."

At Hayneville, the Lord was with us in great power and mercy. Forty-two or three souls were made happy in Jesus; and the Church was greatly quickened. It was good to be there.

The meeting lasted nine days. Six days of that time, Bros. C. Blackman and T. M. Wafer were there, and were very efficient—Bro. W. is an exhorter, but he spoke in demonstration of the spirit and of power. Bro. B. is a Local Elder, and is truly under God, a blessing to our Zion.

Homer has shared largely in the heavenly visitation. Owing to severe and protracted family affliction, the writer could not be in attendance every day; he was present as often as the circumstance would admit, however, and on one occasion witness'd nearly fifty of the slain of the Lord, asking for mercy the same hour. Some of them asked aright and received.

Other places have been blest also; and though obstacles formidable and forbidding have been thrown in the way, the membership on the entire circuit has been increased nearly one hundred, white—and twenty-five colored. Thus we do realize, that in God's name we shall not only do valiantly, but run through a troop and leap over a wall. Amen.

Bastrop Circuit.—REV. J. L. WRIGHT writes: This community (Baatrop) is now, enjoying gracious "seasons of refreshing from the presence of the Lord."

Our fourth Quarterly meeting commenced on last Friday. Bro. Ivy Presiding Elder, present and preached for us with his usual acceptability and success up to Wednesday morning, when he left for his next Quarterly meeting. We have continued up to this time, and good has been done. Nine persons have joined the Church on probation, seven have been converted, and some dozen persons ore at the altar every time a call is made for mourners. If we had the necessary ministerial help, a great deal of good could be effected. However the good Lord has been with us." This circuit is now in excellent condition—the societies all properly organized and doing well. We had two Sabboth-schools in successful operation, during the most of the year, and we trust they will continue. We have received some fifty or sixty into the Church on probation, and we have hopes of receiving yet many more before we leave for Conference. I believe I shall receive my quarterage and allowance. We have received and expended several hundred dollars for Church repairs and Church buildings—expect to get a good missionary collection, and also to collect most of the Advocate accounts, and bring forth the money when we leave for Conference.

Bayou Pierre Circuit.—Rev. W. Wadsworth writes:—We are making our last round on Bayon Pierre Circuit for the Conference year, and hence give you some religious intelligence.

We have had during the year one hundred and twenty-five conversions, and one hundred and fifty accessions, and several professed sanctification.

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Clarke Circuit.—Rev. J. D. Cameron writes: Our first protracted meeting was held at Soule Chapel, commencing Saturday before the second Sabbath in August, and ending with the third; at which there were eighteen whites and six blacks taken into the Church on probation. Our next was held at Hebron, commencing Saturday before the fourth Sabbath in August, and closing the Wednesday night following; here eleven whites and eight blacks joined the Church. Our next was at Shubuta, commencing Saturday before the first Sabbath in September, and closing Tuesday after the second. We set this down as meeting No. 1. Here thirty-seven whites and thirty-four blacks were received on probation, making in all seventy-one. On Friday, the 23d of September, our Camp-meeting commenced, and truly it was good to be there. Twenty-seven whites and twenty-six blacks attached themselves to the Church. Our next protracted meeting was held at Salem, the number that joined the Church I have not ascertained, as the meeting was held by the local Brethren since I visited that Church. I learn, however, that they had a good time. The meeting embraced the second Sabbath in October. On Saturday before the third Sabbath in October, the local Brethren commenced at Enon; the meeting lasted eight days, and resulted in the accession of eighteen whites and nineteen blacks to the Church, making in all an aggregate of two hundred and two, one hundred and eleven whites and ninety-one blacks. Besides these, others have joined at different times, enough to swell the number to at least two hundred and twenty-five.

The number of conversions I presume, has been equal to the accessions. For this mercy let all the people praise the Lord.

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

Election Riot and Bloodshed at Baltimore.

BALTIMORE, Nov. 2.—The election for State officers and members of the Legislature came off to-day, and was characterized by the usual display of violence and rowdyism.

There were many disturbances and fighting in the streets and at the polls in the early part of the day.

Several serious affrays occurred before three o'clock, in which several respectable citizens were shot.

The Reformers in the fifth ward were driven from the polls at early hour.

The first, second and fourth wards were also taken possession of by the rowdies early in the day.

In the twelfth ward the rioters have full control of the polls and are knocking down (I P. M.) whom they please.

The police department offer no protection to peaceable citizens.

A gang of armed rowdies from Washington are aiding the Baltimore Roughs.

The reformers have generally abandoned the contest, and the citizens are talking of establishing a Vigilance Committee.

BALTIMORE, 7 P. M.—Wm. J. Preston, the democratic candidate for Congress in the Third District, was badly beaten about the head with a club in the hand of a Rough.

In the eleventh ward, which is the stronghold of the Reformers, Mr. Thomas, the candidate of the reform party for Attorney General, withdrew his name, whereupon the Reformers left the polls.

Adam B. Kyle, a merchant, who, with several other prominent citizens were shot this morning, is considered in a dangerous condition, and is not expected to survive.

The stores are nearly all closed, and the Roughs have almost undisputed sway in the city.

Mr. Dark, the proprietor of the Baltimore Exchange, has demanded of the city authorities the protection of his office from the violence of the mob, which has threatened to destroy it.

Mexican Affairs.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 2.—Mr. Conner, our Consul at Mazutlan, is here making arrangements to take advantage of the privilege he obtained some time since from the Juarez government to run a line of steamers on the Mexican coast under the American flag.

He has partly arranged, with one of the Pacific steamship companies, to connect with its line of steamers at Acapulco.

Dispatches from our Consul, Mr. Black, fully confirm previous reports in regard to the cold-blooded murder of Ormand Chase by the church officers. The President is exerting all his powers to secure full redress for the outrage.

Constitutional Election in Kansas.

LEAVENWORTH CITY, Nov. 2.—The official vote upon the question of the acceptance of the State Constitution is as follows: For the Constitution 10,319; against it 5536.

The vote on the Homestead Law was 8750 for; against 4772.

An Extensive Forgery.

NEW YORK, Nov. 5.—A report is current that a prominent tobacco broker, whose name has not been ascertained, has committed a forgery or breach of trust to the amount of $50,000 or $80,000.

Washington Matters.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 2.—The friends of the Constitutional Government of Mexico, are urging Senor Lerdo's immediate return to Vera Cruz, to aid in procuring the consummation of the pending treaty with our government.

Gen. Levin, from New Grenada, has arrived, and there is a prospect that New Grenada will ratify the treaty with our Government, as amended by our Senate at the last session of Congress.

Postmaster General Holt left Washington to-day for Charleston, which will deprive notion upon the bids for carrying the mails from Portland to New Orleans.

Trial of the Outlaw Cook. Brown Sentenced to be Hung.

CHARLESTOWN, VA., Nov. 2.—Messrs. Rossell & Senuott, attorneys employed by the Boston philanthropists to defend the Harper's Ferry insurgents, arrived here to-day.

The case of Cook was taken up. Cook waved a preliminary examination, and was committed for trial.

Mr. Chilton's motion for arrest of judgement, was argued, but not granted. Brown made a characteristic speech previous to hearing his sentence.

The Judge, after a few impressive remarks, sentenced him to be hanged on the second day of December next.

Arrival of the Steamer America.

Liverpool Cotton Market.

LIVERPOOL, Oct. 22.—The sales of Cotton during the week amount to 58,800 bales. Middling and the better qualities of Cotton have advanced ¼ during the week, the market, for all descriptions of clean Cotton closed with an advancing tendency. Middling Orleans is quoted at 7 5-16.

The Great Eastern.

The day of the departure of the steamship Great Eastern had been postponed sine die, and it was considered as settled that she would not sail for the United States during the present season.

The Zurich Treaty.

The details of the Zurich treaty have been made known. It is a mere exemplification of the agreement entered into between the two Emperors at Villafranca, with the exception that the rights of the Grand Dukes are held in reserve to future consideration by a European Congress.

Spain and Morocco.

The Spanish Government is not satisfied with the recent offer made by Morocco for the settlement of the difficulty between the two Governments, and a war is considered imminent.

The Sardinian Loan.

The Sardinian Government has issued a decree announcing a loan of 100,000,000 of francs.

The treaty just concluded at Zurich, between the plenipotentiaries of France, Austria and Sardinia, requires that the formality of its ratification shall be exchanged between the respective governments within fifteen days from the date of its conclusion at Zurich.

The European Congress.

The Paris Pays intimates that Naples, Spain, Portugal and Sweden, are not likely to be invited to join in the projected European Congress.

Affairs in Italy.

The London Post, Lord Palmerston's organ, regards the Italian complication as having assumed a very serious aspect. It also regards the position in which the present state of the Italian question has placed the Emperor Napoleon as a very embarrassing one.

The Post considers it certain that the Romagna will be attacked by the Papal troops, and that at the first menace of armed intervention in the Romagna or the Duchies by the Papal troops or their Austrian Allies, Garibaldi's troops will drive them not only from the Romagna and the Duchies, but march on Rome and eradicate every vestige of Papal rule.

It is reported at Paris that the Emperor Napoleon refused an audience to a deputation from Bologna representing the Provisional Government of the Romagna, while he granted an interview to a deputation from the Duchies.

Naval Armaments of France.

The English Journals continue to draw attention to the immense naval armaments of France, particularly those at Toulon, where twenty-two large vessels of war are being constructed.

Nothing has yet transpired in relation to the projected French naval and military expedition against China in conjunction with England.

Warlike Preparations in Italy.

Is reported that Marshal Vaillant has recommended to the Emperor Napoleon the propriety of occupying the Duchies with French troops to prevent the civil war which seems impending.

The people of Piedmont are very much excited about the condition of the Zurich treaty, which has given great dissatisfaction to all classes.

It is reported at Turin that several Neapolitan war ships having been seen off the coast of the Romagna in the Adriatic, the Sardinian government has ordered a squadron to proceed at once into the Adriatic.

A rumor has also been circulated which lacks confirmation, that a revolutionary movement had been commenced at Palermo, and that 150 of the revolutionists had been killed in putting a stop to it.

The Atlantic Telegraph.

Electricians have been engaged for some days in making experiments at Valentia, Ireland, the terminus of the Atlantic Telegraph. The results of these experiments is considered encouraging.

Liverpool Cotton Market.

LIVERPOOL, Oct. 22.—Of the 58,8000 bales sold during the week, 2500 were taken by speculators, and 8000 by exporters. The sales of Cotton on Friday were 8000 bales, of which speculators and exporters took 1500, the market closing steady at the following quotations of the broker's circular. Fair Orleans 7¾; Middling Orleans 7 3-16; Fair Mobile 7¾ Middling Mobile 7; Fair Uplands 7¼; Middling Uplands 6 11-16. The stock of cotton at Liverpool amounts to 519,000, of which 372,000 is of American production.

LIVERPOOL, Saturday Afternoon, Oct. 22.—The sale of Cotton to-day amount to 8000 bales of which 1400 were taken by speculators and exporters. The Cotton market closed steady at the quotations of Friday.

Havre Cotton Market.

HAVRE, Oct. 21.—The sales of Cotton during the week amount to 9500 bales. Orleans tres ordinaire is quoted at 115 francs; Orleans has 105 francs. The stock of cottou at Hevre amounts to 44,000 bales.

Maryland State Election.

BALTIMORE, Nov. 4.—The returns of the election in this city are still incomplete. So far as heard from, however, the Americans have 17,000 majority. The Democrats will probably have a majority in the House of Representatives. The Senate is still doubtful. The Congressional delegates from the State will be unchanged.

FURTHER BY THE NORTH AMERICA.

The Spanish War in Africa — Threatened Interference of England—The Pope's Return to Rome—Palermo in a State of Siege—French Prisoners Buried Alive in Fez—Terrible Shipwreck on the British Coast—Half a Million Treasure and four Hundred Lives lost—Advance in Cotton.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday afternoon, Oct. 26.—The estimated sales of cotton to-day were 15,000 of which speculators and exporters took 3000.

An advance of 1-16 to ⅛ is reported on the week (since last Wednesday?) The market closed firm with advancing tendency on all clean cotton.

The Liverpool Post of the 26th ult., publishes a report that the Australian steamship, Royal Charter was lost on the previous day near Bangor, on the coast of Wales. There were 400 passengers on board, which are reported lost, together with £500,000 in gold from Australia. The report lacks confirmation.

Count Colerado, the Austrian plenipotentiary at the late Zurich Conference, was still living at last accounts, but his recovery was considered hopeless.

The Cunard steamships for New York and Boston are hereafter to touch at Queenstown to deliver and receive the mails under a new contract with the Government, by which arrangement one day later news than heretofore shall be received by them.

Sir J. D. Paul and Stratten, the embezzling ex-London bankers, have been pardoned after four years' servitude.

The first battalion of military for China have received orders to depart via the overland route.

The London Builders' strike still continues, and the workmen are about to appeal to the public for the support of their families.

Parliament has been prorogued to December 15th.

The Paris correspondents of the London Journals indulge in gloomy forebodings respecting the relations between England and France.

The correspondent of the London Herald says that the impression gained ground, that a rupture between France and England was imminent.

Several of the provincial journals publish simultaneously, violent articles against the government, which, it is understood, were suppressed by the government officials.

These articles warned England that the hour of trial approaches, which may extinguish her greatness forever.

The Paris correspondent of the London Post asserts that negotiations are progressing for the completion of a joint expedition against China.

The Paris correspondent of the Herald on the contrary says that the preparations of France for such an expedition have been suspended.

It is positively stated that Lord Palmerston told Count Persigny, the French Ambassador, that England would not suffer Spain to occupy both sides of the Straits of Gibraltar, and if it was attempted, England would forcibly oppose it.

The Spanish Government has formally announced to the Cortes its determination of going to war with Morrocco.

Political parties and the newspapers in Spain generally agree in supporting the Ministry in the measures they have taken.

The Spanish Minister at Tangiers, Morocco, has been recalled, and the army of Africa is to be immediately organized.

Troops for the Africa campaign are being collected throughout Spain.

Advices from Turin state that a change will soon take place in the Sardinia Cabinet, and that Cubomadn is to be minister of foreign affairs.

The Pope returned to Rome on the 20th.

The report of serious disturbances at Palermo are confirmed. Palermo is in a state of siege.

At a conference between the Pope and the French Ambassador it is stated that an ordinance, granting administrative reforms in the Papal States, was agreed upon and will soon be published.

It is stated that the French soldiers who were taken prisoners in Africa on the 31st of August last, were buried alive by the Moors, and the French troops in Algeria are burning to revenge the terrible outrage.

Arrival of Overland Mail.

ST. LOUIS, Nov. 7.—The California overland mail has arrived here, bringing San Francisco dates to the 11th ult.

There were great preparations made in San Francisco to receive Lieut. Gen. Scott, who was daily, to arrive there from Panama.

Charpenning & Co., contractors for delivery of the Salt Lake mails, have suspended payment. The latest accounts from the mines are encouraging. The hostile Indians of Washington Territory are reported quiet.

The Frazer mines are in a prosperous condition.

The business of San Francisco is very dull. Provisions are dull. Candles are drooping.

The Indians still continue to commit depredations and murders on the plains.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 7.—It is believed in diplomatic circles that serious difficulties will yet arise from the San Juan dispute.

The President, at the opening of Congress, will ask for men and means to defend the rights of our country in that quarter.

NEW YORK, Nov. 7.—The steam sloop-of-war Brooklyn sailed to-day for Vera Cruz, with Mr. McLane, our Minister to Mexico, on board.

BOSTON, Nov. 7.—Advices have received at this port, from St. Helena, to the 19th of September, which state that two slavers had been captured off the coast of Africa, and condemned there. One of the vessels was the Stephen T. Townsend, of New Orleans—the name of the other was unknown.

A THRILLING INCIDENT.

Our necounts already published have contained but a brief synopsis of the deeply interesting testimony given on the trial of Brown, by Mr. Henry Hunter, in relation to the killing of one of the invaders named Thompson. Mr. Hunter was a relative and intimate friend of Mr. Beckham, who had been killed, and it was to revenge his death that the act was committed. The following is the testimony as we find it in the Herald:

Witness—There was a prisoner confined in the parlor of the hotel, and after Mr. Beckham's death he was shot, down by a number of us there belonging to this sharp-shooting band.

Mr. Andrew Hunter—Will you allow him to state, before proceeding further, how he was connected with Mr. Beckham?

Mr. Green—Certainly sir.

Witness—He was my grand uncle and my special friend—in fact I loved above all others; after he was killed Mr. Chambers and myself moved forward to the hotel for the purpose of taking the prisoner out and hanging him; we were joined by a number of other persons, who cheered us on in that work; we went up into his room, where he was bound with the undoubted and undisguised purpose of taking his life; at the door we were stopped by persons guarding the door, who remonstrated with us, and the excitement was so great that persons who remonstrated with us one moment, would cheer us on the next; we burst into the room where he was, and found several around him, but they offered but a feeble resistance; we brought our guns down to his head repeatedly—myself and another person—for the purpose of shooting him in the room; there was a young lady there, the sister of Mr. Ponke, the hotel keeper, who sat in this man's lap, covered his face with her arms, and shielded him with her person whenever a gun was brought to bear; she said to us "For God's sake wait and let the law take its course;" my associate shouted to kill him; "Let us shed his blood" were his words: all around were taunting "Mr. Beckham's life was worth ten thousand of these vile abolitionists;" I was cool about it, and deliberate; my gun was pushed up by some one who seized the barrel, and then I moved to the back part of the room, still with purpose unchanged, but with a view to divert attention from me, in order to get on opportunity; at some moment when the crowd should be less dense, to shoot him; after a moment's thought it occured to me that that was not the proper place to kill him; we then proposed to take him out and hang him; some person of our band then opened a way for him, and first pushing Miss Ponke aside, we slung him out of doors; I gave him a push, and many others did the same; we shoved him along the platform and down to the trestle work of the bridge, he begging for his life all the time, very piteously at first; by-the-by, before we took him out of the room I asked the question what he came here for? he said their only purpose was to free the slaves—that he came here to free the slaves or die: then he begged, "Don't take my life—a prisoner;" but I put the gun to him, and he said, "You may kill me, but it will be revenged; there are eighty thousand persons sworn to carry this work;" that was his last expression. We bore him out on the bridge with the purpose then of hanging him; we had no rope, and none could be found: it was a moment of wild excitement; two of us raised our guns—which one was first I do not know—and pulled the trigger; before he had reached the ground I suppose some five or six shots had been fired into his body; he fell on the railroad track; his back down to the earth, and his face up; we then went back for the purpose of getting another one (Stephens) but he was sick or wounded and persons around him, and I persuaded them myself to let him alone; I said "Don't let us operate on him, but go around and get some more;" we did this act with a purpose, thinking it right and justifiable under the circumstances, and fired and excited by the cowardly, savage manner in which Mr. Beckham's life had been taken.

MOB IN NEWPORT, KENTUCKY.

THE TYPE OF THE "FREE SOUTH" FIED, AND THE PRESS THROWN IN THE RIVER.

In the Cincinnati Commercial of the 29th, we find the following particulars of the affair.

Last evening about half past seven o'clock, a mob of some thirty men entered the printing office of Wm. S. Bailey, Newport, Kentucky, and piled a considerable quantity of type, broke one of the presses, and carried off the "forms," on which the outside of the paper was being printed. There were no persons in the office at the time of this visitation, except Mr. Bailey and his family. His four daughters, who set type, and Mrs. Bailey were present, and begged without avail that their property might be spared. The press would probably have been entirely destroyed, but those who undertook the job found it a dirty work, the ink soiling their hands and clothes. Mr. Bally was warned that he must leave town, and quit attempting to publish a paper there, or that he would be roughly used and all his property demolished. When the mob first appeared, they informed Mr. Bailey that they proposed to abolish his incendiary sheet. They considered the community unsafe where such a paper was tolerated, and so forth. Mr. Bulley's paper does not rank very high among the journals of the day, but he and his family have long spent upon it their daily labor, and earned with it their daily bread. The paper has been, we believe a family production, Mr. Bally writing the articles, his daughters setting the type, and his sons making up the forms and working the press.

MARRIAGES.

"It is not good for man to be alone."

In Morehouse Parish, La., by the Rev. J. L. Wright, on the 18th October, MR. A. H. SCHERR, of Ouachita Parish, to MISS BETTIE A. MILLER, of Morehouse Parish, La.

On the 29th Oct., 1859, by Rev. Wm. M. Shockley, REV. P. H. CONNERLY, of the Alabama Conference to MISS FANNIE W. ANDREWS of Milton Fla.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, November 7, 1859.

We condense the following statement from the New Orleans Price Current of the 5th instant:—

The past week has witnessed rather more movement in some departments of our market than we have had occasion to notice for some time past. Cotton has been taken quite freely, and generally at well maintained prices, and the transactions in Sugar and Molasses have about kept pace with the increased receipts, though at irregular and generally lower prices. The operations in Western Produce are still mostly confined to the limited parcels required for home consumption.

COTTON.—With respect to prices, we have to remark that considerable irregularity has been observable, but on the whole no marked and quotable change appears to here taken place. Factors generally seem disposed to meet the market freely at the current figures, and malatain themselves quite firmly for clean Middlings, etc., free from dust, while the lower grades, being comperatively neglected and abundant, may be bought on easy terms.

The receipts at this port since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas,) are 472,716 bales, against 373,930 bales to same date last year, and the increase in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 15,382 bales.

New Orleans Classification.

Inferior	—@—	Good Middling	11¼@11⅝

Just Published,
THE WESLEYAN HYMN AND TUNE BOOK:
COMPRISING THE
ENTIRE COLLECTION OF HYMNS
IN THE HYMN BOOK OF THE Methodist Episcopal Church, South,
WITH APPROPRIATE MUSIC TO EACH HYMN,
BY
L. C. EVERETT.

Published by J. B. McFerrin, Nashville, Tenn.

Price, in Embossed Leather, $1 50.

Discount to the Trade, 20 per cent.

This book is a handsome royal octavo of 368 pp., printed in excellent style on a very durable paper, and tastefully as well as substantially bound. The design had in view, in presenting it to the Church South, is the supply of a means of promoting congregational singing, by furnishing, in immediate connection with the hymns contained in our Hymn-Book, tunes adapted to be sung to them. The number of tunes is 291, and among them are to be found all the old standard melodies, besides many new aspirants to the favor of the Church.

The following explanation of the peculiar features of this work is deemed advisable:

1. The words and the music are brought into immediate connection and relation; thus rendering the use of the hymns and tunes easy, and avoiding the obvious objection to the ordinary music books.

2. With an occasional exception, the turning of every leaf presents to the eye two tunes so similar in character as to be equally well adapted to any hymn found on either page.

3. On the left hand is an old standard tune; on the right a new tune.

4. Occasionally there is but one tune—generally an old one—which is always on the left-hand page: the right-hand page being filled with hymns adapted to be sung to it.

5. The type is of good size, clear, and easily readable, even by artificial light.

6. The adaptation of the tunes to the various sentiments contained in the hymns has been steadily aimed at—it is hoped with success.

The work is now ready for delivery. Copies will be sent to any address, by mail, prepaid on receipt of the price—$1 50. Address all orders to J. B. McFERRIN, Agent.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.

TWO YEARS SINCE, THE UNDERSIGNED OPENED HIS OFFICE at No. 33 Camp street, for the sale of these Machines, which, at that time, were but little known in this city, and the result is truly astonishing both as to the number sold and the unexampled success of the Machines, in nearly every instance. For over $175,000 worth of these Machines sold by the undersigned, not one letter of complaint was received during the past summer, and the repairs on these do not amount to ten dollars, although some of them have been used five years. Their sale at this time in this city is five times greater than it has been heretofore at this season of the year.

Probably more than $100,000 have already been paid in this city for Sewing Machines that were either entirely worthless, or which have cost five times the trouble and expense to keep them running that they were worth. The universal success of Singer's Machines has brought conviction to the minds of the public that it is far better to buy a good article at a fair price than to listen to the thousand and one tales of men who deal in Sewing Machines that are MADE TO SELL AND NOT TO USE, and who, as soon as one humbug is proved up, bring on another.

It is universally known that Singer's Sewing Machines make the most improved stitch that human ingenuity has ever invented, and there is no longer room for peril, as nine tenths of the clothing and shoes sold in this city are made on these machines.

Our competitors in the Sewing Machine trade generally acknowledge that Singer's Machines are superior for manufacturing purposes, but say they are not adapted to fine sewing. This, however, is a mere pretense, and the undersigned challenges the world to produce a Sewing Machine equal to Singer's 18 inch Manufacturing Machine for fine sewing, or to produce samples of work equal to those done at 33 Camp street on that Machine, which also sews leather with equal facility with any kind of thread or silk.

Singer's Manufacturing Machines, when adjusted by the undersigned, with recent great improvements, will sew with a fine needle at full speed through from twenty to thirty thicknesses of Lowell Cotton, with thread No 150 or 200, without breaking it, making a beautiful stitch, the same on both sides of the fabric.

Many persons who have known and even used Singer's Machines for years in New York, are astonished to find that the Manufacturing Machines here are superior for fine work, but when shown the room at 33 Camp street, where every machine is particularly adjusted for fine sewing, the mystery is solved.

All persons who have any doubts of the capacity of Singer's Machines for fine work, can have them removed by sending materials for a garment of any kind to 33 Camp street to be made.

Any person who will carefully compare the sewing done at 33 Camp street, with that sold by S. N. Moody, at 106 Canal street, will be at a loss to account for his certificate.

The public will please bear it in mind that Singer's Machines are sold upon a trial if desired, with any and all other machines, and of the trials that have been made in this city, in nineteen cases out of twenty they have been kept and the others returned.

The largest and most fashionable Dress Making establishments in this city use Singer's Machines, and several have bought them the past week, some of whom formerly used Wheeler & Wilson's Machines.

To the judgment of many eminent men, and in the widely-expressed opinions of the press, it is unsurpassed, if not unequaled, by any other monthly periodical as a treasure-house of choice reading containing in

NOVEMBER 9, 1859.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

THE OUTBREAK AT HARPER'S FERRY.

We give below the proceedings of the 26th, as we find them in the New York papers, and of the 27th, as they are contained in the Cincinnati papers of the 28th:

CIRCUIT COURT—Judge Parker—Charlestown, Oct. 26th.—The court met at 10 a. m. The grand jury retired to resume the examination of witnesses, and the court took a recess while awaiting the return of the grand jury.

E. Johnson, United States Marshal of Cleaveland, Ohio, arrived this morning and visited the prisoners. He identified Copeland as a fugitive from justice in Ohio. His object is supposed to be to ferret out testimony implicating other parties.

The excitement continued unabated. Crowds of persons from the surrounding country are present. The event is regarded as proving the faithfulness of slaves. No fears are entertained of them, but a military guard is kept up, fearing an attempt might be made to rescue the prisoners.

Great consternation among the slaves is caused by the fear of being seized like those of Col. Washington were, and they firmly believe that the object of the prisoners was to carry them South and sell them. Not a single slave has yet been implicated or even sympathising with the insurrectionists. Those carried off have all been captured and returned to their masters. Cannons are stationed at the court-house, and an armed guard is patrolling around the jail.

Capt. Brown has consented to accept Messrs. Faulkner and Botts as his counsel, they assuring him that they will defend him faithfully and give him the advantage of every privilege the law will allow.

Stevens declared he does not desire to be defended by Northern counsel, preferring Southern, and that the court should name them. There is a decided sympathy for Stevens, not on account of his sufferings, but that he has shown none of that vindictiveness and hardihood that characterizes Brown. His regret is regarded as caused by the consequences of his folly, and the examination yesterday indicated that other prisoners had lost their confidence in Brown, and are not disposed to follow him in his defiant course.

At twelve o'clock the court reassembled, and the jury reported a true bill against the prisoners and were discharged. Chas. B. Harding, Esq., assisted by Andrew Hunter, represented the Commonwealth. Charles J. Faulkner and Lawrence Botts are counsel for the prisoners. The true bill was read against each prisoner, for conspiracy with negroes, to produce insurrection, and for treason against the Commonwealth, and third, for murder. The prisoners were brought into court accompanied by a body of armed men. They passed through the street and entered the court-house without the slightest demonstration on the part of the people.

Brown looked somewhat better, his eye not so much swollen. Stevens had to be supported, and reclined on a mattrass on the floor of the court-room, evidently unable to sit up. He has the appearance of an almost dying man, breathing with difficulty, and panting for breath.

Before the reading of the arraignment, Mr. Hunter called the attention of the court to the necessity of appointing additional counsel for the prisoners; stating that one of the counsel (Faulkner) appointed by the county court, considering his duty in that capacity as having ended, had left here. The prisoners, therefore, had no other counsel than Botts. If the court was about to assign them other counsel, it might be proper to do so now.

The court stated that it would assign them members of the bar, and they might select.

After consulting Capt. Brown, Mr. Botts said that the prisoners retained him, and desired to have Mr. Green assist him. If the court would accede to that arrangement, it would be very agreeable to him personally.

The court requested Mr. Green to act as counsel for the prisoners, and he consented to do so.

Brown arose and said: I do not intend to detain the court, but merely wish to say, as I have been promised a fair trial, I am not now in circumstances to enable me to attend a trial, owing to the state of my health. I have a severe injury in the back, or rather in one kidney, which enfeebles me very much; but I am doing well and only ask for a short delay of my trial, and think I may get able to listen to it, and merely ask this, as the saying is, that the devil may have his dues, no more. I wish to say, further, that my hearing is impaired and rendered indistinct in consequence of wounds I have about my head. I can not hear distinctly at all. I could not hear what the court has said this morning; I would be glad to hear what is said on my trial, and I am now doing better than I could expect, so that moving under the circumstances a very short time would be all I would ask, if that could be allowed me, I should be very much obliged. I do not presume that more than a very short delay is needed, so that I may in some degree, recover and be able at least to listen to my trial and hear what questions are asked the citizens, and what their answers are.

Hunter said the request was rather premature. The arraignment could be made, and the question could be then considered. The court ordered the indictment to be read, so that the prisoner could plead guilty or not guilty, and then it would consider Brown's request. The prisoners were compelled to stand during the arraignment. Brown stood up with difficulty, and Stevens was held upright by two bailiffs.

The reading of the indictment occupied about twenty minutes. The prisoners each responded to the usual questions, "not guilty," and desired to be tried separately.

Faulkner—The State elects to try John Brown.

The Court—His condition must be inquired into.

Botts—I am instructed to say by Brown, that he is mentally and physically unable to proceed with his trial at this time. He also heard to day that counsel of his own choice will be here, whom he will of course prefer. He asks only for a delay of two or three days.

Mr. Hunter said he did not think it the duty of the prosecutor for the Commonwealth, or any one occupying that position, to oppose anything that justice required, or to object to anything that involved a simple consideration of humanity, where it would be properly allowed. Yet, in regard to this proposition to delay the trial of John Brown for one, two, or three days, they deemed it their duty that the court, before determining the matter, should be put in possession of the facts and circumstances judicially, that they were aware of in the line of their duties as prosecutors. His opinion was, that it was not proper to delay the trial of this prisoner for a single day, and that there was no necessity for it.

He alluded in general terms to the condition of things with which they were now surrounded, they being such as rendered it dangerous, to say nothing of the exceeding pressure upon the physical resources of our community, growing out of the circumstances connected with the affairs for which the prisoners are to be tried, and that our law is making special provisions for allowing a briefer time than usual in cases of conviction, for such offenders, within the discretion of the court between condemnation and execution, evidently indicates indirectly the necessity for acting promptly and decisively, though always justly in proceedings of this kind.

In reference to the physical condition of Brown, he asked the court not to receive unimportant statements of the prisoners as sufficient grounds of delay, but that the jailor and physicians be examined. As to expecting counsel from abroad he said no impediment had been thrown in the way of the prisoners procuring such counsel as they desired, but on the contrary, every facility afforded, and he apprehended there was little reason to expect the attendance of those gentlemen from the North who had been written to.

There was also a public duty upon them to avoid, as far as possible within the forms of law with reference to the great and never-to-be-lost sight of duty—i. e., giving a fair and impartial trial to the prisoners—the introduction of anything likely to weaken our position, and to give strength to our enemies abroad, whether it issued from the jury or any other source. It was their position that had been imperilled and jeopardized, as they suppose, by enemies.

Mr. Harding concurred in the objections of Mr. Hunter, on the ground of danger in delay, and also because Brown was the leader of the insurrection, and his trial ought to be proceeded with on account of the advantages thereby occurring on the trial of the others.

Mr. Green remarked that he had enjoyed no opportunity for consulting with the prisoners, or for preparing a defense. The letters for Northern counsel had been sent off, but sufficient time had not elasped to receive answer. Under the circumstances he thought a short delay desirable.

Mr. Botts thought that the excitement was so great as to deter Northern counsel from coming, but now that it had been promised that the prisoners were to have a fair and impartial trial, he presumed they would come and take part in the case. The court stated that if physical inability was shown, a reasonable delay must be granted. As to the expectation of other counsel, that did not constitute a sufficient cause for delay, as there was no certainty about their coming. Under the circumstances in which the prisoners were situated, it was natural that they should seek delay, but the brief period remaining before the close of the term of the court rendered it necessary to proceed as expeditiously as was practicable, and to be cautious about granting delays. He would request the physicians who had attended Brown to testify as to his condition.

CHARLESTOWN, 4 P. M., Oct. 26.—Brown has made no confession; but, on the contrary, says he has full confidence in the goodness of God, and that he is confident he will rescue him from the perils that surround him. He says that he has had rifles leveled at him, knives at his throat, and his life in as great a peril as it is now; but that God has always been at his side. He knows that God is with him, and fears nothing.

Alexander R. Boteler, member of Congress elect from this District, has collected five thousand letters from the citizens residing in the neighborhood of Brown's house, who searched it before the arrival of the marines.

Letters are also in possession of Andrew Hunter, Esq., who has also a number of letters obtained from the house by the marines and other parties. Among them is a roll of conspirators, consisting of forty-seven signatures; also a receipt from Horace Greely, for letters, etc., received from Brown, and an accurately traced map of the road from Chambersburg to Brown's house; also a copy of a letter from Brown, stating that the arival of too many men at once would excite suspicion and that they should arrive singly: also a letter signed Merlam, stating that if $20,000 was wanted, J. S. was good for one-fifth. Brown tells them to let women write letters, not men. Also a letter from J. E. Cook, stating that the Maryland election was about to come off, that the people will become excited, and we will get some candidates to join our side.

CHARLESTOWN, Va., Oct. 27.—The storm of last evening prevented the transmission of the latter part of the proceedings of the court. The court finally refused to postpone the trial and the whole afternoon was occupied in obtaining a jury. Brown occupied a cot, to which he was carried into the court-room. The trial will be resumed this morning, when counsel for Brown is expected from Ohio.

Brown was brought into court this morning, being able to walk, but he immediately laid himself down on his cot at full length within the bar. He looks considerably better, the swelling having left his eyes. Senator Mason is among the spectators. Messrs. Harding and hunter represent the Commonwealth, and Botts and Green the prisoner.

Mr. Botts read the following telegraphic dispatch, received this morning.

AKRON, Ohio, Oct. 26, 1859.

C. J. Faulkner and Lawson Botts, Charlestown Virginia—John Brown, leader of the insurrection at Harper's Ferry, and several of his family, have resided in this county for many years. Insanity is hereditary in that family. His mother's sister died with it, and a daughter of that sister has been two years in the lunatic asylum. A son and daughter of his mother's brother have also been confined in the lunatic asylum, and another son of that brother is insane, and under close restraint. These facts can be conclusively proven by witnesses residing here, who will doubtless attend the trial if desired. (Signed,)

A. H. LEWIS.

The telegraphic operator at the Akron office, Wm. C. Allen, adds to the above dispatch, that A. H. Lewis is a resident of that place, and his statements are entitled to implicit credit.

Mr Botts said that on receiving the above dispatch, he went to the jail with his associate, Mr. Green, and read it to Brown; and he was desired by the latter to say, that in his father's family there has never been any insanity at all. On his mother's side there have been repeated instances of it.

He adds, his first wife showed symptoms of it, which was also evident in his first and second sons by that wife. Some portions of the statements in the dispatch he knows to be correct; of other portions he is ignorant. He does not know whether his mother's sister died in the lunatic asylum, but he does believe that a daughter of that sister has been two years in an asylum, and thinks a son and daughter of his mother's brother have been confined in the asyinm, but he was not aware of the fact that another son of that brother is now insane and in close confinemaet.

Brown also desires his council to say that he does not put in any plea of insanity, and if he has ever been at all insane, he is totally unconscious of it. Yet, he adds, that those who are most insane, generally suppose that they have more reason and sanity than those around them. For himself, he disdains to put in that plea, and seeks no immunity of that kind. This movement is made totally without his approbation or concurrence, and was uoknown to him until the receipt of the above dispatch. Brown here raised himself in his bed and said, "I will add, if the Court will allow me, that I look upon it as a miserable artifice and pretext of those who ought to take a different course in regard to me, if they take any at all, and I view it with contempt more than otherwise. As I remarked to Mr. Green, insane persons, so far as my experience goes, have but very little ability to judge of their own sanity, and if I am insane, of course I should think I know more than all the rest of the world; but I do not think so. I am perfectly uconscious of insanity, and I reject, so far as I am capable, any attempt to interfere in my behalf on that score."

Mr. Botts stated that he was further instructed by Brown, that as he rejects this plea entirely and seeks no delay for that reason, would repeat to the Court his request made yesterday, that time be given for the arrival of foreign counsel, which he has now reason to expect. Yesterday afternoon, a dispatch was received from Cleveland, Ohio, signed by Danl. Tildee, dated 26th inst., asking of Brown whether it would be of any use for counsel to leave last night. To this dispatch an answer was returned that the jury would be sworn this morning, and Brown desired the counsel to come at once. The telegraph operator stated that this dispatch be sent off at once, in advance of the dispatches sent by the reporters, and he had learned this morning that it was sent before the storm, that last night interrupted communication, so that the counsel ought to reach here by twelve or one o'clock to-night.

The course taken by Brown this morning, makes it evident that he sought no postponement for the purpose of delay, as he rejects the plea of insanity. Still le his opinion he can have a fairer trial if the defense were coedected by his own counsel, than if he were defended by counsel at present here.

Mr. Hunter observed that the prisoner's counsel having renewed the motion of yesterday for delay for a specific period indicated, and based upon informatioe received in the form of a telegraph dispatch, the questioe eow was whether there was sufficient grounds in this additional information to change the decision announced by the Court yesterday, on the same motion. If the Court did not at once deem the circumstances wholly insufficient before the decision was made, the counsel for the Commonwealth deemed it their duty to call attection to two or three matters connected with the affair. Though desirous to avoid forestalling the trial of this case, in regard to the prisoeer at the bar, they were prepared to prove that he had made open, repeated and constant ackeowledgement of everything charged against him. He had gloried in it, and we have but an exhibitioe of the same spirit and the same purpose in what he announced, that he would permit no defense of insanity to be put in.

The point was fully discussed by the coensel on both sides. The Court said that he must see it in this case as in aey other, that proper cause for delay was made out, before grantieg such an application. In the present case, he could not see that this telegram gava any assorances that the additiönel counsel intended to come. The prisoeer is now defended by counsel who will take care that no impreper evidence is adduced against him, and that all proper evidence in his behalf, shall be presented. He could not see that the proper cause for delay was made out. The expected counsel might arrive before the case was closed and could then see all the testimony taken; thus the prisoner might have the benefit of their advice, although the case now proceeds. As to the matter of insanity, it was not presented in reliable form instead of mere statements; we should have affidavits or something of that character. He thought, therefore, that the jury should be sworn, and the trial proceeded. The jury having been sworn, the Court directed that the prisoner might forego the form of standing while arraigned, if he desired. Botts put the inquiry to the prisoner, and he continued to be prostrate in his cot while a long indictment, filling seven pages, was read, first for insurrectiou, second for treason, and third for murder.

Harding addressed the jury, and presented the facts of the case, detailing the scenes of the Armory; killing the bridge-keeper, and subsequent killing of citizens named in the indictment; seizing Lewis Washington and Alstadt, with their slave; forming a new government withie the limits of the Commonwealth; holding citizens as prisoeers of war, and subsequent capture. He then read the law on treason; levying war against the State; giving comfort to its eoemies, or establishing any other governmeut within its limits, the punishment of which was death; also against advising with a slave to produce insurrection, penishable with death; the murder of citizens, a capital offense. Either of the charges of the indictmeet, if proved, being punished with death. All these chargen would be distinctly proveo beyond the possibility of a douht. He would show that the prisoner's whole object was to rob our citizens of their slaves and carry them off by violeece, and, he was happy to say, against their wills, all of them having escaped aed rushed back to their masters the first opportunity. He concinded hy urging the jury to cast aside all prejudices, and to give the prisoners a fair and impartial trial, and not to allow their hatred of abolitionists to influence them against those who have raised the black flag on the soil of this Commonwealth.

Mr. Green, on the part of the prisoners, gave the law applicable to the case, reminded the jury that they are judges of law and fact, and that if they have any douhi as to the law or fact of the guilt of this prisoner, they are to give the prisoner the benefit of such a doubt. In regard to the first of the charges, treason, or a specific act of treason, it must be provided that he attempted to establish a seperate and distinct government; and it must also be proven what was proposed on treasonable acts, before you can convict him on these charges. If it is intended to rely on his confessions to prove treason the law distinctly says, no conviction can be made on confessions unless made in open Court. There must be sufficient evidence to prove the charge, independent of any confessions out of Court, and it requires two distinct witnesses to prova each and any act of treason.

Second—Conspiring with slaves to rebel and make insurrection.—The jury must be satisfied that such conspiring and such conspiracy was done within the State of Virginia and within the jurisdiction of this court.

If done in Maryland, this court could not punish the act, and if done within the limits of the Armory at Harper's Ferry, it was not. Attorney General Cushing had decided this point, with regard to the Armory grounds at Harper's Ferry, which opinion was read to the jury, showing that persons residing within the limits of the Armory can not even be taxed by Virginia, and that the crimes committed within the said limits are punishable by the Federal courts. Although the jury may have a doubt about the law on this subject, they must give the prisoner the benefit of that doubt. And upon the last count, that of murder, the crime having been committed within the limits of the Armory, this court has no jurisdiction. And as in the case of Beckham, it was committed on the railroad bridge, and therefore within the State of Maryland, which State claims jurisdiction up to the Armory grounds. And though he may be guilty of murder, it must be proven that it was wilful, deliberate and premeditated murder to make it a capital offense. If otherwise, the killing was murder in the second degree, punishable by imprisonment. If there is shy doubt on these points, you must give that doubt to the prisoners. He was satisfied that the jury will not allow any outside excitement to affect them; that they will do their duty faithfully and impartially.

Mr. Botts impressively addressed the jury, saying the case before them was an unusual one, and in many respects such as has before been unkeown. It was a jury-triel, calling for calm, unimpassioned deliberation, and not seizing upon those statements to indoce a conviction.

The jury must be morally above all prejudicee and influences, and deliberate calmly, free of all resentment, bearing in mind that the mission of the law is not to wreak vengeance, and that the majesty of the law is best maintained when judges, counsel and jury rise above those influences. The burthen of proof is on the Commonwealth, and if she fails to substantiate her charges you are bound to do your duty impartially and find your verdict on the law and testimeny that Commonwealth may be able to presect to you. He then proceeded to go over the same grounds taken by Mr. Green on each of the three points of indictment, treason, insurrection and murder. He said it is no difference how much the jury may be convinced in their own minds of the guilt of the prisoner.

It is essential that they must have proof of positivo guilt. Mr. Botts, in reviewing the law bearing on the case, evinced a determination to avail himself of every advantage that the law allows, and do his duty to the prisoner earnestly and faithfully.

It is due to the prisoner to stete that he believed himself to be actuated by the highest and noblest feelings that ever coursed through a human breast. His iestructions were, to destroy neither property eor life. They would prova by those gentlemen who were prisoners that they were treated with respect, and that they were kept in positinns of safety, and that no violence was offered to them. These facts must be taken into consideration, and have their due weight with the jury.

During the eession of the court, on Wednesday afternoon, prisoner Brown lay with his eyes closed. Though evidently not much injured, he is determined to resist the pushing of his trial by all meaee in his power. The jury was then called and sworn. The court excluded those who were present at Harper's Ferry, and also those who had formed or expressed eny opinion that would prevent the elting of the case impertially; twenty-four, mostly farmers from a distance, owning a few slaves, were selected as competent jurors. Out of these the counsel for the prisoner struck eight. Twelve were selected by ballot from the remaining sixteee, as follows: Richard Timberlake, Joseph Myers, Thomas Watson, Jr., Isaac Derk, John C. McClure, Wm Rightson, Jacob J. Miller, Thomas Osborne, George W. Boyer, John C. Wilkshire, George W. Tapp, and Wm. A. Martin.

The jury were not sworn on the case, but the Judge charged them not to converse upon the aubject nor to permit others to eoverse with them. John Copeland, the mulatto prisoner from Oberlin, Ohio, has made full confession to the United States Marshals, Mr. Martin, of Virginia, and Mr. Johnson, of the Northern District of Ohio. He has given the name of parties at Oberlie who induced him to go to Harpers's Ferry, who furnished the money for his expeeses, etc. He also states a movement of a similar character was contemplated in Kentucky about the same time. Many persons in Northern Ohio, whose names have heretofore been mantioned, are directly implicated. His confession is withheld from the public until the trial is over, by order of Gov. Wise.

Mr. Johnson was shown, to-day, a large number of letters implicating Gerrit Smith and a number of prominent men of Oberlin, Cleveland, and other points of Ohio. Among the letters is one signed Hora ce Greely & Co., that had inclosed forty-one dollars, seven letters from Kansas and two from Ohio. It was directed to J. H. Kagi, one of the killed, but as he had been a correspondent of the Tribune, this letter had evidently inclosed his pay. Another letter from Capt. Brown to one of his sons, dated April 16, 1856, details a visit to Garrit Smith, Peterboro', which the writer regarded as highly encouraging, and says that Smith gave him one hundred dollars, and that he also received at his house a note that he considered good for two hundred dollars more; also that Smith had written to his friends at the East thet two thousand dollars must be raised for Brown, of which he would agree to furnish one-fifth himself. There is also a notice of a draft from the cashier of the New York State Bank, sent him by direction of Gerrit Smith, dated Albeny, August 29th, 1859. Marshal Johnson also has a list of the officers of the "Provisional Govornment," and a list of contributers to the project. He left for Cleveland last evening, taking copies with him. The examination made by him settles the fact that thie movemeet had long been maturing—that many men, prominent statesmen, have given money and influence in its behalf, and when the facts are made public a sensation may be expected.

Mr. Hunter followed, stating his purpose to evoid anything by way of argument or explanation not immediately connected with the particular issue to be tried, and to march straight forword to the attainment, so fer as may be in our power, to the end of justice, by either convicting or acquitting the prisoner at the bar. With a single preliminary remark, explanatory of his position here as an assistant prosecutor, which had been assigned to him by the Governor of the Commonweelth as well as by his Honor the Judge, he passed at once to a review of what was the law in reference to the case, and what he expected to be able to prove to the satisfaction of the jury.

First, as to high treason, or treason against the State, this was probably the first case of high treason, or treason against the State that had ever been tried here by our State courts. He fervently hoped that it would be the last that would ever occur. Probably, in some degree, not only upon our decision, but upon our prompt decision of this case, will that result depend. He thought his friends on the other side were totally mistaken in their views, that the law as it now stands on the statute book, and refereece to overt acts was either in the language, or substaetially that contained in the Constitution of the United States; on the contrary the phraseology hed been varied from the Constitution, and as he conceived, for a plain and pelpable purpose: all the powers vested in the Federal Government, were given with great jealousy; this was an historical fact perfectly familiar, and consequently while treason against the United States consists only in levying war against them or adhering to their enemies or giving them aid, and there is a provision that no person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses or some overt act or confession in open court; yet, the State law is more full, and includes within its definition of treason also the establishing without the authority of the Legislature within its limits, separate from the existing government, or holding or executing under such usurped government any officer professing allegiance or fidelity to it, or restricting the execution of the law under color of its authority; and goes on to decime that such treason, if proved by the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or by confession in court shall be punished with death. Any one of these acts constitutes treason against this commonwealth, and he believed the prisoner hed been guilty of each and all these acts, which would be proved in the clearest manner, not by two, but by a dozee witnesses, unless limited by the act of time. The prisoner had attempted to break down the existing government of the commonwealth, and establish on the ruins a new Government; he had usurped the office of commander-in-chief of this new government, and, together with his whole band, proposed allegiance and fidelity to it. He represented not only the civil authorities of the government, but our own militiary; he is doubly, trebly and quadrupedly guilty of treason. Mr. Hunter proceeded again, to the question of jurisdiction over the armory grounds, and examined the authority cited on the other side, of Attorney-General Cushing. The latter was an able man, but came from a region of the country where opinions are very different from ours, in relation to the powers of the Federal Government. As affecting State rights, our courts have decided adversely to Mr. Cushing's views, for all time past. The jurisdiction of his court of Jefferson county, in regard to criminal offences committed at Harper's Ferry, has been uoioterrupted and unchallenged, and whether they were committed on the government property or not. He cited an instance which occurred twenty-nine years ago, where an atrocious murder was committed between the very shops in front of which these men fought their battle, and the criminal was tried here, convicted and executed under our laws. There was a broad distinction between cessation of jurisdiction by Virginia to the Federal Government and the mere assent of the States the Federal Government should become a land apoller within its limits. The law of Virginia, by virtue of which the grounds of Harper's Ferry were purchased by the Federal Government, ceded no jurisdiction. Brown was also guilty on his own notorious confession of advising the conspiracy. In regard to the charge of murder, the proof will be, that this man was not actually engaged in murdering our citizens, but that he was the chief director of the whole movement. No matter whether he was present on the spot or a mile off, he is equally guilty.

In conclusion, Mr. Hunter said he hoped the case would be considered with fairness and impartiality, without fear, favor or affection, and he only asked that the penalty might be visited on the prisoners which our safety required and which the laws of man and God approve.

The court then took a recess.

HUNTSVILLE FEMALE COLLEGE, HUNTSVILLE, North Alabama.
PROPRIETOR—
REV. A. R. ERWIN, D. D., Principal
This Establishment offers the following inducements to Southern patronage.
1. Huntsville is the nearest mountain location to the South and Southwest; and is proverbially healthful. The social elegance and beautiful scenery to be found here, are great auxiliaries in the formation of character.
2. The edifice is large and elegant—supplied with gas-light; and water in the greatest abundance by pipes, from a mommuth Spring in the town. It is 164 by 52 feet, three stories high, and well furnished.
3. The domestic arrangements are such as to secure not only comfort, but the social and domestic training of the pupils. Frugality, politeoes and grace, as well as the virtues of the heart, are habitually cultivated.
4. The facilities of instruction are unsurpassed. There are fifteen teachers and attaches, some of whom are distinguished educators. The large patronage, from among the best families of NINE of the Southern states, attest the good-will of the Institution.
5. Arrangements are made to accommodate Southern pupils during the Summer Vacation, and to furnish them with such instructions in the extra branches as may be desired. Pupils received at any time.

GREENSBORO' HIGH SCHOOL—REV. J. W. N. Mears, A.M. M.D.
The exercises of the third session of this school will commence on the first day of September next.
The session comprises nine months—including the usual holidays—and is divided into three terms of three months each.
French will be taught for a small extra fee.
The Principal will take a very few boys under his immediate supervision in rooms adjoining his own. The amusement and labors of such boys out of school will be under the direction of the Principal.
Those parents who have sons to board out, will, it is thought, at once recognize the advantage of such an arrangement.
The play-grounds are ample and pleasant, and the house commodious and furnished most neatly and comfortably.
Young men can prepare to enter the Junior class in any of our Colleges.
Miss E. B Mears takes a limited number of young ladies on whose education she bestows particular care. All the branches essential to a polished education are taught.
The attention of parents is especially invited to this Department.

DEAR VEASY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untimely sorrow in many a happy household.
On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 15 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sovereign remedy against this terrible enemy of children, I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly, by the acquiescence of my family Physician. On the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, save in quantity, being afraid to give the amount of prescription. I was unable to detect any impression occasioned by it until late in the afternoon of that day; and should not then, but for the discharge of some thirteen worms, varying in length from two and a half to six inches. This I thought a remarkable number for a nursing infant. But, to my great amazement, about one o'clock on Sunday night I was aroused from my slumber to witness the incredible number of one hundred and thirty-six from one evacuation.
Before breakfast of the same morning, (Sunday) but one small dose was administered, which was followed by the discharge of fifty during the day. The next day, (Monday) none was administered; but still occasional discharges occurred during the day, varying in size and quantity as described.
On Tuesday morning following, one more small dose was administered, making in all five doses of a quarter of a teaspoonful instead of a half as prescribed by the label of directions. In all, the little creature has discharged to this date, the rise of three hundred worms, a majority of which will average five or six inches in length; and is running about as usual, with returning evidences of good health and spirits.
Having met with such astonishing effects in the case of my infant, I was induced to use the Vermifuge on six other children under my protection, var

A NOBLE AND SUGGESTIVE DEED.

BY C. K. MARSHALL, D.D.

"Sixty years ago, Theodore Atkinson, a benevolent citizen of Portsmouth, N.H., left a legacy in money to one of the churches, to be placed at interest, and the interest to be laid out in bread, to be distributed every Sunday morning to the poor of the parish; which has been faithfully done, and every Sabbath witnesses the bestowment of the token of the kindness and generosity of the poor man's friend."

So much for one kind and noble deed! Bread—fresh, warm, pure, nourishing; bread for the needy, hungry poor, once a week for sixty years, from an oven heated by a dead man; of flour furnished by a dweller in the old church-yard—now a tenant, there of full sixty winters; and still, as often as the gates of the holy day turn on their hinges, that invisible hand holds out to each comer a new loaf, and the hungry poor turn joyfully homeward with the treasure. How touching must be the benediction! How refreshing the memories that brood over the morning repast! How like a sacrament of gratitude! And so it has been for more than three thousand Sabbath mornings; and will, doubtless, continue till centuries shall have passed away, poverty and want be unknown, or Portsmouth be erased from the habitations of men.

How beautiful is the sight of a bread-fruit tree yielding its ripe, life-preserving fruit every seventh day! nor shall age, decay, or change, blight it, while a perennial vitality is imparted thereto by the hand that planted it three score summers gone. Thrice a thousand Sundays ago, and more, it brought forth, with the music of the Sabbath-bells of Portsmouth parish, its virgin harvest. Then the poor man dropped a tear in grateful memory of the thoughtful friend of the poor. The widow's heart leaped for joy when the first white loaf was brought home early in the morning; and as she broke it in pieces, with the invocation of heaven's blessing, and fed her children, she also blessed the memory of the sainted donor. The aged poor, with their bleached locks and tottering limbs, whose coarse fare and hard lot had wrung from the soul many a sigh for the calm of Potter's Field, fed on the delicious loaf, and owned, with emotions strange and cheering to their sorrowing hearts, that, though

"The poor make no new friends,
God had kindly spread a table with Sabbath bread, by the hand of one who had the heart to commiserate their hard lot.

Thenceforward, up to the last Sabbath-day, have come the weary, faint, hungry poor, till thousands have eaten of the bread of benevolence—the Atkinson loaf! What a multitude has been fed, in every condition of destitution and age, in those few years! The first partakers are all gone. Benefactor and beneficiaries sleep together in the dust, and now, as we would fondly hope, eat together of that "Tree of Life, which yields her fruit every month," and "they shall hunger no more."

But, "the poor ye have always with you," and they are a class who carry about them the symbols of a divine dispensation. They are God's bill of exchange, drawn on those who hold his treasures, payable at sight, and woe be to those who dare allow His drafts to be dishonored. They are placed all about us, to give us an opportunity of feeding the hungry Saviour!—for, "inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

In the person of a poor disciple, the world's Redeemer eats our bread.

Who would not wish thus to share a loaf with Christ? Doubtless, so thought the benevolent Atkinson. Besides, how fraught with inspiration to emulate the good example; and, possibly, many little girls and boys whose first knowledge of good bread was derived from those Sabbath offerings, have ascended the rising pathway of honest industry to honor and respectability, and have looked backward and downward to dark and hunger-bitten hours, with gratitude for their benefactor; while the promptings of noble generosity have prompted them to imitate so worthy an example, and, by some perennial kindness, send living bread to those who are ready to perish.

How poor are statues of bronze, parian marble, aspiring cenotaphs, or pompous monuments, to embalm a fame, compared with the simple oven and Sabbath batch of the great-hearted Atkinson! Surely, he, being dead, yet speaketh.—Ah! and right well he acteth, too, though dead.

But now, gentle reader, pause a moment, and tell me truly, do not the souls of men need bread—soul-bread? Is not every human soul asking for nourishing loaves? Does not all-pervading hunger of spirit indicate the necessity of the BREAD OF LIFE? Light, knowledge, love, are soul-bread. Christ is the Bread of Life.

Bread for the inner man—loaves for such as "hunger after righteousness," are more valuable and important than food of the finest wheat, as the soul is greater, nobler and more valuable than the body. The soul craves Truth, and Light, and Love. These alone can satisfy its spiritual appetites. "This is the Bread which cometh down from heaven, of which, if we eat, we shall not perish."

Thank God, that everywhere are to be found noble illustrations of the same philanthropy that heated the tiny oven for the Portsmouth poor, from the fuel of that will; and not a few would seize an opportunity to provide bread for hungry souls, that they might, for centuries to come, enjoy a rich weekly repast, which should elevate, strengthen, and redeem the soul. I have been looking round upon the masses composing the great communities of our land, contemplating their wants, and the best modes of their relief; among those wants I class, as the greatest, bread for the soul. There are thousands who read but little, and think less, among whom untold numbers do not feel able to procure the books, magazines, or papers, which might minister to their edification. The city surroundings, the country village, the sparsely settled and poor regions of our several States; our seaports, with their vast shipping interests, and thousands of neglected seamen; our fleets of bayou, river and lake steamers, with their multitudes of passengers, and toiling crews,—all need and might have, if strong men, or one able man, would so decree, the necessary bread for the intellect and for the heart. At least, a plan for meeting much of the great want might be carried into execution. What we need is a kindred spirit to the Portsmouth philanthropist. Some man, with a princely purse and a princely soul, who will take an interest in the great cause of human progress and evangelization, and set up a prudent oven, that should send forth a weekly batch ample enough to satisfy the appetites of a million souls every week for the remaining portion of man's probation on earth—centuries on centuries. Girard was such a man. He, with a few millions, so engrafted himself into the interests of the land—of humanity, of orphanage,—that the world's history will be imperfect without the record of his benevolence.

Now, suppose one million of dollars, or much less, were invested by some christian man, the annual interest on which should be employed in printing a superior weekly newspaper, under christian auspices, to be distributed free to the really necessitous, and partly maintained by a moderate price from others, so that a small revenue might aid in its wider circulation; pray, tell me, how could an investment be made to do greater service? Girard lavished millions on the college bearing his name, and some three hundred pupils now enjoy the fruit of that vast expenditure. One million of dollars spent as I propose, would establish a sort of Publishing College, the lectures, discourses, essays, expositions, arguments, demonstrations, instructions of which would weekly reach, not merely three hundred minds, but nearer three millions, when once in the full tide of successful operation.

But, if no generous and powerful benefactor may be found, there will not be wanting those who, in smaller sums, will lay the foundation with a few hundred thousand dollars; and, once inaugurated, it will never want for support. As an indication of this, I extract the following from a communication now lying before me: "I have been considering how I could best bestow a portion of the money God has entrusted to my care, so that it might accomplish the largest amount of good, and I have never seen anything that so completely meets my views as 'THE CHURCH EVANGELIST.' Properly managed, such a paper may become the greatest agency ever employed by the Church, excepting only the pulpit and the Bible, for spreading light and salvation, and arousing the Church to a sense of her high calling and unappreciated responsibilities. It is my purpose to invest several thousand dollars in the endowment fund," etc., etc.

Thank God for such a testimony and pledge. Those are the words of an influential, wide-minded private citizen, who deems his possessions "entrusted" by God, to be used for the promotion of His Church and the glory of the Cross. "Them that honor me, will I honor, and they that despise me, shall be lightly esteemed," saith the Lord. "These are they who "honor the Lord with their substance." Heaven multiply the number of such souls! such men, like the man of Portsmouth, furnish subsistance for posterity to feast on, and thus prove themselves the real benefactors of mankind."

When a century shall have filled, and laid its records of useful deeds on the altar of Eternity; and the weekly doings of such a Journal as we would establish, shall have been noted, having sent its bread for the intellect—its bread for the heart, its brimming goblets of living water,—grapes from Eschol, and honey out of the rock, to millions of delighted partakers, who will be able to compute the sum of good those thousands of dollars shall have done? More than five thousand weekly sowings of seeds, and reapings of harvests, and all nourished by a perennial stream flowing from a fountain opened by the hand of one over whose honored grave the thousand-voiced winds of heaven will have pealed their glad memories of his name! What blessings await the servants of God who devote their means to the cause of humanity—the claims of evangelization! Their names shall be had in everlasting remembrance. But, above all, is the debt we owe to Christ. Our wealth is not our own, "for all things come of Thee, and of thine own have we given Thee: O Lord our God, all this store * * * cometh of thy hand, and is all thine own." So thought a gentleman who recently left $100,000 to be devoted to the cause of God.

We propose the establishment of a Christian journal, or Church Organ, for the wider diffusion of valuable but especially religious information, to be chiefly sustained by an endowment fund. It is on the plan of endowing a college, and as nobly and important as the endowment of Girard's, or any other; probably, far more so. To make the plan plain: suppose Harper's Weekly Journal of Civilization endowed by the gentleman whose name it bears, with, say, a million of dollars, the annual interest of which should be appropriated to meet the expenses of editing, printing, engraving, and publishing the paper: then the cost to subscribers might be the mere expense of the paper as purchased at the mill. If placed under the auspices of the Church and made a religious paper, as well as literary, then each church could well afford to make its distribution to the needy a part of her benevolent work, while the more able would generously facilitate the distribution by regular donations. Such a paper could be made the greatest periodical in the world. It would be, amongst other weekly papers, what the Great Eastern is among steamboats: what the Girard College is among common schools: what the swift car is to the old coach: what the telegraph is to the old snail-paced mail.

And God has furnished means enough to set it to work. The plan may take rest in the heart of some one to whom God has "entrusted" vast stores of wealth, or many loving hands may unite to build the monument to God and the rising generations; but, come as it may, in God's good time, it will bring blessings unnumbered to millions of our race. Thus, in that golden age of periodicals it shall illuminate and adorn, it will issue to starving souls the true Bread, of which, if they eat, they shall never perish; while, with the coming in of every beautiful Lord's Day morning, the Atkinson loaves shall overspread the board, and cheer the health of the humble poor, till both are done away by the transporting music of Gabriel's life-inspiring challenge to the dead.

EAST ALABAMA MALE COLLEGE.

REV. E. J. HAMIL, the Agent, sends us the following, from the pen of Hon. Wm. F. Samford, clipped from the Montgomery Mail, with a request to publish. Why could not an account have been prepared for the Advocate? Mr. Samford says:

—It may interest the people of Alabama to know know that the East Alabama Male College, situated in Auburn, Macon county, opened its exercises on the first Wednesday in October, with a much larger number of students than its most sanguine friends had anticipated. It has now (the second week) between seventy and eighty students, and is receiving accessions almost every day. All the regular college classes, from the Freshmen to the Senior, are represented. Such a beginning, we presume, no other college in this country ever had. Judging from first appearances, we suppose no institution ever had, for the same number, a finer body of young men.

The friends of the institution are greatly encouraged. It is believed that it is destined to be an agency of immense usefulness to the State. It is certainly a no unimportant event, the establishment and opening of a first class male college immediately in the midst of a people so numerous and intelligent, and so well prepared to sustain such an enterprise, as are the people of East Alabama. The provision has not been made sooner than the wants of the people indicated an urgent demand for it.

Dr. Sasnett brings to the Presidency of this promising institution the very highest qualifications of both character and attainments. A large experience in the duties of college education, and an eminent devotion to practical results, combine to render him efficient in his office. He is at his post and laboriously laying the foundation of this new college, on the rock.

Professors Tilwin and Dunklin, Darby and Slaton, are equal to all demands of their responsible stations. They are active, working, thoroughly trained instructors. A new life will henceforth invigorate and elevate every public interest in this part of Alabama. Heaven send propitious gales to waft this grand enterprise of enlightened patriotism and practical christianity, with its precious freight, over every sea of storm and peril, to the distant ages!

A MAMMOTH INCOME.—The annual income of the Marquis of Westminster, who owns about one-half of the "West End" of London, besides vast landed estates in the Provinces, is £800,000, or $4,000,000 of our money. The late Dwarkanauth Tagore of Calcutta, died of a broken heart some twelve years ago, because, in the commercial panic of 1847, his fortune had dwindled down to only $10,000,000. With us, when a man is supposed to be worth $200,000, he immediately obtains the title of millionaire.

A LIVE ALABAMIAN AT HOME, WITH A FRIEND AT HIS SIDE.

MR EDITOR: I am at home, where most sensible men are wont to keep themselves. And, although I am neither a D. D., nor a H. B. (big bug), of any sort, and though my stand point of observation be emphatically "homely," contrasted with the "abroad" of many who write, yet I hope that my communication will receive the unprejudiced consideration of your righteous tripod.—Moreover, I beg respectfully to submit, that home affairs as much deserve a passing notice as the sayings and doings of the world outside, on the cars, at "the falls," and the fashionable watering-places. The can't-get-aways," as well as those who go abroad, should have a representative.

An old lyric sings:

"Be it ever so humble,
There's no place like home."

"At home are dispensed those "small, sweet courtesies" which contribute so much to human happiness. Here are met the countless little trials and ever-recurring labors which, aggregately, make up the great battle of life. Home is at once the pleasure-ground and the battle-field of life.

It would, doubtless, be very interesting, and equally important for you and the public generally, to hear all about our home affairs—how the baby grows, laughs, and grows fat; what we have had on our table; what we talk about; how we get water from the well, whether with pump, windlass or sweep; how we manage to pass away the time,—everything, in fine, pertaining to home-life at the parsonage. But lest we should be led to the perpetration of a dozen chapters, more or less, let it suffice to mention only one incident, and a scene or so, of domestic life.

Imprimis, we should state that the yellow-boy-Aleck is an important personage about the premises—doing up the honors of the boot-blacking, wood-pile, and errand-boy department. Aleck is not very regardful of his outer man, and, among other things, he rejoices in a pair of old boots, by no means comely in appearance. Seated in the parlor, one day, I heard an order from the good wife to the cook: "Tell Aleck to go over to Mrs. P——'s after some tomatoes." The order contained an injunction that Aleck should have an eye to a more decent exterior. The cook forthwith and peremptorily proceeded to reiterate the order: "You, Aleck! go on after them tomatusses, and take them old boots and go 'long and walk!"

Did you ever, Mr. Editor, keep house at the parsonage? If so, and you will but call to mind the appearance of things towards the "wind up" of the year, you can form a tolerable idea of the condition of our internal arrangements. But, for the benefit of the uninitiated, we will just open the door, and take a peep into the larder. Away down in this barrel, you see something dark and dusty; that is the balance of our flour—very good, what there is of it; it looks dark because it is so remote from the top of the barrel. Take that cup, make a long arm, and reach down into that other barrel: you scrape the bottom, but bring up a little sugar—we hope it will hold out. That pile of sackcloth in the corner can yet develop itself into something like a bag, with a little coffee in the bottom. That pear-shaped thing, with a wide gap cut in it, is our last ham. Here is yet another barrel; a hearty thump brings out a hollow sound, but it was full of molasses months ago. These empty boxes served us a good turn occasionally, for putting fruit and potatoes in. Those empty bottles around on the shelves, stand like sentinels over the contents of the larder.

The parsonage larder is a kind of chronometer of the year: the descent of the barrels' contents marks the lapse of the months; when the cup scrapes against the bottom, we conclude that the year draws to its close, and that Conference is at hand. Our barrels indicate such a period. It is a good time to retrospect the by-gone part of the year. So doing, we find that some things wise and good, and some other things otherwise and not good, have transpired since our last Conference. From some directions come cheering accounts of gracious visitations and mighty ingatherings of souls; while in other places,

"The withering fig-trees droop and die,
The fields elude the tiller's toil."

One preacher I heard from in the earlier part of the year, was turning many delinquent members out of the church. I heard from him again, later in the year, and his labors were crowned with abundant fruit. So much for faithful pruning. Many of us, I fear, are delinquent in this regard. Sometime during the past summer, a young lady, who was a member of the Methodist Church in Mobile, visited some friends in one of our beautiful up-country towns. While there, she attended the Methodist Church during a sacramental occasion, but did not participate in the communion; she gave as a reason for her neglect, that she had been dancing; this was allowed by her own pastor, but she did not know how the preacher and church up the country would regard it. Conscientious, very!

The present year will be distinguished in the annals of our Conference by the inauguration of two male colleges—the East Alabama Male College, at Auburn, and the Southern University, at Greensboro. Our rising generation ought to grow up wise and good. I wish the trustees of colleges would pursue a more liberal policy, and let us know all about their doings, by advertising in every county paper throughout the State. In a county adjoining that in which is located the Southern University, some difficulty was experienced in getting information about the board, tuition, course of study, etc., in that institution. One gentleman thought the board was a dollar a day, and the tuition high in proportion.

While speaking of colleges, let me tell you what transpired at one of our seats of learning, within the bounds of our own Conference, sometime during the summer.—It is an institution that we delight to honor; many sons and daughters of our beloved Methodism are there.—There was, at this place, a Sabbath-school celebration, which was all proper and right; but the finale of the celebration was a fair—a bona fide fair, for the young people to enjoy themselves and to make money at. Now that was a strange sequel to a Sabbath-school celebration, at a Methodist school! How the staid Methodist people of that community could deglutize such a compound, we do not undertake to tell.

So much for the retrospect. What of the prospect? This looks through the month that yet remains until Conference shall assemble. The time is short, but much is yet to be accomplished—collections to be raised, stewards to be reminded that half the preacher's "allowance" is behind, the church book to be posted, and delinquent members regulated according to discipline. Let us try and leave well-pruned vineyards to our successors. We already begin to anticipate the Conference. It is a time of importance; much business will there be transacted. It is an interesting time; friendly associations are to be renewed, and warm sympathies reciprocated. It may be a time of great spiritual profit; there will be good sermons and earnest prayers, while the volume of sacred song will gush out from two hundred practiced throats. Stand aside, ye soprano, contralto, and base singers, and ye deep-toned organs! A Conference of Methodist preachers is one of the best choirs in the world. But there is some danger of losing spirituality at the Conference, and of getting into some bad habits. I had once, for my Conference room-mates, a stationed preacher, a presiding elder, and another distinguished personage. They all smoked! Morning, noon, and night, they puffed away: and, although no smoker myself, I was tempted by the fragrance of the narcotizing weed. Last Conference, our host, wishing to be hospitable, provided a box of cigars for the preachers, and I actually indulged the disgusting propensity—I smoked! Now, Mr. Editor, hear me when I say that I intend to refrain from this non commendable practice when I go to our Conference at Eufaula; neither there, nor in the stage, nor on the cars, nor in any hotel by the way, do I intend to put one of those smoke-stacks between my lips. Who will join the Anti-Smoking Society?

CHIP OF THE NEW BLOCK.

For the New Orleans Christian Advocate.

THE MOTHER SIN.

COVETOUSNESS is a mother sin—a radical vice. "The love of money is the root of all evil." He who has an earthly itch, a greedy desire of getting the world, hath in him the root of all sin. Covetousness is a mother sin. I shall make it appear that covetousness is a breach of all the ten commandments.

1. It breaks the first commandment: "Thou shalt have no other Gods but me." The covetous man hath more gods than one; Mammon is his God, he hath a god of gold, therefore he is called an idolator. Col. 3 5.

2. Covetousness breaks the second commandment: "Thou shalt not make any graven image, thou shalt not bow down thyself to them." A covetous man bows down, though not to the graven image in the Church, yet to the graven image in his coin.

3. Covetousness is a breach of the third commandment: "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain." Absalom's design was to get his father's crown, there was covetousness; but he talks of paying his "vow to God." There he took God's name in vain.

4. Covetousness is a breach of the fourth commandment: "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." A covetous man doth not keep the Sabbath holy; instead of reading in the bible he will cast up accounts, etc.

5. Covetousness is a breach of the fifth commandment: "Honor thy Father and thy mother." A covetous person will not honor his father if he doth not feed him; nay, he will get his father to make over his estate to him in his life time, so the father shall be at the son's command.

6. Covetousness is a breach of the sixth commandment: "Thou shalt not kill." Covetous Ahab killed Naboth to get his vineyard. Kings 21. 13. How many have swum to the crown in blood?

7. Covetousness is a breach of the seventh commandment: "Thou shalt not commit adultry." Covetness causeth uncleanness; you read of the "life of an unclean person. Du. 23: 18. An adultress for money sets both conscience and chastity to sale.

8. Covetousness is a breach of the eighth commandment: "Thou shalt not steal." Covetousness is the root of theft; covetous Achan stole the wedge of gold. Therefore thieves and covetous are put together. 1. Cor. 6. 10.

9. Covetousness is a breach of the ninth commandment: "Thou shalt not bear false witness." What makes the perjurer take a false oath but covetousness? He hopes for a dividend.

10. It is plainly a breach of the tenth commandment: "Thou shalt not covet." The mammonist covets his neighbor's house and goods, and endeavors to get them in his own hands. Thus you see what a sin covetousness is—it is a mother sin—it is a plain breach of every one of the ten commandments.

A man is guilty of covetousness when he overloads himself with worldly business. He hath many irons in the fire; he is in this sense a pluralist, he takes so much business upon him that he cannot find time to serve God; he has scarce time to eat his meals, but no time to pray. When a man doth overcharge himself with the world, and as Martha, cumber himself about many things, so that he cannot have time for his soul, sure he is under the power of covetousness.

He whose heart is so set upon the world, that, to get it he cares not what unlawful, indirect means he useth—he will have the world per las et nefas—he will wrong and defraud, and raise his estate upon the ruins of another. Hos. 12. 7. 8. "The balances of deceit are in his hand, he loveth to oppress."

Pope Sylvester II did sell his soul to the devil for a Popedom. Many there are who are selling their souls to the devil for office that is lucrative. We preach to men to get their hearts in heaven, but where covetousness is predominant it chains them to this earth. J. W. L.

THE GREAT PROBLEM.

EVERLASTING PUNISHMENT.

The feelings of rationalists are opposed to the awful doctrine of everlasting punishment. They urge that "sin cannot forever be triumphant against God, as if the whole mystery of iniquity were contained in the words forever." Professor Mansel remarks, that "the riddle of existence—the problem which confounds all philosophy, aye, and all religion too, so far as religion is a thing of man's reason—is the fact that evil exists at all; not that it exists for a longer or shorter duration. Is not God infinitely wise and holy and powerful now? and does not sin exist along with that infinite holiness and wisdom and power? Is God to become more holy, more wise, more powerful hereafter; and must evil be annihilated to make room for his perfections to expand? Does the infinity of his eternal nature ebb and flow with every increase or diminution in the sum of human guilt and misery? Against this immovable barrier—the existence of evil—the waves of philosophy have dashed themselves unceasingly since the birthday of human thought, and have retired broken and powerless, without displacing the minutest fragment of the stubborn rock, without softening one feature of its dark and ragged surface.

"This mystery, vast and inscrutable as it is, is but one aspect of a more general problem; it is but the moral form of the ever recurring secret of the Infinite. How the infinite and the finite, in any other relation, can exist together; how infinite power can co-exist with finite activity; how infinite wisdom can co-exist with finite contingency; how infinite goodness can co-exist with finite evil; how the infinite can exist in any manner without exhausting the universe of reality; this is the riddle which infinite wisdom alone can solve, the problem whose very conception belongs only to the Universal Knowing which fills and embraces the universe of being. When philosophy can answer this question; when she can even state intelligibly the notions which its terms involve; then, and not till then, she may be entitled to demand a solution of the difficulties which she finds in the everlasting punishment of the wicked."

The question is above reason. It is not for the reason of a fallen being, a sinner against God, a party involved in guilt, to affirm that everlasting suffering is a penalty transcending the claims of justice; or that it is inconsistent with infinite benevolence. The existence of sin is a fact—and we are obliged to regard it as consistent with the Divine benevolence, or renounce our belief in that benevolence. If sin may now exist, in the presence and under the control of Infinite Goodness, who can assume that the penalty of sin—suffering—may not forever exist under the control of the same Divine Power. This question is settled by the Son of God, who offered his life a ransom for sinners. The wicked will go away into everlasting punishment.—From the Christian Observer.

THE NEW YORK BOOK TRADE.

Of Washington Irvings works—exclusive of the Life of Washington and the Sketch Book—there have been sold, within the last ten years, 22,000 sets, of fifteen volumes each. Of the Sketch Book, 35,000 copies have been distributed; and of the "Washington" 42,000 sets, of five volumes each, and at prices ranging from $7 to $35 per set. This gives a grand total of 575,000 volumes disposed of under G. P. Putnam's management since 1849. Meanwhile Mr. Irving has received, as the reward of his brain-work, the snug little sum of $75,000, in the past ten years. A curious scrap of secret literary history is the fact that, at the expiration of Irving's contract with Lea & Blanchard, in 1844, there occurred a hiatus of five years, into which no other publishers ventured to leap. During this time the genial author of Sunnyside (then in Spain) imagined himself obsolete and forgotten, his works being almost entirely out of the market, and no proposals being made to him for their re-publication. In 1849 Mr. G. P. Putnam tendered to Mr. Irving a formal offer to assume the reissue of the various works in uniform and attractive style, which proposition the great writer accepted without suggesting a single change of terms. And the immense sales I have mentioned are the fruits of the contract then entered into.

The same enterprising publisher has the business management of Bayard Taylor's works, of which more than 150,000 volumes have been sold. Of Views A-Foot, 30,000 copies have been put into circulation; and the sales of the other titles have averaged upward of 20,000 each. This lucky traveler has realized $30,000 from the copyright of his various books. A new volume, called At Home and Abroad, is in press, of which I am inclined to think the circulation will exceed that of any of his previous works. It is a collection of personal experiences and reminiscences of a most interesting character.

Charles Scribner has applied the public demand for various works of popular authors to the following extent: Of Headley's Napoleon and his Marshals, 50,000 copies; Washington and his Generals, 40,000; Sacred Mountains, 40,000; Ik Marvel's Reveries of a Bachelor, 40,000; Dream Life, 30,000; Timothy Titcomb's Letters, 20,000; Bitter Sweet, 10,000, and of Bushnell's Sermons, 10,000. He has paid Ik Marvel over $20,000, and Mr. Headley more than $50,000, as their share of the proceeds of these large sales.

By untiring energy, granted upon rare tact and talent, Sheldon & Co., have reared an establishment which is taking front rank in the trade in New York. In testimony of this I gave you a few figurative items. Of Grace Truman they have sold more than 39,000 copies; of Olshausen's Commentaries 15,000; of Spurgeon's works, (reprinted,) 200,000 (for which Spurgeon has received satisfactory compensation.) In ten years they have circulated 1,500,000 copies of Sandard's School Series; 8,000,000 of Webb's Readers; of Loomis's Physiology 20,000; and of Hazen's Speller and Definer, they sell 20,000 per annum. This house is aspiring to the position of the leading Baptist publishing concern, and many of the doctrinal books pertaining to that denomination are securing, under their auspices, a widely extended circulation.

There are some remarkable figures connected with the publishing operations of Derby & Jackson, whose capital selections have found ample appreciation on the part of the public. Of their Standard British Classics, comprising the works of twelve great English writers, there have been yearly sales of 500,000 volumes. Their series of Standard Fiction sells at the rate of 72,000 volumes per year. The following figures are reliable as to the circulation of the books named: Widow Bidott Papers 40,000 volumes; Life and Sayings of Mrs. Partington 30,000; Sparrowgrass Papers 15,000; Life of General Marion 50,000; George Greene 25,000; Lafayette 25,000; General Putnam 25,000; Signers of the Declaration 25,000; Patrick Henry, by Wirt, 50,000; Cumming's Hunter's Life 25,000; Stephens's Egypt and Holy Land 25,000; Dick Tinto's Court of Naleon, (a $12 book,) 5000; Milburn's Books 25,000; Beecher's Star Papers 30,000; Beecher's Lectures to Young Men, 40,000; Female Life among the Mormons 50,000; A. S. Roe's novels 30,000; Marion Harland's (all) 100,000. Of the Minister's Wooing, just issued, 25,000 copies have been sold, and of Beulah 50,000 is considered a reasonable estimate for the first year's sales. This firm has paid Beecher $6000. Dick Tinto, (Frank B. Goodrich,) $5000. Marion Harland $15,000. Roe $3000, and Mrs. Partington, (Shillaber,) $3000.

The educational publication of Ivison & Phinney has reached a circulation almost marvelous. The sale of Sanker's series of Readers, Spellers, etc., has been some twelve millions, and is now more than a million per annum. This extensive circulation is accounted for by the fact that the books are used in nearly every section of the Union. Over $150,000 is/ve been paid as copyright upon these publications alone. The yearly sale of Thompson's Arithmetics is over 150,000, and of Cotton and Fitch's Geographies about 120,000. Wells's English Grammar, of which a new edition is just published, has sold to the extent of 200,000 copies. Of Fasquelle's French Series, 30,000 volumes are sold yearly. The total amount of copyrights paid annually by Ivison & Phinney is about $30,000, and up to this time this house has paid for copyrights the aggregate sum of nearly five hundred thousand dollars. They publish, gratuitously, a descriptive catalogue of one hundred and sixty pages, and the Educational News, (quarterly,) of which latter 50,000 copies are circulated.

BISHOP ASBURY'S WILL.

WE find a copy of Bishop Asbury's will, which, it is said, has never before been published.

Francis Asbury's Last Will and Testament.

In the name of Almighty God, Amen.

I, FRANCIS ASBURY, native of Great Britain, born at Great Bar, Handsworth Parish, Staffordshire County, Superintendent and Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church in America, in common health of Body and firm exercise of mind, have deliberated upon the shortness of human life and the certainty of death, I make my last Will and Testament revoking all others. Item, I give my body to the dust from whence it was originally taken, in hopes of a glorious resurrection to everlasting Life. I commit my Spirit to the Father of all Spirits, in the justifying, sanctifying, preserving and Glorifying Grace of the Son of God and only Saviour of the world. Item, I give and bequeath all my wearing apparel to the traveling and local preachers of the M. E. Church that shall be present at my death. Item, I give and bequeath my Horses, or Horse and Carriages, together with all my Books and Manuscripts to Wm. McKendree, first American Bishop of the M. E. Church. Item, I give and bequeth in Special Trust and Confidence to William McKendree, Daniel Hitt and Henry Boehm the sum of Two thousand Dollars, now deposited in the Book Concern, be the same more or less, to be applied in printing Bibles and Testaments; with other pious Books and Tracts and Pamphlets upon experimental and practical Godliness, and upon the decease of said Trustees, then and in that case I devise the trust and Confidence shall be founded upon the Bishops elected by the General Conference in succession on the one part, the Baltimore annual Conference on the other part, shall elect two Elders of their Body, in joint Trust and Especial Confidence to insure the deposit in the Book Concern as long as the General Union of Order and Interest shall be maintained, and an equal dividend is made to all the Conferences in the Union and within the United States. Should the present order of things be changed, then and in that case I wish the money to be funded, and the Interest by the Special Trust and Confidence to be equally and annually divided among the Ten Conferences as now appointed by order of the General Conference, or if the number shall hereafter be increased, there shall be an equal dividend to the whole number. Be it known that I have not laid up treasures upon Earth more than the sum I have bequeathed in the principal and interest, has been left to me in Legacies by persons that died childless, some thinking possibly I might live to an advanced age, and to need an Independent Support; these legacies were left me chiefly by persons of the first Generation of Methodists. I have appropriated the Interest and some of the principal, and as a faithful steward return it to the Church; should Elizabeth Dickins survive me and continue in her widowhood, it is my will she should be paid, during her natural Life, Eighty Dollars annually, as to all my nominal Children, Male and Female, whose parents have thought proper to put any part of my name upon them, I wish the Book Concern to give them each a Bible, as one of my nominal Children. Lastly, I appoint my three before-mentioned friends, viz:—Wm. McKendree, Daniel Hitt and Henry Boehm as sole executors of this my last Will and Testament, revoking all Former Wills by me made, my Burial decent and solitary, a Gravestone or not, but plain, my Funeral expenses paid by money in my pocket or from the Interest of the deposit in the concern Given under my hand and seal this Seventh day of June in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirteen.

FRANCIS ASBURY.

LAY DELEGATION IN THE NORTH.

WILL BLACKS BE ADMITTED?

The Baltimore Christian Advocate, in response to the proposition of the Christian Advocate and Journal, to introduce lay delegation, says: "In discussing the propriety of Lay Delegation there is one subject that has not been broached, but which may as well be suggested at once. Indeed a remark by Dr. Haven in the last Zion's Herald directly suggests it. If we are to have lay delegates, will the North agree that they shall all be White. We do not see how some of our brethren, who contend for full equality among our members as an indefensible right, can consent to exclude our colored members from any new privilege to be granted to the laity." Zion's Herald says:—"Let master and slave meet on equal terms; let no church privilege be accorded to the one that is not accorded to the other, and we are content to abide the issue. Let us have Lay Delegation, and let some of the slaves take their seats as lay delegates in the Conferences," etc., etc.

Now, we directly ask Dr. Stevens and Dr. Haven whether in their schemes of Lay Delegation they contemplate the admission of colored delegates to the Annual and General conference? In other words, do they intend to exclude colored persons by law? If they do not, it will not be sufficient to tell us that the election of colored delegates would not be possible. We believe the contrary. We think it likely that one or more would be elected to the first General Conference. The Abolitionists, though not numerous, are very strong in some localities. To introduce a black delegate to the General Conference, would be to them a triumph worth every effort. It would immediately dissolve the body. For as the conference could not expel a member duly elected, and its members would not submit to such a manifestation of social equality, the body would be immediately broken up. To accomplish this would be too desirable to certain lunatics in the church not to be made a perpetual and ultimately successful object.

AN AMERICAN'S VIEW OF PEI-HO.

An American merchant, who has resided for fifteen years in China, has written a pamphlet which sums up the Chinese question in a very sensible and satisfactory manner. The work is only printed, not published, and is designed to have some practical effect in London, where it is issued. The writer warns Englishmen against suffering themselves to be led by the Times, and gives the following simple statement of the whole matter:

The English Government, he says, has always ignored the dignity and importance of the Chinese Government—treating the whole nation as a crowd of savages with whom no treaty was to be honestly made or decently enforced. The consequence has been the fomenting of a rebellion which has long raged in China, and of whose history and progress no outsider is very fully informed. The arms of the English have succeded in humiliating the mandarins, in destroying the prestige of all internal government, and in annihilating the only authority with which a treaty was possible. When, therefore, the English send an embassy to conduct negotiations they have only themselves to thank if the rebels, not respecting or fearing the Government with which the English seek to treat, but whose prestige they have destroyed, suddenly turn upon the English themselves, and blow them out of existence. To make it the pretext of another war is only to aggravate the old difficulty.

In this condition of things the writer urges an alliance between England and Russia; insisting that, if it be not effected, the Chinese will seek and obtain it, in which case a long and extensive and unmanageable war will ensue. If England, however, succeeds in a Russian alliance, she can gain a hearing at Pekin, and settle the consequences of her own mistake by negotiation, permanently establishing the bases of commerce between the nations.

THE PRONOUNS OF THE BIBLE.

The heart has a grammar of its own. It employs the possessive pronouns with great frequency. It seems to claim them as its peculiar inheritance among the parts of speech. In the circle where love reigns, how sweetly these pronouns fall upon the ear—"My Mother," "my child," "my darling!" They represent the golden links which bind us together in our human relationships and friendships. The utterance of them with the emphasis of true affection awakens a thrill of pleasure in the breast of the one to whom they are spoken, and strengthens his faith in the speaker's love for him. Without these pronouns the music of love would cease on earth. They are the notes of its melody.

God, adapting the Bible to our natures and wants—being determined to arouse, if possible, the greatest love and faith of our hearts—has, in it, used these pronouns with wonderful frequency. He says: "My people," "my sheep," "my servants," "my friends," "my jewels," "I am thy God," "thy Redeemer," "your Father," etc. He inspired his saints to cry, "The Lord is my rock, and my fortress, and my deliverer," "O God, thou art my God," etc., etc.

Let no Christian fail to observe and to dwell upon these pronouns. They will aid him in cultivating a filial spirit and an appropriating faith. They are little words, but they are mightier than the most cogent arguments of Paul, or the sublimest descriptions of Ezekiel or John. You may be an orthodox believer by studying the attributes of God and the nature of his remedial scheme. But you cannot be a warm-hearted, happy, zealous, joyous, useful believer, without cherishing the feeling of the bride in Canticles, "My beloved is mine and I am his."—Cent. Chr. Herald.

THE NAMES OF THE MONTHS.

The names of the months were given by the Romans.

January, the first month, was so called from Janus, an ancient King of Italy, who was deified after his death, and derived from the Latin word Janualis.

February, the second month, is derived from the Latin word Februo, to purify; hence Februaris, for this month the ancient Romans offered up expiatory sacrifice for the purifying of the people.

March, the third month, anciently the first month, is derived from the word Mars, the god of war.

April, so called from the Latin Aprilus, i. e., opening; because in this month the vegetable world opens and buds forth.

May, the fifth month, is derived from the Latin word Majores, so called by Romulus, in respect towards the Senators; hence Maius or May.

June, the sixth month, from the Latin word Junius, or the youngest of the people.

July, the seventh month, is derived from the Latin word Julius, and so named in honor of Julius Cæsar.

August, the eighth month, was so called in honor of Augustus, by a decree of the Roman Senate, A. D. 8.

September, the ninth month, from the Latin word Septem, or seven, being the seventh month from March.

October, the tenth month, from the Latin word Octo, eight, hence October.

November, the eleventh month, from the Latin word Novem, nine; being the ninth month from March.

December, the twelfth month, from the Latin word Decem, ten; so called because it was the tenth month from March, which was anciently the manner of beginning the year.

ACCOUNTS—NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

All parties interested in the Advocate—Editor, Preachers, and Subscribers—are interested in avoiding confusion in accounts.

Those well acquainted with the credit system in the newspaper business know full well that, unper that system, confusion in accounts never was, never will, never can be avoided.—Uncertain mails, unavoidable oversights in agents or clerks, forgetfulness in subscribers and others, and the wearying, vexatious details of this business over all others, render it impossible. We have tried, for years, and know.

To have the subscription begin and end with the year, and to pay, if not in advance, at least once a year, is the nearest approach to a remedy that we can devise,—and this is our plan.

Immediately after the Conferences, all the accounts will be made out to January, 1861, without reference to time of commencement, or time last paid to; and they will be sent to each subscriber who has not paid to January, 1861.

If all our subscribers and agents will patiently co-operate with us, this difficulty about accounts will be forever settled during the coming year. After that, when January, 1861, comes, $3 more will be due, and so on.

Will our brethren and friends, when they receive these accounts, immediately remit the money to the office, or pay to the preacher, taking a receipt? If any think the account incorrect, let him inform us, pleasantly, without quarreling. We never quarrel, though we have more cause than others.

The volume of the Advocate will hereafter begin and end with the year; and it is very desirable that subscriptions should conform to the same rule.

Therefore, new subscribers, who do not begin with the year, will please send, not two dollars, but an amount sufficient to pay for the paper till the end of the year, at the rate of Four Cents a Week.

Then, every subscriber will know, without being informed, that at the beginning of the year is the time to remit the subscription money.

And let us have scores, hundreds, thousands of new subscribers with which to begin the New Volume, January 1st, 1860.—We intend, if Providence smile on us, to make a better paper next year than ever before. Arrangements are made, and being made, for greatly increasing its attractions.—Some new writers, of the first order, will begin with the year. The paper is flatteringly approved now—we intend to merit higher approbation.

SOUTHERN UNIVERSITY AND EAST ALABAMA MALE COLLEGE.

In this week's Advocate, our brethren of Alabama representing respectively both these institutions, have a full hearing. We now "shut down" the "flood-gates." The Alabama Conference is near at hand. That body, and not this paper, is the arbiter in these brotherly differences. Enough has been said on each side to place them both fairly before the Conference.

The Advocate, heretofore, according to the most impartial and enlightened judgment of which it has been capable, has endeavored to represent the interests of the Church in the Alabama Conference, in both these institutions, not according to individual opinions, whether of the advocates of Greensboro' or Auburn, but according to the action and purpose of the Conference as far as understood. It has had no opinions of its own, and should have none on this subject; it is representative and impersonal. This having been its course heretofore, it will also be its course hereafter.

That this has not pleased, entirely, the more sensitive and zealous friends of either institution, is not surprising; however much to be regretted. It now appears, from the wide differences of opinion as to what the action of the Conference has been, to have been utterly impossible. When the members of the Conference and Church in Alabama differ so widely, how can the Advocate be supposed to have more wisdom than all of them? The supposition is preposterous.

And could it decide a question of such delicacy, in which so much feeling is involved, and upon each side of which the members of the large Conference immediately concerned, and who are thoroughly posted, are ranged, it would be simple folly to utter and endeavor to enforce such decision. He who expects such a thing is sadly in the dark, both as to the right of a Conference to determine its own questions, and as to the duties and responsibilities of our Church editors.

This paper has been the organ of the Alabama Conference from the commencement of this controversy. It has never taken a side, but has been impartial from the beginning; it will remain so throughout. Both the former and the present editor have been censured, by both sides, for this course; but they have been "judicious editors," in this respect, at least.

The last General Conference was deeply impressed with a conviction of the importance of editorial conservatism, and advised accordingly. Respecting this high advice, and following personal convictions in harmony with it, we have endeavored to follow the coarse most conducive to the peace of the Church In reference to the questions under consideration, we have no advice at present to give the Conference. We content ourselves with endeavoring faithfully to represent it, and earnestly striving to advance the interests of the Church within its bounds.

Dr. Webb says his first "letter was not written for publication." Then we have to beg his pardon for making the mistake, and he has to beg ours for leading us into it. The letter was in reply to the Advocate, and not in reply to a private letter. It professed to represent the University and its friends, and not the mere sentiments of the writer. The argument, style, and punctuation of the letter, all had evidences of intention for publication. And he gave us no intimation that it was private.

He says we are mistaken in thinking he "represents himself alone" in that letter. We trust not.

He says he was "under the impression that our preferences were not for the Southern University," and asks, "am I mistaken?" The course of the paper is sufficient answer. We have always represented the University as the "only thing of the kind attempted by Southern Methodists." The Doctor had overlooked that, and his zeal will not let him see that we repeated it in our reply to his letter. A questionable zeal that which strives to prove a true friend to be an enemy. "O Jerusalem," etc! No friend of the University has gloried in its success more than the editor of the Advocate. But he has not thought proper to insult a portion of the ministry and membership of the Alabama Conference by a foolish and meddlesome partisanship. That is our offence.

As to the balance of his letter, it simply amounts to a begging of the questions involved, the assumption of imaginary editorial duties and delinquencies, and censure accordingly.

He now says we did not publish a communication from Rev. H. A. M. Henderson. We had published one from Dr. Hamilton on the same subject. Mr. Henderson's came during our absence, and was laid aside as unnecessary, in consequence of the previous publication by the editor pro tem. We never knew that such a communication had been received until since the reception of Dr. Webb's first letter.

But this persistent determination to make out the Advocate an enemy to the University, is deplorable. It is useless to oppose denial, when, in order to make the charge, the columns of the Advocate are almost entirely ignored. The University has been fully represented, and truly represented. Auburn has been noticed too, occasionally; and so have the University of Alabama, the University of Mississippi, and other such institutions. The truth is, there is not the shadow of a shade of cause for this complaint.

We copy below some extracts from an editorial in a recent number of the Picayune, on Southern University education. It regards (very justly, as we had supposed) the Southern University as an enterprise of the Southern Methodist Church, inaugurated by the Alabama Conference. We have a much higher and more enlarged opinion of the Southern University than Dr. Webb seems to have. The Southern public, we imagine, will be surprised to learn that one of its trustees wishes to make it merely a Conference institution.

We learn that a project is on foot in that State, (Alabama) and warmly seconded in others, for the establishment of an university of high grade and character, under the auspices of the Methodist Episcopal Church South.

We have already noted, from time to time, the extraordinary favor with which a similar movement, on the part of the Protestant Episcopal Church, has met throughout the South, and we doubt not the same success—it could scarcely be greater—attends upon this. The Methodist Episcopal Church South is rich, as all know, and liberal, as its numerous beneficent works testify, and of course, so far as money avails, equal to any enterprise of this character. It also comprises a large portion of the educated intelligence of our people, and in its numerous primary institutions of learning, in a number of cotton planting States, has, perhaps, at this moment a better foundation, upon which to build up a great university, than any other similar body in the South. It is clear, then, that neither the ample means required, the necessary foundation, nor yet the genial personal sympathy, by which most of all such institutions thrive, will be found wanting, even within the limits of the liberal denomination of which we speak.

But it is not upon its own resources only, or its own concurrence and support, that this, or any other similar denomination may safely count, in an enterprise of this character. It may calculate with equal certainty upon that of the whole Southern people. With them, indeed, speaking generally, and their wants, has the idea originated, and not with any particular body or set of men. We have, so to speak, educated ourselves, as a people, up to that standard that a system of university education, of the high grade and character of which we speak, is beginning to be felt as almost a necessity among us.

And here we may remark, in passing and by way of allusion to unjust reflections, not unfrequently thrown out by those personally unacquainted with our people, in their homes, that nowhere, excepting, perhaps, the British Isles, would such an university have a broader and surer foundation than in our own Southern States. The older planting States especially are rich, and, as all know, our agricultural life and peculiar institutions are under such circumstances, exceedingly favorable to intellectual pursuits. It is not uncommon therefore—it is, in fact, the rule—to find in remote regions of the country, where many think only cotton and rice and sugar are grown, men thoroughly conversant with all the common branches of knowledge. It is not uncommon, indeed, on the larger plantations, to find men profoundly learned, especially in the Greek and Roman classics, traveled men, who speak the living languages of Europe as their mother tongue, or men of science, fully up in every department of experiment and research therein. In the older planting States, too, families have been very well kept together, which is always exceedingly favorable to the accumulation of the means of knowledge, as it is to the growth of that generous ambition which aims, in each generation, at something nobler and better. It was by such families as these, indeed, that the older institutions of the North were in great part supported before they lost the confidence of the Southern people, and it is to such that the newly founded institutions in our own midst can confidently look for generous encouragement and support.

We know not, indeed, in the wide world, a more interesting or inviting field for the inauguration of a high and comprehensive system of university education than that now open in the Southern States. Our people, as we have already shown, are fully prepared for it; they in fact demand it as an imperative necessity; and are ready to contribute freely toward its realization. There can be no difficulty on that score. The only question is whether the men, who may have the work in charge, will prove equal to it. Notwithstanding the many and peculiar advantages we enjoy, it will be no easy work with us. This is essentially a time-serving, money-making, materialistic age, and everything thus far has been made to bow down to it, till the advantages of what Plato and Aristotle would have called a "liberal" education are nowhere to be found.

The Northern colleges were long since turned into mere laboratories and workshops for mechanics; the German universities—how sadly fallen from the good old days of Buttman and Heyne, and Wolf, and Neander!—have degenerated into shameful dwelling establishments; while the English universities—fortunately not the noble old English gentry—are fast losing their once proud pre-eminence. Even the pattern institution of our own country, founded by Jefferson, ar rather called into being by a necessity, not unlike that we now feel in the more distant South, has been compelled to yield in its race for popularity, upon which it depends, to the same base, materialistic spirit of the age.

The Picayune is mistaken somewhat as to the tense of this enterprise. The college edifice has already been erected, at a cost, we believe, of $60,000, to be enlarged as the necessities may demand. The endowment fund has already been raised to about $300,000, and it is intended to bring it up to half a million. The Institution is already under way, having been opened on the first of October last, with as large a number of students as the faculty desired at the commencement. If the Picayune were acquainted with President Wightman, and the other learned gentlemen who compose the Faculty, we imagine there would be no question as to whether or not they would "prove equal" to their "charge."

Below will be found communications on this subject from Rev. E. J. Hamill, Rev. O. R. Blue, and Dr. Webb.

Brother Gillespie: I learn from the Advocate, of the 2d inst., that "certain questions were sent to it for publication, asking the ecclesiastical status of the East Alabama Male College. These questions you, very properly, referred to the Alabama Conference, which alone is competent to answer them authoritatively. In the mean time, for the satisfaction of all concerned, allow a bare statement of facts:

First—The entire subscription for the East Alabama Male College was taken up with the express understanding that the College was to be under the control of the Methodist Church.

Secondly—The written form of the subscription made it impossible that the College should ever be alienated from the control of the Methodist Church.

And thirdly—During the present year, and at the proper time for such action, the Board of Trustees of the East Alabama Male College, did actually take the necessary steps to put the College under the control of the Alabama Conference, and precisely the same sort of control which the Conference holds over the Southern University. This last fact was published in your paper, but was strangely overlooked by your esteemed correspondent.

The Auburn College has no controversy with Greensboro', and the agent of the Auburn College is responsible, for his communications through your columns alone to the Alabama Conference, which appointed him to that agency.

E. J. Hamill,
Conference Agent of the East Alabama Male College.
Auburn, November 8, 1859.

Mr. Editor: In your issue of the 2nd inst. I find a communication from W. T. Webb, the tone and temper of which admonish calm, thoughtful readers to hesitate before receiving its assumed facts as facts.

Being intimately connected with this whole college matter from the meeting of the convention at Summerfield in July, 1855; being one of the sub-committee there that framed the compromise, and being somewhat prominent in the debate at the Eutaw Conference, I feel it incumbent on me, and due to the truth of history, to make the following statement:

1. The compromise at Summerfield originated in the statement on the part of Greensboro' that their subscription was made with the understanding that there was to be but one college, and that the location of two by the convention would, it was feared, greatly damage, if not entirely invalidate, that subscription. Whereupon, Auburn, with rare magnanimity, agreed to give them the advantage of the location by the convention upon condition that the convention should recommend the Conference to adopt the Auburn college upon an equal footing with that at Greensboro'. The terms were agreed to; and pledges were there and then publicly given to advocate that compromise before the Conference; which pledges were not only not redeemed, but on the contrary, some who made them did most strenuously oppose the ratification of the compromise by the Conference. "This," also, is a part of this "college history of too much importance to be forgotten."

2. The Conference never repudiated the action of that convention. The compromise commanded a majority of the Conference upon every test vote, but was, on motion of the friends of Greensboro', laid on the table in order to refer the whole subject to another committee, in the hope of an amicable adjustment. That committee failed to agree; and a resolution was then offered, by a friend of Greensboro', "that the Conference now proceed to locate one college, and but one." That resolution was debated, put to vote, and lost. The chair just here decided the college question at an end; and it will be recollected by the Conference that, when I rose again, the chair informed me that if I rose to speak on the college question, I was out of order.

Finding it impossible to harmonize the claims of the two places, I rose and stated that, sooner than adjourn without a college, I would move to re-consider the last vote, and let the college go to Greensboro'—which was done.

It appears, then: 1st. That Greensboro' secured the location originally through the magnanimity of Auburn, and again at the Conference by the direct action of some of the warmest advocates of Auburn.

2d. That the Conference never did repudiate the compromise, nor refuse to locate a college at Auburn.

3d. That the Conference did not so stultify itself as to give a pledge never to have but one college. There is some common sense to that body.

In view of these facts, I am somewhat at a loss to account for the animus of Dr. W.'s letter.

I am sure I speak the mind of the Trustees of the East Alabama Male College when I say that, on their part, there is no jealousy of, nor hostility to, the Southern University. We intend, by God's blessing, to live and prosper, and to have soul enough to rejoice in the prosperity of all our fellow-laborers.

Auburn, Ala., Nov. 8, 1859. —O. R. Blue.

Mr. Editor: Judge of my surprise in finding in the Advocate of November 2d, that I was arraigned before its "thirty thousand readers" for having written a private letter to "an old friend of fifteen years standing" by way of remonstrance, or protest, against real or imaginary wrongs, which, I supposed, had been committed against the Southern University. This letter is published in full, with an editorial introductory, and a closing commentary, pronouncing it unfounded, unjust, mistaken, etc., etc. This letter was not written for publication, but as it has been placed before the readers of the Advocate, and I have thus been made the subject of criticism, I hope I may be permitted to give briefly its history.

Before the opening of the Southern University, I received a private letter from my old friend C. C. Gillespie, requesting, for publication, an account of the opening ceremonies of the University. Subsequently (in the Advocate) he refers to this letter, lamenting that the University "had no friend who seemed to appreciate the value of such a thing." I deemed it due "an old friend of fifteen years standing" to tell him that he was mistaken in his conclusion, and to inform him, frankly, the opinions entertained here of his editorial course toward our Institution.

It were but doing half the work of "an old friend" to state our conclusions and not give the facts upon which they were based. Permit me to assure him that I speak advisedly in saying he is in error in "regarding his good friend Dr. Webb as representing himself alone."

I have never questioned the friendship of brother Gillespie, as a Methodist preacher, for "every interest of the Church." Yet, it is natural that all should have their preferences and predilections, and these might bias the mind even of a Methodist preacher. It was not of him in his individual or ministerial character that I complained, but as editor of our Conference Journal. I was under the impression that his preferences were not for the Southern University, and frankly avowed it. Am I mistaken? and is my letter unfounded and unjust?

Is the brief history given of the inception, location and final action of the Conference in relation to the two institutions under consideration unfounded?

Was it unjust to remind him of these facts, and ask him in good faith to observe them? Is the assertion unfounded that he has by his editorials and admitted communication permitted the impression to be made that both were Conference institutions?

Is it unjust to say he permitted this, knowing that the East Alabama Male College had no legal connection with the Conference? Is it unjust to expect the Advocate to sustain the interests of the Southern University above every other institution, as the Conference is pledged to one college, and one only? These are the facts submitted for his consideration, and not the issues presented in the introductory of his editorial.

I have never designed, or do I desire to engage in a newspaper discussion of the questions here presented. I, therefore, pass them without comment. I also willingly admit that he "has nothing to do with this college controversy," as the day of controversy has passed. The Alabama Conference declared at Eutaw, by its adoption of the one, and the rejection of the other, that "it had no interest in Auburn," and as the editor of the Advocate has declared that "the paper will conform its course to such action," we do hope the history of the session of the Conference at Eutaw will be kept in remembrance. We know the Conference is competent to "define the relations of its educational institutions," and it is because it has done this that we insist that the Advocate shall not do, or permit others through its columns to do, anything calculated to make the impression, that any other college is under the control of the Alabama Conference, than the Southern University, until the Conference rescinds its action at Eutaw, and this it has no power to do, because that action was the work of a party to a contract. He has done me injustice by his emphatic denial of one of my specifications. I did not say that he had refused to publish the decision of the Supreme Court touching the liquor clause or restriction, but that he had declined to publish a certain communication informing the friends of Methodism that our charter had been sustained, etc., etc. This communication was from brother Henderson, and has it been published?

In conclusion he remarks, "more mistaken, unfounded, unjust, injudicious letter he had never been called on to publish." Who called on him to publish it?

If I am mistaken I shall be most happy to know it. Is it unfounded? The decision of this question I cheerfully submit to the disinterested readers of the Advocate. If unjust, I sincerely regret it, and unhesitatingly tender the most ample apology. Is it injudicious?—There we cannot doubt but that "an old friend of fifteen years standing" will have the magnanimity to assume all the responsibility incurred by publishing a private letter addressed to the Rev. C. C. Gillespie, and not to the editor of the New Orleans Christian Advocate. He tells me that "an injudicious friend is a practical enemy." I am fully prepared to appreciate its force and admit its truth. Permit me to ask, what shall we say of an injudicious editor?

Yours, etc., Wm. T. Webb.

CHINA, ENGLAND, AND OUR MISSIONS.

The truth about the dispute at the Peiho, between the Chinese, and the English and French, and about our Minister's (Mr. Ward) reception at Pekin, heretofore colored by English prejudice, coming through English channels, is beginning to appear at last. It is only necessary to read both the British and the Chinese versions of the affair to get a tolerably true view.

The English statement is that Mr. Bruce, the British Commissioner, was proceeding, by agreement with the Imperial Court, to the mouth of the Peiho, to be received there as the representative of his sovereign, and he conducted to Pekin to ratify the treaty of Tien-tsin. Having reached the place appointed, the passage was found to be stopped up, and armed resistence offered to the expedition. The British Admiral attempted to carry his force through, and was assailed, and the catastrophe followed of the total defeat of the English, with a great destruction of men and vessels. This looks like treachry on the part of the Chinese, and seems to demand chastisement.

But the Chinese statement is equally hard on the British, and is supported by British testimony. Captain Langley, son of the Bishop of Durham, who was in the expedition, on his return to England, in a reply to a congratulatory address from his friends, confirms the statement of the Chinese that the mouth of the Peiho, at which the English presented themselves, was not the place to which the Chinese invitation referred. There was another month of the river to which access was open; this one was closed by command of the Emperor. The Chinese met the English Minister with the announcement that he could not pass that way. There was another way open by which they were at liberty and expected to go. The British Commissioner decided that he would go by the way he had selected; not being allowed, he undertook to force a passage, and was beaten off disastrously.

It is Capt. Laugley's testimony also, that the Chinamen did not commence the fight. The British determined to force their way and commenced taking their position for hostilities early in the morning, but were not molested all day. It was not till they had commenced tearing down the Chinese defences and had blown up one of their barriers, that the Chinese fired a shot. Therefore, said Capt. Langley, the Chinese were neither treacherous nor aggressive.

Not only has the cause of the fight been misrepresented, but also the reception of our Minister, Mr. Ward. Reports, through English channels, represented him as having been ridiculously received, and treated with indignity. The contrary turns out to be the truth. He was received with distinguished consideration. It was also reported that our common language, manners, and the like, confounded Americans with English in the Chinese mind. But it seems that the Chinese are not so ignorant; they know perfectly the difference between the two nations, and their policies, and act accordingly.

The letter of Mr. Cunnyngham, our missionary superintendent in Shanghai, which recently appeared in the Nashville Christian Advocate, is in harmony with the above views, and pleases us much. Owing to American relations with the Chinese, our missions there are in no danger whatever, even in the event of a continued war between the British and Chinese, which we do not much apprehend.

WOMEN PHYSICIANS FOR WOMEN.

Harper's Weekly has some sensible views on this subject. Miss Elizabeth Blackwell, a practicing physician, has just returned from a tour through Great Britain and France, where she has been warmly received by Miss Florence Nightingale and other great and good women living in Europe. Miss Blackwell's observations abroad have confirmed her in her purpose of continuing the fight she has so nobly waged against stupid prejudice and ignorance; she proposes not only to continue the practice of her profession, but so to labor as, if possible, to draw into the ranks other ladies of good education and social standing, until female physicians become a recognized and an honored class in this country. Every person of right feeling and sound judgment will wish her well.

Whatever objections may be urged against the theories known by the name of "Women's rights doctrines," there can be none against the study of medicine by women. Every woman to be a wife or a mother, requires some knowledge of medicine. Until she possesses it, her existence is miserable, and the life of her children is in jeopardy. No mother can keep a doctor always at her elbow, to tell her when, how, and in what proportions to administer medicine, promote perspiration, secure ventilation, regulate diet, direct exercise, or superintend the general hygiene of her family. These matters are usually learned by our women by experience—often at the cost of the lives of one or more of their children. The day can not be distant when young women will all be taught the elementary principles of domestic medicine at finishing schools; the first great school which introduces this novelty in the place of some of the rubbish now taught to girls at fashionable academies will achieve a very remarkable success.

The moment we begin to introduce common sense into our system of female education, female physicians will follow as a necessary consequence. If women of thirty, mothers of three or four children, require some knowledge of medicine to do their duty knowingly in their homes, their is no excuse for not teaching such women such knowledge when it can be learned without risk of human life; and once admit that girls ought to learn something of the medical science, who shall set a limit to their studies, and where? They acquire medical knowledge as rapidly as men, and, uniting their aptitude for nursing with medical knowledge, they will make the best physicians for females—the only class they ought to attend, except it be children or near relatives and friends. As to delicacy, they are now associated with doctors in nearly all sickness. The indelicacy is on the other side—men attending women where none but women ought to be.

Every man and woman of extended experience and ordinary intelligence must have noticed the extraordinary aptitude which sensible women display for the medical science. Very few doctors are as safe guides in the illnesses of infants as experienced mothers and nurses. In diseases of women the advantages possessed by a female doctor over a bearded professor are at once obvious. While male patients will probably continue to be treated by male doctors to the end of time, and surgical processes will probably likewise remain the monopoly of the masculine hand, if there were medical colleges for girls, twenty years hence women would never think of consulting a man for their own little infirmities or the diseases of their babies.

LETTER FROM BR. SUMMERS.

Mr. Editor:—I have received a letter from Bishop Kavanaugh, in which he states that his recovery to health is so gradual and slow that he has been forced to relinquish the purpose of attending the Ouachita and Mississippi Conferences. He hopes Bishop Andrew will be able to attend the former; but this he cannot do, as he fears that his state of health will hardly warrant the expectation of attending his own Conferences, viz: the Memphis, Nov. 16, and Louisiana, Dec. 14. He was very much worn down by the labor of the Western Virginia, Kentucky, and Louisville Conferences. It is hoped, however, that he will have strength enough to hold the sessions at Memphis and Franklin. Bishop Kavanaugh hopes that Bishop Soule will be able to attend the Mississippi Conference; and this may be the case.

I preached yesterday at the church (called City Road Chapel) near Bishop Soule's residence. The occasion was the ordination of Rev. Messrs. Hunter and Knight to elder's orders. The Bishop performed the service without much difficulty, and did not seem to be greatly exhausted when he reached his home. I received one more letter than at the close of the Tennessee Conference. He says if he continues as well as at present, he shall make the attempt to visit the Mississippi brethren at Jackson. They will rejoice to see the brave veteran with them once more.

Bishop Kavanaugh purposes to leave home about the middle of this month, designing to reach Eufaula, the seat of the Alabama Conference, by easy stages, resting a while at Columbus, where his previous visit was so fruitful of results. He hopes to be able to attend the Georgia Conference at Rome, Dec. 14, and the Florida Conference at Tallahassee, Dec. 28.

So far as I know there is nothing of special interest going on in these parts, either in Church or State. The Tennessee Legislature is progressing quietly with important business; the daily sessions in both houses being opened with prayer by the city clergy in rotation. Governor Harris who was re-elected to the gubernatorial chair during the summer was inaugurated last week.

The Railroad connecting Louisville with Nashville is completed, and the cars are now running through. They cross the Cumberland on a noble draw-bridge, just below the office where I am now writing.

The ministers sent to the various churches in Nashville and suburbs appear to be well received, and have entered spiritedly on their work. I understand Dr. Palmer has large congregations at McKendree, and I believe nearly all the congregations are increasing. Much greater attention is bestowed on the Sunday School cause. A Methodist Sunday School Association has been organized, composed of all the Methodist Sunday Schools in the city and its surroundings. It meets once a week to hear addresses, concert measures for the establishment of new schools, etc. One of the objects of the Association is to raise the standard of Sunday School instruction, so that greater and more spiritual results may be realized from this noble institution—the catechetical institute of the church.

Things are moving on pleasantly at the Publishing House. We have just stereotyped Smith's Elements of Divinity, a portly octavo of 592 pages, which the Bishops have placed in the course of study. It will be considered a very valuable work; well fitted for the purpose to which it is specially appropriated. We have also issued the second volume of the Scripture Catechism, which is designed to take the place of all other elementary manuals of this class which have been in use in our Connection. The long expected Tune Hymn Book is also out. I hope it will give satisfaction to all the lovers of sacred song in our wide-spread Connection. It was compiled by Mr. L. C. Everett, a gentleman of Virginia, well known in the musical world. A new work by the Rev. Josephus Anderson, of the Florida Conference, is in press, and will soon be on sale. It is entitled "Our Church," and is designed for circulation among probationers and others who need information in respect to our doctrines and discipline. I think it will prove a very serviceable manual.

I will be obliged to you if you will request the Bishops and Secretaries of Conferences to forward me without delay the minutes of this year's sessions, as I have to put them to press immediately. As yet I have received the minutes of none. Full and accurate returns are earnestly desired. Blank forms, together with the Circular ordered by the General Conference, have been sent to every Conference this year, as well as last. We are making efforts to secure correct statistics.

PACIFIC CONFERENCE.

The M. E. Church South, in this city, has been ministered to during the past year, by Rev. O. P. Fitzgerald, Editor of the Pacific Methodist. Its membership numbers 40; among them are some whole-souled, liberal minded members, and especially some choice spirited young men.

The Pacific Annual Conference has just closed a pleasant session in this city.—Bishop Pierce presided, and he has won all hearts. I never knew a man, in so short a time, to win more love. His visit here will not be forgotten. I am glad that after preaching and traveling extensively through this State, he is very favorably impressed with the prospect of our Church on this coast.

Besides three transfers, sixteen preachers were received into the traveling connection on trial. Some of them have experience, and some of the young men have talent and education sufficient to enable them to make their mark on the times. The Bishop has ordained seven Deacons and eight elders since his arrival on this coast.

Here are some items of results for the past year: Missionary collection $1050; S. S. collections, 1870 95; estimated value of church property, $71,650. The whole membership of the church, including 41 local preachers, and the probationers, 2,886. Sixty-two traveling preachers received appointments. The net increase of membership the past year is 167. The Methodist is free from debt and has a circulation of upwards of two thousand. We now have an Oregon District: Father Fisher is P. E. Our church is gradually gaining ground here. What we need is more men of experience. The Lord has used a handful of ministers, most of them young and inexperienced, and amid obstacles, insurmountable but for the help of him who said, "lo, I am with you alway," the church is planted deeply, and the people are flocking beneath its branches. The Bishop, Pierce, has transfered more men, and has written still for more. We want them. Can't the "Old North" help us? Some of us breathed the pure air of her Blue Hills, in the sweet, far-away days of childhood. One that she gave us fell asleep in Jesus, and is resting in the valley of Los Angeles until the trump of God shall wake him up. Who will come and take his place?

I neglected to mention that steps were taken to build up a denominational school, to be styled the Pacific Methodist College. An agent was appointed for it, and an effort will be made to raise an endowment fund.—Cor. North Carolina Christian Advocate.

EDITORIAL LIFE.

The Nashville Christian Advocate says: "We have long been casting about to find the bright side of editorial life. The press is a modern invention, and those who superintend it inherit none of the promises, except constructively. 'You made several friends by that article in the Advocate,' said one. 'Yes, and lost several,' was the reply. Such is editorial life, that if, on striking the balance, we can keep even, it is counted pretty fair business in the way of making friends. Happily, however, that this is not the main thing.

"Many readers will go along with you, in the best humor and approbation, until some one position is taken, or some one word is written (against their cherished opinions.) Then they forget all the righteousness the editor hath done. It is a trial of nerve to make a cool calculation to lose a friend, and too, pro bono publico.

"Others there are (God bless them!) who take a paper as a man does his wife, for better or for worse. Dealing with such, there is hope. They give you time to defend a position, or wait for you to make it good. They allow for a full evolution of truth."

WHERE ARE SUCH METHODISTS?

Mr. Editor.—Announcements like the following frequently make their appearance in the public prints, but I do not remember to have seen one in twelve months in connection with the death of a Methodist! What does this mean? Are the members of our Church, who intend to bequeath property to the cause of Christ, not going to die? I do not ask this because I wish them to go, by any means, but in wonder over their longevity!

Is there any thing in the determination to give a good portion of our money to Christ, that prolongs a man's life? It would almost seem so. I wish a large number of our rich men would try its effects. But beware! do'nt determine upon this course and leave it incomplete. Do not make your will, inserting legacies to benevolent objects, and leave them unsigned. I have known several persons die suddenly after doing such things, and there the whole matter failed. Finish it up at once. If some of the rich ones in this region could have foreseen how few thanks they would receive for the money they left to relations, they would have made a different disposition of it. Some of the living have sons, who are wondering why they can't die like other folks and leave their property to them! Still they toil on for such thankless, graceless descendents, and neglect the cause of humanity and God. Alas! alas! when will men come to their senses? Not till they enter eternity I fear. H.

Bequests.

Lyman Pease, for a long time a merchant at South Deerfield, Mass., and lately deceased, has left most of his property to benevolent objects, except $5,000 worth of personal estates which goes to his widow, and a few other bequests to some of his friends. The recipients were the American Board of Foreign Missions, the American Tract Society, the Massachusetts Hope Missionary, and the Massachusetts Education Societies. His estate was estimated at about $50,000 besides real estate.

Ira Arms, of Shelburne Falls, whose will has just been proved, possessed property to the amount of $50,000, and leaving no widow nor children, public charities have received liberal bequests. The American Board of Foreign Missions have received $1,000, the House Missionary Society $4,000, the American Bible Society $1,000, and the American and Foreign Christian union, and the American Doctrinal Tract Society $500 each. Besides leaving several legacies of $500 to individuals, he had bequeathed the sum of $5,000 to the Shelburne Falls Library, to which institution he had given $200 a year for many years previous to his death; the Village Cemetery Corporation $1,000, and the Shelburne Falls Congregation Society $5,000, and each of the Congregational Churches in Shelburne are to receive $500 to provide a library for their respective pastors. Mr. Arms also made provisions for a permanent fund of $20,000, the income of which to be devoted to the support of a first-class academy to be erected at Shelburne Falls by the town of Buckland and Shelburne.

THE LATE JOHN ANGELL JAMES.

The power of a truly earnest Christian ministry is not more aptly illustrated than in the life of this devoted servant of Christ. At twenty years of age he commenced a pastorate which lasted upwards of fifty years, at Carr's Lane, Birmingham, England—with a congregation of two hundred, and a declining church of forty members. Of late years, his membership has been at least one thousand, and his congregation two thousand. But he labored seven years before his church began to grow. A new church had to be built, costing considerably over $100,000, and the church has been noted for missionary and educational liberality, besides building several other churches and chapels. Under Mr. James it became a model church, as he was a model minister. He was one of those rare men whose ecclesiastical relations made no difference with those who knew him, of whatever churches they might be. He belonged to the "Holy Catholic Church," and all its ministers and members were his brethren. He promoted Christian Union in the only way it can be promoted—not by invalidating ecclesiastical individuality, but by a loving heart and a loving example. He established a retiring fund for aged pastors, and a scholarship in Spring Hill College. He was a nobly spiritual and eloquent preacher, and a most evangelical and useful writer. He is known throughout protestant christendom by his practical and experimental works. He sought fame in neither, but the salvation of souls in both. He preached an effective sermon the Sunday before he died, and had prepared the sermon for the next Sunday. His end was peace. His life and character were beautiful—they will be a joy forever. Earnest piety developes the highest manhood, and makes christians of all denominations alike.

REFORM AMONG WESLEYANS.

Our British brethren have had no "stations," as the Methodists of this country have. It is all "circuit" work, whether in London or the far interior. Yet American Methodists regard themselves as maintaining the itinerancy as really as do British Methodists. The law of change, after a pastoral charge of two years, is regarded in this country as the law of the itinerancy, whether a man travel a country circuit with many appointments," or preaching places, or fill a "station"—that is, one church, in a town or city. During the past year, however, Rev. W. M. Punshon, who was one of four ministers on the sixth London circuit, preached, by arrangement, once every Sunday at Bayswater, a popular and wealthy chapel near his residence, instead of only once in four weeks, as the old circuit plan required. Great debate was the consequence, when the Conference assembled. The Presbyterian Press of this country regard this as an innovation upon the itinerancy, and speak of it as a sort of radical movement among the Wesleyans; whereas it is only a modification of the British custom, without infringing upon the itinerancy at all. American Methodists have followed this plan from the beginning. Wherever a church has been able to support a minister, and there have been men enough, a "station" has generally been the result. Yet stationed ministers are subject to the law of change as well as others. The truth is, there is nothing essential to the itinerancy, but the unrestricted power of the Bishops to change pastors. This is what separates it from all other forms of the pastorate, and this only, so far as an essential principle is concerned. If there was no law compelling the Bishops to change a pastorate at the end of two years, yet, while he retains the power to change him at the end of three months, if necessary, the itinerancy, in its principle, would still remain intact.

A New Arctic Expedition.

A new Arctic expedition will probably be shortly organized and dispatched to the mouth of Back River and Montreal Island. It will be borne in mind that no evidence has been obtained of the death of the 105 men who departed from King William's Land, under Captain Crozier, to make their way to the Continent. It is now intimated that some of these men may be alive among the Esquimaux at or near Montreal Island.

Recent experience proves that an Arctic expedition need not involve any actual expenditure of life. To undertake an Arctic voyage, even among the "congeries" of Islands lying north of the American continent, it is necessary to have a small screw steamer, well-built and adapted for Arctic voyages, amply provided with every appliance and supply requisite for life in the Arctic regions, and manned by thirty to forty men—not more. Such a craft, it is believed, could, in two seasons, effect such an exploration of Montreal Island and the outlet of Back River as would forever set at rest the possibility of there being any survivors of the Franklin Expedition.

Mr. Choate's Library.—The sale of the late Rufus Choate's miscellaneous library closed on last Friday. The Gazette says the sale will realize to the family about $15,000.

BISHOP SOULE.

Rev. Dr. Summers, in a letter to the Southern Christian Advocate, speaking of the Tennessee Conference, says: Bishop Soule was present, but alas! too feeble to take any part in the proceedings of the Conference, or even the ordinations. At the close of the session he took an affecting leave of the brethren, intimating to them that this was quite likely the last session he should be able to attend. There was great emotion in the conference room while the apostolic man was giving them his last words of council and blessing. One cannot gaze upon the noble veteran, called off from the battle-ground, where he fain would be, mingling in the thickest of the fight, on the high places of the field, without a feeling of solemnity tinged with melancholy. But we are relieved by the reflection that more than half a century of almost unparalleled heroical service is closing with honor and peace and triumph. Memory and hope are both strong in the case of Bishop Soule, so that he can sing in the language of Watts and in the spirit too,

"Life has a soft and silvery thread,
Nor is it drawn too long;
Yet when my earlier hopes persuade,
I'm willing to be gone.
Fast as ye please roll down the hill,
And haste away my years;
Or I can wait my father's will,
And dwell beneath the spheres.
Rise glorious, every future sun,
Gild all my following days,
But make the last dear mourner known
By well distinguished rays."

A million of Methodists to whom his ministry has been so long a blessing and to whom his memory will be a pleasing savor, will say Amen to that prayer.

DR. PIERCE ON CHURCH GOVERNMENT.

"That the flight of a hundred years has produced many and great changes in the wants of our Church. The Church has been forced into a great informal financial corporation, and the necessity to employ the press has forced upon the Church an order of religious secularism which, together with her benevolent finances, seems to call for business men and minds—such men and minds as could hardly be looked for among men of ministerial habits. These changes and advances, in the progress of things, may by possibility demand a change in representation; and if they should, I shall be ready for them, provided I am still on hand; but could only be ready under such regulations as would leave what is wholly ministerial to ministerial determination. This could be done with perfect ease and safety. As far back as forty-five years ago I remember a conversation which Bishop Asbury had with me in reference to the future of Methodism, in which he said it was even probable that, from the nature of our free institutions, it might come to pass some day that a direct representation from the laity in our legislative councils might become needful, and if so, it would be best, in view of the peculiar nature and obligations

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

NOVEMBER 16, 1859.

EDITORIAL NOTICES.

ADVERTISING IN THE ADVOCATE.

The business public are slowly learning that the Advocate is THE GREAT ADVERTISING PAPER OF THE SOUTH AND WEST. Advertisements in it are more valuable than in any half dozen other papers.

1.—It has the largest circulation west of Charleston, and South of Cincinnati; larger, than any other two weeklies in New Orleans, and is increasing rapidly—will, in a few years, double its present circulation;

2.—Of medium size, and not crowded with advertisements, an advertisement is not lost in it, but can be easily found.

3.—In our "Editorial Notices," which we give to every adver. tisement, we specify the page and column on which an advertisement may be found. We seek to make every advertisement valuable to the advertiser and to the paper.

4.—The circulation is spread out over Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, principally; Georgia, Florida, Tennessee, Kentucky, Arkansas, partially.

5.—It is the only weekly of large and widely-spread circulation in the great and growing metropolis of the South.

PROFESSION.—We see by notice in Dr. Mortimore's Family Medical Journal, that he expected to arrive and open an office in our city by 1st of November, for the treatment of Rheumatism, Sciatica, Neuralgia, Dyspepsia, and Chronic complaints. But we are now advised that he has been professionally delayed, and will not arrive before about the 20th to the 25th of this month; and, by request, give this notice to advise the out numbers writing and desiring to visit him here, so that after that date they will not be disappointed. Dr. M.'s success in curing such complaints is now extensively known throughout the Union, and those who are thus afflicted, throughout the South, will have opportunity to avail themselves of his professional skill any time during the entire winter and spring, in this city.

J. WRIGHT & Co.—This is, we believe, the largest and most enterprizing drug business in this city. Our highest evidence of their capacity and success as business men is, the extent to which they advertise. It will be noticed that they advertise largely in the Advocate. Their appropriateness in dealing with us, we take as a sample of their reasonable in business generally. "Wright's." has really become an "institution" in New Orleans. He is, in the drug business, what the great publishers are in the book business—everything is regular, or new, in his line, may be found at his house.

THE HELION LIGHT.—Some time during last summer Mr. Noyes, 97 Camp-street, the proprietor of the Helion Light, sent us one of his lamps, with the request that we would use, and express an opinion of its merits. We have used it from time until now, and like it very much. The light is soft and yet full, and one lamp will light a medium-sized parlor.

GREENSBORO' HIGH SCHOOL.—The Southern University is fortunate in having, in the same town, a High School, in harmony with it, to fill young men for college, and the Greensboro High School is fortunate in occupying such position and relation. Dr. Mears, the Principal, we know well, and can cordially recommend him.

SHARON FEMALE COLLEGE.—We are glad to learn that this institution is highly prosperous. A private letter informs us that its prospects are better than they have been for the past. President Hard is just as good a governor of a female institution as if he had a n in his name.

FORT GIBSON COLLEGIATE ACADEMY.—This Institution is under the control of the Mississippi Conference, Rev. H. Bass Principal. The advertisement is on fourth page, fourth column, of this paper. We learn that it is in a flourishing condition.

COAL OIL.—Artemoo Hill, whose coal oil makes the best light yet, he says, has removed from 28 Camp st. to Charters st., near Canal. He keeps both the oil and the lamps.

HATS.—If you need hats for yourselves or your boys, call or go to BOOTH & Co., No. 45 Magazine-street.

SHOES.—If you need shoes, send to R. W. RAYNE, 41 Magazine street. He has hats too.

TEACHER'S CARD.—See the notice of Mrs. Elmore in another column on this page, fifth column.

YOUNG LADY TEACHER.—See the notice of H. B. A. Waresboro, Ga., on this page, fifth column.

TOMB-STONES OF DECEASED MINISTERS.—See the notice of the Committee on this page, fourth column.

NEWS FROM OUR HOME WORK.

"To spread Scriptural Holiness over these Lands."

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

Greenville Station.—A CORRESPONDENT writes: This work for the past two years, has been under the pastoral charge of Rev. W. Harrington, whose labors have been highly appreciated by all classes of the community, and owned and blessed of the Great Shephard. This Church (by the way one of the neatest and best in the bounds of the Conference) has been uniformably attended by large and respectable congregations; plainly indicative of the greatly increased interest which the people of the community take in the Gospel, with its sacred institutions and privileges. But a few years ago, the congregations were usually very small, especially during the summer months, when so few attended that the preachers suspended preaching in town, for the more useful employment of their time on the plantations of the surrounding country; and the village itself, on the Sabbath, was only a scene of traffic, drinking and profanity. Now it is charming to see the change: Greenville is about as quiet and orderly a place as is to be seen in the State; the doors of business houses being, apparently, always closed on sunday, and respectable congregations assembling on that day throughout the year.

Several interesting protracted meetings have been held here during the past two years, at which several have professed conversion, and the members of the Church were much revived and invigorated in their spiritual experience. Though the number in the membership is not much, if at all increased, yet there has been an accession of between twenty and thirty; the deficiency having been caused by removals and deaths.

But here, Mr. Editor, are a few facts, which, I think, justly challenge our confidence in the increased benevolence and liberality, if not the faith and piety of the people of this charge. There have been collected this year, in this neighborhood, for the following purposes, the annexed sums, viz.

For the Parsonage	$1525 00
" Book and Tract cause	540 00
" Centenary College (in note)	600 00
" Missionary purposes	350 00
" Conference collection	264 00
" Preacher in charge	1000 00
" Presiding Elder	200 00
Amounting to	$4479 50

All this, besides other private benevolent enterprises.

The Agent for the "Church Evangelist" has been here, sowing his seeds for the maintenance of the Great Paper, which are sprouting for the forthcoming harvest. Success, we say, to every good enterprises.

Cayuga Mission.—REV. M. FORD writes: I have filled six appointments once a month. There are about one hundred members—about sixty in full connection. I have received upwards of forty on trial, up to this time. I have one round more to make, which will close the present year's labors. I have no doubt that much good might be done on this Mission, if there were not so many appointments for the Missionary to serve, and if there was a deeper interest manifested on the part of owners of servants. At some of these appointments, we have had God's power manifested in the awakening and conversion of souls. We sincerely hope that the time is not distant when all the colored population of our country shall be supplied with the blessed Gospel.

East Feliciana Circuit.—REV. E. A. FLOWERS writes: We have closed a protracted meeting at Pine Grove, which resulted in two converts, and twelve accessions. The Church was also greatly revived.

I am now holding a series of protracted meetings around the circuit in conjunction with my colleague, Rev. Geo. T. Vickers, and as our late camp meeting has prepared the people for the Lord, we expect some good times.

The Conference year is nearly closed, and I am about to leave this dear people. There have been forty or fifty conversions on the work the present year, and largely over a hundred accessions. I trust the Lord will still be with us, and bless us abundantly.

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Athens Circuit.—Rev W VARNADOE writes: Just closed our fourth Quarterly meeting (a camp-meeting) this morning. Had a severe contest with the enemy of souls; it was peculiarly a working meeting; christians had scarcely time to rejoice over the young converts, till they were mourning for sinners. Victory turned on Israel's side. The altar was crowded with seekers (fifty at a time); they were down in different parts of the congregation in open daytime pleading for mercy. Ninety-one whites gave their hand in token they had found peace, besides many converted in the woods, and others had left the ground. Fifty-one joined the Church on probation.

About fifty conversions among the colored, left to join at their respective Churches.

Rembert Hills Circuit.—Rev. J. W. Shores writes: At five of the six appointments on this circuit, we have had religious meetings ranging from four to sixteen days, and they were all "seasons of refreshing from the presence of the Lord." Some eighty white persons, besides a number among the colored people, have been converted. Eighty-nine whites, and fifty-seven colored have joined the Church. Rev. J. Barker, Presiding Elder, T. D. McCuskey, my colleague, L. M. Wilson, J. M. Boland, A. J. Crawford, J. Bevery, W. H Cutter, J. H. Stanford, and J. E. Treadwell of our Church, J. W. McCuskey of the Methodist Protestant Church, and Messrs. Frierson and Bowling of the Presbyterian Church, have all rendered effectual service in our meetings.

In matters of Finance we are likely to do well. Our Conference collection will be over one hundred dollars, (assessment one hundred;) and the missionary collection, between four and five hundred dollars, (assessment, two hundred and fifty.)

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

Trial of the Harper's Ferry Ruffians.

CHARLESTOWN, VA., November 2.—The trial of Stephens, one of old Brown's associates, was commenced to-day.

The court was proceeding to impanel a jury, when a telegraph dispatch was received from Gov. Wise, suggesting to the presenting officer the propriety of allowing the Federal authorities to proceed against Stephens, in order to bring prominent Northern men and some of the abolition fanatics, who were cognizant of Brown's movements, as witnesses before the United States Court, if the authorities of Virginia having no authority to summon witnesses from other States.

Accepting to this suggestion, Mr. Hunter, the prosecuting officer, handed Stephens over to the United States Marshal for trial.

Arrest of Another Harper's Ferry Outlaw.

MEMPHIS, NOV. 8.—W. H. Palmer, who is charged with having been an accessory to the late Harper's Ferry riot, was arrested here to-day. He is confined in the city jail awaiting a requisition from Gov. Wise.

The Trial of the Insurgents.

CHARLESTOWN, VA., November 11.—The trial of the insurgent Cook was concluded to-day. The jury brought in a verdict of guilty against him. He is sentenced to be hung with Green, Coppoe and Copeland on the 16th of December next. It is thought that Gov. Wise will respite Brown until that day. The court adjourned.

New York Election.

NEW YORK, November 11.—The latest returns of the election in this State indicate that the Republican State ticket is elected by about 3000 majority.

Wisconsin State Election.

MILWAUKIE, WIS., November 11.—The returns of the State election are yet incomplete, although it is probable the entire Republican ticket is elected.

New Jersey Election.

TRENTON, N. J., November 11.—Olden's majority for Governor is 2000.

In the Senate the Democrats have four majority. In the House of Assembly the Opposition have two majority, leaving a Democratic majority of two on joint ballot.

The Election in Kansas.

LEAVENWORTH CITY, November 11.—The Republicans have gained a majority in both branches of the State Legislature.

The Great Balloon Burst.

NEW YORK, Nov. 11.—Professor Lowe's great balloon, the City of New York, was badly damaged this morning, a large rent having been made in it by the wind, and a large quantity of gas escaped.

Professor Lowe has been engaged for some ten days in inflating the immense balloon at Observer Square, and had nearly completed the work when the accident occurred.

The escape of gas has caused a loss to Professor Lowe of $3,000.

Health of Senator Douglas.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 11.—Senator Douglas, who was taken suddenly ill a day or two since, is much better. His illness was thought to be a disease of the stomach, but proves to be bilious fever.

Latest from California.

JEFFERSON CITY, Mo., Nov. 14. The Overland California mail has arrived here, bringing dates from San Francisco to the 24th inst.

The clipper ship Mastic, from San Francisco to the Sandwich Islands, was burnt to the water's edge on the 15th of last September, losing only five days out. The passengers and crew and $157,000 in specie were taken out by the ship Achilles and taken to Honolulu.

By latest advices from Sandwich Islands we learn that the King of that country shot his private secretary in a fit of jealousy.

The business of San Francisco is unimproved. Crushed Sugars quoted at 11¢.

The coffee crop of Honolulu, Sandwich Islands, has proved an entire failure.

Heavy Gales on the Coast of Cuba.

NEW YORK, Nov. 14.—There was a very heavy gale at Havana and on the coast, on the 11th inst., which done considerable damage among the shipping.

The Havana sugar market has nominally advanced ¼ real.

There has been nothing heard from the North Star. She has been due here several days, and had not arrived at Aspinwall up to the 4th inst.

There was a heavy gale at Aspinwall on the 3d and 4th, though it did not do any damage to the shipping.

Shipwrecks and Marine Disasters.

NEW YORK, Nov. 14.—The ship Queen of the Pacific, from this port and bound for San Francisco, struck a reef about 180 miles north of Pernambuco, on the Pariile coast. The shock broke the vessel amidships. The officers and crew were saved. She was insured to her full value.

CHARLESTON, Nov. 14.—The steamship Isabel has arrived at this port from Havana. The Isabel reports the ships Charles Crocker, from New Orleans to Liverpool, and Millburg, from New Orleans to Harre, as being ashore on the Florida beach. The Millburg bilged at North cape, Florida. The Isabel also reports the ship Eliza Mallory and the brig North as having gone ashore and bilged on Jupiter Inlet. The bark Mary Storr, from Mobile to Havre, has also gone ashore on Jupiter Inlet. The Isabel reports the the steamship North Star, of the California line of steamers, as not having arrived at Panama up to 4th inst.

ARRIVAL OF THE BALTIMORE AND HUNGARIAN.

The Suez Canal.

The Paris Constitutionel speaks of the conduct of England in opposing the construction of the Suez canal, in threatening terms. It says France will not submit to the action of England in the matter.

The tone of the Paris Journals generally, is more than usually acrimonious toward England.

Montenegro.

The Montenegrins, who have been in constant insurrection since the late movements in the Adriatic, have been committing great atrocities against the Turks, and the Austrian authorities, who have heretofore governed them by the most arbitrary rule, have evacuated five of the cantons of Gurghatinon and Targo di Marali.

The conspiracy against the Sultan has numerous ramifications throughout Montinegro.

Spain and Morocco.

The report circulated that Spain has effected a settlement with Morocco is without foundation.

On the contrary, the Spanish troops destined for Morocco, have received marching orders. The troops received the orders with great enthusiasm.

Change in the French Cabinet.

The Minister of the Interior, the Duke of Padua, has resigned, and has been superceded by Mr. Bunaudi.

French Expedition to Morocco.

The French expeditionary force against Morrocco, in conjunction with Spain, has been augmented by the addition of two brigades, including two regiments of Zouaves.

The report by the City of Baltimore, which is contradicted by the Hungarian's advices, was to the effect that the French Minister of War had placed material of war at the disposal of Spain, and had agreed to render the same aid to Spain against Morocco as had been rendered to Piedmont against Austria.

Prussia and Japan.

The Government of Prussia is desirous to avail herself of the opening recently made by the Americans in China and Japan. It is now sending to the China seas an expedition, comprising three vessels, which carry a Counsellor of State with authority to conclude treaties with China, Japan and Siam.

General and Political News.

It was expected that offensive operations between Spain and Morocco would commence on or about the 8th of November.

Count Colloredo, the Austrian plenipotentiary at the Zurich Conference, is dead, and Count Carolithye has been appointed by the Emperor to represent Austria at the Conference in place of Colloredo.

The European Congress.

It is reported that a Congress of the European powers will soon assemble, and it is believed that an English Plenipotentiary will sit in the Congress.

England and France are reported to be better disposed to unite in a European Congress.

ARRIVAL OF THE ASIA.

Advance in Cotton Confirmed—Shipwrecks on the English Coast—The France-English Expedition to China—Activity in the French Navy—The Alliance of Russia and Prussia.

LIVERPOOL, Oct. 29.—The sales of cotton during the week ending on Friday, the 28th, amount to 88,000

Fair and Middling qualities of clear cotton have advanced ¼ to ⅛, owing partly to the fact that clear American cotton is getting scarce in the market. The lower grades of cotton, have, however, slightly advanced.

The stock of cotton at Liverpool was 473,400, bales of which 337,000 are of American production.

LONDON, Oct. 29.—The funds have somewhat improved in tone and price, owing in a measure to the favorable advices from Berlin, in regard to the interview between the sovereigns of Russia and Prussia.

Consols for money closed at 96¼.

The London money market is slightly more stringent, money being scarce, although there was no active demand.

General and Political News.

The number of lives saved from the wreck of the ill-fated Australian steamer Royal Charter is 39, making the whole number who perished by the disaster 455.

During the late storm which prevailed along the English coast, the American ship Rockingham, from Cardiff, ran aground in Penarth Roads.

The bark Marlborough, from Baltimore, was totally lost near Harlesmith. The second mate and pilot were drowned.

Lord Brougham has been elected chancellor of the University of Edinburgh.

The widow of Sir Robert Peel is dead.

The arrangements for the combined expedition of England and France have been completed, and the expedition will probably sail during the early part of February.

The French Government has ordered the immediate completion of one hundred gun-boats, of a capacity to carry twenty-five guns each.

Great activity prevails at all the naval stations of France.

The recent meeting of the Emperor of Russia and the Prince Regent of Prussia had created great anxiety at Paris, as it was the general impression that an agreement was entered at the meeting not to oppose the annexation of Central Italy to Piedmont.

THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY has passed from the hands of Messrs Phillips, Sampson & Co., to those of Messrs. Ticknor and Fields. The November number is a valuable one.

E. Feltre Foresti, Tom Paine's First Appearance in America, The Trial Trip of the Flying Cloud, and, the Professor at the Breakfast Table, we have read with great pleasure. They would do honor to any magazine in the world. The literary critcisms of the highest order of taste and ability, though we do not like its tone and spirit. In politics, the Atlantic is unfortunately secessionist—abolition.

MARRIAGES.

"It is not good for man to be alone."

On the 16th October, by the Rev. Wm. H. Owings, at the residence of Mr. M. Murrah, Mr. BENJAMIN A. HOBY to Miss REBECCA E. SPRAWEL, all of Pickens county, Alabama.

By the same on the 27th of October, Mr. JOSHUA FIELDING of Lowndes county, Mississippi, to Miss CORNELIA D. HAWTHORN, Pickens county, Alabama.

On the 30th October, at Fayette, Mississippi, by the Rev. W. C. Millsaps, Mr. WILEY H. BURKE, of Franklin county, Mississippi, to Miss MARY COSTLEY, of Jefferson county, Mississippi.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, November 14, 1859.

We condense the following statement, from the New Orleans Price Current of the 12th instant:—

A fair degree of activity has been observable in some departments of our market during the past week, but no general revival of trade can take place until a rise in the tributary streams shall open more extended intercourse with the interior. Cotton, it will be seen, continues to move off freely, and the receipts of Molasses have been taken readily at rather improved rates, while Sugar has found a heavy market at reduced prices. The transactions in the various articles of Western Produce are still confined mostly to the limited parcels required for home consumption.

COTTON.—With respect to prices, we have to remark that they have generally been quite full for the Middling and better grades, and the favorable news yesterday having given sellers a further advantage, we find it necessary to advance our quotations ⅛ to ¼ cent for grades above Low Middling. The lower qualities are still comparatively neglected.

The receipts at this port since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida, and Texas,) are 543,195 bales, against 443,275 bales to same date last year, and the increase in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 111,061 bales.

New Orleans Classification:

Inferior	—@—	Good Middling	11¼@11⅜
Ordinary	9 @9⅛	Middling Fair	12 @12¼
Good Ordinary	9¾@10	Fair	—@—
Low Middling	10⅛@10⅝	Good Fair	—@—
Middling	10⅞@11¼	Good and Fine	—@—

SUGAR.—The sales of the week amount to 2055 hhds. We quote for Inferior and Refining 4 to 5¼; Common to Good Common 5¾ to 6¼; Fair to Fully Fair 6¾ to 6¾; Prime to Choice 7 to 7¾; Centrifugal and Clarified 7¼ to 8¾ cents per pound. The above quotations apply to round lots, but small orders of 5 hhds and under, could not be filled without paying a further advance of ⅛ to ¼ per pound.

MOLASSES.—Total receipts of the week, 7565 barrels. The prices obtained during the week were: Inferior to Fair, 34 to 37 cents per gallon; and Prime to Choice, 38 to 39 cents; half barrels, 41 to 42 cents per gallon.

FLOUR.—About 6,000 barrels have been sold during the past week, at from $5 25 to $5 87½ for superfine, $6 to 6 50 for ordinary to good extra, and $7 00 to $8 00 per bbl. for small lots of choice extra brands.

GRAIN.—The receipts of Corn continue light. About 8,500 sacks have been sold at from $1 to $1 05 for ordinary, and $1 10 to $1 15 for old white. Oats have been in good request at 52c to 55c per bushel for good to prime St. Louis. Bran sells at $1 00 to $1 20 for ordinary to choice lots. Wheat sells at $1 45 per bushel for prime red.

PORK.—The principal sales reported through the week were at $15 50 to $16 00 per bbl. for Mess.

BEEF.—We quote Prime Mess at $14 00 per bbl. for extra brands.

BACON.—Shoulders 8½ to 8¾; Ribbed Sides 10½ to 10¾; Clear Sides 12½ to 12¾; Sugar-cured Hams 12 to 15 cents per pound.

LARD.—We quote 11¼ to 11¾c for prime to choice prime, in tcs. and 12 to 13c. for kegs.

BUTTER.—Western generally selling at 10 to 14 cents per pound, according to quality; and Cheese 11 to 12c.

BAGGING AND BALE ROPE.—We quote Kentucky Bagging at 12 to 14 cents per yard; India Bagging, 11½ to 12c; Bale Rope, hand spun, 6½ to 7¼, and machine made, 7¼ to 7¾ cents per pound.

GUNNY BAGS.—Limited parcels sell at 10 cents for light and 11 to 11¾c. to heavy and extra heavy bags.

COFFEE.—We quote fair at 11¼ to 12, and prime at 12¼c. per pound.

SPECIAL NOTICES.

NOTICE.—Persons having business with the NEW ORLEANS DEPOSITORY, will please direct to KEENER & PARKER.

MONUMENTS OF DECEASED MINISTERS.

The committee of the Louisiana Conference are now ready to furnish monuments, at the rate of from $110 to $150 each, delivered on board steamers at this place. Some $80 have been received on account of the monument of Richmond Nolly, from Rev. Thomas Owen; and some $30 on account of Rev. J. H. Waters. The following ministers are buried in the bounds of our Conference without tombstones to mark their resting places. The preachers in charge of works where these men of God labored and died, are invited to bring the matter before the people, and collect the amount necessary to raise a tombstone and to pay a decent respect to the memory of the noblest of human kind. J. C. KEESEE, Chairman.

ALABAMA CONFERENCE NOTICE.

Some time since Rev. W. M. Motley, Pastor at Eufaula, the seat of the Conference, published a notice to the effect that the steamers from Columbus, Ga., would take the preachers down for half price. Dr. Mitchell writes: "In addition to what Bro. Motley says, please say that the Rail Road company have proffered to carry the members of Conference at half price. They will pay as they go on, and Dr. Hamilton or myself will furnish them with free tickets on their return.

TEACHER WANTED.

A Lady competent to teach the English branches thoroughly, and PIANO MUSIC, is wanted in a private family. Address (giving references.)

MRS. E. J. SMITH,
41. Canton, Mississippi.

Just Published,

THE WESLEYAN HYMN AND TUNE BOOK:

COMPRISING THE

ENTIRE COLLECTION OF HYMNS

IN THE HYMN BOOK OF THE

Methodist Episcopal Church, South,

WITH

APPROPRIATE MUSIC TO EACH HYMN,

BY

L. C. EVERETT.

Published by J. B. McFerrin, Nashville, Tenn.

Price, in Embossed Leather, $1 50.
Discount to the Trade, 20 per cent.

THIS book is a handsome royal octavo of 368 pp., printed in excellent style on a very durable paper, and tastefully as well as substantially bound. The design had in view, in presenting it to the Church South, is the supply of a means of promoting congregational singing, by furnishing, in immediate connection with the hymns contained in our Hymn Book, tunes adapted to be sung to them. The number of tunes is 201, and among them are to be found all the old standard melodies, besides many new aspirants to the favor of the Church.

The following explanation of the peculiar features of this work is deemed advisable:

1. The words and the music are brought into immediate connection and relation; thus rendering the use of the hymns and tunes easy, and avoiding the obvious objection to the ordinary music books.

2. With an occasional exception, the turning of every leaf presents to the eye two tunes no smaller in character as to be equally well adapted to any hymn found on either page.

3. On the left hand is an old standard tune: on the right a new tune.

4. Occasionally, there is but one tune—generally an old one—which is always on the left-hand page: the right-hand page being filled with hymns adapted to be sung to it.

5. The type is of good size, clear, and easily readable, even by artificial light.

6. The adaptation of the tunes to the various sentiments contained in the hymns has been steadily aimed at—it is hoped with success.

The work is now ready for delivery. Copies will be sent to any address, by mail, prepaid on receipt of the price—$1 50. Address all orders to J. B. MCFERRIN, Agent.
Nashville, Tenn.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.

TWO YEARS SINCE, THE UNDERSIGNED OPENED HIS OFFICE at No. 33 Camp-street, for the sale of these Machines, which, at that time, were but little known in this city, and the result is truly astonishing both as to the number sold and the unexampled success of the Machines, in nearly every instance. For over $175,000 worth of these Machines sold by the undersigned, not one letter of complaint was received during the past summer, and the repairs on these do not amount to ten dollars, although some of them have been used five years. Their sale at this time in this city is five times greater than it has been heretofore at this season of the year.

Probably more than $100,000 have already been paid in this city for Sewing Machines that were either entirely worthless, or which have cost five times the trouble and expense to keep them running that they were worth. The universal success of Singer's Machines has brought conviction to the minds of the public that it is far better to buy a good article at a fair price than to listen to the thousand and one tales of men who deal in Sewing Machines that are MADE TO SELL AND NOT TO USE, and who, as soon as one humbug is proved up, bring on another.

It is universally known that Singer's Sewing Machines make the most improved stitch that human ingenuity has ever invented, and there is no longer room for envil, as nine tenths of the clothing and shoes sold in this city are made on these machines.

Our competitors in the Sewing Machine trade generally acknowledge that Singer's Machines are superior for manufacturing purposes, but say they are not adapted to fine sewing. This, however, is a mere pretense, and the undersigned challenges the world to produce a Sewing Machine equal to Singer's in both Manufacturing Machine for One sewing; or to produce samples of work equal to those done at 33 Camp street on that Machine, which also sews leather with equal facility with any kind of thread or silk.

Singer's Manufacturing Machines, when adjusted by the undersigned, with recent great improvements, will sew with a fine needle at full speed through from twenty to thirty thicknesses of Lowell cotton, with thread No. 150 or 200, without breaking it, making a beautiful stitch, the same on both sides of the fabric.

Many persons who have known and even used Singer's Machines for years in New York, are satisfied to find that the Manufacturing Machines here are superior for that work, but when shown the room at 33

Poetry.

THE PLAGUE OF ELLIANT.

[FROM THE BRETON.]

[A large proportion of the ballads still sung in the gatherings of the Breton peasantry—at the "pardon" of the patron saint, the festivities of the wedding, or the consecration of the new threshing-floor—relate to historical events of remote antiquity. One of these time-worn, but deeply-stamped pieces of old barbaric coinage, now come down to exclusive circulation among hard peasant hands, but still precious for the quality of its true poetic metal, and venerable for its ancient mint-mark, is the ballad of "The Plague of Elliant," of which the following is a literal a version, I think, as can be made from the Breton into the English. I have preserved the metre of the original, so that my version may be sung to the Breton air of the "Boston Elliant." The plague which the ballad commemorates ravaged Brittany in the sixth century. The book of Llandaff (in Jesus College, Oxford) contains an account of this plague in an abridgement of the life of Saint Gwenole, made in the ninth century by Gurdestine, abbot of the convent. In this account special mention is made of the ravages of the plague in the parish of Elliant, though the country immediately round about it is said to have been preserved from the scourge by the prayers of a saintly hermit named Ranian. He is mentioned in the ballad, which, like all other ballads in M. de Villemarque's "Barz Breiz" (from which my translation was made,) was taken down from oral recitation of the Breton peasantry.]

'Twixt Faouet and Llangolan
There lives a bard, a holy man—
His name is Father Ranian.

On Faouet hill best he laid :
"Let every month a mass be said,
And bells be rung, and prayers be read."

In Elliant the plague is o'er,
But not till it had raged full sore :
It slew seven thousand and five score.

Death unto Elliant hath gone down,
No living soul is in the town—
No living soul but two alone.

A crone of sixty years is one,
The other is the only son.

"The Plague," quoth she, "is on our door-sill ;
'Twill enter if it be God's will ;
But till it enter bide we still."

Through Elliant's streets who wills to go,
Every where will find grass to mow—

Every where, save in two wheel-ruts bare,
Where the wheels of the dead-cart went to fare.

His heart were glad that had not wept,
Through Elliant's grass grown streets who stept,

To see eighteen carts, each with its load—
Eighteen at the grave-yard, eighteen on the road.

Nine children of one house there were
Whom one dead-cart to the grave did bear :
Their mother 'twixt the shafts did fare.

The father, whistling walking behind,
With a careless step and a crazy mind.

The mother shriek'd and call'd on God,
Crash'd, soul and body, beneath her load.

"God, help me bury my children nine,
And I vow thee a cord of the wax so fine :

A cord of the wax so long and fine, [shrine.
To go thrice round the Church and thrice round the Nine sons I had ; I bare them all ;

How Death has ta'en them, great and small,

Hath ta'en them all from my own door-stone ;
None left, e'en to give me to drink—not one !"

The church-yard to the walls brims n'er,
The Church is full to the steps of the door :
They must bless fields, if they'd bury more.

There grows an oak by the church-yard wall,
From the top-bough hangs a white grave pall—
The Plague hath taken one and all.

LADY FRANKLIN

[It is seldom that two such poets live under one roof, as in a cottage on the Merrimac, in Amesbury, Mass.—JOHN G. WHITTIER, and his sister, ELIZABETH H. WHITTIER, the writer of the following lines.]

Fold thy hands, thy work is over !
Cool thy watching eyes with tears,
Let thy poor heart, overwearied,
Rest alike from hopes and fears.

Hopes, that saw with sleepless vision,
One sad picture fading slow ;
Fears, that followed, vague and nameless,
Lifting back the veils of snow.

For thy brave one, for thy lost one,
Truest heart of woman, weep !
Owning still the love that granted
Unto thy beloved sleep.

Not for him that hour of terror,
When the long ice-battle o'er—
In the sunless day his comrades,
Deathward trod the Polar shore.

Spared the cruel cold and famine,
Spared the fainting heart's despair—
What but that could mercy grant him ?
What but that has been thy prayer ?

Dear to thee that last memorial,
From the calm beside the sea :
Evermore the month of roses,
Shall be sacred time to thee !

Said it is the mournful yew-tree
O'er his slumbers may not wave ;
God it is the English daisy—
May not blossom on his grave.

But his tomb shall storm and winter
Shape and fashion year by year—
Pile his mighty mausoleum
Block by block, and tier on tier.

Guardian of its gleaming portal
Shall his stainless honor be,
While thy love, a sweet immortal,
Hovers n'er the winter sea !

Children's Column.

DESPERATE ENCOUNTER WITH CONVICTS.

With fifty pirates on board, twelve ordinary convicts, a guard of fifteen Madras artillery-men, and eight Sepoys of the marine battalion, the Ararat left Singapore on the 19th of June, and arrived at Penang on the evening of the 24th. Twelve convicts were here added to the gang, making seventy-four in all.

The Ararat left Penang on the 25th, a junk leaving at the same time, and doing her best to keep up with the ship. Captain Carreys, not liking the appearance of things, dodged his satellite, and finally lost sight of the craft on the evening of the 27th. A few hours later the Ararat was some sixty miles from Penang. The 28th broke gloomy ; very dark and sharp guests of wind. At 2.45 the captain ordered the mate to set top-gallant sails if the weather should clear, and laid down again on the poop. His rest was of short duration. Ten minutes later he was aroused by a noise, such a one as wakes a man broadly in an instant. The noise, a crash as of something giving way, followed by a shout, startled the mate also, as he was standing by the break of the poop.

There was no doubt as to the cause ; the convicts had broken loose. Quick as thought, the captain leaped to the deck and brought his arms—a revolver and two pistols—from the cabin. The mate as instantly aroused the guard, at the same time hailing the sentry forward, but received no reply. He remained by the eight guard muskets until the guard turned out, before which the captain's revolver spoke from the poop. The captain, it seems, on reaching the deck, could just discern that the convicts were making their way aft. They had advanced as far as the stern of the long-boat when he fired into them. Still they came on, a tomultuous rush, yelling like fiends, and heaving before them blocks, handspikes, boiystones, firewood, carry-stuff grinders—anything, in fact, they lay hands on. Capt. Correys was severely struck by some of these missiles, as were also several of the guard, who had, by this time, joined the captain (the crew, Lascars and Spaniards, being altogether without arms, having made their way into the rigging) on the poop. The gallant party had no thought, however, of acting on the defensive, but, jumping to the quarter-deck, commenced a hand-to-hand fight with the scoundrels. Both the captain and guard fired into them as fast as they could load, using also their cutlasses and bayonets to keep them at bay. No sooner was a musket fired, than a rush was made upon it before it could be reloaded ; but in no one instance did they succeed in wrenching it from the grip that held it for life or death. One bayonet was their only spoil.

During the whole time they kept up a shower of the missiles described above, and it is only wonderful that more mischief was not done by them. Inch by inch, however, the captain and his party gained ground, advancing purposely with caution, lest from behind the water casks a rush might be made upon them, and their arms—their salvation—be seized. And here we have to record an instance of courage as rare as heroic. Some ten minutes or so after the outbreak the captain's wife took her part in the fray by loading and continuing to reload her husband's pistols, and passing them up from the cuddy sky-light. As each batch was gained it was seized by the guard and fastened down.

After an hour's hard fighting the convicts were driven on to topgallant forecastle, where they were charged with the bayonet, and several run through or driven over the bows. Two or three were seen to lay hold of the foretop gallant studding sail, which was laying on the forecastle, and jumped overboard with it. They were shot from the poop and quarterdeck as well as the darkness permitted. The deck clear lights were brought ; many attempts had been made to get lights during the fight, but as soon as one appeared it was knocked over by the convicts, and the whole work was done in almost solid darkness. The lights which the lights revealed were horrid. Here a man with a gashed face, there another cut almost in two, there another riddled with the bayonet, there one—yes, yet living—with four bullets through him. The aspect of the place was that of a slaughter-house. Eight dead bodies were found on the fore castle and three on the main deck, including the European sentry and Portuguese cook. It was now apparent why the sentry had not answered the hail of the mate. There seems to be no doubt that he had left his post below and come on deck, where he is supposed to have fallen asleep, being stabbed without awakening eyes to fire his pistol, which was in his hand as he lay. The poor cook was shot by accident, being mixed up with the convicts. The carpenter and an Arab passenger jumped overboard. The former fell into the light of the lee foresheet, and into the forechains and made his way aft. The Arab was never seen again. At daybreak a man was found hanging on to the rudder. A rope being thrown he was hauled up, and found to have been shot through the leg. On search being made below five more bodies were found of men who, on receiving enough, had gone below to die.

It was found that the convicts had escaped by cutting through with a knife, of which they had meanwhile gained possession, a hatch-of-a panels door forward, there partly cutting the inside partitions but on the port side, which enabled them to burst the door in altogether. They then shouted to the rest in the other cells to follow them, which, with the exception of fourteen, whom the guard were enabled to keep down, they did. At six the convicts were mustered, when it was found that twenty-seven were dead or missing, twenty-eight out of sixty who came on deck. The remaining thirty-two, with the exception of three wounded, were treated to three dozen each. At half-past nine the sentries gave the alarm that some of the convicts had slipped their leg irons. The guard was rallied and secured them. On overhauling the remainder it was found that many of the irons were too large, and they were accordingly reduced. A welcome sight must Bombay have been to the Ararat !

FIDELITY OF THE NEGROES.

It is pleasant to know that not a single slave was compromised in the late Harper's Ferry affair. Not one could be induced to join Brown, by either threat, promise, or persuasion. While the South should guard them more zealously than ever against the corruption of abolition emissaries, they should trust them more than ever.

Heywood was shot dead while heroically expressing his horror of their nefarious designs. Brown discovered he could make no use of such as he had captured, and sent Cook, two white men, with eleven negro prisoners to the Maryland side, where they were employed in removing the arms and munitions from the Kennedy farm to the log school house in the mountain opposite the town, that they might be convenient for those imaginary recruits which the brigands seemed to expect. As Cook and his companions went to the river to fire across at the Virginians these negroes escaped, dodging through the woods, swimming the river, and running every hazard, returned to their homes. Several of them narrated their adventures with great humor and vivacity. One fellow said that, when he was taken, a pike was put into his hands by Brown, who told him to take it and strike at observe."

"Good lard, Massa," cried Cuffee, in a tremor, "I dont know nuffin 'bout handlin' dem tings."

"Take it instantly," cried the philanthropist, "and strike home. This is a day that will long be remembered in the history of our race—a glorious anniversary."

"Please God, Massa, I'se got a sore finger," and Caffee exhibited a stump, the first joint of which he had lost in a wheat-machine some years before.

Finding that he had no mind to be a hero, Brown took him to the Armory, and daring the siege sent him out for water. As soon as he got out of range of their guns he broke the pitcher and fled for his life. In the town they were passing to and fro with entire freedom, jubilating over their own escapes and jeering at the dead carcasses of the Liberators. Brown, in urging them to arm, said, repeatedly, "Don't you know me ? Did you never hear of John Brown of Kansas—old Ossawatomie Brown ?" This only frightened the negroes more. They dropped the pikes, like the devil's gifts, and took to their heels, hiding every where under straw ricks, barns, and stables. There is sufficient evidence that, had their masters been present in any instance, the slaves would, in their defence, have very cheerfully thrust the pikes into the bodies of the pseudo-philanthropists, proving that they were not so ignorant of the pitch-fork exercise as they pretended. Four out of five of those who volunteered so promptly were non-slaveholders and of non-slaveholding families. They were the fighting men of the occasion; the stormers, who went to work with a remorseless ferocity equaling that of the outlaws themselves.

STORMING OF THE ENGINE HOUSE.

During the night Brown acknowledged that all was lost. The courage of his men, too, began to give way, and they wished to surrender ; but he urged them to continued desperation. One asked, "Captain Brown, would this enterprise in which we are engaged be called 'High Treason ?'" "Very likely it would be so considered," replied Brown. "Then," said the man, "I will not fire another shot." "It will make no difference to you," said Brown, "except that you will die like a dog instead of falling like a man."

During the livelong night, the voice of Brown was heard continually repeating, 'Are you awake, men ? are you ready ?'"

When Tuesday morning came the troops were put in position and a flag was sent to the besieged, borne by Samuel Strider, a citizen, and accompanied by Lieutenant Stuart, Colonel Lee's aid. They were received at the door by Brown. The parly lasted some time without result. In the mean time the storming party of twelve marines, headed by Lieutenant Israel Green, took position on either side of the centre door. As the parley ended, the officer stepped back several paces and waved his hat. Two stalwart soldiers sprung forward, and with heavy sledges tried to force the door. One of the engines inside had been pushed against it, and it resisted all their efforts. Thirty men then came forward, and taking a heavy forty-foot ladder, used it as a battering-ram, dropping upon their knees at each blow to avoid the expected volly on the falling of the door. At the third or fourth blow it gave way, and the stormers rushed in gallantly, headed by Lieutenant Green. The pent-up excitement of the multitude now burst forth in a shout that shook the air, and nearly drowned the sharp crash of fire-arms that received the stormers on their entrance. Private Quinn, one of the first who entered, received a mortal wound. Turning back, he dropped his musket and staggered to the rear, where he fell, preserving to the last his quiet, soldierly bearing. Colonel Washington, who through all these trying scenes had borne himself with an intrepid coolness that excited the admiration of the brigand chief himself, now the moment the marines entered, sprung upon one of the engines, told his fellow prisoners to hold up their hands that they might be recognized as non-combatants, and then rapidly pointed out the outlaws. Having discharged their pieces in the faces of the soldiers, several of these threw down their arms and begged for quarter. Untamable to the last, old Brown sat in a corner loading his rifle, a breech-loader, and in this position received a sabre-stroke from Lieutenant Green which threw him forward on his hands and knees. Two or three bayonet stabs finished him, it was then supposed. Oltowa Brown, his son, was shot down and bayonected.

"DEAR KINDRED BLOOD."

The old man recurred again to his sons, of whom he had spoken several times; asking if we were sure they were both dead. He was assured that it was so.

"How many bodies did you take from the engine-house ?" he asked.

He was told three.

"Then," said he, quickly, "they are not both dead ; there were three dead bodies there last night. Gentlemen, my son is doubtless living and in your power. I will ask for him what I would not ask for myself ; let him have kind treatment, for he is as pure and noble-hearted a youth as ever breathed the breath of life."

There was some show of humen feeling in the old felon at last, but his prayer was vain. Both his boys lay stark and bloody by the Armory wall.

Stephen was holding a small packet in his folded hands. It contained miniatures of his sisters ; one, a sweet girlish face of about fourteen, the other more mature, but pretty. What strange reflections these incidents awakened ! This old man craves a boon for his noble boys, which neither pain nor death can bring him to ask for himself. The other clasps to his dying breast a remembrance of his gentle sisters and his father's elm-shaded cottage far away in peaceful Connecticut. Is this pity that thus dims my eyes ? a rising sympathy that struggles in my heart ? Away with pulting weakness. Has not this hoary villain, that prates about his sons, been for months a deliberate plotter against the lives and happiness of thousands ? Did he not train these very boys to aid him in his attempt to waste, with fire and sword, the fairest land under the cope of heaven ? And this bloody dupe—his follower—how many men's sisters did he propose to murder ; how many social hearths to quench in blood ; for what use were those hundreds of deadly rifles, those loads of pikes, those bundles of incoudiary fagots ?

MATRIMONIAL SCHEME OF NAPOLEON IN 1833.

The Home Journal republishes an account of a conversation between Lafayette and Fenimore Cooper, which took place in 1833. It was recorded by Mr. Willis, and was printed at the time in the paper named above. This is the extract :

"I was calling upon Lafayette one day (said Mr. Cooper) and was let in by the confidential servant, who, it struck me, showed signs of having something to conceal. He said his master was at home, and after a moment's hesitation, made way for me to go on, as usual, to his private room—but I saw there was some embarrassment. I walked in and found the General alone. He received me with the same cordiality as ever, but inquired with some eagerness who let me in, and whether I met an old acquaintance going out. I told him that his old servant had admitted me, and that there was certainly something peculiar in the man's manners"; but as I had seen no one else, I knew nothing more.

"Ah," said the General, "that fellow put him in the side-room. Sit down, and I will tell you. Prince Louis Napoleon Bonaparte was here two minutes ago !"

I expressed my surprise, of course, for this was in '33, when it was death for a Bonaparte to enter France.

"Yes," continued the General, "and he came with a proposition. He wishes to marry my grand-daughter Clemontine, unite the Republicanist and Imperialist and make himself Emperor, and make my grand-daughter Empress !"

"And, if it be not an indecent question," I said, "what was your answer, my dear General ?"

"I told him," said Lafayette, "that my family had the American notion on that subject, and chose husbands for themselves—that there was the young lady—he might go court her, and if she liked him, I had no objection."

Mr. Cooper did not tell us (for of course he did not know) how the Prince plied his wooing, nor why he failed. The fair Clementine, who thus, possibly lost her chance of being an Empress, married M. de Beaumont, and now represents her rejected admirer, as the French Embassadress at the Court of Austria. Shortly after this visit to Lafayette, Mr. Cooper was in London, and mentioned to the Princess (the widow of the elder brother of the Preaident of France) this venture of Prince Louis into the den of the Orleanist. "He is mad," was the only reply. But the finger post of the way madness lies does not always point truly. At any rate, there is a certain method in his madness," for the same match between Imperialism and Republicanism has been the Prince's pursuit ever since, and the chances are that he will finally bring it about—Clementine and other intermediate unbelievers notwithstanding.

Says the Home Journal, referring to the above, "subsequent events have made the foregoing prophetic comments of our own very significant."

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MRS. MARY ELIZABETH RIVES, consort of John Fletcher Rives, was born July 5, 1822, and died July 31, 1859. She was the daughter of Rev. R. W. Bailey D.D., now President of Austin College, Texas. She was educated at the school of Dr. Marks, in South Carolina, to which State her father moved when she was but two years old. When but a child she joined the Presbyterian Church, of which her father is now a distinguished minister. At about ten years of age her mother died, leaving her, another daughter and son. Though deprived at this early age of a mother's holy influence and tender care, her youthful heart was staid on Christ, and she continued a faithful member of the Presbyterian Church until her marriage to John Fletcher Rives, May 14, 1846, after which she united herself to the M. E. Church South, to which her husband belonged. Her example as a member of the Church to the day of her death, was that of a highly intelligent and deeply pious Christian. Few of her age exerted such influence on the mind of a community. Her piety was that of principle—uniform—a vital power. Her humility was scriptural—her sensibility of duty quick and imperative. Her religion was not merely a rational acknowledgment of Christ, but a living verity—an inborn divinity—the partaking of the nature of God, in that spiritual union which exists between the converted soul and God, as the result of living faith in Christ.

As a daughter, she was affectionate ; as a wife, she was true and faithful ; as a mother, tender, but positive ; as sister, friend, and mistress, she was equally true, confiding and forgiving. Great decision and firmness were prominent traits in her character ; and yet she was so gentle, artless, and earnest as a child ; winning by her sweetness of temper, and evenness of life all with whom she was associated. Those who knew her best loved her most. Her worst side (then) so long disthalgolshed as a Minister of the Gospel, speaks beautifully of her character in contrast with that of her mother, and says : "My dear Mary's life and death will stand before me with a new power to strengthen and stimulate me in the duties of my Christian life."

When interrogated by her anxious husband as to her future prospects, she expressed the most perfect resignation to the will of God, and said, "All I live I shall praise my maker, but if I die, I shall praise him louder still." She requested her husband just before her death, to read the Scriptures to her, which he did, and often asked him to read some hymns for her. He read her own selections :—"Rock of ages cleft for me," "Jesus lover of my soul."

She spoke of her loved ones that had passed before her, and expressed great joy at meeting them. Said that she had "no fear of death," that she was "ready and willing to die." A short time before she expired, she exclaimed with great rapture, "Oh ! I shall soon see my blessed Jesus and live with him forever."

Sister R. died at about the same age at which her mother died—left the same number of children, twin girls and a boy—and the text from which her mother's funeral was preached was that used on the occasion of her funeral twenty years after.

MRS. MARTHA B., wife of A. H. Christian, and daughter of Francis M., and Martha J. Gilman, of Montgomery county, Ala., died Sept. 26, 1859, aged 30 years. Sister C. professed faith in Christ, and united with the M. E. Church South in 1846. She will be well remembered by all the members of the conference, who have travelled the Montgomery circuit within the last twelve or fifteen years, as one of the lights of the Church in that region. Seldom has a young woman descended to the tomb amid such general regret; a void has been made in a large circle which will not be easily filled.

Sister C. possessed in an unusual degree a quick and tender sympathy with affliction and want, and was ever ready to relieve both, to the extent of her power. Hers was a self-forgetting, self-sacrificing nature, that neither numbered steps, nor weighed burdens when demanded for the good of others. She was an example, counsellor, and guide, to the young of her sex in the community, and especially to those who were beginners in the christian life. Her liberality was most exemplary. She did not complain that the amount expected of her, for the support of the worship of God was too large, and seek to have it reduced ; but went on paying without enquiring what was expected, until the sum apportioned was far exceeded. Her last request of her husband was, that he would "remember the poor." But the distinguishing trait in the character of our departed sister, was her conscientious devotion to the religious instruction of the colored people. She held that no christian owner of slaves could meet his responsibility in reference to their salvation, without personal attention to their welfare ; that the employment of a missionary to labor with them, did not relieve the owner from the obligation of laboring with and for them himself. For ten or twelve years she devoted a good portion of each Sabbath, when at home, in catechising and reading and explaining the Bible to her father's servants. The consequence was, as would be expected, that a large number of them are members of the Church and professed faith in Christ.

Hers was a beautiful life ; reared and taught by one of the best of mothers, she unbraced truths, and instilled principles which lasted her through life, and went with her to heaven. Possessed of the means which wealth affords, she remembered that she was accountable, and lived as became the gospel. Instead of lavishing her means to adorn her person, she sent them forward to adorn her heavenly mansion. But she rests from her labors and her works follow her. Her end was peaceful and triumphant. J. HAMILTON.

BEXAR LODGE No. 230.
October 23, 1859.

At a regular communication of this Lodge, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted. Whereas it has pleased the Grand Architect of the universe, in the dispensation of his allwise providence, to remove from us our highly esteemed and much beloved Brother, Charles M. Little, who departed this life on the 3d day of May 1859, aged twenty-two years, seven months and thirteen days. Although cut down in the bloom of youth, vigor and usefulness, as a lawyer, he gave satisfactory evidence of a well grounded hope of eternal life through the atoning sacrifice and merits of a crucified Saviour. Therefore we would submissively bow, with humble submission to thy providence, O God ! and trust, that through thy mercy, our loss is his eternal gain. In the death of our Brother, the chain by which we were united has been severed.

Resolved. That we lament the deep affliction that has fallen on the parents and relatives of our departed brother, and we hereby offer them our sympathy and condolence.

Resolved. That we wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days, and that the furniture and jewels of the lodge be clad in mourning as a token of respect for our deceased brother. W. T. BISHOP, Secretary of Bexar Lodge No. 230.

H. W. MATHEWS,

SISTER SARAH STEPHENS died 27th of September 1859. For many years her home had been in Montgomery, Alabama. Her natura was a very fine one—she was sincere and truthful. Her mind was fine and well ordered—she had great taste for reading. Her early advantages were not very good, and her subsequent life was unfavorable to the cultivation of her intellect, and yet, through difficulties many would have sunk under, she would never neglect the improvement of her mind. Her spirits were cheerful, hopeful. But her deep piety was her blessing as well as her great attraction. How she was sustained by it, through all the vicissitudes of her life. She loved God—her reliance was upon her Saviour, the Holy Spirit her comforter. She had the "witness of the Spirit," that God, for Christ's sake, had forgiven her sins. This blessing abided with her through thirty-five years of Christian life, which was the number of her years in the M. E. Church. Her life was a suffering one, but she was so religious, so cheerful, that she was seldom "cast down." Her bible was her delight and her guide. Her reliance on her Saviour was firm—she felt that he was with her as "she passed through the dark valley." She has left an aged, feeble husband to mourn her loss. They were all of life to each other—no other ties—but he feels that he will not be here long.

DR. SOLAN M. GRIGG died at the residence of his brother-in-law, Mr. L. Rounds, in the city of Columbus, Ga., on the 9th day of October 1859. Dr. Grigg was born in the county of Hancock, Ga., on the 22d of March 1827, professed religion and joined the M. E. Church at Mt. Jefferson, Chambers county, Ala., in 1850. At the time of his death he was a citizen of Russell County, Ala., and was engaged in an extensive practice of medicine. Dr. Grigg died in full vigor of manhood possessing the confidence and esteem of all who knew him, for none knew him but to respect him. The writer of this knew him well and can truthfully say he was a gentleman in the largest sense of the term ; a more benevolent and pure heart than his never animated the bosom of any man. He was emphatically an honest man. He left a widow and children to weep at the remembrance of his death and to mourn over this their greatest affliction. May the death of Dr. Grigg determine those who loved him most on earth to meet him in heaven. Peace to his ashes.

WILLIAM JACKSON, was born Nov. 1st 1784, in Wilkes county, Ga., and died at Galustown, Clarke county, Ala., Oct. 7, 1859. He moved to Clarke county in 1818, and was one of its oldest and most respected citizens. He was the father of fourteen children. He joined the M. E. Church South, about thirteen years ago, and was a faithful member until death. Of a retiring disposition, he was content to live a meek and humble christian in the quiet peaceful life of home. Though possessed of property, his heart was larger than his purse—he dispensed a generous hospitality and his house was the preacher's home. The poor and distressed found him a sympathizing friend. A kind husband, a tender father, and considerate and just master, he was greatly loved by his family and servants, and by all who knew him. Father Jackson often regretted that he had not commenced the service of God earlier in life, and said in his last sickness that he had been an unprofitable servant, and his only hope of heaven was in Christ.

His last sickness was painful and protracted, yet patient and resigned, and in full possession of his rational powers, he slowly and calmly approached the "King of Terrors," and by faith in Christ triumphed and went home to rest. D. M. H.

MRS. SARAH DRANE, daughter of John and Eleanor Germany, was born in Columbia county, Ga., January 6, 1809, was married to Benjamine Drane Nov. 2, 1826, joined the M. E. Church in 1829, and died on the 17th day of Oct. 1859. She adorned the doctrines of our holy religion. Before she died she said, "all is well, I have no fear of death ;" and as she gave up her hand to say good-bye, said, "I shall meet you no more in this life, but let us meet again." One of her servants came to her and she admonished him to prepare to meet her in heaven. She frequently expressed her astonishment at people wishing to live in this world, where there is no lasting pleasure. She was an affectionate wife and mother, mistress and neighbor ; and her home was truly a home for the Methodist preacher. She left a husband and children to mourn her loss, and numerous friends. She selected her funeral text, "Prepare to meet thy God." A. R. HIXES.

MRS. EMILY HARRISON, wife of D. C. Harrison, died Sept. 10, 1859, in her 56th year, after a painful and protracted illness. She was married to D. C. Harrison on the 11th of January 1843. Professed religion when about fifteen years old, but did not join the church until about eight years ago. She was born and raised in Shelby county, Ala. Her husband emigrated to Mississippi in 1845. Suffice it to say, she suffered as only a christian can suffer—with patience and resignation. She viewed death as only a christian can view—without dread or alarm; She died as only a christian can die—peaceful and happy.

Thus passed away a devoted wife, an affectionate mother, and a meek and pious member of the Church militant to her reward in heaven. She leaves a husband and several little children to mourn her loss. O, that God may take care of the little children.

Her infant babe died the 16th of the same month, aged three months and sixteen days: "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not. J. M. HOON.

MARY FAUQUIER, wife of Mr. O. A. Younger, at Donaldsonville, La., in the nineteenth year of her age. Her bride had preceded her but two days. When told that she must die, "I am ready to die," she replied, "and to go to heaven." Though young, she had for years been a professor of religion and a member of the Methodist Church. She sent messages by name to her acquaintances inviting them to meet her in heaven. Her sickness was characterized by the most unexcomplaining fortitude. In the very article and moment of death she spoke in a distinct and impassioned tone, "I SEE HEAVEN !" So departed in early life, one who was both a child of God, a most dutiful daughter, and devoted wife. J. C. K.

MRS. ELIZABETH JANE GRIFFICE, daughter of Robert and Ann Smith, was born in Maury county, Tennessee, March 28, 1833, and died near Uniontown, Perry county, Alabama, September 12, 1859. The deceased made a profession of religion, and joined the M. E. Church, September 1857, and remained a consistent member until her death. She leaves a husband and several children to mourn her early death. But their loss is her eternal gain. J. B.

ELIZABETH ANN, infant babe of Rev. J. M. and Elizabeth Hood, died on the 10th Oct., 1859, aged three months and twenty-seven days. "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the Kingdom of God."

BOTH DIED IN ONE DAY.

"Lovely and beautiful in their lives" in death they were not divided."

Died, on the 26th of August 1859, JOHN F. AULD and MARY AULD, (Mary Jackson.) They were born in Anson county, N. C. Father Auld was born 1788, Mother Auld, 1791. They married in Anson county, moved to Alabama, thence to Union parish Louisiana, where they departed this life in the full assurance of a blessed immortality. At an early age they professed religion and joined the M. E. Church, of which they lived consistent members till death. It may be said of them, "they were one". Together they lived—together they died. As they had borne the burden and heat of the day of life together, they desired and prayed to be released at the same time. God granted them their desire. One did not know that the other's spirit had departed. Together their spirits ascended, and now rest in the bosom of their Redeemer. D. P. CULLIN.

EDUCATIONAL.

PORT GIBSON COLLEGIATE ACADEMY
For Young Ladies,
will resume its exercises on the first Monday in October. A well-chosen Faculty will spare no pains or care, to make this institution a pleasant and profitable place for young lady students.
The buildings are large, well-ventilated and well furnished. The grounds ample and beautiful.

HUNTSVILLE FEMALE COLLEGE, HUNTSVILLE North Alabama.
Rev. A. R. ERWIN, D. D., Principal.
This Establishment offers the following inducements to Southern patronage.
1. Huntsville is the nearest mountain location to the South and Southwest; and is proverbially healthful. The social elegance and beautiful scenery for no found here, are great auxiliaries in the formation of character.
2. The edifice is large and elegant—supplied with gas-light; and water in the greatest abundance by pipes, from a mammoth spring in the town. It is built by the most approved plan for health and well furnished.
3. The domestic arrangements are such as to secure and unite comfort, but the social and domestic training of the pupils. Frugality, politeness and grace, as well as the virtues of the heart, are habitually cultivated.
4. The facilities of instruction are unsurpassed. There are fifteen teachers and attaches, some of whom are distinguished educators. The large patronage, from among the best families of nine of the Southern states, attest the good-will of the institution.
5. Arrangements are made to accommodate Southern pupils during the Summer Vacation, and to furnish them with such instructions in the extra branches as may be desired. Pupils received at any time.

COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE, BATON ROUGE.
The Exercises of this institution will be resumed on the 12th of October next.
The Principal intends to spare neither labor nor expense to make the school in its Educational Facilities and its moral influences, equal to the very best Schools in the country.
As the number of pupils is limited, it is desirable that applications be made as early as possible.
Parents are seriously advised of the importance of having their children at School as promptly as possible. The loss of a few days at the beginning, often proves a serious disadvantage to the pupils, and greatly increases the labor of the teachers for the whole session.

LETTER FROM REV. R. ABBEY.

Gaines' Landing, Ark., Nov. 5, 1859.

MR. EDITOR—

Dear Brother This morning, before daylight, I left Monticello, the seat of the Ouchita Conference, in company with Bro. Watson, Editor of the Memphis Advocate. We are on our way to the Arkansas Conference, and are now very busy waiting for a boat. We hope to reach Searcy, Ark., the seat of the Arkansas Conference, by Tuesday, or Wednesday morning; and my calculation is, to leave there in time to reach Jackson, Miss., the seat of the Mississippi Conference, by Tuesday evening following (15th).

Of course we left Monticello before the adjournment of the Ouchita Conference. It began on Wednesday last, with Bro. Andrew Hunter presiding, there being no bishop present. A letter was received from Bishop Kavanaugh, stating that he was yet so feeble that he could not leave home. Bishop Andrew was looked for somewhat, but he was also kept away in consequence of feeble health and approaching infirmity.

The Conference was working on very well with its business. Brother Hunter's presidency was giving universal satisfaction.

I was much pleased with the state and appearance of things in the Ouchita Conference. They have a fine company of ministers; the Conference is increasing in usefulness, and is certainly planting the principles of religion deeply in Southern Arkansas. I do not know of a Conference with more of the appearance of thrift, respectability and usefulness. But their work is increasing in their hands, and they are greatly in need of more men. Eight or ten men of experience and standing in the ministry would find work both plenty and profitable in this new and improving Conference.

Monticello is a new, clean and beautiful town of, perhaps, two thousand inhabitants, in a high, dry, oak and pine country, which has all the appearances of health and many of the appearances of comfort. In travelling between this place and that, you pass twenty miles across the Mississippi swamp, crossing the Bayou Mason at the Bartholemew; and it is a most singular topographical fact, that right here where I write, within fifty yards of the bank of the Mississippi river, I am on the waters of Red River. The water which falls on the inside of the levee, all along in this region, flows into the Mississippi of course; but that which falls on the outside of the levee runs back and finds its way into the Bayou, and thence into the Teasas, and Black River, and Red River.

The valley or swamp land back of this place is neither so rich nor so well settled as I had expected to see.

The Ouchita Conference organized a Book and Tract Society, looking to the establishment of a Depository, and with decided indications and appearances of success in this highly promising enterprize.

Yours truly, &c., R. ABBEY.

"MAKING HASTE TO PRINT."

Villula, Ala., Nov. 9, 1859.

MR. EDITOR: That was a good article, highly appreciated and fully approved. I felt justly admonished and kindly reproved for ever having offered the public a carelessome composition from an imperfect pen, and promised I would do so no more; yea, thought I would write no more to a newspaper on any subject.

But there are two or three facts, composed of statistics concerning my appointment, that I think ought to be known, and I know of no one else who will disclose them to you.

First, I have twelve appointments to fill; two of them at public churches, and ten on plantations. Second, my patrons are "good men and true," all more or less in the Church of God. Third, I preach to about 550 working hands, besides cotachmens. Fourth, the preaching places or houses are—five houses set apart for that purpose, and seven are negro cabins, piazzas, or the blue dome of heaven. Sixth, the accommodations are good; and I here render thanks to the overseers and their kind families for the gracious manner in which they have received and entertained me. And especially do I thank God Almighty and His people for the unparalleled mercies from their hands to me and mine in our extreme affliction. Lastly, the pay—it was $512 last year; I do not know what it will be this, but am not afraid.

Now, a suggestion, and I am done. It is this: that the Conference appropriate no more to this or any other domestic mission of like wealth. The reasons are too obvious for specification; and, to show my sincerity in this matter, I will say, that should these patrons honor me with a request to return, and my Master will let me travel next year in His field, I am willing to risk my chance of living one year on their justice and honor—not their liberality, no such thing; justice and honor alone would be concerned.

IDOL WORSHIP.

Dr. Wentworth writes: There has been an unusual amount of idol worship in Fuh Chau this summer. The people eat green fruits till they get all sorts of fluxes, choleras, and dysenteries, and then appeal to the gods to cure diseases brought upon them and made general by their own imprudences. For several weeks it has been excessively disagreeable to go to our appointments, on account of the throngs in the streets, engaged in celebrating idolatrous rites. A week ago Wednesday I went to our long-Ton church, at twelve o'clock, and hoped to get back before the orgies of the afternoon, for which I saw all sorts of preparation going on, should set in. I was unfortunate enough to be just in time to fall right into the midst of them. Chinese streets are about as wide as a Western sidewalk, and signboards and articles exposed for sale take up a portion of this narrow space, so that the actual current of travel flows along the centre in a channel often not more than four feet broad. It is impossible for two to walk abreast. Half way between our church and dwellings is the fish-market, a whole "block," as we should say at home, of stores given up to the sale of fish, which are exposed by the wayside in huge baskets, standing in a line on both sides of the street for a quarter of a mile together, making it one of the most crowded of thoroughfares. Right in the midst of this market I fell in with an interminable train of idolatrous processions. White idols and black idols, looking like great dolls, are taken out of the temples, set in gilded chairs, and placed inside of sedan chairs, so wide as to command the whole street, and to crowd all passers-by to the walk. Everybody must stop out of respect to the god, as he passes, and everybody is obliged to stop, because the chair of his godship effectually blocks up the path so that no one else can pass by or get inclined.

In the narrowest part of this dirty market, reeking with the odors of fish in all stages of decomposition, my sedan had to stand aside to let troops of men and boys, in masks and gaudy dresses, and half a dozen sedans with repulsive idols in them, and more than twenty tall and red short idols of wicker work, borne on coolies' shoulders, go past. On said occasions the natives drink a good deal at their idol-fests; and some are overbearingly jolly, and some overbearingly insulting, according as liquor affects them respectively. It was by no means agreeable to be jammed into a dirty corner by a filthy coolie, and be forced to listen for half an hour to their filthy jokes upon the very irksomeness of your position. If idolatry were only as offensive to God as it is to any man whose intelligence is above that of the brute creation, it would be no wonder if he should enact stringent laws against it. Besides diverting attention from the spiritual God and spiritual worship, it is brutal, brutalizing, and degrading in practice to the last degree. If books and descriptions disgust us with it, what of the sight of its practice. O send us means to end these abominations!

THE MOSAIC CALENDAR

Archbishop Usher formed a calendar, by which to decipher, in Julian time, the days of events recorded in the Holy Bible. And Dr. A. Clarke, in his commentary on the Old Testament, has often given, as authority, the results of Usher's synchronical cycle, when applied to his years of the world. But as both his years, and the cycle made to run on them, were adopted without due regard to Scripture testimony, the results have no just claim to the confidence of a Bible student. Others again, and even Clarke, (who had so often quoted the results of Usher's solar cycle,) have adopted a synchronical lunar cycle (repudiated by the latter,) to decipher in Julian time the days of Bible events. But this method, which was derived from the heathen, through the rejected Jews, has utterly failed to conduct any one to correct results on this very important question of Scripture chronology. Therefore, with a view to excite attention to what the Bible itself teaches on this subject, we offer a few thoughts on the calendar, as indicated by Moses at the time of the Exodus.

1. "In the fourteenth day of the first month at even is the Lord's passover. And on the fifteenth day of the same month is the feast of unleavened bread unto the Lord."—Lev. xxiii., 5, 6. Let it be remembered once for all, that this law governed the time of both the passover and the feast of unleavened bread, until these types were fulfilled in the death and burial of Christ. Again, verses 10, 11, "Ye shall bring a sheaf of the first-fruits of your harvest unto the priest: and he shall wave the sheaf before the Lord, to be accepted for you: on the morrow after the Sabbath the priest shall wave it." Josephus says expressly this was done "on the second day of unleavened bread, which is the sixteenth day of the month."—Antiq. book. c. 10, sec. 5. These testimonies establish the fact that the passover was on the evening of Friday, the fourteenth: the first day of unleavened bread was Saturday, the fifteenth; and the day of waving the sheaf of first-fruits before the Lord, was Sunday, the sixteenth of the first month, in the first year of the exode. But this was the established order of time for these types every year, until they were fulfilled in the death, burial, and resurrection of our great Deliverer on the same days of the Jewish week. Therefore, no lunar calendar can possibly give the required days of the week on the appointed days of the first month of each year. No one can successfully deny this. And that "the Sabbath," of "the fifteenth" was a weekly Sabbath, is settled by verses 15, 16, "And ye shall count unto you from the morrow after the Sabbath, from the day that ye brought the sheaf of the wave-offering; seven Sabbaths shall be complete; even unto the morrow after the seventh Sabbath shall ye number fifty days; and ye shall offer up a new meat-offering unto the Lord." Here are eight successive Sabbaths, beginning on Saturday, the fifteenth of Abib, the first month, reaching through Iyar, the second month, and ending on the fourth day of Sivan, the third month. But the fiftieth day, in the count from that of the wave-offering, fell on Sunday, the fifth of Sivan; when the law that killeth was delivered. This was the order of this type every year until it was fulfilled on Sunday, the fifth of Sivan, the fiftieth from the resurrection, in the baptism of the Holy Spirit, by which the disciples were leavened into new lumps before the Lord. No lunar calendar will meet these demands.

2. Next, examine the demand of this law for the first month of the second year of the exode. "The same law requires that the first day of the feast of unleavened bread should be the "fifteenth of the month," and that it should also be on the Sabbath, that "the morrow after the Sabbath," according to Josephus, might be "the sixteenth of the month." Moreover, "on the first day of the first month" of "the second year, Moses reared up the tabernacle," "put the table in the tent of the congregation," "and set the bread in order upon it before the Lord."—Ex. xl., 2, 17, 22, 23. By this last transaction, "setting the bread in order upon the table before the Lord," we have an infallible proof that the whole service of that occasion was performed on the weekly Sabbath. For the standing law required of the performer that "every Sabbath he should set the bread in order before the Lord continually."—Lev. xxiv., 8. And, therefore, long after this, it is said in 1 Chron. ix., 32, "The Kohathites were over the show-bread, to prepare it every Sabbath." Moses set up the tabernacle, therefore, on the Sabbath day. Also the first, in the second year of the exode. This required "the eighth day" to be a Sabbath also, Lev. ix., 1, etc.; when Aaron and his sons, after being consecrated "seven days," began to offer for themselves, and for the people, the double amount of offerings expressly ordered for the "Sabbath."—Num. xxviii, 9, 10. The loaves of bread which Moses put on the table the previous Sabbath, were then removed, and others put thereon. And then the following fourteenth and fifteenth days of the same month, Num., ix., 1-5, the annual passover at even was eaten, and the feast of unleavened bread occurred on the Sabbath, as the law directed. Who, in the face of such testimony would follow the misleadings of a lunar calendar, in the study of the Bible?

MONEY.

No man can show that the love of gold, in the shape of eagles and sovereigns, is not as base idolatry as the worship of the golden calf. A sordid love of wealth is one of the lowest vices. Its effects on character are extremely debasing. When men have made large acquisitions of gain, the uses to which they apply it show its vanity, its utter worthlessness. The wisest of wealthy men, who was exceedingly rich, (yet at that time governed by worldly feelings,) made him great works, builded him houses, planted him vineyards, made him gardens and orchards, planted in them trees of all kinds of fruits, made him pools of water, got him servants and maidens, had great possessions of great and small cattle, gathered about him the most expert musicians with the best instruments, and abounded in all the refined luxuries of the world. But when he looked on it all, he pronounced it wholly unsatisfying—vanity, yea, more, a source of positive distress—vexation of spirit. Such an experiment ought to have satisfied the rest of mankind. It was made under the most advantageous circumstances. The means were not strained, but ample. Yet the result was what it has always proved to be.

This effect was not confined to any age or latitude. Johnson spoke but the truth as exhibited in the history of his own times in Europe, when he said: "Money and time are the heaviest burdens of life, and the unhappiest of all mortals are those who have more of either than they know how to use. To set himself free from these encumberances, one hurries to Newmarket, another travels over Europe; one pulls down his house and calls architects about him; another buys a seat in the country, and follows his hounds over hedges and through rivers; one makes collections of shells; and another searches the world for tulips and carnations."

The allusions in the last sentence point to the wild speculation in Holland in tulips. It is said that the best saddle house in England or France, would not have sold for as much as one bulbous root in the Netherlands. In the same spirit the English went mad over dovecotes, as much as two hundred guineas being given for a single pigeon. In our own time we have seen no small part of our nation go crazy after switches and hen coops. The multitudinis trade and the hen fever enriched a few and impoverished many.

We do not generally despise men who spend their money freely, through it be foolishly, it no mischief directly follows their wastefulness. But we detest one who hoards up his gains, and neither receives nor imparts any real profit by all his wealth. We call him miser, which signifies miserable. Yet the Bible tell us he has one pleasure in all his wealth: He beholds it with his eyes. That pleasure is, however, greatly diminished by being attended with a dreadful thirst for more.

The right use of money is to secure for us and our dependants the necessaries and comforts of life, and the best possible educational and religious privileges; then to employ it in the largest liberality, and in direct and honest efforts to spread abroad truth, peace, righteousness, the knowledge of God, and the love of Christ. How easy it would be to make all the honest, virtuous, industrious poor of this world happy by at once raising them from abject poverty, which is but another name for abject misery.

To do good and communicate, let not the rich forget; for with such sacrifices God is well pleased. Let those who have more money than they need, remember continually every benevolent plan and enterprise. There never was a time when riches rightly bestowed seemed to do more good than at present. Nor was the cry from perishing men ever louder than now. "Come over and help us."—Rec. U. S. Plainer.

EXAMPLE.—The Romans had a law, that every one should, wherever he went, wear a badge of his trade in his hat, or outward vestment, that he might be known. Thus the Christian is never to lay aside the badge of his holy profession, but to let his lights shine and adorn the doctrines of God his Savior in all things.

TRIALS AND TRIUMPHS OF METHODISM.

It is deeply interesting and not uninstructive to trace the constant recurrence and seeming relation of these two parts throughout the history of our Church. If her statistics are reliable, and her reported converts in an average proportion genuine, then has Methodism done more to elevate and save the race than any other agency in the great field of moral enterprise within the same time. She has built more churches, established more schools, published more literature, enshrined a greater number from vice and nurtured, trained, and finally dismissed from her bosom for the heavenly state a greater number of souls than perhaps even any two Churches within the same period.

"And yet how great have been her trials from first to last. It is doubtful whether more space is occupied by intelligent and faithful historians in recounting her triumphs or in relating her sorrows." Her afflictions have proceeded both from without and within. Those from without occurred mainly in the earlier stages of her career; mainly, I say, yet not all. She mingles too much with the masses, and has too many of her reclaimed though infirm members in her fold to be of much esteem among those who affect caste and prate of "good society." Cardinal Granville, who had a great contempt for the populace used to say, "that vile and mischievous animal, the people." The old Jesuit has his sympathizers, in this respect, in every part of the land. Such men are of course against us, and not unfrequently greatly annoy and deeply afflict us; but these afflictions "are not worthy to be compared with" the sufferings which were endured from without by the heroic fathers of Methodism.

But her severer trials are those which proceeded from within, and these continue unto this day. They are, in a measure, the result of her position and policy, and the only course which promises large exemptions from them in the future she adopts at her peril; for it would exhibit servility to Pharisaic sentiment, and recreance to our Lord Jesus Christ. We do not underrate the grace of God when we say that it seldom eradicates all the effects of a neglected or vicious education; and as the world now goes, three fourths of society come upon the stage of responsible life suffering from those disadvantages. Among this class, often unsought by others, has Methodism achieved her wondrous victories. This has been effected only by that simplicity of manner, fervor of spirit, and untiring perseverance which the constraining love of Christ inspires. When the "Tongue of Fire" and the "Power from on High" are discarded for other measures, the fruit which have so long gladdened and peopled heaven will infallibly cease.

Yet while our Church occupies her present field, and persists in her present policy, her trials in a measure will remain as an unavoidable concomitant. "The Wesleyan body," says Dr. Hamilton, of London, "is the great absorbent of warm hearts and fervid spirits. Sanguine and enthusiastic natures, through the grace of God, make the best evangelists. But the predominance of the emotional element is not without its inconvenience and its perils, for it aggravates the tusk of the governing body, and renders periods of internal commotion vehement and almost volcanic." But the masses have incomparably more of the emotional than of the reflective element; and that Church that takes her position among them as Christ did, must, while society remains what it now is, accepted the trials with the triumphs of her mission. These facts teach us a number of useful lessons.

1. That we should be careful how we accept of the tempting invitations of society to come up higher. Should we,

"To soothe the holy throng,
Soften the truth or smooth our tongue."

We might attract a class of hearers who would dow the Christian profession, while, in many instances, their secret vices would remain undisturbed by our liquid sentences. Meanwhile, for the want of direct, earnest, and pungent appeals, the rougher but more honest natures in society would remain unattracted and unsaved. "The greatest good to be the greatest number" is accomplished by following the footsteps of Christ among the "common people."

2. Our Church difficulties should secure us the sympathies of all good men. Many escape our trials, while no small portions of their increase is the product of our labor. They grow with our growth and strengthen with our strength.

3. We learn, also, the advantages of an itineracy and its indispensable accompaniment, a general superintendency. In this way only can the field and the laborer be adjusted to one another: Men of fervor and fire where society is unenterprising and lethargic; and where it is restless and inflammable, men of dispassionate minds and sound discretion.

4. Finally, the importance of general education, to develop in better proportion the elements of our nature; not to promote stoicism, but to bring the emotional into due subjective to the reflective, and thus by proper early culture "prepare the way of the Lord."—Christian Advocate and Journal.

FRANCE NEEDS A SABBATH.

LAMARTINE, in one of his articles, written since the revolution of 1848, declares that the fatal defect in French character, which made a permanent French Republic impossible, was lack of conscience. This is exactly true. But how happens it that this want should so especially prevail in France, and not in England and America, where free government is in successful operation? Certainly it cannot be said that nature, in making up Frenchmen, has omitted conscience, or the elements out of which a developed and enlightened conscience proceeds. The cause then must be that conscience is not cultivated. The root is there, but there is no outgrowth and no fruit. And the plain cause of this want is, that there is no time set apart for attending to such cultivation.

The Frenchman at home has no Sabbath, and in consequence what little religion he has consists of sentiments, not principle, and lies in acquiescence, not conviction. It originates not in the deep-rooted springs of moral obligation, but is rather the result of that vague instinct of worship which is common to all the races.

"The thoughts of this people are not the thoughts of a civilized race," exclaimed Jasmer Perier, in Guizot's Memoirs; "their imaginations are those of a savage tribe!" Their thoughts and imaginations will never, never, never be different until they shall become subject to the purging, chastening, solemnizing influences of the Christian Sabbath. Not otherwise can they acquire a reverence for, and alligance to the great invisible, or that humble, self-denying, self-disciplining faith which enables man to "erect himself above himself," and to act in constant view of eternal truths and immortal destinies. Not otherwise can they ever obtain that moderation and prudence, that earnest seeking after the truth and right, that habit of acting in reference to settled maxims of conduct which alone qualify man for freedom.

We profoundly believe that there is no institution under the sun, divine or human, that is so absolutely indispensable to a free people, as a day set apart for retirement from the whirl of pleasure, and for sober attention to the higher aspirations of the heart and soul. The man who saps this institution is a traitor to his country; he is snapping the very strongest pillar of this Republic. He is taking the very surest means to assimilate us with the masses of Europe, and to involve us in the same degraded destiny. Sundays, for self-indulgence, may suffice for slaves; but freemen must have Sabbaths for the worship of God.—Courier and Enquirer.

THE POOR.

We utterly repudiate, as unworthy, not of freemen only, but of men, the narrow notion that there is to be an education for the poor, as such. Has God provided for the poor a coarser earth, a paler sky? Does not the sun pour down his golden flood as cheerfully upon the poor man's hovel as upon the rich man's palace? Have not the cottager's children as keen a sense of all the freshness, verdure, fragrance, melody, and beauty of luxuriant nature, as the pale sons of Kings? Or is it on the mind that God has stamped the imprint of a baser birth, so that a poor man's child knows with an inborn certainty, that his lot is to crawl, not climb?

It is not so. God has not done it. Man cannot do it. Mind is immortal. Mind is imperial. It bears no mark of high or low, of rich or poor. It heeds no bounds of time or place, of rank or circumstances. It asks but freedom. It requires but light. It is heaven-born, and it aspires to heaven. Lowliness does not enfeeble it. Poverty cannot repress it. Difficulties do not stimulate its vigor. The poor fallow chandler's son, that sits up all night to learn, shall stand treating with mighty kings; shall add new provinces to the domain of science, shall bind the lightning with a hempen cord, and bring it harmlessly from the skies. The common school is common, not as an inferior, but as the school for poor men's children, but as the light and air are common.—Bishop Doane.

THE CHASE OF THE LOST.

Some years ago, a visitor at the Utica Insane Asylum observed a woman pacing to and fro a long, passage. As she would reach the wall at either end, she would look eagerly for an object of which she appeared to be in search, and then, failing to find it, she would wring her hands, and moaning piteously, commence again the round. So it was that she passed each day and night, except during a few hours of exhaustion, when in her dreams the same sad search was kept up. She was a mother who had lost her child, and then, in her grief, had become deranged.

So it may be during eternity with those who fix their hearts on merely temporal pleasures. Let us take the love of money. Gold is hunted and gloated over so that the lust of it becomes a controlling passion. But then comes the grave. There are no pockets in the shroud. Those who come after are eager enough to seize the wealth of him that goes. See the scene by his death bed. The words he utters are about his money. When his mind is recalled, and his lips are aroused from their torpor sufficiently to articulate, we find that it is in the eager haunt for money that he is still engaged. As the tree falls so it lies. The consuming passion of time will be the consuming passion for eternity. But there is this difference: In time there is an object to be seized. There may be a maniac pursuit but there is also a maniac enjoyment. But it is otherwise in a lost eternity. There the money so long coveted is gone. The chase after it lasts forever, but its enjoyment never comes. It is not necessary for us to call in imagination to describe the terrors of that state. It is enough for us to know that the passions of this life continue to rage in the heart desolated by them, while the object of those passions are gone. It is an incessant agonizing pacing through the corridors of eternity, in an alternation between a frenzied search and a still more frenzied despair.

Seek, then, O soul, those pleasures which this world can neither give nor take away.—Episcopalian Recorder.

THE MERCY SEAT.

What a sinking of heart we experience when we are called upon to separate from those whom we love—those who seem to be a part of our very being. Everything we see is associated with them. Morning, in its glory, as the sun emerges from the east, reminds us of our loss. The busy hum of noon has its voice, and twilight, gentle twilight, with its sad, pensive tones, so deepens holy memories, that we sink in utter despondency. Every book, every flower, every strain of music, seems to sigh for the absent one far away. Anxiety fills our mind. Temptations or trials may assail the loved one. O, how we yearn to shield him from these; to hide from the tempest; to hover like Mentor of old, around him, and keep him in the narrow way; to soothe his dreams with visions of those who love him so well. But it is all in vain; we are utterly helpless. In such an hour, what can console the heart, like the assurance that a mercy seat is accessible; we hear the voice of Jesus, "According to your faith be it unto you," and we bend the knee, and implore the blessing of that Saviour to rest upon the absent one; to shield him from the dark hour of temptation, or from the syren power of pleasure as she would seek to draw him from the narrow way; we pray that he would hold him in the hollow of his hand, and hide him in the secret of his pavillion. While we are enabled thus to pour out the soul before God, the Comforter descends, peace enters our heart, we exclaim, O! the blessedness of bowing at the foot of the cross—of feeling for one moment the ineffable joy of trusting all to God, whose goodness, greatness, wisdom and love are all pledged to us through Jesus. Surely the very adaptedness of the gospel to the wants of man, is the best proof of its origin.—Sunday School Times.

FAMILY PRAYER.

No man should feel satisfied with simply silent prayer. The habit of expressing your feelings through the medium of words, not only makes them distinct and clear, but it makes them strong. On the other hand, no man should pray so little as he would when he only prays by vocalization and utterance. There ought to be in every man's life, every day, appointed periods in which there should be utterance in prayer before God, in which a man should be accustomed to develop his feeling in actual language and words; and over and above that, and after that, there should be prayer and thought ejaculation—the uplifting of unexpressed feelings—both of them should go on together, working and co-working with each other. There are many persons who are deficient in prayer, because they never have cultivated themselves by expressing their prayerful feelings. There seems to be a difficulty in beginning. I suppose that it is always hard to speak in an unknown tongue, and to speak in a tongue we do not understand, before people we do not know, brings to every one some feelings of shame. Many Christians shrink from taking up the cross of family prayer, but most unwisely ere they dealt with who are dealt with tenderly upon this subject. Any man who has a family round about him, whatever it may cost in the beginning, will do wisely to take up family prayer. As to reading it from a book, every man must have his own liberty; it is better to read than not to pray; but it is still better to read from your own religious experience than from any other volume. I am sure that a man who walks with crutches is better than a man who does not walk at all; but a man who walks well without a crutch is better than a man who walks with either a cane or crutch. The expressing of devout and thankful feelings before God in prayer is one of the most needful things for Christians.

A DIFFICULTY CONSIDERED.

A gentleman, on being expostulated with, on his own neglect to seek earnestly the salvation of his soul, excused himself on the very common, but insufficient plea, "That the Christian world was divided into so many sects that he should be at a loss to decide with which one to unite."

The reply he received was substantially as follows: "You greatly deceive yourself if you regard this as a satisfactory excuse for an irreligious life. You make that a primary which is only a secondary question. There are various sects which have distinguishing peculiarities, but there is a great foundation—repentance toward God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ"—on which they are agreed. Now, your first consideration should be to get a safe standing on that foundation, and then you will be able, without danger, more deliberately to determine with which sect to unite. You may lose all, even the precious life of your soul, if you wait in your present perilous situation to settle this really secondary question. Look at that vessel trembling under the power of the gale, her sails rent, her seams opening, her rudder lost, and she driven helplessly toward the rocky shore! Of what are her crew thinking? Is it not the main and absorbing object with every one to secure a safe footing on shore? Suppose one of them, with death staring him in the face, should refuse to make an exertion for his safety, because he had not determined whether he should be entertained at this house or that which he descries on the land. This is your case. Get to shore first, set your foot firmly on that rock, then you may safely take time to decide to which house you may repair."

AN AFFECTING INCIDENT.

When Dr. Hutton was Bishop of Durham, (as we are told by his biographer), and as he was travelling over Cam, Wensleydale and Ingleton, he suddenly dismounted and, having delivered his horse to a servant, walked to a particular place, at some distance from the highway, where he kneeled down, and continued some time in prayer. On his return, one of his attendants took the liberty of inquiring what was his master's motive for so singular an act; in answer to which the Bishop informed him that, when he was a poor boy, without shoes or stockings, traversing this cold and bleak mountain on a frosty day, he remembered that he had disturbed a red cow, then lying on that identical place, in order to warm his feet and legs on the spot.

The above anecdote, which so beautifully and touchingly illustrates the character of the worthy Bishop, is taken from Whittaker's "History of Richmondshire."

Does it not teach us two things? First: That we ought never to be ashamed of poor parents, and the mean and lowly circumstances of our early days. It is a much greater honor to any man to have raised himself by his knowledge, his industry, and his goodness to the highest position in society, than if he had inherited such position merely by the accident of his birth or fortune. Secondly: That when any little incident occurs to remind us of the lowliness or privations of our former life, we ought to make use of it as an outlet of our gratitude to God, and as a motive, for renewed devotedness to His will and service, who "raiseth up the poor out of the dust, and lifted up the beggar from the dunghill," that He may "set them among the princes of His people."

SCHAMYL IN ST. PETERSBURG.

The Journal de St. Petersburg announces the arrival, on the 8th of October, of Schamyl at St. Petersburg, it says:

Schamyl arrived here this morning by railway from Moscow. The celebrated Imaum of Caucasus is accompanied by his son and four Murids. He alighted at the Znamensky Hotel facing the station. The time of the arrival of Schamyl not being known in the capital, there were but few persons assembled to see him. A few hours after his arrival he drove out in an open carriage, and paid a visit to the principal military authorities. He then drove along the principal quays and squares. Schamyl will remain a few days at St. Petersburg. It is said he will then join his wife and son at Kaluga.

A letter from Stavropol, inserted in the Invalide Russe, describes the arrival of Schamyl in that town. He was a man of lofty stature, thin and broad shoulders, with hollowed eyes and a dyed beard. His walk is slow and dignified. His face bears the trace of many wounds, and grief and compressed regret. His son, Casi Mahomed, resembles him only in his height. His face is pox-marked, and his grey eyes betray rather cunning than talent. The Emperor's journey will prove to you how grave the situation of affairs is in the Interior. He will visit all the Southern provinces of the Empire as far as Odessa. He will go through Toula and Carkov, and return perhaps through the Crimea. The object of the Emperor's journey is to assure the liability that the Government will take care of their interests, and at the same time to convince the people that great reforms will be accomplished. The journey is conducted with a religious ostentation which was never previously remarked. On his entrance into each town the Emperor visits the church and prays previous to receiving the authorities and deputations. This conduct has produced the best effect on the people.

SALT LAKE.

GREELEY, in one of his letters from Utah, gives the following, concerning the remarkable body of water called Salt Lake:—That this lake should be salt is no anomaly. All large bodies of water into which streams discharge themselves, while they have severally no outlet, are or should be salt. If one such is fresh, that is an anomaly, indeed. Lake Utah probably receives as much saline matter as Salt Lake; but she discharges it through the Jordan and remains herself fresh; while Salt Lake, having no issue save by evaporation, is probably the saltest body of water on earth. The ocean is comparatively fresh; even the Mediterranean, at Leghorn, is not half so salt. I am told that three barrels of this water yield a barrel of salt; that seems rather strong, yet its intense saltness, no one who has not had it in his eyes, mouth and nostrils, can realize. You can no more sink in it than in a clay bank, but a very little of it in your lungs would suffice to strangle you. You make your way in from a hot rocky beach over a chaos of volcanic bases that is trying to the feet, but at the depth of a yard or more you have a fine sandy bottom and here the bathing is delightful. The water is of a light green color for ten or twenty rods; then, "deeply, darkly, beautifully blue." No fish can live in it; no frog abides in it; but few birds are seen dipping into it. The rugged mountains in and about it—just such scraped and seamed and gullied precipices as I have been describing ever since I reached Denver—have a little fir and cotton wood or quaking asp in their deeper ravines or behind their taller cliffs, but look bare and desolate to the casual observer; and these cut the lake into sections and hide most of it from view. Probably not more than one-third of it is visible from any single point.

DEALINGS WITH THE DEAD.

A writer in the Electric Review, in discussing the subject of memorial tombs, makes brief allusions to two specimens of interment he has visited, each having its own peculiarities.

One is the grave of St. Carlo Borromeo, beneath the marble temple of Milan. This venerated and popular archbishop of the sixteenth century, to whom Milan owes, among other things, the completion of its Duomo, was virtually mummified: he was then clothed with sumptuous arch episcopal attire, the mitre was placed upon his skinny scalp, the crozier in shrivelled fingers, and the whole was enclosed in a coffin of transparent crystal. Whosoever will now pay a few francs for the sight, may have an opportunity of inspecting at leisure this lesson on the vanity of human greatness.

In contrast to this, I may mention the curious practice of the Capuchin friars, who boil their dead in some strong antiseptic, bake them in an oven, then clothe them in a large serge gown confined with a girdle of ropes, and having placed their well thumbed rosary on their withered fingers, arrange them in open niches of a subterranean chapel. In one of the Capuchin monasteries in Malta there is a fine collection of these semi-cooked individuals. After a year or two they become unable to stand as they were at first placed, and then for a time they are suspended, and finally, in ghastly submission, they are doubled together, and laid in their rags to moulder in the dust.

DEGREES OF BLISS IN HEAVEN.

Every true child of God will reach heaven, and dwell there for ever; but the Scriptures clearly teach that, although none will purchase heaven with works, all will be rewarded according to their works. "The more we keep ourselves in love with God," said Dr. A. Alexander, "the more meet shall we be for heavenly inheritance, where perfect love reigns in every heart. Not only so, but the richer reward will be possessed; for, notwithstanding the imperfection of our services, God is pleased to make our good works here the measure of the reward he will bestow hereafter. All his people are equally justified, but all will not be equally glorified. 'In my father's house are many mansions,' and some are doubtless much nearer to the celestial throne than others.—Some saints will occupy in heaven a higher and more honorable throne than others. All will be happy as they are capable of being; but the capacity of those who loved God most constantly and fervently, will be greater than that of those who loved him less."

What an encouragement is offered by this doctrine to the cultivation of an ardent piety, and to the performance of an abundance of good works: "For as much as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord." This can be truly said of no other kind of labor. There is no treasure laid up for future use so safe as that which is laid up in heaven; and no labors so certainly yield treasures as those performed in the service of God.—Dr. Rice.

MUSIC AND FLOWERS.

Two gifts God has bestowed upon us that have in themselves no guilty trait, and show an essential divineness. Music is one of them, which seems as though it were never born of earth, but lingers with us from the gates of heaven. Music, which breathes over the gross, or sad, or doubting heart, to inspire it with a consciousness of its most mysterious affinities and touches the cords of its undeveloped, unsuspected life. And the other gift is that of flowers, which though born of earth, we may well believe, if anything of earthly soil, grows in the higher realm; if any of its forms are identical there, will live on the banks of the river of life. Flowers, that in all our gladness, in all our sorrow, are still congruous—always appropriate in the church, as expressive of its dearest and most social themes, and blending their sweetness with the incense of prayer. Appropriate in the joys of the marriage hour, in the loneliness of the sick-room, and crowning with prophecy the foreheads of the dead. They give completeness to the association of childhood, and are appropriate even by the side of age, strangely as their freshness contrasts with the wrinkles and the grey hairs; for still they are suggestive, they are symbolical of the soul's perpetual youth, the inward blossoms of immortality, the amaranthine crown. In their presence we feel that when the body shall drop as a withered calyx, the soul shall go forth as a winged seed.—Observer.

GREAT MEN.—A great man is always willing to be little. Whilst he sits on the cushion of advantages he goes to sleep. When he is pushed, tormented, defeated, he has a chance to learn something; he has been put on his wits, on his manhood; he has gained facts; learns his ignorance; is cured of insanity of conceit; has got moderation and real skill. The wise man always throws himself on the side of his assailants. It is more to his interest than it is theirs to find his weak point. The wound cicatrizes, and falls off from him like a dead skin, and when they would triumph, lo, he has passed on invulnerable. As long as all that is said is against me, I feel a certain assurance of success. But as soon as honeyed words of praise are spoken for me, I feel as one that lies unprotected before his enemies.—Emerson.

THE SOLAR SPOTS.

Astronomers have recently noticed spots on the sun, and the nature or cause of the phenomena is the subject of scientific speculation. An English astronomer thus writes to the London Times:

One of your correspondents last week called the attention of your readers to a remarkable change of spots on the sun. I observed the group on the morning on which it appeared and have watched it closely ever since, and most interesting have been the changes which it has undergone. I would now ask all who take an interest in the subject to direct their attention to the present appearance of the sun. In addition to the group above referred to there are two large collections of spots and one small one, the latter being exactly upon the equator.

The two large chains are of great length, extending, by rough micrometrical measurement, about three minutes and a half, or over 100,000 miles in length. The most important and interesting of the two is a little to the south of the equator, and is headed by a very large opening, with a dense penumbra and black nucleus. The other is an object of great interest, on account of its position, it being very near to the southern limb of the sun, a quarter in which these appearances are not generally looked for or found.

THEY SHALL OBTAIN MERCY.—If you find a man disposed to complain of the coldness of the world, be sure you will find that he has never brought anything into the world to warm it, but is a personal lump of ice set in the midst of it. If you find a man who complains that the world is all base and hollow, tap him, and he will probably sound base and hollow. And so, in the other way, a kind man will probably find kindness everywhere about him. The merciful man, as a general thing, will obtain mercy. he who has always had a kind excuse for others, who has looked at the brightest side of the case; he who has rendered his pardon and his help whenever he could, who has never brought his fellow-man into any strait by reason of not helping him, will find that the mercy which he has bestowed, flows back upon him in a full and spontaneous spring. He will make a merciful world by the mercy he himself shows.

A SHORT METHOD WITH AN INFIDEL.—The Christian Index gives an incident which illustrates the value of Christian consistency in particular, on all occasions. The writer of the anecdote was one of several gentlemen—among them a lawyer and an editor of some note—who were quartered for a night in the same room at a country tavern. Before retiring to rest, the editor introduced a dispute on the subject of religion, by avowing his disbelief in, and contempt for its doctrines. He indulged in a lengthened display of his bitterness and folly, with but an occasional reply from the lawyer, until the latter commenced preparations for rest, by withdrawing quietly to his bedside and kneeling in prayer. An instant hush fell on the scene. An audible rebuke from heaven could scarcely, it seemed, have interrupted the current of blasphemy with more surprise and awe. Little was said further; but the retiring of that company of travelers was a season of speechless solemnity long to be remembered by every one of them.

THE EXTENT OF OUR COUNTRY.—It has been computed that the United States have a frontier line of 10,750 miles, a sea-coast of 5,430 miles, a lake coast of 1,160 miles. One of its rivers is twice as long as the Danube, the largest river in Europe. The Ohio is 600 miles longer than the Rhine, and the noble Hudson has a navigation in the "Empire State" 120 miles longer than the Thames. Within Louisiana are bayous and creeks, almost unknown, that would shame by comparison the Tiber or the Seine. The State of Virginia alone is one third larger than England. The State of Ohio contains 3,000 square miles more than Scotland. The harbor of New York receives the vessels that navigate rivers, canals, and lakes to the extent of 3,000 miles, equal to the distance from America to Europe. From the capital of Maine to the "Crescent City," is 200 miles further than from London to Constantin

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Terms—$2 00 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1859.

ACCOUNTS—NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

All parties interested in the Advocate—Editor, Preachers, and Subscribers—are interested in avoiding confusion in accounts.

Those well acquainted with the credit system in the newspaper business know full well that, under that system, confusion in accounts never was, never will, never can be avoided.—Uncertain mails, unavoidable oversights in agents or clerks, forgetfulness in subscribers and others, and the wearying, vexatious details of this business over all others, render it impossible. We have tried, for years, and know.

To have the subscription begin and end with the year, and to pay, if not in advance, at least once a year, is the nearest approach to a remedy that we can devise,—and this is our plan.

Immediately after the Conferences, all the accounts will be made out to January, 1861, without reference to time of commencement, or time last paid to; and they will be sent to each subscriber who has not paid to January, 1861.

If all our subscribers and agents will patiently co-operate with us, this difficulty about accounts will be forever settled during the coming year. After that, when January, 1861, comes, $2 more will be due, and so on.

Will our brethren and friends, when they receive these accounts, immediately remit the money to the office, or pay to the preacher, taking a receipt? If any think the account incorrect, let him inform us, pleasantly, without quarreling. We never quarrel, though we have more cause than others.

The volume of the Advocate will hereafter begin and end with the year; and it is very desirable that subscriptions should conform to the same rule.

Therefore, new subscribers, who do not begin with the year, will please send, not two dollars, but an amount sufficient to pay for the paper till the end of the year, at the rate of Four Cents a Week.

Then, every subscriber will know, without being informed, that at the beginning of the year is the time to remit the subscription money.

And let us have scores, hundreds, thousands of new subscribers with which to begin the New Volume, January 1st, 1860.—We intend, if Providence smile on us, to make a better paper next year than ever before. Arrangements are made, and being made, for greatly increasing its attractions.—Some new writers, of the first order, will begin with the year. The paper is flatteringly approved now—we intend to merit higher approbation.

HERE AND THERE OF A BIBLE AGENT.—NOTICES OF A ZIG-ZAG COURSE, &C.

Mr. Editor: I was a little afraid when I sent you my last letter that it was too long, and hoped you would make a division of it, and not tax your readers with the whole of it at once. But, then, I ought to have done that myself, and not seek to impose burdens upon one already in "labors abundant."

TEXAS CAMP-MEETING.

On my return from North Alabama, I visited the Texas camp-meeting, about fourteen miles from Auburn and in the Tuskegee Circuit. This meeting was under the control of the Rev. F. G. Forgerson, whom I found equipped for the battle against Satan and Sin. He extended to me, as the representative of the Bible cause, a cordial welcome, and gave me an hour to present its claims, which I did, and which was responded to in a collection of $150. Here I had the pleasure of meeting with Dr. J. Hamilton, whom I knew before I became a member of the Alabama Conference. It was he, more than any other man, who influenced me to become an itinerant minister. But for his strong and persuasive appeals upon this subject, I might have consecrated myself to the world, and to-day might have been in the race after its pelf and vanities. The Doctor I found weak in body, but mighty in spirit, ready for every good work. His discourses were full of the marrow and fatness of the gospel. He preaches as one who never doubts his divine commission—as one who ever realizes the preciousness of the Sacred Oracles committed to him. Who can mark his attenuated form and weakening strength without a feeling of regret? The Church should pray for this faithful man of God, that his valuable life may long be spared to the Church. The Conference of which he is a member should grant him any privilege, in the way of rest or travel, which he may desire for the benefit of his health. The Alabama Conference can never fully estimate the value of his services, although he is one of its fathers whom it delights to honor.

WAMIR STAND CAMP-MEETING.

Here I also met Bro. Furgerson, who gave me a second shake of the hand as Bible Agent and the eleven o'clock hour on Sabbath morning. The congregation was an immense one, and the attention for the most part fixed and solemn. The amount raised was in the neighborhood of $200. The brethren in the ministry—John Metley, Mathews, Pitts, and others,—did faithful work, and some of the services were marked by wonderful displays of divine power. Many souls were disburdened of their sins, and praises to God burst forth from lips unused to prayer or praise. The hospitality of the tent holders merits all praise.

CHENNENUGGEE RIDGE CAMP-MEETING.

You know, Mr. Editor, something about that beautiful section of Alabama. Have you not preached there? It seems to me they have in recollection a man of your name and calling in that region of country. I could tell you some things I heard of you; but you editors have praise enough without hearing what is said in your favor in every neighborhood of the country. But, don't ye get a little of that thing opposite to praise, now and then? Well, you have bargained for a mixed cup, and must therefore drink it without murmuring. If I mistake not, you obtained your "better half" from that paradisaic ridge. Of course you are kept in lively remembrance of it. Speaking of "better half," I pleasantly asked a wife the other day about her absent husband, calling him her "better half." She refused the compliment, and seemed astonished at my politeness. So you see the wives magnify the position allowed them by their lords, and deny them all equality.

There were several preachers at this camp-meeting—Presiding Elder Rev. John D. Lavey, who gave me an encouraging welcome; the Rev. M. Dessler, the preacher in charge, of whom good things are reported; the Rev. M'Carty, of Glennville; William Motley, of Eufaula; Dr. Dawson, Dr. Ellison Crowell, George Carter, and others. It was indeed pleasant to mingle with so noble a band of pure-minded men, whose highest ambition is to save souls, elevate humanity, and bless the world by preaching the everlasting gospel of Jesus Christ.

Monday morning, at eleven, was assigned me for my Bible collection. There was no wincing, as I could discover, under that awakening process. The sum of $300 was mined. Col. Ott, of Barber, gave $100. On expressing my gratification at his liberality, I was informed that it was characteristic of the man. He did more: he proposed, if I would visit him, to take me in his buggy, and accompany me in my work. Such an example speaks for itself. Bros. Russell Flewellen, Allen, and others, gave liberally. I cannot omit to mention the name of Bro. James Banks, of Enon—"Uncle Jimmy," as he is called. He had already paid me his annual contribution; his sons had also given to the Bible cause; yet Uncle Jimmy could not refrain from taking stock in this good cause a second time. After the public collection was nearly closed, Dr. Ellison proposed to be one of a certain number to raise $100. The amount was not quite filled out; Bro. Banks asked for the paper containing the names to this proposition; he put down his own, hunted up his two sons and son-in-law, and told them they must give more; and thus, in a little time, had the matter closed up. Here was an act of unaffected kindness and liberality which was truly refreshing.

LOUCHAPOKA.

This village lies between Auburn and Montgomery, about seven miles from the former place, and is rapidly improving in its architecture and morals. Its schools and churches established by its citizens, indicate their appreciation of education and religion. The Methodist Church of this place gave over $100 toward the circulation of the Scriptures. Bro. Lewis Wimberly gave $30, Bro. J. T. Wagnon $20—others also gave liberally.

OPELIKA.

This is another flourishing village lying within seven miles of Auburn, on the Montgomery and West Point Rail Road. The Methodists have a very neat place of worship here, which was dedicated last year by Dr. Means, of Ga. Here I got something worthy to be recorded for the Bible.

TUSCALOOSA.

I reached this place Saturday morning August 8, just before day, after riding all night in a very uncomfortable hack. I dipped into bed and snatched up a very small portion of sleep. Arose and got my breakfast before some of the fashionables were out. Went to the parsonage and saluted the Rev. J. B. Cottrell, stationed preacher of the M. E. Church of that place. Found him on the eve of starting to Camp-meeting at a place called "Bone Camp." What a name. Don't ask me to explain it. Being invited to accompany him, I did so. We arrived too late for the 11 o'clock services. At three P. M., Brother C. preached us a good sermon. I was appointed to conduct the religious services at night, but late in the evening the wind was high, blowing a gale. It continued so until night had closed in, and the lateness of the hour almost determined us to abandon the idea of a meeting. But, hark, the horn blows—the signal for assembling at the stand. The people are moving in that direction. The congregation has assembled. I find myself in the pulpit, not knowing whether to preach, or to exort, or to omit both, for the wind still runs high and the candles are flickering and going out. They are relighted, but out they go. A word of exhortation is however given amid the otherwise of darkness and light and mourners invited to the altar, when about twenty came forward. By and bye the wind partially lulls, the candles shed a steadier light, and a gracious power descends upon the people.

I have often thought of an incident which occurred at this camp-ground some four or five years ago. The Rev. T. J. Koger and I were in the pulpit, and that good and useful man, James Wells was preaching. As he proceeded solemnly along with his discourse, several large curs fiercely and furiously barking, ran a cow bellowing into the encampment, and they came rushing toward the stand as though they intended to drive right through it; but fortunately they turned away in another direction; the congregation became diverted, and soon almost every person present was seized with an unaccountable inclination to laugh. Even we, who were in the pulpit, could not refrain from it. Bro. W. tried in vain to go on with his sermon—finally closed saying, "I cannot preach." Turning to me he said, "will you pray?" Well, well, what a fix we were in to go to prayer. Yet, wonderful to state, we had not been on our knees but a few moments before an awful solemnity rested upon the people, a complete reaction had taken place in their feelings, and groans, and shouts, and praises closed the services of that hour. Bro. Freeman, a local preacher of great piety and usefulness, having charge of that Circuit in which this camp-ground is located, kindly gave me the 11 o'clock on Sabbath, and some fifty-six dollars was raised for my cause. At 3 P. M. Bro. Cottrell preached a Missionary sermon and raised $130 for that cause.

At night I preached at Tuskaloosa in the Methodist Church, which was a familiar place to me, having occupied its pulpit in the years of 1854 and '55. The Bible collection in Tuscaloosa amounted to over $300, including the amount raised at the camp-ground. My time in Tuscaloosa was very pleasantly spent at the houses of Brother Alfred Battle, Judge Ormond, J. P. Turner and others. I felt quite at home among my old parishioners, whose kindness to me and my family I cannot soon forget. Tuscaloosa is noted for its educational advantages. Besides the University, which this year has opened under more favorable auspices than within a few years past, it has two or three classical male schools, and three female colleges, Presbyterian, Baptist and Methodist. The last is under the control of the Rev. F. M. Grace, of the Alabama Conference, who is assisted by competent teachers. I was pleased to see the Methodists of Tuscaloosa so deeply interested in this institution, and determined to secure its success. Bro. Grace has experience as a teacher, and merits the confidence of the public.

HAVANAH.

Visited this little place with the Rev. R. K. Hargrove, who has charge of the Circuit called by its name. He occupied a parsonage here which his people fitted up very comfortably. He kindly gave me the 11 o'clock hour on Sabbath, although he had two collections to take up the same day. I raised nearly $140. Prof. Tutwiler gave $65 of it. After the services were closed I took a seat in his carriage and went out to his home, at Green Springs, where he has had a flourishing classical school for twelve years. His number of pupils is limited to sixty. It is impossible to say how large the school would grow if he would remove the limit; for about 125 applied during the present year. Prof. Tutwiler is a member of the M. E. Church; a gentleman of elegant and profound scholarship, and a beautiful simplicity of character. He has a lovely family. His son-in-law, Mr. Wright, assists him, and is himself a very interesting man.

I preached three times for Bro. Hargrove. Sunday night heard him preach an able sermon to his people, who highly esteem him, and would be glad to receive him back. Bro. J. J. Hutchinson, P. E. of Tuscaloosa District, joined us Sabbath evening. Monday morning I had the pleasure of a seat in his buggy to Greensborough, where I shared the generous hospitality of his house until next morning. At Bro. H.'s house met with Bros. Stokenwork, Kennedy, and Prof. Lupton of the Southern University, who is a modest and scholarly gentleman.

TALADEGA.

This place is the present terminus of the Selma and Tennessee River Railroad. The finishing of the road to this point was celebrated with imposing ceremonies. It has given new life to the place. Improvements are progressing, and a considerable quantity of cotton is being sold and shipped here. Talladega has a romantic scenery. Mountains almost entirely surround it, and you can hardly look in any direction without pleasurable inspirations.

Bro. Crymes, the stationed preacher, gave me kind greetings, and an open field for Bible collections, which amounted to over $100. Instead of being dead as reported, he is alive, and while some thought him in heaven he was engaged here below in building up, and advancing the interest of the Church Militant. The Church which he serves has been recently blessed with a gracious revival. Bro. C. has the advantage of most men in that he knows something about a posthumous reputation. I spent several pleasant days in Talladega, partly with my wife's aunt, Mrs. John Rice, and partly with the family of the Hon. Mr. Parsons.

JACKSONVILLE.

This town is about thirty-five miles north-east of Talladega, and, like the latter, has a mountainous scenery surrounding it. It does not, however, exhibit the same thrift, and perhaps can never compete with it as a commercial place, not having the same extensive and rich back country.

Circuit Court was in session while I was there, and I had the pleasure of meeting with some pleasant lawyers, and especially was I pleased to meet with Judge Shorter, of Eufaula, who was the presiding Judge. I find him greatly admired, both for his legal ability and Christian gentleness and consistency. Though a Baptist, he expects, at the approaching Conference, to entertain six or eight preachers, and expressed a willingness to take over twenty if need be. Bro Gillis, the stationed preacher, is popular. Has done a good work. I think every body would be willing to have him back. I spent a good time, with John M. Col, Clarke's. Bible collection over fifty dollars.

Still Westward—The Gulf again—At Anchor—Pedro Island—Matagorda Bay—Indianola—Denizens of the Prairies—Lavacca—Water and Wood Wanted—Tadmore in the Wilderness—San Antonio Female College.

The Island city was too near the sunrising. Light journeyeth westward. So doth the star of empire. So must we. Paradise, doubtless, lies in this direction.

Goods are boxed, baled, barrelled, bundled and shipped for San Antonio. On board the Charles Morgan, we are plowing again the Gulf of Mexico. The ofticer the better, if one has a good errand, a pleasant destination, agreeable companions, and exemption from the mal de mer.

Time and tide, they say, wait for no man. Many a man, however, has waited for time and tide. Too early is as great an evil as too late. Twelve hours we were obliged to lie at anchor in the mouth of Matagorda Bay. But what misfortune hath not its counter blessing? During this detention, I made the acquaintance of a somewhat interesting fellow passenger. This was Capt. Singer, brother to the father of the sewing machine. He is the proprietor of Padre Island; and, with this family, the only occupant. Padre Island is a strip of land, averaging four miles in width, and a hundred and twenty in length, lying off the coast of Texas from three to six miles, and extending Southward to the mouth of the Rio Grande, the southernmost point—at present, but not long—of the United States territory. Eleven years ago, the hero of my story, in command of a vessel bound for California, was cast away upon this island. The ship and cargo were a total loss. The Captain escaped with his life, his wife, two children, and ninety smooth dollars. He found a Mexican padre in possession of the island, who had been banished thither by the Mexican government; whether for his good deeds or his bad deeds, my informant could not tell. The padre, profiting by his exile—no matter whether through piracy or husbandry—had grown rich enough to retire. So he sold the island to Capt. Singer for five cents an acre, and carried away with him two and a half millions of dollars. The present proprietor was lately offered twenty-five thousand dollars for two thousand acres. Thirteen thousand acres he has given to his niece, and is now paying taxes on nearly a hundred thousand, and thinks a hundred and fifteen dollars an enormous exaction. He raises sugar, cotton, rice, tea, coffee, apples, peaches, plumbs, pears, quinces, strawberries; besides oranges, lemons, citrons, pine apples, and all the tropical fruits; for which he finds good market at Corpus Cristi, Brazos Santiago, and other towns of the coast. He has grape-vines which ran sixty-two feet last year, and some of his sugar cane produced thirty-six mature joints, more than twice the growth ever attained during a single season in Louisiana. When he took possession of the island, there was not a tree of any sort growing upon its soil. Four years ago, he set out two fig-tree sprouts; and now has not less than a thousand fig-trees, bearing all the year round. He began with a few cattle and horses, which have increased to thousands. They run wild, and are as fat as Jeshurun. When he wants beef, he goes out and shoots a bullock. When he wants a new team, his boys capture a couple of horses with the lariat. Last year his wife made fifteen hundred dollars by the sale of her butter. She has never left the island since she first set her feet upon its beach, and declares she has no desire to leave it. Five of their seven children were born there, and have never been beyond its bounds. They are educated at home, by means of a private tutor. They run without hats or shoes, and ride the wildest horses. A daughter thirteen years old milks twenty-four cows every morning and evening. These children eat mush and milk for supper, and are never sick. Their father has not purchased a picayune's worth of medicine in eleven years. That was a blessed shipwreck! And what think you now, Mr. Editor, of the Bishop's footsteps? One item I commit to you and the public in perfect confidence:—The Captain generously offered your correspondent a thousand acres of land, on condition that he would settle in Padre Island. Think of it, Mr. Editor; and thou also friendly and disinterested public; and be ready, when I call for it, to give me suitable advice.

"Heave-o-hoy!" They are picking up the anchor. Now Neptune raises his huge shoulders, and lifts us over the bar; and we go steaming inland, cutting a furrow through the mud with our keel, and disturbing the subterranean repose of many a scaly denizen of the brine. The navigation of this bay is extremely difficult and dangerous, and many a mast and chimney rise from the waves as a warning.

But the peril is past, for here is Indianola. Pretty near, is it not? But the name is about the only pretty thing belonging to the place. It was formerly called Powderhorn. Indianola was an ambitious young rival, that came and seated herself upon the shore three miles above, and looked sourly and supercilliously down upon her unpretending neighbor, like upper Basle upon lower Basle, and threatened one day to eat her up. An interesting company, who knew what they were about, came hither, and built a pier far out into the Bay. And when the young and haughty Indianola saw every sail and every steamer stopping at the pier, she came, with drooping crest, creeping down into Powderhorn—inhabitants, houses, traffic, name and all; and Powderhorn became Indianola. The town contains six or eight hundred inhabitants, and does an immense shipping business for the Interior. It is the nearest port, and indeed the only access, for Victoria, Goliad, Gonzales, Seguin, Lockheart, New Braunfels, and San Antonio. The houses—no very imposing specimens of architecture—are strung along two parallel streets, a mile or more in length, on a narrow sandy ridge, with the Bay in front, and a marsh in the rear. There is a good hotel in the town, but I saw no church.

Too early for the tide, we were too late for the stage, and obliged to wait here till another day. The day dawns, and we are journeying over the eternal prairies. Where, between the equator and the pole, is any thing more beautiful? The grass is lush high, and as green as an emerald. Cattle and horses are grazing everywhere by thousands. Here and there you see a little company of deer, feeding freely by the wayside, and merely looking up inquisitively as you pass. The pretty prairie hen flies up just under your horses' feet, and alights not ten yards distant. There goes a mute rabbit, as if running a race with lightning. Plovers too are plentiful, and the Texas bird of paradise. These long-tailed beauties, it is a joy to see! They are about the size of a mocking bird, very rich in plumage, with two long feathers streaming behind them, and nothing that wings the upper deep moves more gracefully. About sunset, you see them coming in from all quarters, toward some cluster of live oaks, soaring like angels, and seeming, like angels to descend from heaven; and their shrill clear voices, as they meet, are like the salutations of the seraphim. A couple of eagles, seated upon a mesquit tree, looked as insolent as brigands; but with the wild turkies that trotted across the road, and then stopped to gaze at us, I should like to have made a more intimate acquaintance.

Lavacca is a thriving little town, and mine host of the hotel treated me like a Methodist preacher. I am really ashamed to have forgotten his name, but it is no common name, and as long and as crooked as the San Antonio River. He keeps a good house, and is a clever Methodist, and has a worthy Methodist wife. This excellent lady, I was informed, was once over-taken by the Indians, who stripped her, bound her to a tree, and were just about to shoot her, when she was rescued by her friends. May she outlive the last Comanche!

Victoria, Gonzales, Seguin, the Guadaloupe, and two or three other things in Texas, must bide their time. I have not room for them in this letter.

We are approaching San Antonio. The prairies are very different in time, so far as art can remedy the defects of nature. They will bore artesian wells. They will construct tanks for rain water. These will furnish a supply for man and stock; but they will not produce corn, cotton, and sweet potatoes. Western Texas was made for the herdsman and the shepherd.

Timber for fencing is another desideratum. Very likely rails will hereafter be superseded by hedges. The mesquit bush is well adapted to this use, and grows abundantly everywhere. She acacia, perhaps, would be still better; and the aloe is also indigenous, and one of the most graceful trees I ever saw.

And here is a great frontier town, of ten thousand inhabitants, embracing the prettiest little river in the world—a real "Tadmor in the wilderness." And this is to be our home, the scene of our labors and sufferings; concerning which I have many things to say for the illumination of the public; but the public must be patient, and you, Mr. Editor, must be indulgent too. For the present I add only this: We are organizing The San Antonio Female College; have already in operation a prosperous school, with an encouraging prospect; are surrounded with warm and generous friends, and an enlightened and liberal community; and hope soon to occupy a stately collegiate edifice, second to none in the Atlantic States, or the Mississippi Valley; with three hundred young ladies, and an incomparable corps of teachers.

And now, Mr. Editor, excuse me. I am going out for a walk upon the breezy hills beyond the city; where I trace the footprints of Bishop Pierce; and whence, with a good pair of wings, one might soar off into California and infinity.

Jos. Cross.

MIDDLE LIFE.

It is perhaps not without some shade of sadness that one comes to rank himself in middle life. Slowly it dawns upon him, reluctantly he admits it. It is no sense of growing old that teaches him, no dogging of the powers of the spirits, not even the taunt of that opprobrious epithet now-a-days flippantly flung at middle life—for the "fogy" is not the old, but the middle-aged man; but one finds that, with the fuller flesh, and firmer muscle, and stronger trend, and truer poise of his faculties—while yet his sympathies are all young and fresh, while yet he waits to follow where the older and wiser lead—the world waits and looks to him—pushes him forward where he hesitates, until he discovers, that no longer looked upon as young, he must take his place in the toiling and exposed van, and hew the way in which other steps shall tread.

The character of middle life is the character of the man. It is that by which he is known, that by which he makes his mark, that by which he does his good and evil; it is the character he carries with him into age and into the dread presence of his Maker. Middle life makes for us what God himself could not give. The bright visions of youth are past. Sorrows, disappointments, griefs, have overtaken us, and we are made to see how solemn and how real a thing it is to live, how vain and weak and ignorant is the unsupported soul of man. Amid trials and foils, the attendant witnesses of a father's discipline and oversight, amid defeats which each day testify to our insufficient principle, our advancing years lead us. Shall all this pass us as the breeze passes the wheatfield, leaving it standing and smiling as before? Shall we not have gained some steadiness, some stateliness of character, some other reverence than ourselves, some other dependence? Shall the old frivolity still cleave to us—the garb of childhood on the frame of man—the old love and pursuit of pleasure—the old, often vanquished, self-confidence? Shall we be growing into years with all the frippery of childhood lingering about our hearts, or manners, or hopes, or attainments? Not so; middle life is for better things; for the casting off of the childish and unworthy, for the putting on of the whole man—even of the man after Christ. Saddest of all sad sights is to see the probation of a human soul wearing towards its noon, while no deepening tinge to character proclaims the ripening within; while all things say how closely and wilfully it clings to its grosser delights. Old age is not of necessity beautiful. All do not know the secret of the art of growing old gracefully. It is an art which middle life works at and perfects. The secret lies back there. Serene and waiting and beloved age is the result of honorable and virtuous middle life; and age, querulous, exacting, burdensome to itself and others, is the product of selfish, frivolous middle life.

PROTRACTED MEETINGS.

Bishop Early, in a recent address to the Holston Conference upon the duty of pastoral visiting, said: "You appoint protracted meetings; I never appointed a protracted meeting; I appointed two days' meetings, and if they promised well I protracted them. You are not to be spending all your time and strength on protracted meetings, letting the regular appointments fall through, and the whole circuit get into disorder—no class-books, no account of periodicals, no Sunday-schools. Neglecting and slighting your work three-quarters of the year, not expecting to do anything, and teaching people not to expect a blessing at regular meetings; then, at the heel of the year, getting up a revival, going into protracted meetings, reporting so many conversions, and when your successor comes along, he can't find half of them. Everything at loose ends—no class-books, but slips of paper here and there. Under such men the Church will go down. They do not administer sacrament once a quarter. I hear of elders who have not administered the sacrament of the Lord's Supper in a year—a whole year! and yet they stood up once and took the vows you are taking. Go from house to house. This you promise to do, but you don't do it when you whip from home to church and back, maybe stopping at a few favorite places to get a meal and have your horse fed. So have I heard of a preacher who had a circuit seventy-five miles round; but he travelled three hundred miles. How? From home to one appointment fifteen miles off, and back, same day—thirty miles; from home to another appointment and back, same day—twenty miles; and so on. This is not family and pastoral visiting. It cannot discharge your conscience of these vows. Be gentlemen. Give as little trouble as possible, and do as much good, wherever you go. You must often, brethren, pursue your sacred calling under disadvantages; but go forward. Remember, he that goeth forth weeping, bearing precious seed, shall come again rejoicing. Weeping! Why should he weep? Because, forsooth, grain might be precious and scarce. He and his family can ill spare it for seed; they need it for food for present necessities. But the sower takes it for seed, though suffering for food. By and by the harvest comes; yes, the harvest."

ELOQUENT EXTRACT.

The best thing yet written by Edward Everett in his "Mount Vernon Papers," is an article on the late comet. After describing its late approach to the earth, and the beautiful picture it presented, he says: "Return, then, mysterious traveler, to the depths of the heavens, never again to be seen by the eyes of men now living! Thou hast run thy race with glory! Millions of eyes have gazed upon thee with wonder—but they shall never look upon thee again. Since thy last appearance in these skies, empires, languages, and races of men have died away. The Macedonian, the Alexandrian, the Augustan, the Parthian, the Byzantine, the Saracenic, the Ottoman dynasties have sunk or are sinking into the gulf of ages. Since thy last appearance old continents have relapsed into ignorance, and new worlds have come out from behind the veil of waters. The Magian fires are quenched on the hill-tops of Asia, the Chaldean is blind, the Egyptian hieroglyphic has lost its meaning, the Oracles are dumb. Wisdom now dwells in the farthest Thules, or in newly discovered worlds beyond the sea. Haply, when wheeling up again from the celestial abyss, thou art as once more seen by the dwellers of earth, the language we speak shall be forgotten, and science shall have fled to the utmost corners of the earth. But even there, His hand, that now marks out thy wondrous circuit, shall still guide thy course; and there His Hesper will smile at thy approach, and Arcturus with his sons rejoice at thy coming."

THE MAGNETIC TELEGRAPH.

Lord Brougham, before the British Association for the Advancement of Science, delivered an address, from which we take these remarks: The power of the magnetic telegraph extends to the comfort of families, the cure of diseases, the transactions of business, the administration of justice, the operations of government in all its branches, civil and military, domestic and foreign; establishing an almost instantaneous communication between the remotest regions of earth. But physical science has given us the means of personal intercourse as well as correspondence with remote places. How little could Watt, when employed as a common mechanic to repair a model engine, foresee that from the happy inventions which arose out of his deep reflection upon the agencies submitted to his studies there would follow such a change in our relations with the natural world—now sets winds and tides and currents at defiance, and excludes in a great degree the consideration of space and time from our calculations, and a yet greater revolution in our social system. Little did he think that the work he was just beginning would, before another generation passed away, not merely change the whole course of commercial dealings, the communication of all countries, one with another, and of all men among themselves in each, but affect the whole policy of nations, their relations in peace and their operations in war."

TRADE WITH JAPAN.

The Netherlands government has published a very interesting official report of the trade carried on in the port of Nagasaki, Japan, from the 16th of October, 1857, to the 4th of July, 1859, and the statistics give a flattering idea of the commercial prospects which lie before the civilized nations, when Japan and China are fully opened. During the period referred to one hundred and forty-nine vessels arrived at Nagasaki, and all foreigners were freely admitted by the authorities, the flag of the ship only being scrutinized.

So brisk was the trade that the authorities were nearly overwhelmed; but still they endeavored to meet it in a liberal spirit with the exception of the Commercial Corporation, a sort of native Chamber of Commerce, the members of which have enjoyed a monopoly. Warehouse accommodation was very much required. The Japanese junks coming into port were increasing in number. Within two years Japan will furnish a good supply of raw silk, but at present her exports are not well suited for European or American markets. Coal is sent to China, with a fair and steady supply. A police has been organized in Nagasaki, and foreigners were well treated. Vessels were repaired there satisfactorily and cheaper than in Shanghae.

REVIVAL IN IRELAND.

Rev. W. Arthur has just communicated to the Wesleyan organ in London a letter written by Mr. Cary, an Irish gentleman from Amalong, on the south side of the province of Ulster, and bordering on the strong Romish counties. The revival is spreading in that direction with great power, and Mr. C. makes a loud call for help from England to supply places now open to the Gospel. He calls for local preachers, even laymen, to volunteer in the good work temporarily. There is, he says, a most urgent demand for a missionary at Mourne, and also a loud call for laborers for the Kilkeel country. The present aspects of the awakening in Ireland give hope that the day of her redemption is near.

One of the most hopeful among the signs of the times is the great desire shown for the word of God. A bookseller in Belfast says that his sales of Bibles and Testaments have increased more than four-fold since the revival began. In the months of June, July, August and September of 1858, the number sold was 5325; in the corresponding months of the present year, 19,641. Besides this there is an increasing demand for tracts and religious books, illustrating the hunger and thirst of the people for religious knowledge.

WHAT A GOOD PERIODICAL MAY DO.

Show us an intelligent family of boys and girls, and we shall show you a family where newspapers and periodicals are plentiful. Nobody who has been without these silent private tutors, can know their educating power for good or evil. Have you never thought of the innumerable topics of discussion which they suggest at the breakfast table, the important public measures with which, thus early, our children become familiarly acquainted; great philosophic questions of the day, to which, unconsciously, their attention is awakened, and the general spirit of intelligence which is evoked by these quiet visitors? Anything that makes home pleasant, cheerful and happy, thins the haunts of vice, and the thousand and one avenues of temptation, should certainly be regarded, when we consider its influence on the minds of the young, as a great moral and social blessing.

NEWSPAPERS IN GREECE.

The kingdom of Greece has at present 41 newspapers and periodicals, among which are a few theological, judicial, and medicinal papers; also one military and one Sunday paper. Three-fourths of these papers (31) are published in the city of Athens. In 1853 the number of political papers published in Greece was 23, of which 14 appeared in Athens. Among the theological papers is also a weekly with evangelical principles, established a little more than a year ago, by Mr. Kalopothakes, under the title, The Star in the East, which gives brief articles and religious intelligence of Greece and other countries. Though the Greek clergy are not favorably disposed toward the paper, it has in Laconia alone more than a hundred subscribers, and is read by nearly all the educated citizens of Athens.

Job Work, of the best quality, and in variety of style, and in the most prompt manner, done at the New Orleans Christian Advocate office. Terms, cash, on delivery.

The Mississippi Conference and the New Orleans Christian Advocate.—Our clerk, Mr. Oliver, was present at the Mississippi Conference until Monday evening. He returns greatly and most favorably impressed with the ability and courtesy of its members; and brought with him the largest cash receipts the Advocate has ever had from an Annual Conference. The Bishop had not arrived; but Dr. Drake was elected President, and was discharging the difficult duties of a chairman in a manner the most appropriate and impartial. The Conference was progressing rapidly and smoothly in the business of the session.

Progress of Cherokee Nation.—The St. Louis Republican has the following letter, dated Tahlequah, Oct. 26. Bishop Paine, of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, preached an able sermon here yesterday. He is on his way to attend the Indian missionary Conference, which convenes at the Creek Agency, some thirty miles west of this place, Thursday next. The Bishop had a providential escape from death, only a few days since, near Bentonville, in Arkansas. The stage in which he was traveling upset, the horses took fright, and dashed off at a furious rate, dragging the vehicle over a rocky road, fracturing two of his ribs on the left side, and confining him inside until the top of the coach was broken to pieces.

Rev. Thomas Gunn.—This venerable Methodist minister died in Robertson County, Tenn., May 13, 1859, aged 89 years, one month, and three days. He was born in Nottoway County, Virginia, April 10, 1770. While young, his father removed to Caswell county, North Carolina, where, at about eighteen years of age, he professed religion and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was ordained deacon at Lynchburg, Virginia, Feb. 4, 1808, by Bishop Asbury. He was ordained elder by Bishop M'Kendree, in Tennessee, on the 11th of October, 1814. He emigrated to Tennessee at an early day, and was long a citizen of Robertson County. The late Rev. William Gunn, of Kentucky, was his nephew. Dr. Gunn says: "His mind was vigorous, and his powers as a preacher far above ordinary."

The Death of Pitt.—A writer in Once a Week gives the following account of the death of the great Pitt: Pitt died at his house on Putney Heath, near the spot where Canning and Castlereagh fought their duel, and in a very neglected state, none of his family or friends being with him at the time. One, who was sincerely attached to him, hearing of his illness, rode from London to see him. Arriving at his house he rang the bell at the entrance gate, but no one came. Dismounting, he made his way to the hall door, and repeatedly rang the bell, which no one answered. He then entered the house, wandered from room to room, till at last he discovered Pitt on a bed—dead, and entirely neglected. It is supposed that such was his poverty, he had not been able to pay the wages of his servants, and that they had absconded, taking with them what they could.

Summerfield.—I heard Summerfield make one of the first addresses, if not the first he ever made in this country. He represented the Bible as the vine of Joseph, which ran over the wall; and so traced the vine running over sectarian, tribe and national walls—over mountains, rivers, lakes and oceans—over all the barriers which separate men and nations from one another, till it bore fruit on all sides of all walls, for the healing of the nations. Nearly for years have since passed away, and the figure of Summerfield is yet before me in the beauty of meekness, and with the simplicity of eloquence, tracing the vine of Joseph as it spread over the walls. I even now see his long white finger making its undulating line.—Murray.

Old John-street M. E. Church celebrated its anniversary last Sunday. Rev. Mr. Milburn preached in the morning, and Bishop Janes at night. A love-feast was held early in the forenoon, and a meeting for addresses in the afternoon. Dr. Bangs presided. He had preached the last sermon in the old house, and the first in the new. About seven hundred dollars were collected for the church during the day, and the whole occasion was highly successful.

The first and the last of the English Martyrs, who died at the stake, for the cause of Christ, were Baptists. William Sawty, in 1428, was the first who led the way into the fire which was to consume the bodies and purify the spirits of so many Christians, and which was kept burning for nearly two centuries. Edward Wightman, in 1612, being the last of the brave and glorious army in England, who perished in the flames.

Mr. Benton will probably have the remaining volume of his father's life ready about March, or possibly a little before. By dint of great condensation it will be completed in that second volume, being somewhat larger than the first. Dr. George Smith is busily at work now on the third volume of his history, to be continued fully down to 1839, and slightly till 1852.

Baptists of Georgia.—The statistics collected by brother Lagg, says the "Index," clerk of the Convention of the State of Georgia, show that 7,759 were baptized during the last year. The actual gain of membership compared with the previous year is 7,665. The whole membership of Georgia Baptists is 93,417.

The oldest painting in the world is a Madonna and Child, painted A. D. 889. The oldest in England are supposed to be the portraits of Chaucer, painted in panel, in the early part of the fourteenth century, and of Henry IV, done in the beginning of the fifteenth century.

Rev. Dr. Manly.—Dr. Manly, of Charleston, now of Alabama, has been elected President and Professor of Theology of the University at Mount Lebanon, Louisiana, in place of the Rev. Dr. Hartwell, deceased, and hopes are entertained that he will accept.

Death of a Moravian Bishop.—The Rev. Andrew Benade, the oldest Bishop of the Moravian Church in America, and nearly ninety years of age, died on the 30th ult. He was much respected for his intelligence and good qualities.

The Texas Almanac.—Richardson & Co., of the Galveston News, have sent us their Texas Almanac for 1860. If you wish to know anything about Texas, this Almanac will be of more service to you than five years' correspondence with friends there.

Large Accession.—In one of the Methodist Churches at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, in England, upward of nine hundred persons have been admitted into the Church.

Hugh Miller's Museum.—The museum of the late Hugh Miller has been purchased by the city of Edinburgh, for the sum of one thousand pounds sterling.

The taxable property in Texas this year is $224,353,266, being an increase of thirty millions of dollars over the last.

The late Mr. J. K. Brunel, the engineer, was a rich man. His personal property alone was worth $400,000.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

NOVEMBER 23, 1859.

EDITORIAL NOTICES.

ADVERTISING IN THE ADVOCATE.

The business public are slowly learning that the Advocate is the GREAT ADVERTISING PAPER OF THE SOUTH AND WEST. Advertisements in it are more valuable than in any half dozen other papers.

It has the largest circulation west of Charleston, and South of Cincinnati; larger than any other two weeklies in New Orleans, and is increasing rapidly will, in a few years, double its present circulation.

It is of medium size, and not crowded with advertisements, an advertisement is not lost in it, but can be easily found.

In our Editorial Notices, which we give to every advertisement, we specify the page and column on which an advertisement may be found. We seek to make every advertisement valuable to the advertiser and to the paper.

The circulation is spread out over Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, principally; Georgia, Florida, Tennessee, Kentucky, Arkansas, partially.

It is the only weekly of large and widely spread circulation in the great and growing metropolis of the South.

NEWS FROM OUR HOME WORK.

"To spread Scriptural Holiness over these Lands."

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Benton Circuit.—Rev. G. Hawkins writes: At Rebb's Chapel on the 5th Sabbath in July, the "pillar of cloud and of fire," settled on the Tabernacle of God, and for several days we enjoyed a season of "refreshing from the presence of the Lord." Here the divine glory moved from point to point, until the whole circuit of ten appointments, with one exception, has been visited with revival power. The result has been about two hundred and fifty whites and colored, have been received into the Church; old backsliders have been reclaimed; lukewarm professors have been stirred up; faithful ones have been greatly blessed; and many have been newly converted to God. You will be sure, Mr. Editor, we have had some happy seasons. Once or twice, I have seen a whole Church happy in the love of God. The best work has been done in the Church. I have urged the members again and again, all around my work, to be earnestly the higher attainments of religion, holiness of heart and life, and I know of but few who have not been abundantly blessed; some have been constrained to acknowledge that they did love God with all their soul, and received strength. I am more thoroughly convinced than ever, that the only way to successfully carry on the work of God is, as our discipline directs, "Strongly and closely to insist upon inward and outward holiness in all its branches." When the Church is clothed with her heavenly armor, she has a moral power the world cannot resist. We have had a revival on this work of family religion. Family altars have been erected, where the holy incense of prayer and praise never before ascended to God. Altars torn down have been rebuilt; and those long standing have been refreshed over with fire. I hear of some where the husband and wife pray alternately, the wife leading entirely when the husband is absent.

Question.—If we are as fervent and as believing in our family prayers as we ought to be, might not the conversion of children and servants be as common at home as at our protracted meetings? The God we pray to around the family altar, is the same we worship in the great congregation.

By the ways I must not forget to mention the "Golden Censer" has helped me much in reviving family prayer among my members; and it ought to be scattered broadcast all over the country. I am now through with all my meetings for this year. Tired and worn down, I returned home last Sunday at about 9 o'clock to rest a few days with Mattie. You see that I enjoy this rest after a three months hard labor at protracted meetings. Heaven will be a sweet place to the faithful servant. I think I shall throttle my missionary, and double my Conference assessments. I will soon close work, and then will be ready to go to Conference and receive another appointment for the ensuing year. What a wonderful machinery is an itinerancy! How it grinds sin to powder, and scatters it like before the summer's threshing floor. Let all the parts of this providential machine be kept in active motion, from the Bishop to our Bishops; let every man do his duty—do his own share, and Methodism will conquer the world.

Jasper Circuit.—Rev. J. C. Krogan writes: On reading your excellent paper, I noticed several revivals, for which I thank God. This encouraged me to give a short history of my circuit.

I filled eighteen appointments, fifteen churches, and three hundred and fifty miles ride per month. We had six gratious revivals, one hundred and four conversions, one hundred and sixty accessions to the Church; fifty received in full connection; thirty-six adults baptized, twenty children baptized. For Missions, twenty-eight dollars subscribed and paid; for Conference collections $25 paid and subscribed. A fine District—parsonage building at Jasper. Pray for us, dear brethren. Thanks due to the Presiding Elder, the Rev. W. J. Powers, and the local preachers for their faithful labors in this work. We are collecting some for the Christian Advocate, but it think safer to pay up the money at Conference than send by letter.

Sympathy Circuit.—Rev. L. E. Bell writes: We closed our Camp meeting at Carolina Church the 17th ult.; which was largely attended. We had a number of faithful ministers. The result was a great blessing to the Church, between thirty and forty conversions, and twenty accessions. I have received forty probationers since the death of my worthy colleague, Rev. J. T. Abernathy. This work is in a prosperous condition. Our Missionary and Conference assessments will all be collected.

Raw Ridge Circuit. Rev. J. J. Latham writes: The Lord has blessed us with five revivals; the members have been greatly revived; thirty-five or forty added to the Church; and about the same number professed religion. The general prosperity of the circuit is good.

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

Latest from Kansas.

LEAVENWORTH CITY, Nov. 17. The Leavenworth and Denver express has arrived here from Denver City, bringing dates from that place to the 10th inst. The express brings $40,000 in gold dust, consigned to various firms in this city.

Both houses of the Legislature of the State were this day organized.

Excitement in New Mexico.

St. Louis, Nov. 17. Later advices from New Mexico report great excitement throughout that country, on account of the continued outrages of the Indians.

Fatal Affray at Nashville.

Nashville, Nov. 18. A serious rencontre occurred this morning between two of our most respected citizens. The parties concerned were Allen A. Hall, editor of the Nashville News, and G. C. Poindexter, editor of the Union and American. Mr. Poindexter was instantly killed by a load of buckshot discharged from a shot-gun in the hands of Mr. Hall. Mr. Poindexter did not fire at his antagonist.

The affair grew out of an editorial quarrel.

The Harper's Ferry Affairs.

Boston, Nov. 17. Dr. Howe, who was shown by Col. Forbes to have been connected with the Harper's Ferry insurrectionists, has gone to Canada. His friends deny his connection with the insurrection.

Richmond, Va., Nov. 18.—John Brown has requested a new trial on a writ of error, which has been refused by the Supreme Court.

Charlestown, Va., Nov. 19.—The excitement here has subsided, but the military forces are augmenting. The baring, stock yard, and implements which were burned, belonged to John Darris, George H. Tate, and Mr. Sinder, who were jurors at the recent trial. The losses by the fires amount to about $2900.

The Hon. Alexander Hunter expresses a conviction that the rescue of the prisoners will be attempted. A letter from Urbana, Ohio, addressed to Brown, and written in cypher, has been intercepted and decyphered. The letter tells Brown to keep up his spirits, and that his friends are mustering, and will drop along one by one at a time.

Charleston, Va., Nov. 19.—The excitement on account of several fires which occured here has subsided. The fires were supposed to be the work of the friends of Brown and his cause, but the inhabitants subsequently concluded that they were caused by accident. Troops were ordered from Richmond by Col. Davis to attend this place, but were not needed. The officials abuse Col. Davis for being so precipitate about ordering troops.

Richmond, Va., Nov. 17. There is great excitement here and at Alexandria, in consequence of a rumor to the effect that the rescue of Brown is to be attempted, though the rumor is discredited at Washington.

A dispatch has been received here from Col. Davis, at Charlestown, to Governor Wise, requesting him to send two companies of cavalry, which are stationed here, to that, for the purpose of quelling insurrectionary movements. Col. Davis states that there has been five barns and outhouses fired to-day, which is supposed to be the work of Brown's sympathizers.

Startling Information. The Brown Rescue Affair.

Washington, Nov. 21. Dispatches have been received here this evening announcing the startling fact that a body of 1,000 men, under John Brown, jr., are actually on the way from Ohio to attempt the rescue of the prisoners at Charlestown, Va.

The Virginia Excitement.

Washington, Nov. 21. No reliable information received here from Harper's Ferry or Charlestown justifies the great excitement here during the last few days concerning an apprehended attempt to rescue Brown and the other condemned prisoners, and the extensive military preparations to prevent such an attempt.

The whole proceedings are regarded in high circles as the result of morbid imaginations, excited by the wildest, most unauthenticated rumors.

Steamer Lucy Holcombe Sunk.

Memphis, Nov. 21. The steamer Lucy Holcombe, from this place to New Orleans, struck a snag near Helena, Ark., and immediately sunk. The Holcombe was heavily loaded with cotton, having 1062 bales on board. She was valued at $27,000. Her freight was mostly taken off by the U. S. W. Hill and other steamers.

No lives were lost, and it is thought the boat may be raised.

New York Election.

Albany, Nov. 17, 1 o'clock evening.—The return of the State elections give hopes, the candidate for Secretary of State a majority of 1270 over his opponent.

The Safety of the "North Star."

New York, Nov. 17. Information has been received at this port of the safety of the steamship North Star. She was driven ashore on the 23d ult., at the French Keys, and got off without assistance, after remaining three seven days, and then proceeded on her voyage.

Canary Island Import Duties.

Washington, Nov. 17. Official advices have been received here, which state that corn and tobacco have been excluded from the list of free imports in the Canary Island, and that they are both still subject to heavy duties.

Latest from California.

St. Louis, Nov. 19. The California Overland mail has arrived here, bringing dates from San Francisco to the 28th ult. San Francisco dates report great excitement concerning the Carson Valley and Walker River Mines, which has caused great numbers of Californians to leave for those places. The mines are reported to be yielding largely.

Governor Weller has appointed Judge Hamn to succeed the late Senator Broderick.

Business at San Francisco is active, the sugar market is declining.

Gen. Scott has arrived at Portland, Oregon. Gen. Harney has left. He is supposed to have been offended on account of being superseded by Gen. Scott.

United States Troops for the Rio Grande.

Washington, Nov. 21. The Government has determined to send large reinforcements of troops to the Rio Grande, not merely for the present protection of the Texan frontier, but to be prepared for a contingency which there are strong reasons to believe may soon arise.

The Government has in its possession official information which leads to the belief that France, England and Spain conjointly, will immediately, in view of the distracted state of Mexico, take such measures to obtain the full satisfaction of the claims of their respective subjects against the Mexican Government as will end anger the existence of Mexico as a nation, and that should these powers be obliged to use force in the prosecution of these claims, and the country, or a portion of it, fall into their hands, it is feared that a monarchial form of government would be established under the protection of these powers.

The object in thus augmenting our force to such an extent on the Rio Grande is to be prepared for, such an event, in which case the United States may feel constrained to occupy the Northern States of Mexico, for the purpose of satisfying the claims of our own citizens against that country, and the security of the American residents on the frontier of Mexico.

It is expected that some vessels of the home squadron will soon be ordered to Vera Cruz and other Mexican ports, to watch the course of events.

Later From Washington. Orders Countermanded.

Washington, Evening, Nov. 21. In consequence of the receipt of official advices from Gen. Twiggs and other sources, to the effect that Brown's life was not in immediate danger, the War Department has to-day countermanded the orders for six companies from Fort Monroe, and five companies of United States troops from Fort Leavenworth, which were recently ordered to proceed to the defence of Brownsville, and the Texas frontier, as from the information received from New Orleans to-day it appears their presence is not needed.

Extraordinary News from Mexico.

Mobile, Nov. 21. The schooner Mary Clinton, of New Orleans, has arrived here, il ten days from Vera Cruz.

Her captain reports that on the night of the 9th inst., the day after the steamship Tennessee left, a courier arrived at Vera Cruz from Jalapa, bringing the news from the capital, that Miramon, who had left the city to proceed against Marquez, on account of the latter's declaration for a change of government and his seizure of $660,000 of the $2,660,000 he was charged to escort to San Blas, had, on the contrary, joined Marquez; and the two getting aboard a British vessel at San Blas, or near there, with the $2,000,000 in their possession, had left for parts unknown.

On the receipt of this letter Miramon's army "pronounced" in favor of Santa Anna.

Latest From South America.

New York, Nov. 22. The steamship North Star has arrived at this point from Aspinwall, bringing later advices from the Isthmus and South America.

A severe shock of an earthquake was felt throughout Chili on the 8th inst.

The shock was most severely felt in Chopiapi and Coldera. Rich mines of silver and copper have lately been discovered at Tarlof White.

The revolutionary Governor Bolivar has taken Mompax and defeated the Federal forces.

Mr. Clark, our Guatemalian Minister is seriously ill.

The revolution which broke out in Costa Rica has been suppressed.

Mr. Dimitry, our Minister, had recognized the new Government.

ARRIVAL OF THE CANADA.

Improvement in Cotton and Cereals. Basis of an European Congress agreed on. Garibaldi Declares Italy Retreated. He Threatens to Head a Revolution.

Halifax, N. S., Nov. 19. The Cunard steamship Canada, Capt. Lang, has arrived at this port, on her way to Boston.

She left Liverpool on Saturday the 5th inst., and touched at Queenstown, where she was detained until Monday the 7th inst. Her advices by telegraph from Liverpool and Londonderry are therefore five days later than those received by the Hungarian at Portland.

Liverpool Cotton Market.

Liverpool, Nov. 5. The sales of cotton for the week ending on Friday evening amounted to 59,000 bales. The sales on speculation during the same period were 8000 bales, and the sales for exportation were 8000 bales.

A slight advance has taken place in Middling Clean Cotton, which closed on Friday at extreme prices, to 1-16 advance. Other qualities of Cotton are generally unchanged.

The stock of Cotton at Liverpool amounts to 457,000 bales, of which 308,000 are of the American production. Some authorities say that all qualities of Cotton have slightly advanced, and that there was a partial advance of ⅛ on Fair and Middling qualities.

Liverpool, Nov. 7. The Cotton market closed firm on Saturday at the previous day's quotations.

The Breadstuffs market closed quiet to-day (Monday) the Cotton market opens steady at Friday's quotations.

Manchester Trade.

Liverpool, Nov. 5. Advices from Manchester are of a favorable character. The market is good and yarns closed firm, and holders were demanding an advance in prices. The firmness of the manufacturers had some what checked transactions.

Breadstuffs and Provisions.

The Liverpool Breadstuffs market generally closed quiet, with but slight variation in prices. Wheat has slightly advanced. Descriptions of Corn have also slightly advanced.

The Provision market generally closed dull. Beef closed heavy and prices are generally unchanged.

The European Congress.

London, Nov. 7. It is asserted on what appears to be good authority, that the English Government has consented to join a Congress of the great Powers, for the purpose of definitely setting the complicated question of our Rebel Confederation. It is understanding upon the subject that the French and English Governments have come to a complete agreement upon a basis for the action of the Congress.

Garibaldi's Declaration.

It is reported, although not confirmed by any reliable source that Garibaldi had another interview with King Victor Emanuel, and that the latter has again basely declared to the King, that he would have betrayed by the agreement of Villafranca and Zurich. Garibaldi also is reported to have declared that he would lead a revolution against the Italian Government unless the treaties of the revolution which was epidemic in Italy were carried out. The Ministry was interested in regard to the Zouaves, and without changing Garibaldi's purpose.

Garibaldi and Victor Emanuel.

Boston, Nov. 21. A Times correspondent in the London journals states that at the recent interview between Garibaldi and Victor Emanuel, the latter, in reply to Garibaldi's threat that he would lead a revolution against Austria unless the treaties of Villafranca and Zurich were fulfilled, declared that should the part she such a course Sardinia would be obliged to employ force against him.

Escape of a Slaver.

Later advices from Africa report that the ship Memphis had succeeded in taking aboard 700 negroes on the coast of Africa, and had sailed with her cargo, evading the vigilance of the English and American cruisers and getting safely to sea.

General Intelligence.

It is reported that the Austrian Government will be obliged to make important concessions to the people of Hungary in accordance with the demands of Emperor Francis Joseph, to allay the revolutionary spirit which is now slumbering among the masses of the inhabitants.

Advices from Florence state that a National Assembly has been convoked to meet in that city on the 15th of November.

Advices from Turkey state that Prince Dacia is out to return to Constantinople, as has been reported.

COMMERCIAL.

Monday Evening, November 21, 1859.

We embrace the following statement, from the New Orleans Price Current of the 19th inst.:

A fair degree of activity has been observable in some departments of our market during the past week, but no general revival of trade can take place until a rise in the tributary streams shall open more extensive intercourse with the interior. Cotton, it will be seen, continues to move on freely, and the receipts of Molasses have been large and ready, at rather improved rates, and Sugar has improved somewhat during the past week. The transactions in the various articles of Western Produce are still confined mostly to the wants of parcels required for home consumption.

COTTON.—With respect to prices, we have to remark that they have generally been quite well maintained throughout the week for the Middling and better grades, to which the demand has been mainly confined, while the lower qualities, having been comparatively neglected since the opening of the season, have accumulated to an extent that causes them to weigh heavily on the market, the occasional sales being at irregular and easy prices.

The receipts at this port since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas,) are 611,228 bales, against 512,845 bales to same date last year, and the increase in the receipts at all the ports up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 130,516 bales.

NATCHITOCHES CIRCUIT.

The last Quarterly Meeting will be held at Keatchie Campground on the first Sunday in December. All preachers, both local and travelling, are invited to attend.

O. H. Westmoreland, P. C.

MONUMENTS OF DECEASED MINISTERS.

The committee of the Louisiana Conference are now ready to furnish monuments, at the rate of from $140 to $150 each, delivered on board steamers at this place. Some $60 have been received on account of the monument at Richmond Nolly, from Rev. Thomas Owen; and some $93 on account of Rev. J. H. Waters. The following ministers are buried in the bounds of our Conference without tombstones to mark their resting places. The preachers in charge of works where these men of God labored and died, are invited to bring the matter before the people, and collect the amount necessary to raise a tombstone and to pay a decent respect to the memory of the noblest of human kind.

ALABAMA CONFERENCE NOTICE.

Some time since Rev. W. M. Motley, Pastor at Eufaula, the seat of the Conference, published a notice to the effect that the steamers from Columbus, Ga., would take the preachers down for half price. Dr. Mitchell writes: "In addition to what Bro. Motley says, please say that the Rail Road company have proffered to carry the members of Conference at half price. They will pay as they go on, and Br. Haughton or myself will furnish them with free tickets on their return.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.

TWO YEARS SINCE, THE UNDERSIGNED OPENED HIS OFFICE at No. 33 Camp street, for the sale of those Machines, which, at that time, were but little known in this city, and the result is truly astonishing both as to the number sold and the unexampled success of the Machines, in nearly every instance. For over $175,000 worth of these Machines sold by the undersigned, not one letter of complaint was received during the past summer, and the repairs on these do not amount to ten dollars, although some of them have been used five years. Their sale at this time in this city is five times greater than it has been heretofore at this season of the year.

Probably more than $100,000 have already been paid in this city for Sewing Machines that were either entirely worthless, or which have cost five times the trouble and expense to keep them running that they were worth. The universal success of Singer's Machines has brought conviction to the minds of the public that it is far better to buy a good article at a fair price than to obtain to the thousand and one tales of men who deal in Sewing Machines that are MADE TO SELL AND NOT TO USE, and who, as soon as one humbug is proved up, bring on another.

It is universally known that Singer's Sewing Machines make the most approved stitch that human ingenuity has ever invented, and there is no longer room for cavil, as nine tenths of the clothing and shoes sold in this city are made on these machines.

Our competitors in the Sewing Machine trade generally acknowledge that Singer's Machines are superior for manufacturing purposes, but say they are not adapted to fine sewing. This, however, is a mere pretense, and the undersigned challenges the world to produce a Sewing Machine equal to Singer's 18 inch Manufacturing Machine for fine sewing; or to produce samples of work equal to those done at 33 Camp street on that Machine, which also sews leather with equal facility with any kind of thread or silk.

Singer's Manufacturing Machines, when adjusted by the undersigned, with recent great improvements, will sew with a fine needle at full speed through from twenty to thirty thicknesses of Lowell cotton, with thread No. 150 or 200, without breaking it, making a beautiful stitch, the same on both sides of the fabric.

Many persons who have known and even used Singer's Machines for years in New York, are satisfied to find that the Manufacturing Machines here are superior for their work, but when shown the room at 33 Camp street, where every machine is particularly adjusted for fine sewing, the mystery is solved.

All persons who have any doubts of the capacity of Singer's Machines for fine work, can have them removed by sending materials for a garment of any kind to 33 Camp street to be made.

Any person who will carefully compare the sewing done at 33 Camp street, with that sold by S. N. Moody, at 100 Canal street, will be at a loss to account for his certificate.

The public will please bear it in mind that Singer's Machines are sold upon a trial if desired, with any and all other machines, and of the trade that have been made in this city, in nineteen cases out of twenty they have been kept and the others returned.

The largest and most fashionable Dress Making establishments in this city use Singer's Machines, and several have bought

A BUTTERFLY IN AUTUMN.

Your wings are heavy, butterfly,
With other dust beside the golden hue
Wherewith the angel Summer painted you
When June passed idly by.

I saw thee stop to drink
The dreary tear-drop from the violet's eye,
Where the moss-bordered streamlet playfully
Leaped o'er its sunny brink.

Where did'st thou hide thy head
When the loud storm was roaring down the dell?
Safe 'neath the rocks thou heard'st the wild winds swell,
From out thy sheltered bed.

Thou saw'st the daisies die,
And roses wild drop shattering from the stem,
And autumn early flowers succeeding them
As summer days passed by.

Lonely and weary too,
Thou sorrow'st that the long, warm days are past;
The chilling autumn sure has come at last,
For man as well as you.

Fold up thy wings to-day,
And rest thee on these withering flowers to die:
To southern climes, with her sweet minstrelsy,
Summer has passed away.

DAYS IN AUTUMN.—TO ONE DEPARTED.

"'Twas her that taught my harp to sing,
And like note and like string
Shall back wend to her mem'ry fling
A heartfelt lay,
Till death shall tear wi' ruthless wring
Its chord away."

Five years have dropped their golden leaves
Down on that gravestone lone,
And five Octobers sighing passed
To those forever gone,
Since in the sacred autumn time
She bowed her weary head,
And mournfully we heard the truth—
Our Sister Jane is dead!
But not more fresh the evergreens
From wastes of winter start,
Than lives her youth and beauty in
The winter of my heart.
Dear Love! while skies so softly blue,
And leaves in golden showers,
Fall on my heart like souvenirs
Of past, departed hours,
My soul must sing a song of love—
Deep, passionate, heart-rhymed,—
A Pesserose music strain
To solemn measure timed,—
Oft as the autumn shifts his gold
Around that far-off spot,
In anniversaries n'er thee—
Long-lost, but not forgot!

DEATH OF FANNIE SEAT.

MR. EDITOR: Our dear little Fannie has left us for the home of the angels. Her last sickness was protracted, and exceedingly severe. She bore it, however, with patience and resignation, and fell asleep on the fifth day of October.

She was, as you are aware, and as many of your readers also know, entirely helpless—never could walk. She was fully sensible of this painful difference between other children and herself, but she repined nor murmured not. She enjoyed their sports about her as much, almost, as though she could have mingled in them herself. Meekly patient, sweetly resigned to her Heavenly Father's will, she had a hope that some time it might be different with her; or if not, that in Heaven the Good Lord would let her walk. This was her unfailing source of consolation, rendering her cheerful and contented under her lifelong affliction. Her amiability and sweetness of spirit were almost beyond parallel. She was of an exceedingly affectionate disposition. Her crowning characteristic was love—love that extended to all, and knew no bitterness nor wrath. Her feelings might be hurt, but seldom did she exhibit even the slightest degree of anger.

She was as conscientious and as truthful as, perhaps, any human being, young or old. To please the good Lord, and her Ma and Pa, was her standard of duty. She was very devotional—loved to pray not only in secret but at the family altar. She took delight in hearing her Ma read the Bible, and had great reverence for the "Good Lord's Book."

She was taught that the blessed Saviour loved her and died for her, and her affectionate, grateful nature received the truth in the love of it. She joined the Church of her own accord, and was happy in the love of her Savior. Her faith was so implicit, her confidence in the Good Lord so undoubting, that she seemed greatly surprised when, during her last illness, she was excessively nervous, Ma did not literally answer her to let her sleep, and to make her well.

During the first week or two of her painful illness she seemed anxious to get well, that she might go and see her grandma (Mrs. Fly, of Gonzales county, Texas), to whom she was most tenderly attached; but she seemed more and more to lose sight of earthly prospects, talked of her enjoyment of the Saviour's presence, of her home in heaven, where she would walk, and was perfectly resigned to the Divine will. She expected to die—wanted to die "if the Good Lord wanted her to," and was fully ready for her change. On a bright and beautiful autumn morning the angels took her sweet spirit away to her heavenly home.

Our little Fannie's full name was MARY FRANCES GIBBS SEAT. She was born in Grenada, Miss., August 4th, 1848, and was consequently eleven years, two months, and one day old when she died.

A volume might be written, portraying her character, detailing events and incidents in her life, and magnifying the grace of God that was in her. Helpless as she was, her life was not in vain. As an example of piety in childhood, of sweet patience in continued affliction, and of human innocence and loveliness, her mission has been a beautiful one.

We are very grateful to our Heavenly Father for giving us our little Fannie. She has taught our hearts a depth and intensity of parental love which we could never have felt toward a child less afflicted and less lovely. And now that she has gone, her memory is as ointment poured forth. It is a treasure in our hearts, there to abide until we meet her again. Heaven seems nearer and sweeter since our precious babe has gone there. She cannot come to us, but we can go to her. We shall see her again.

THE TRIAL OF THE CONSPIRATORS.

THE law, in its awful majesty—its mumbling of essential formulas, its wise delays, its careful siftings of evidence to prove what seems already patent, its hair-splitting principles, its squeamishness in terms, its quirks and quibble—has few attractions for a fervent and impulsive spirit. A criminal trial in a crowded room is a lingering bore to one who loves action and out-of-doors.

As the minutest details of the trial of the Harper's Ferry prisoners are furnished by the reporters of the daily press, I will not crowd your pages with needless repetitions, but will endeavor to find other matter bearing upon the subject, I hope equally interesting and enlightening to the public.

Charlestown, the place where the court now holds its sittings, is the seat of justice for Jefferson county Virginia, situated on the Winchester and Potomac railroad, eight miles from Harper's Ferry. It is a neat and flourishing town, containing about sixteen hundred inhabitants, and is the centre of one of the wealthiest and most prosperous agricultural regions in the United States—a region distinguished at the same time for the high social refinement and princely hospitality of its inhabitants. This region of which the counties of Berkly, Frederick, and Clarke form a portion—has sometimes been called the Garden of Virginia, and reckons among its native sons many eminent men both of the past and present.

At an early hour on Wednesday morning, I visited the prisoners—got in their cells, as our usual phraseology has it, but in their rooms, large, well ventilated, and comfortable. Brown and Stephens, the wounded men, occupy the same room. From general indications, I think that the wounds of the latter are mortal, and that in all probability he will not survive the trial. Brown is mending rapidly, being already in much better condition than when I saw him at Harper's Ferry on the morning of his capture. Both prisoners are very conversable; but as I had nothing to say to them by way of encouragement, I did not care to annoy them with curious questions. In the room above, Edwin Coppic, and Shields Green, (alias Emperor,) a negro, are handcuffed together, sharing their meals and occupying the same bed. Coppic says he is twenty-four years of age; Green says he is but twenty one; I should judge he was at least twenty seven or eight. I think he understates his age that his youth might excite compassion. Although a member of Congress elect, he also says he can neither read nor write, and was once a professional old-clothes cleaner. In view of these facts it is scarcely to be regretted that the scheme failed, as the Congress of the proposed Provisional Government would hardly be an improvement on the present body. The courage of these men has ordinarily given way; they have a cowed and haggard look that would excite pity, were such a feeling possible under the circumstances. In an adjoining room is the fifth prisoner, Copeland, taken at the Rifle-works on Monday. Copeland is what is called technically a likely mulatto, and would make a very genteel dining-room servant. He has the rudiments of education, and is believed to be a Judge of the Supreme Court under the Provisional Government. At present he is cowed and penitent, and says he was entirely deceived as to the ends and objects of the invasion. This, however, is disproved by the testimony of the other prisoners, and especially of Brown, who says that no man was either hired or persuaded to join him. Money was furnished for equipment and traveling expenses; but, beyond that, all enlisted voluntarily, and with full knowledge of his intentions.

Doubtless the spoils of the conquered territory, confiscated estates, and the lucrative offices would soon make all right. What story of the Arabian Nights can equal the golden dreams that besotted their woolly noddles as they lay snoozing and snoring over at the Kennedy Farm! Green, the M. C., already sees the elegant country-mansion which is to fall to his lot; his fingers stiff with diamond rings, his vest loaded with gold chains and stuffed with jeweled repeaters, he struts out upon his terrace, surveys his broad lands, and calls his couch and six—six at least, for a negro never enjoys anything by halves. The coach appears, with driver and footman in livery, some ex-gentleman of the F. F. V.'s—the future proprietor, perhaps. The (alias) Emperor drives to the Provisional Capital where he finds the Supreme Court in session. He gives his fellow-countrymen peace, that they may go and drink his health. It is recommended that the fallen race should be treated leniently; and it does him good to feel princely. Entering the court-room, he finds Judge Copeland engaged in important business. A number of perverse and unreasonable Southerners have refused the merciful terms offered them; and have been taken in arms in defense of their homes and property. Death is their doom; and grim General Brown stands near, with his regiments of Sharpe's riflemen and legions of sable pikemen, ready to lead the rebels to execution. The sable Congressman suggests some amelioration, being dull of meat and drink; and in a good humor generally. He would like to have a dozen of them to work on his estate; thinks he can manage them; it is pleasant to have a number of people that one can order around. Hist—Emperor starts and rubs his eyes. It is the order to march. The chilly air of an October night, or the startling proximity of long-meditated action, sends a sharp thrill through the dreamer's heart; but where old John Brown leads, there is no turning back. The deed is done—Monday morning has dawned. The night was one of action, but no reinforcements have come in. With the light they read dismay and astonishment in every face.

After terror follows anger. Then the day of desperate combat, blood, and death. Hemmed in, trapped, deceived. It is soon over. Now manacled and imprisoned, all these dreamers of wealth and greatness—their delusions vanished—crushed under the awful realization of their situation.

This is no imaginative picture which I have drawn in a spirit of levity and scorn. In wildness and absurdity it halts behind the reality—the long-devised and coolly-meditated scheme of the fanatical conspirators. It is difficult for a sane mind to conceive of such infatuation; and yet these men are clearly not insane. Minds too narrow to contain more than one full-grown idea runs easily into monomania. Cervantes has given us the type, in his famous "Don Quixote," of wind-mill memory; and the credulous Sancho, covetous of islands and assen-colts. John Brown is not unlike the Don personally, as described, and is certainly quite as mad. His one-and-twenty followers, in their thrice-sodden folly, are no whit better than so many Sanchos.

Courtly flower of La Manchean, chivelry, end thou his true and faithful squire, we humbly crave your perdon for thus associating your names with these vulgar knaves and midnight assassins!

The more I see of Brown, the more I am convinced that, in addition to his abolition monomania, he is under the influence of a ferocious vanity. Influenced by the infuriated babblings of persons better educated, but no wiser than himself, he goes to Kansas, where he earns a reputation as a partisen leader, and at the same time gets a taste of human blood. "Ira brevis furor est." That misererable contest, fomented by unprincipled politicians for party and personal purposes, at length ceased. The belligerent parties shook hands, took a drink, and peacefully turned their energies to cheating one another and the rest of the world. Not so John Brown. The demon which those border forays had awakened is destined never again to sleep. Old Brown—Osawattomie Brown, Brown of Kansas, the Topeka Governor, the dread of Border Ruffians, the Moses of the higher law—can not descend into the vulgar stagnation of common life.

Æsop tells us of a certain harper who, having pleased the sots in an ale house with his music, was so conceited as to go upon the stage and play for the great public. Here he failed ignominiously, and was hissed.

In his grand scheme to overthrow the Government of the United States and the Anglo Saxon race in the South, with twenty-two men, Brown has failed as signally as the poor musician, but will hardly get off so cheap. Yet, (to use his own expression,) to give the devil his dues, he bears himself stiffly under his misfortunes. Fierce as a gun-lock, cool as a sword, he makes no apologies, and yields no triumph to his enemies. In his bearing there is neither weakness nor bravado. Defiant only when stirred; otherwise civil and straightforward; communicative when questioned; and thankful for small favors.

In person, Brown is gaunt and tall—over six feet I should think. He walks like a man accustomed to the woods. His face indicates unflinching resolution, evil passions, and narrow mind. Perhaps these interpretations may be drawn from his actions rather than his features. But consider his face as he appeared in The Arraignment—where, if there is nothing extenuated, there is naught set down in malice—and see if you do not agree with me.

The only thing Brown seems to fear is Lynch Law. He covers his dread of it, and has condescended to ask protection from it from those about him. To give him this assurance (rather than from any well-grounded fear of disturbance,) an armed guard accompanies him in his daily rounds between the jail and the court-house.

When brought before the court to answer the indictment of the Grand Jury, he made a strong effort to have his trial deferred; stating that, from his wounds, his hearing was impaired and his general condition too feeble to enable him to attend to the proceedings. This was very generally considered a sham to gain time; and in truth I did, for the first time since his capture, suspect the old fellow of playing 'possum. In the opinion of his physician, the delay claimed was unnecessary, and it was consequently refused. Since that, he has appeared in court trussed up in a cot, generally—to all seeming asleep—while the proceedings are going on; but occasionally starting from his lair, grim and sudden, like a brindled wolf, interrupting the court with short, snappish questions and speeches. When ordered to stand up to hear the verdict of the jury, he sat up in his cot; and while thousands held their breath in solemn silence to hear the verdict that pronounced him guilty of treason, inciting to servile insurrection, and murder, he was picking his teeth with a pin.

Of a truth the human mind is a mystery! A week ago I heard John Brown avow that he was a sincere Christian; in the same breath declaring that he had entered Virginia for the purpose of making war on the white race, determined to kill all who opposed his views. He knew that his life was forfeited if he failed; confessed that he failed; and said savagely that the great mistake he had made was in sparing the prisoners he had in his power. He would not presume to ask for mercy—he did not expect it. Now he pleads not guilty to deeds which he before avowed and reiterated; quibbles with the lawyers to obtain delay; and clamors about a fair trial.

Well, well, a truce to philosophy! Here, in all probability, is an end of old John Brown—saint or sinner, martyr or murderer, famous or infamous, as the case may be. We may yet all have to acknowledge that we owe him for one good turn; with desperate hand he has blown up the whole magazine of abolition pyrotechnics—pray God there may not be cracker or a squib remain unburned! Brethren of the North, when hereafter any man shall attempt to profane your rostrums or your pelpits with incendiary abuse and revilings against any section of our common country, I charge you smite him on the mouth—with the word Harper's Ferry.—Correspondent of Harper's Weekly.

ANTECEDENTS OF "INSURRECTIONISTS."

It is curious to note the antecedents of some of the Harper's Ferry insurrectionists—they become interesting in view of the horrid crime or wicked delusion that these parties have been engaged in. The previous lives of most of these fellows is in accordance with the results which followed. Witness the annexed:

Stevens' Antecedents.

Stevens, the accomplice of Brown in his Harper's Ferry foray, is, like his leader, not without his antecedents. The records of the War Department show that he was in the regular army in Mexico; that while there he and several others mutinied against their captain, for which he was sentenced to be shot, but was pardoned by President Polk; that he was afterwards sent in the regular army to Kansas at the time of the troubles there—where he deserted the service and joined the marauding party of John Brown. Like his leader, he was severely wounded at Harper's Ferry, and like him, survives to end his life on the gallows.

The Young Man Coppic.

A correspondent of the New-York Tribune, writing from Salem, Ohio, says:

The young man Edwin Coppic (improperly printed Coppic,) is a native of this place, where he resided until some seven years ago, when he went to Iowa. He was left an orphan at an early age, and was provided with a home in the family of a benevolent Quaker, a friend of the Coppic family, who were also Quakers. He remained at this place some two or three years, exhibiting during that time such evidence of a depraved and vicious nature that his benefactor did not feel it his duty to befriend him longer, and turned him loose. After a few years more, spent in various places, he at last went to Iowa, where he remained until the commencement of troubles in Kansas, when he emigrated to that Territory, returning again to Iowa after peace was restored. One who knew him in Iowa, after he had attained to manhood, informs me that he enjoyed the reputation of reckless, daredevil fellow, possessing much more physical fortitude than principal. After the cessation of troubles in Kansas, he was engaged with Brown in running off slaves from Missouri. Some few months since he passed through this place on his way East, as he said, and spent several days here with his former associates. It is probable that he was then on his way to John Brown.

Albert Hazlett.

The Johnstown Echo says: If our information be reliable, Albert Hazlett, one of the insurgents killed at Harper's Ferry, or reported so in the first accounts, is not unknown in this region. It is said by some here who claim to be cognizant of the fact, that Hazlett was reared in Westmoreland county, and some years since was employed in the capacity of a boatman on the Pensylvania canal. While so engaged he was entrusted with the care of a section boat belonging to Mr. John McGovern, dorieg one trip, but when he reached his destination, on the other side of the mountain, he disposed of the boat and team and pocketed the proceeds. He was afterwards arrested, but the matter was doubtless adjusted by the disgorging of the money, as he never came to trial. His next connection was with a band of horse thieves, one of whose depredations were committed near Wilmore, in this county, and as such was arrested, but upon turning State's evidence and giving testimony against his confederates, during their trial at Elkins, New York, he was discharged and again appeared in this part of the country, shortly after this he departed, and was lost sight of until he turned up as one of the desperadoes led by the infamous Brown.

Young Merriam.

The Boston Transcript says: The Mr. F. J. Merriam, of Boston, who died of his wounds received at Harper's Ferry, was a young man known in this vicinity. His father was of the house of Curtis & Merriam, dry goods jobbers in Kilby street, and his mother is the daughter of Francis Jackson, Esq., the famous abolitionist and non-resistant. Young Merriam has been an extensive traveler, having had ample means to indulge his tastes for foreign scenes. He was very impulsive, and has fallen a victim to the most foolish and mad enterprise of our times. He had a superior education, and was of more than ordinary intelligence. His father died when he was quite young, and his mother is now the wife of Mr. James Eddy, the artist.

Mr. Redpath says, in the Boston Atlas and Bee, that Merriam was a Boston boy, and a grandson of the venerable Francis Jackson, president of the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society. He was Mr. Redpath's companion and interpreter in his recent travels in Hayti. Mr. Redpath says:

In his recent action he had no advisers, and acted in contradiction to the creed of his family. They are non-resistant abolitionists of the Garrisonian school.

RITTER'S DEATH.—It is said in the learned circles of Europe that the great geographer died of a broken heart, caused by the decease of his old friend, Humboldt.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MISS SARAH HOWARD MAGRUDER, daughter of the late Maj. John H. Magruder, of Madison county, Mississippi, departed this life on the 19th of September, 1859.

In the Spring-time of life, she was cut down, while surrounded by every endearment that could bind the young and loving heart to earth.

Physically and mentally, she had been cast in a superior mould. Of a lovely disposition, she seemed so formed to be a blessing to all around her, that it appeared an inscrutable providence that these early removed her hence. We can only solve the mystery by the adoption of the sentiment of the inimitable Young:

"For us they sicken, and for us they die."

And with an ardent desire that the good designed in the removal of our interesting young friend, may be fully accomplished, we beg leave to inscribe the present sketch to the numerous young readers of the Advocate, to many of whom, both in the city and in various parts of the country, she was personally known.

Although my lovely niece had not, previous to the last illness, made a profession of religion, she had, nevertheless, been deeply interested on the subject of her salvation, and had, as her friends believed, been an earnest seeker of religion. Scrupulously attentive to her private religious duties, such as private prayer, and searching the word of God, she was in the daily habit, as the shades of evening gathered over the face of nature, of locking herself in her chamber, that she might uninterruptedly hold communion with her God in that quiet impressive hour.

Sarah was naturally of a gay and buoyant spirit; cheerful and hopeful, and before her heart was impressed with religious truth, she loved the world and its gayeties.

On the 11th of February, she was attacked with Typhoid fever, which for a number of weeks raged with consuming power, until nature seemed giving way. Many were the fervent prayers that were offered up in her behalf during that gloomy season, and great was the solicitude of her anxious friends to know her state of mind.

Yet, during that period, as she afterwards informed me, the subject of religion had chiefly engrossed her thoughts, and that now she was enabled to put her trust in her Savior; her implicit confidence was fixed on the Rock, Christ Jesus, and she was enabled to feel a sweet realization of His love, shed abroad in her heart.

A day or two after she had come to this interesting point, while conversing with her uncle Cirrlss, to whose searching questions as to the ground of her hopes, she returned the most unequivocal and satisfactory answer, all at once she became so filled with the assurances of hope that she broke forth in strains of exalted praises to God, while her countenance became radiant with joy. Almost miraculously her whispering voice became so strong that it filled the house, as she told the assembled family of the joy that filled her soul, and with impressive pathos gave the word of exhortation where it was fitting, exclaiming, "I know if I were to die this moment, I should go right to my Savior." None were forgotten in that interesting hour, but servents and children were called for, and all were melted under her touching appeals. To a friend, sitting near, she said "raise me up, and let me pronounce the high praises of Almighty God." For several weeks she continued in that happy, triumphant frame of mind, although she was the subject of severe paroxysms of excruciating pain, for her disease had assumed somewhat the character of inflammatory rheumatism. Her system seemed more to be giving way under her protracted sufferings, and though memory failed her in a great measure, the songs of Zion were never forgotten, and with these she often beguiled the weary hours. Again she seemed to recuperate, and hopes were entertained of her recovery; she herself expressed a desire to recover, that she might glorify God in a religious life.

But deeper affliction awaited her. A dear sister who had been unremitting in her attentions to her, was seized with Typhoid fever, and for several days her life was despaired of. This visitation she sorely felt, for she attributed her sister's illness to her fatigue in nursing her. This sister, however, recovered; yet a deeper grief was at hand.

After she had lingered five months or more, her beloved father, always remarkable for his doting fondness for his children, who, though he had been greatly consoled and sustained by prayer, his afflictions having pressed him near to the mercy-seat, yet, borne down by the pressure of mental anxiety and protracted physical fatigue, sickened and died. This shock seemed almost too much for poor Sarah's feeble frame. It seemed for a while as if she would die of grief, exclaiming again and again, "how can I give my dear father up." As the gloom of the grave came to her mind, she remembered he has gone to,

"That land of deepest shade,
Unpierced by human thought"

But recollecting that she too was passing away, she spoke of their anticipated meeting above, and endeavored to be resigned. A few weeks longer it was her lot thus to linger, and suffer. A few days before her death, no one being present but her mother, she raised her feeble voice again in praise to God: "Glory to God, glory to God in the highest," again and again burst forth from her glad heart.

Her mother expressing her thankfulness that she felt so happy, remarked, "You love the Lord, don't you, Sallie?" to which she emphatically replied, "I do, and I know He loves me too."

She then enquired, "do you feel perfectly resigned to the will of God?" the reply was, "indeed I do, I am resigned." Again she remarked, "O mother, I feel so happy this evening." Her sister commencing to sing her favorite hymn, "How firm a foundation," she joined in with her feeble voice and sang until they had to desist for fear of exhausting her strength. This was on Tuesday. On Friday, the live-long day, she was passing through the cold waters of death; she spoke but seldom, seemed scarcely conscious of anything around her, while the labored breathing, the heaving chest, all told too plainly that the death-spell was upon her. Yet it was not until the evening shades had gathered around, that the spirit took its flight. At the very hour in which she was wont to meet her Savior at the mercy seat, the Heavenly convoy were commissioned to bear her freed spirit to mansions of eternal glory. As I stood beside her, and marked how the labored breathing became slower and fainter until it ceased, and the serenity of repose rested upon her pale features, almost involuntarily I exclaimed, "at rest at last."

At rest at last;
The throbbing heart hath ceased its throbbing,
Death's turbid stream is past,
In angel's garb thou now art robing.

At rest at last;
The heaving breast hath ceased its heaving,
The mortal struggle past,
Thy heavenward flight thou art now taking.

At rest at last;
These aching limbs have ceased their aching,
And past, forever past,
Thy days of pain, thy nights of waking.

At rest at last;
Having thy soul in life's pure river,
Where sorrow's chilling blast
Those peaceful waters trouble never.

ELEANOR D. CURTISS.

At the fourth Quarterly Conference, held on Butler Circuit, Alabama Conference, Oct. 22, 1859, was appointed a committee to draft resolutions respecting the death of Dr. Jno. B. Cousins, also to write his obituary.

Resolved 1st. That in the death of Bro. C., the Church, Quarterly Conference, and Society have lost an exemplary member.

Resolved 2d. That we be profitably impressed by this affecting dispensation, with the uncertainty of life; and while we treasure up his memory, we will endeavor to follow his good example, that we may be ultimately associated with him in heaven.

Resolved 3rd. That the members of the Quarterly Conference deeply sympathize with the orphan children, and remember them at a throne of grace.

OBITUARY.

DR. JNO. B. COUSINS, in the 38th year of his age, died at his residence, near Butler, Choctaw county, Ala., on the 8th of September, 1859. He was born in the State of Virginia, and came to this in the year 1849. He joined the M. E. Church about fifteen years ago. He recently remarked that he had not seen the time, since his connection with the church, that he felt afraid to die. Until this year his professional engagements interfered much with his church privileges, but having sacrificed much of his temporry interest, he evidently enjoyed an unusual degree of love of God.

The church, by his death, sustains the loss of a faithful member, the Sabbath-school an efficient superintendent, and the community a kind and excellent neighbor. When interrogated about dying, he replied, "I am not afraid to die." Pillowing his head upon the cross, he closed his eyes in sleep, saying, "all is well."

Many friends are left to mourn his departure, but not as those who have no hopes.

H. L. TURNER,
F. J. RUTLEDGE, } Committee.

At the fourth Quarterly Conference for Socapetoy circuit, Alabama Conference, held at Mt. Pizgah Church, on the 5th inst., the subjoined preambles and resolutions were passed and requested to be handed to the Advocate.

Whereas, since the last meeting of this Quarterly Conference, it has pleased the great Head of the Church to remove from his labors amongst us, our beloved preacher in charge, Joseph L. Abernathy, who died in the full faith of that gospel he had preached successfully to others, and has doubtless gone to his reward in the church triumphant, Therefore,

Resolved, That while we bow with humble submission to this dispensation of Divine Providence, we feel that in the death of Bro. Abernathy, the church has been bereft of a pious, faithful, and useful minister, and society at large of a good citizen.

Resolved. That we tender to the family of our deceased Brother, our sincere condolence upon the event which has taken from them a faithful, tender husband and a kind father.

Resolved. That a page in the record book of the circuit be dedicated and inscribed to the memory of our Brother Abernathy.

Resolved. That the proceedings be forwarded to the New Orleans Christian Advocate for publication, and a copy furnished to the friends of our deceased brother.

THOS. EDWARDS, Sect. W. D. MATTHIS, E. E.

MRS. ALETHE HAYNES, wife of Thos. B. Haynes, died at the residence of her brother-in-law William L. Cobb, on the 17th of August. Slow indeed has been the pen to recognize departed worth; yet it hath been recorded upon that which is so lasting as eternity itself—the Lamb's Book of Life. She was for several weeks a valetudinarian, yet not a murmur escaped her lips. She saw the will of God in all things, and her light afflictions here, were but finger boards to point her tried spirit to a home of bliss. I had the melancholy pleasure of visiting her during her illness, and of wiping the dew of death from her icy brow. Never was there a more triumphant realization of the poet's words:

"Jesus can make a dying bed Feel soft as downy pillows are."

Gently as a little child sinks to slumber upon its mother's bosom, did her pure spirit take its flight from earth. May her last words never be erased from the memory of those loved ones who watched beside her with such tender solicitude in her last moments: "All is well; meet me in heaven." Farewell, dear Lethe; we shall hear thy glad voice no more on earth, yet with the clear eye of faith, we gaze across the blue hills of Time and meet thee in that blessed clime, where they who have loved shall part no more forever. May I die the death of the righteous and may my last end be like thine.

MDLLLE A. HORNSBEY.

EDWIN LINDSEY, infant son of John and Sarah Carraway, of Deer Creek, Washington county, died Oct 25, 1859, aged three years and twenty-eight days. Edwin was a noble, sprightly, sweet little boy, the treasure of his parents' hearts. But the chilling frosts of disease nipped the opening flower and transferred it to a more genial clime to bloom and shed its fragrance there. Our Heavenly Father often takes the treasure of our hearts, and lays it up on high, "that where our treasure is, there may our hearts be also."

PORT GIBSON COLLEGIATE ACADEMY
For Young Ladies,
Will resume its exercises on the 1st Monday in October. A well-chosen Faculty will spare no pains or care, to make this institution a pleasant and profitable place for young lady students.
The buildings are large, well ventilated and well furnished. The grounds are also and beautiful.
For information and Circulars, apply to

HUNTSVILLE FEMALE COLLEGE, HUNTSVILLE North Alabama.
REV. A. R. ERWIN, D. D., Principal.
This Establishment offers the following inducements to Southern patronage.
1. Huntsville is the nearest mountain location to the South and Southwest; and is proverbially healthful. The social elegance and beautiful scenery to be found here, are great auxiliaries in the formation of character.
2. The edifice is large and elegant—supplied with gas-light; and water in the greatest abundance by pipes, from a mammoth Spring in the town. It is 164 by 52 feet, three stories high, and well furnished.
3. The domestic arrangements are such as to secure not only comfort, but the social and domestic training of the pupils. Frugality, politeness and grace, as well as the virtues of the heart, are habitually cultivated.
4. The facilities of Instruction are unsurpassed. There are fifteen teachers and attaches, some of whom are distinguished educators. The large patronage, from among the best families of nine of the Southern States, attest the good-will of the Institution.
5. Arrangements are made to accommodate Southern pupils during the Summer Vacation, and to furnish them with such instructions in the extra branches as may be desired. Pupils received at any time.
Apply for a circular to REV. A. R. ERWIN, D.D.,

COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE, BATON ROUGE.
The Exercises of this Institution will be resumed on the 12th of October next.
The Principal intends to spare neither labor nor expense to make the school in its Educational Facilities and its moral influences, equal to the very best Schools in the country.
As the number of pupils is limited, it is desirable that applications be made as early as possible.
Parents are earnestly advised of the importance of having their children at School as promptly as possible. The loss of a few days at the beginning, often proves a serious disadvantage to the pupils, and greatly increases the labor of the teachers for the whole session.

LETTERS FROM TEXAS.—No. V.

In any other man than Shakspeare had suggested the possibility of a rose smelling as sweet by any other name, I should at once have thought him no better than "one of the ignorant." "What's in a name?" A very great deal, I assure you. More of the comfort and discomfort of life, than one would imagine at first glance, is bound up in this matter; for instance, do you not find yourself constantly striving to avoid the disagreeability of mispronouncing your friend, Mr. Hodgehog, or Mr. Simpkins? It is "my friend," or "the gentleman with whom I was conversing," or "the lady to whom I bowed." When I call the school-roll in the morning, the names "Laura," and "Medora," and "Beatrice," and "Orpha," and "Jessie," all linger about my heart for some moments, like a little stream of music. When I speak of walking upon the "plaza," I seem to be surrounded by a stately city, with marble colonades and palaces, with fountains and statuary, and blooming bideones, whose flowering shrubs conceal trees still more beautiful. What, if in fact it be but a dusty square, surrounded by dingy shops, and varied only by the greater or less number of huge wagons and enormous oxen, yet the liquid Spanish word blots out the reality, and brings its world of enchantment instead. To their sonorous language, perhaps, the Spaniards owe that dignity of character which they still retain. It is true that Capt. John Smith was somewhat of a hero in his time; yet all the devotion of the enthusiastic Indian girl could throw a hue of romance over but a small portion of his life. If his name had been De Vere, or Waverly, or Arlington, we should have had most interesting accounts of his rambles with the trusting maid along the banks of James river, of his twining her hair with wild-flowers, and breathing vows of affection into her ear, while the forest-birds sent forth their most joyful notes, and the sun was

> "To gold converting, one by one,
> The ripples of that mighty river," and anon we should have heard of his bearing across the ocean his blushing bride, and presenting in the royal palace Mrs. Pocahontas De Vere, Arlington, or Waverly, as the case might be; instead of that, Capt. John Smith straggles off by himself, and the next we hear of him he is on his way to England, sans eyelashes, with singed brows and blistered hands, and burnt hair, smelling villainously of gunpowder. Being named John Smith, it was inevitable.

These stray thoughts were suggested by the name of a town in Texas, where I spent some exceedingly pleasant days—La Grange! Just pronounce the name, and immediately arise glowing landscapes in sunny France, with feudal castle, and, the vine-clad hills, and merry-hearted peasantry chattering in French as easily as we speak English. We see the young lord of nineteen parting from his youthful bride, panting to enter upon that career which was to lead him to an immortality of which he had scarcely dared dream, even in his boyish visions, which was to encircle him in a halo of glory, and place the name of La Fayette beside that of Washington.—Together they stand now, inscribed upon the very heart of Texas, written upon her richest fields, her most blooming prairies, her loveliest woods. (I would just say, however, Mr. Editor, sub rosa, that there is not very much wood to speak of in any part of Texas that I have seen, albeit there stands upon the bank of the Brazos the most magnificent sycamore I ever beheld.)

There I was, with all these conjoined French and American associations, seated in Mr. Webb's front gallery, and Mrs. Webb and I were tracing out in the outline of a tree near by the resemblance of a demure old lady with her head inclined. On our left, and yet in sight, is the graveyard, which is the first thing to greet the traveller as he comes from the direction of Chappell Hill. These silent, unobtrusive ones seem to stand at the entrance, and ask a single thought before you are engrossed with the living. Let us give it to them—those poor struggling, praying, erring, weeping ones, who have at last attained a place so restful; and thitherward we also are struggling, stumbling, blinded by our tears, and often sighing, in a more serious spirit than the man in the play, "Would it were bed-time, and all safe."

On the west of La Grange runs the Colorado. Is not the name like the gurgling, gushing music of water? A noble looking stream it is—too noble to be leading the idle, wandering life it does, bearing no steamboats, no commerce, no anything for the good of the nation,—a mere "Turveydrop" among water-courses, being simply a thing of leisure and model of deportment. Opposite La Grange, across the river, is a magnificent bluff upon whose summit stands a monument erected to the memory of the Mier prisoners, and this monument bore my thoughts back to Kentucky, to its green woods—to the > "Banks of old Salt river,

> That roaring river wild,"— to the little boy who had there wandered with us,

> "When I was but a child."

But farther, and farther he wandered forth into the wilds of Mexico, and now his memory is blended mournfully with this "Monument to the Mier Prisoners."

The situation of La Grange is indeed very pretty; as yet, it wants houses;—there are some there, but not enough. Their court-house is a very excellent one; their Methodist church not so good;—but the town will, doubtless, progress with the age, especially as it is surrounded by an extent of rich land, and in two years from this time it will have a railroad bringing it within twelve miles of Galveston. The people of La Grange are decidedly agreeable; the women and children have a delicacy and a refinement of appearance that is unusual.

On Sabbath we drove out some five miles to Rutersville, where Mr. Cross preached, in the hall of the Military Academy, to a very nice, intelligent congregation. The sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered, and after service we received invitations to dinner from almost everybody in the house—a specimen of Texan hospitality with which we will finish for the present.

Kindly,

JANE T. H. CROSS.

THE FRENCH EMPEROR AND THE PROTESTANTS.

An intelligent friend who saw the Emperor and Empress on their visit to the Pyrenean springs in August, says the Emperor is more grey than when he saw him some years ago, and more sallow, which may have been occasioned by his exposures in Italy; that the Empress looked lovely, and bowed to the Americans who had raised the flag of their country, and smiled upon the children.

During his visit, the Emperor received Emilien Frossard, (pastor,) and four of the Presbyterial body of Orthez, as a Protestant deputation. In reply to their very short address, which, one of them told me, he listened to with undivided attention and fixed eye, he instantly said that he was grateful for the prayers and wishes of the Protestants of France, and that they might be assured that he would protect equally (indistinctement) all the religions of the empire.'

This is felt by the Protestants to be an important admission, made with plainness by the Emperor, as it will show the people of France where they (the Protestants) stand. He wore a very gracious, kind look, one of them said, when saying it. It is rather odd that it should have been spoken in the house of his host, a Jew, whose wife is a Protestant, and whose children are brought up in the Roman Catholic faith. There is decidedly an increasing toleration in France.—Am. Mess.

A TRIP TO NIPTONE, OR THE JAPANESE EMPIRE.

To the Rev. E. W. Sehon, D.D. Missionary Secretary.

MY DEAR BROTHER: You have already heard of the dangerous illness of Mrs. Jenkins. On the 26th of March last, Dr. H. J. Macgowan, of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of the University of New York, assisted by Drs. Courtney and Bryce, Surgeons of Her Britannic Majesty's steamer Highflyer, who kindly volunteered for the occasion, removed from the right axilla a large tumor, which for a year had been to her a source of pain and uneasiness; and which, from its downward progress, threatened speedily to cover the right hypochondria. Her recovery was tedious; for while the external wound healed twice, it inflamed internally and brought on fever each time, and it was not until the 15th of May that the Doctors gave their certificates permitting her to take a voyage either to the United States or to Japan. For the Doctors, the case was a laborious one; the wound required daily dressing; and sometimes needed more than daily visits. More than once, recovery seemed very improbable; but, through the merciful providence of our heavenly Father, she was sufficiently restored to health to make a sea-voyage prudent.

Accordingly, on the 15th of June (Wednesday,) by the advice of our colleagues, we embarked in the ship Mary and Louisa, of New York, for Japan. It took us till Saturday evening the 18th, to go down the Yangtsekiang River, as far as the light-ship, a distance of only sixty miles. At 6 P. M. on Saturday evening we took our departure from the light ship on the shores of China, and steering an east by-north course, soon after midnight on Sunday night, we were in among the islands and breakers on the shores of Japan. Sunday had been a dark day, and so we could not get a sight at the sun to determine our position; the result was, that an imperceptible current setting us northwardly, had put us to leeward of the point aimed at about sixty miles. The ship had run but twelve knots an hour by the log, while the unseen current had added two miles more every hour to her velocity, and the distance between the shores of the two great Asiatic Empires of China and Japan—four hundred and twenty miles—was run over in the short space of thirty hours. Not long after midnight, I well knew from the confused noise on deck, that we were somewhat too close to the land, and hastening on deck, found that we were on a lee shore, so close that a stone might be thrown against the land, and then there were breakers ahead. The crew were huddled together, and so affrighted that they could hardly obey orders. The captain was cool, and, instantly ordering on the mainsail, which for some time had been furled, and taking himself the helm, our gallant little ship darted past the jutting headlands, while we all looked trembling at the large rolling surf as it dashed furiously against the lofty and steep cliff, which promised us no deliverance, if perchance we passed but a few feet nearer to it. For an instant there was a relief; but then the breakers ahead are even worse than the danger just passed. The captain gives up the helm and hastens to the fore rigging. Keep her away! a point or two! he cries, and in a few minutes we are sending past on the lee side of the foaming breakers. The deliverance seems almost miraculous; and again you hear all hands running over our hair-breadth escape. I speedily went below, not to hurry my wife on deck to face the surging lash of the deep waves as they dash against the bold shore, nor the dashing spray from the whirling waters as they roll and break over the shallow covering of the sunken rock, but to tell her of our providential deliverance from the recent dangers, and to quiet her with the assurance that we are now standing out to sea again, away from the storm-beaten coast of Japan. For three days we beat up to windward, in order to weather Cape Gotto, and although it is but sixty miles off, we find it hard work against head wind and tide. On Thursday the 23d we drop anchor near the Island Tuppenberg, at the mouth of the entrance to the Port of Nagasaki, passing by the United States steamer Mississippi, coming out of that port, with Commissioner Townsend Harris, on his way to Kanagawa and Yedo, to have the American treaty with Japan ratified by the Emperor on the 4th of July. How pleasant to dip flags and exchange thus friendly salutations with a national vessel as we enter a country so mysterious as Japan? Tuppenberg scarcely covers two acres of ground—but it is famous as the scene of slaughter for the few Portugese Christians that remained in 1639, after the massacre of some six hundred thousand Japanese Christians, by the persecuting edicts of the previous quarter of a century. What wonderful progress must Christianity have made in Japan from the year 1549, when Francis Xavier is said to have first preached its doctrines to the Japanese; and what a feeling of awe comes over the mind when we look at this green islet, and think that this great Empire holds not within its ample domains at this moment perhaps, a single native professor of Christianity.

On the following morning, Friday, the 24th June, we weigh anchor again, and stand in with a light breeze for the harbor of Nagasaki, now about two and a half miles in a northerly direction from us. The bold shore, with its lofty hills on either side, terraced and cultivated to the very summit, presents the strongest possible contrast to the low and perfectly level plain on the shores of China, which we had so recently left. The alternation of hill and valley, of green copse and yellow patch, of abrupt rock and gently ascending plain, is most agreeable to the eye, and finds a resemblance in the lands on either side of the Tennessee river, for a hundred miles below the Chattanooga, with this exception, that the Japanese hills are nearly all cultivated, and the Tennessee hills are generally in all the grandeur of their primeval state.

The boats of the Japanese, with their sharp-pointed and projecting prows, and lug sails with the breadths of sail-cloth merely tacked together, or hoisted in separate breadths, and their crews nearly in a state of perfect nudity, are passing us by, going in and out—and generally respond cordially to the salutation, "Ohio," "All well?" But, let it be remembered that the accent is on the final o, and not on the i.

Two large Russian gun-boats, or rather three-masted schooners, propelled by steam screws, pass us by, bound over to the shores of China.

About noon we drop anchor in that western port of Japan called Nagasaki, from which all foreigners except the Dutch, have been excluded for more than two hundred years. We dropped anchor now amidst a fleet of twenty sail of foreign ships. There were Russian and Dutch, Frenchman and English, Chinese and Americans, The American Consul, Mr. Thos. Walsh, was a fellow passenger with us, and we had a pleasant imaginary ramble together over Montgomery and Charleston, Mobile and Tuskegee; Chunnyuggee-ridge and Savannah, and many other spots from Massachusetts to Louisiana. Mr. Walsh is one of the very first men to establish an American house for trade in Japan, and is sure to get rich. But there is another American residing for a short time in Nagasaki, and his object is not the wealth of this world. I refer to the Rev. Mr. Liggins of the American Protestant Episcopal Church. He had been for a year or two in China as a missionary; and had about two months previously been appointed to Japan He had been so fortunate as to obtain a building for a residence near a Budhistic temple, elevated above the heat and dust of the city. He kindly offered us a room, and we took a bed from our ship, with the captain's permission, and during our brief stay endeavored to make the best use we could of the occasion, to acquire information regarding Missionary prospects in Japan. We feel grateful to Mr. Liggins for polite attentions and hospitality, and regard him as a gentleman well fitted for the exceedingly delicate position he occupies—requiring as it does, an uncommon share of prudence and perseverance.

We find, in the first place, a most perfect system of espionage exercised by an almost omniscient government; and if there be one subject more than another which they are averse to have brought before their people, it is the subject of Christianity. I am informed that until within a few years past, the Dutch, who alone were permitted among western nations to hold any commercial intercourse with Japan, were required, on the only day in the year that they are permitted to go through the streets of Nagasaki, to trample publicly on the cross, as an evidence of their hatred to that symbol. The Dutch too, had assisted the Japanese in the early part of the 17th century, to massacre the few Portugese who remained alive in Japan. Some allowance should be made for the spirit of the age, and the uncompromising character of the professors of the Romish faith; yet Protestantism must with difficulty wipe away this foul blot.

The position of the Dutch in Japan from 1639 to 1859, was little better than that of prisoners. Confined to the little islet of Desima, which was a mud-flat, of a few acres in the harbor of Nagasaki, walled round and filled in, so as to be above high-water-mark, there they contentedly abode for more than two centuries, for the miserable privilege of loading a few vessels annually with silks and crapes, copper and porcelain, lacquer ware and curios, and having no opportunity of going off their islet, except on the few occasions when a commissioner was permitted to go, safely guarded, with a hand full of followers, to the Capital of Yedo, to take the tribute of the King of Holland, and lay it at the feet of the Emperor. One valuable purpose it served, however, and that was, to show how little Asiatic nations will grant, until they are persuaded that western nations have both the power and the will to compel them to relax their grasp.

Of all the governments of the far East, that of Japan is probably the most perfect in the entire control of the people—who have scarcely any right of their own. For instance, at the present day a Japanese has no liberty to depart the country, and no liberty to believe in Christianity—and no liberty to read the Scriptures of Divine truth, which can alone make him wise unto salvation! When I was in Nagasaki, a woman was in prison awaiting the order from Yedo (for the execution of) because she dared to accompany a Frenchman to China and return to Japan.

Mr. Liggins will be able to maintain his position in Japan, if he be silent on the subject of Christianity, and refrain entirely from circulating books directly on that subject, particularly the Scriptures. The few who are desirous of obtaining situations under the Japanese government as interpreters, undoubtedly desire ardently to acquire English—and so do a great many in the silk, lacquer, and various other kinds of business; but the motive here is gain, and that exclusively. The government also wishes to have its own native Japanese interpreters get hold of the English language; but the object is, non-intercourse rather than unrestricted intercourse with those who speak English, or are suspected of a design to teach Christianity. Mr. Liggins condescends to give lessons to English to the interpreters, but when they come to him a spy comes also, and a report is made to the Governor of all that is said and done. On the day of my arrival in Nagasaki, I had a long conversation on board the ship with the Chinese interpreter, who could not speak Chinese near as well as many of the missionaries at Shanghai. The dialect which he had learned was the Nankin mandarin. When the English interpreter came up from the cabin he gave me an introduction to him, and I found his English barely intelligible. I presented him copies of the Chinese trimetrical classic, which I had translated literally, and printed at Shanghai with the Chinese text. They were quite glad of course to get them, as they knew the meaning from their own Japanese translations of the same books. A few days afterwards I met them at Mr. Liggins'; and they said that the Governor had examined the books and found them unobjectionable. He was desirous that his interpreters might be furnished with copies; but Mr. Liggins told the interpreters that he had long since made applications to the Governor for certain Japanese books, which were on sale in the stores; and as soon as the Governor would furnish those to him, he would be happy to return the compliment by furnishing them with any Chinese and English books? As a specimen of the surveillance exercised over foreigners in Japan, I would mention that a day or two before I left, Mr. Liggins attempted to purchase several books at a public bookstore, tendering the full price for each; but the only one they would permit him to take away, was a small blank book! They had undoubtedly been forbidden to sell any books to foreigners—and if so, the penalty would have been decapitation or garotting. I have now further to add in this connection, that the Governor of Nagasaki now requires to examine every book previous to giving a permit for its importation; and this they do to prevent the introduction of Christianity—for vile books and pictures of foreign manufacture, are publicly exposed for sale in the Japanese shops; such pictures as would be burnt by the corporation of any city in the United States.

The first missionaries to Japan, will need an unusual amount of patience and perseverance. They ought to know something of Eastern tactics, or in other words be good judges of human nature, as we find it in this part of the world. As God hath made this Japanese Empire, it is beautiful; but it is inhabited by a litigious race, who, although they have gods many and lords innumerable, know not the wise and true God. The Chinese you know to be low, in the moral scale; but some heathen Chinese with whom I conversed in Japan, are perfectly surprised at the laxity of manners and disregard of the obligations of social order manifested by the Japanese. This, however, is but another evidence that "the world by wisdom knows not God." The five and twenty million who people the Japanese Islands are industrious enough to be independent of all the world besides for their manufactured clothing, and indeed they can undersell Manchester and Lowell in cotton fabrics, and Nankin, Soochow or Bombay in silk manufactures; and France or China in porcelain; while copper, gold, and silver have long been abundantly produced, and coal is dug out at the foot of hills a thousand feet high, and by the water's edge in the port of Nagasaki, and in many other situations—although Marcel'olo was thought to be stretching far beyond the bounds of truth, when in the 13th century, he reported the people in these regions to be in the habit of cooking their rice with black stones. The land also produces an abundance of rice, wheat, and other grain, sweet potatoes, and various kinds of vegetables, sufficient to sustain its population, which is no denser than that of Great Britain and Ireland, and not half as dense as the great plain of Kyang-soo in which we live in China. We need a hundred millions of pounds of rice to give the people of Kyang-soo in China a breakfast, and that would support the whole Japanese Empire for two whole days. The numerous coves, bays, inlets, harbors and gulfs, which indent and enclose the thousands of islands of which the Japanese group is composed, furnish an abundance, too, of excellent fish, and while in Nagasaki I enjoyed, for the first time since I left America, a dinner of fresh lobster. The common laboring people are much more energetic than the Chinese, as they have not yet been stultified by opium-smoking. The shop-keepers and trades-people are affable, polite, always using towards foreigners a respectful demeanor in conversation. The upper classes are overbearing and supercilious to their inferiors, always exacting the most humiliating postures and language from those below them; and it is indeed said that in Japan a man must never attempt to rise above the occupation of his father.

The language of Japan is a multiluous polysyllabic language, with declensions and conjugations, and has not much in it that resembles Chinese. True, there have been some ingraftings from that great continent, but the Chinese has not so much affinity to Japanese as French has to the English. The alphabet with which Japanese is written, has been borrowed from the Chinese, by taking certain characters from their sound only, and so reducing the number of their pencil strokes as to form a set of alphabetic syllable powers nearly equivalent to our > ka, ki, ki, ko, ku, > ta, te, ti, to, tu, etc.

These alphabetic symbols are forty-eight in number, and by combination of them, all words are spelt somewhat after our method, but I think the introduction of the Roman alphabet would be a great benefit to the nation—for it is admirably suited to write their language and to express its sounds. It is common to print all the Chinese classics in Japan, in large Chinese characters, and to print the Japanese meaning in small Japanese characters by its side. I have now before me a set so printed which I got in Japan. Chinese books in Japanese and Chinese, are also common, and I have one book quite a curiosity in its way, printed at Yeddo; it is a small vocabulary cut on wooden blocks, in Chinese, Japanese, English, French, Dutch and Russian. It was printed by the Japanese government. The English, etc., is cut in script, and not badly done.

The numerals of the Chinese, with a slightly modified pronunciation, are in common use for business; but the common people use the Japanese equivalents. The Japanese numerals are—1 itsh, 2 nee, 3 san, 4 yes, 5 go, 6 roku, 7 sitsh, 8 hatsh, 9 kew, 10 jew, 11 jew-itsh, 25 nee-jew-go, 36 san-jew-roku, etc. The common people use the following numerals: 1 stotes, 2 stats, 3 meds, 4 yotes, 5 itsutes, 6 moots, 7 nanats, 8 yats, 9 ko-ko-notes, 10 toe, etc.

The commonest salutation in the streets—ohio, the equivalent of good-day; the common drink of the people is cha, tea, or medsoe water, or sakee, arrack; the boys in the streets are all musoe; and the girls are all musemay; the men are all otoko; and the women are all onago; the commonest designation applied to Mrs. Jenkins, who, to the astonishment of the Japanese, accompanied me everywhere, in streets, shops, houses and temples, was —epi yo ka, very handsome; and indeed one Japanese went so far as to propose an amount of money to buy her of me; while the little girls would come up the hill after her in dozens, and some would remain until we had to tell them to come back to-morrow, and then after giving her a lesson in Japanese, they would depart with a polite bow, and se-o-na-ra, good bye.

We passed our week in Japan very pleasantly; my invalid had been greatly benefitted by the sea-voyage, and we saw no way of getting back to China near so economically as to return in the ship by which we came; we resolved to do so, although the commander of the U. S. sloop-of-war, Germantown, Capt. Page, very kindly called us on board the ship, and said he would be happy to host Mrs. J. about the harbor and islands near Nagasaki, if we desired to remain longer. We left on the 2d of July, Saturday, and on account of light winds it took us till Saturday the 9th, to run our 460 miles to Shanghai. The benefit from the voyage was considerable, and if there had been the comforts of such an unrestricted intercourse, and comfortable residence as Shanghai, and the benefits of medical attention, it might have been better for us to spend the summer there. But it did not appear advisable then to continue longer, although I considered the people quite interesting, and would have deemed it highly honorable to have been a pioneer in the Christian cause in Japan.

Upon my return, I find that the Southern Methodist Episcopal Church contemplates the establishment of a mission in Japan; and is in quest of information as to the most desirable point. This I conceive to be Yedo, the capitol, but then no foreigners except those in the suite of the foreign Commissioners can reside at Yedo until January 1862. After that Americans can reside there, if the treaty be kept. But then there is the port of Kanagwa, only twenty miles from Yedo, where they can reside for business from the fourth of July 1859. The language of Kanagwa must be substantially that of Yedo, and if you establish a mission in Japan, Kanagwa will probably be the best place to direct their labors, with discretionary power, however, to permit them to take any other port, where the restriction imposed may be less stringent. Your missionaries for the present have not liberty either to preach Christianity or to distribute the Bible; they must settle down and learn the language, and prepare and print vocabularies in Chinese-Japanese and English. They must get dictionaries made, and translate into Japanese from Chinese, the Holy Scriptures, and thus quietly fit themselves to become quiet workmen. And the Church of God in America must make unceasing prayer, that the Lord would so dispose the hearts of the Rulers in Japan, of the Emperor especially, that he would remove all obstructions to the spread of Christianity; and who knows how they may be inclined ere your men are ready to enter on the vast and important work of disseminating Christianity in that great Empire. It needs as many Christian ministers and teachers, and presses, and Bibles, and books as Great Britain, Scotland and Ireland, yea, nearly as many as the whole United States of America, ere its twenty-five million pagans shall be as well disciplined as are the people of those favored lands; and no one yet thinks that they are too well supplied. If it be necessary to pray there is "O Lord revive thy work," what is the condition of Japan, not one of whose teeming millions yet calls on the name of the only wise and true God, and his Son Jesus, the world's Saviour.

Should you decide on a mission to Japan, let your missionaries come to Shanghai—from which port we can send them to Japan for about one hundred dollars each—perhaps less—and also furnish them with such information regarding the best point to settle at as the events of the next year may involve. The expense will be no greater than in China. We are on the eve of great changes in China and Japan. It may be the divine purpose to do more for this people than we imagined. For a while a dark cloud rests upon us; it may be big with blessing for us, and for mankind at large.

Since my return from Japan I have had opthalmia, which renders it difficult still for me to read or write. The children have all had it, but we are better.

At the date of closing this letter (August, the 1st) Shanghai community is in the highest state of excitement, and although on Thursday last I preached in the city to a deeply interested audience, to-day it is unsafe for any one to enter it. Yesterday was the first Sabbath for a long time that no one entered the city. The people are exasperated on account of a French vessel which is loading with coolies for Cuba, and some people have been kidnapped and sold to her. On Saturday night our settlement was under martial law. Companies of marines and armed men, and nearly the whole foreign community armed, and paraded and patrolled all night. The ladies and children nearly all took to the ships in port, and a battle was expected before daybreak, but although there was intense excitement, no fighting came off, and although we still have a large force of armed patrol, confidence is, I think, returning that there will be no more blood shed. It is is said that in the streets of the foreign community and the city, eight foreigners have been murdered by Chinese during Friday and Saturday. I walk about with a fan only, for the thermometer is at 94.

Yours affectionately,

B. JENKINS.

Shanghai, July 26, 1859.

BISHOP SOULE'S FAREWELL ADDRESS

TO THE PREACHERS OF THE TENNESSEE CONFERENCE, AFTER THE RESOLUTIONS PASSED IN REFERENCE TO HIMSELF, COLUMBIA, OCTOBER 20, 1859.

I feel a deep sense of obligation with respect to the resolutions adopted by you. In looking back upon my past life, I see defects and weaknesses. I have been an unprofitable servant. Yet by the grace of God I am what I am.

A few words to the preachers of the Tennessee Conference. I have no reasonable expectation of meeting you again on earth. Such a thing is scarcely probable. In taking leave of you, you will indulge me in a word of myself. Sixty years ago, last January, I left my father's house and went to a circuit. I have been in the work ever since. I have never been a supernumerary preacher; I have never been a superannuated preacher; I have never been a local preacher. And from the first day I entered the itinerant Methodist ministry, I have never looked for, nor made calculations of any location but one; and that is a location in the grave. By the grace of God I have been enabled thus far to continue.

During your present session a considerable number of young men have entered the travelling connection, and I have done so, I trust, from settled, fixed principles. I trust they have entered here with one design and purpose, to devote themselves to one work—the ministry of the Lord Jesus Christ; work enough for one man, most assuredly.

The qualification of young men for the ministry: Much has been said about qualification. We all need it. But you may take young men, and if they have a capacity of for acquiring, they will obtain it, place them wherever you will. I speak sentimentally. But if they do not have this capacity and this thirst, you may carry them through your schools, and they will come out minus. "Study," my dear young brethren, "to show yourselves approved of God; workmen that need not be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth." What an important lesson St. Paul teaches to Timothy, his son in the gospel: "No man that warreth entangleth himself with the affairs of this life." Beware my dear young friends, how you entangle yourselves with the cares and concerns of a family. It will be time enough—I speak with feeling and experience—to devote yourselves to domestic affairs when you shall have become elders in the ministry, and shall have made yourselves acquainted with the doctrines and discipline of the Church, and become capable of preaching those doctrines, and administering that discipline. I advise you to keep free from matrimonial alliances. If you do not, I look for your early location.

I can proceed no further. May the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ abide with the Tennessee Conference.

(Here the venerable bishop would have closed, on account of physical weakness and frequent coughing; but the members urged him to go on.)

I wanted to say something more. I will touch one point. In looking over your work, I have suffered pain. I have seen contracted, poor circuits, and little town stations placed in charge of preachers on trial. Of your course I would speak respectfully; and with regard to these young men, I esteem them highly. But may we expect them to be so well read in the government and discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church as to take a wise and profitable course in the due administration of that government and discipline? At their age I needed government myself, instead of being prepared to govern others. I speak plainly on this subject: I speak in view of the judgment.

In looking over our general Minutes, I perceive that over three hundred circuits and stations are in charge of preachers on trial! Under these circumstances the Church cannot be prosperous in all its departments.

Again: I believe there are thousands of members of the M. E. Church, South, who do not receive the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, from first to last during the year. Why? Because you have sent to them young men who cannot administer the Lord's Supper. This is because you have cut up the work into small patches. How many four weeks' circuits have you in the Tennessee Conference? There are but few. How many circuits with two preachers on them? There are but few. Our colleges are excellent; but, depend upon it, a large circuit, with two preachers on it, is the best place to train our young men. I hope to see this thing of cutting up our circuits ended. If I had time and ability, I would enlarge on this subject.

But, again: we need parsonages. This is an important part of our system. There are but few of them in our bounds. I suggest that one cause of this is the cutting up of our large circuits, and changing the form of them so frequently. Thus you have small circuits and little bits of stations. Do you expect our members to build houses for the preachers in these small circuits and little bits of stations? I do not expect it. But when you make your circuits permanent, settled, fixed, and make them sufficiently large, you have my word for it, the members will show a liberality in building parsonages which you have not witnessed heretofore.

If I see you no more until that day when we must give up our accounts to God, I trust I shall meet you and dwell with you in that city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God.

A CARD TO THE CHURCH AND THE FRIENDS OF MISSIONS.

Your Board and its officers have labored most faithfully in every way possible to sustain and advance the important interests committed to them.

By great exertion and prudent management, and the full co-operation of the bishops, in drawing their drafts at three, six, and nine months, the affairs of the Society were beginning to assume a most favorable appearance. Against a debt of some $10,000, two years ago, one of some $12,000 only was found to exist. But new difficulties have arisen. They are the following:

A decrease in five of the Conferences recently held, in the missionary collections; the great stringency in the the money market of the West and South-west, at this moment, preventing the loans which have heretofore been easily effected, for much larger amounts than we now require; and also the fact that in some instances the drafts are again being drawn at sight, instead of the time proposed by the Board.

The question is to meet us boldly, What now is to be done? Are we to have any dishonored drafts? Are we to call home missionaries already in the field, or refuse to send those ready to go?

We hope, yea, sincerely pray, that the Conferences yet to be held, may witness a large advance on their collections, and that thus we may have speedy relief. But should this not prove to be the case, we put it to every heart to say, what must be done?

We now most earnestly and sincerely call upon all members of the church and friends of missions to take the matter into immediate, serious, and prayerful consideration. We would respectfully ask all the preachers in all the Conferences which have been held or yet to hold their sessions, to bring this matter before their respective charges, and raise in each and all a contribution, to be forwarded immediately to the General Treasurer, I. Litton, Esq., Nashville.

How soon a few of our wealthy members or friends could remove our present difficulties! and how surely all future trouble might be avoided by every preacher throughout our whole connection faithfully presenting the subject and urging the collections, as provided for according to the discipline!

We are in earnest upon this subject, and hope seriously that a sense of duty upon the part of the whole church may prompt all to immediate action.

Friends and brethren, let us hear from you.

P. S.—Each preacher who holds a draft can give us great relief by meeting the same from collections which may be made within the bounds of his own work. Who will do this?

E. W. SEHON, Missionary Secretary.

THE GREATEST MUSICAL PERFORMANCE EVER KNOWN.

The lovers of sacred music have been having a great time in London. The Handel-centenary celebration has taken place, and it seems to have been a complete success. It was in some respects the most remarkable musical fete ever held. The Crystal Palace, in which it took place, was thought to be not fitted for acoustic purposes. But the disadvantages arising from this source were overcome, or neutralized by special arrangements for the occasion, so that the immense area answered equally for the most delicate solos and for the orchestral swell of more than three thousand performers. The number of persons assembled in the Crystal Palace to hear the choicest pieces of the great composer performed by this unheard-of orchestra, was not less than twenty thousand. The orchestra comprised 92 first and 66 second violins, 60 violas, 60 violoncellos, and 61 double-basses—363 stringed instruments: of flutes, oboes, clarionets, and bassoons, 10 each; together with six trumpets, 12 horns, 9 trombones, 3 ophicleids, 2 bombardons, 7 serpents, 3 double drums, 1 bass drum, and 6 side drums, being 90 instruments of wind and percussion; making a total of 453—a force as unprecedented in excellence as in number. The chorus, carefully selected from the choral institutions of the metropolis and all parts of the empire, comprised 735 trebles, 735 altos, 665 tenors, and 665 basses—in all 2,800, which, added to the instrumental department, and including the organist and conductor, makes up a force of 3,255. The orchestra measuring in width 216 feet, and in depth 100 feet, had been completely enclosed at the back and sides, and covered in, so as to propel the sound towards the audience, and to avoid that dispersion of it so apparent in 1857.

SUCCESSIVE CREATIONS OF THE GLOBE.—The theory of successive creations of the Globe is one which, however much or little probability of truthfulness may attach to it, is at least unique, and interesting. According to the advocates of the theory the star on which we live is a mass of liquid fire of celestial origin, round, as liquids are when floating in space, and encrusted by cooling into a shell of feldspar and quartz. A blue gaseous mural of watery exhalations envelopes it for about thirty miles, and encloses on its surface into lakes, rivers, and oceans, covering three-fourths of the crust, and forming a resplendent globe of many colored waters. Instead of being fixed and solid, the crust quakes, Islands rise and sink in the sea, coasts change their levels and the fiery central gases escape through the regular series of craters. Ultimate change in the experience of every generation of men. The sea has been where the land is, and the plants and animals of the tropics have lived and flourished in Siberia, while the sedimentary rocks are proved, in countless instances, to be made of the petrified remains of marine life.

WHAT IS NEEDED.—We need for our dwellings more ventilation and less heat; we need for our out-door exercise, more sunlight, more manly, athletic, and rude sports; we need more amusements, more holidays, more frolic, and noisy, boisterous mirth. Our infants need better nourishment than colorless mothers can ever furnish, purer milk than distilleries can manufacture; our children need more romping and less study. Our old men more quiet and earlier relaxation from the labors of life. All men, both young and old, need less medicine and more good counsel. Our cities need cleansing, paving, and draining. The Asiatic cholera, the yellow fever, the plague, and many other fearful epidemics are called the opprobria of our art, and our fellow-citizens upbraid us with the feebleness and inefficiency of our resources in staying their fatal progress. When will they learn that although we do not fail to cure these maladies, the more precious secret of prevention is in our possession, and has been for these many years?

THE SCULPTURE OF HABIT.—Did you ever watch a sculptor slowly fashioning a human countenance? It is not moulded at once, and it is not struck out at a single blow. It is painfully and laboriously wrought. A thousand blows roughcast it. Ten thousand chisel points polish and perfect it—put in the fine touches, and bring out the features and expression. It is a work of time; but at last the full likeness comes out, and stands fixed forever and unchanging in the solid marble. Well, so does a man under the leading of the spirit, carve his moral likeness. Every day he adds something to the work—a thousand acts of thought, and will, and deed, shape the features and expression of the soul—habits of love, and purity, and truth. Habits of falsehood, malice and uncleanliness silently mould and fashion it, till at length it wears the image and superscription of the evil one.—Plain Parochial Sermons.

BE NOT SLOTHFUL.—Many Christians are settled upon their lees; they are loth to put themselves to too much pains. It is said of Israel, 'They despised the pleasant land,' (Ps. cvi. 24.) Canaan was a paradise of delights, a type of heaven; but some of the Jews thought it would cost them a great deal of trouble and hazzard in the getting, and they would rather go without it. Men could be content to have the kingdom of heaven, if it would drop as a ripe fig into their mouth, but they are loath to fight for it. Oh, take heed of spiritual sloth! God never made heaven to be a hive of drones. We cannot have the world without labour, and do we think to have the kingdom of heaven?—Watson.

"SHOW me the man who would go to heaven alone if he could, and in that man I will show you one that will never be admitted into heaven.—Feltham.

THE HEART AND HOME.—Home is the spot where hearts are to be cultivated. Where the affections are to bloom in their highest beauty; and to be taught to entwine their tendrils about worthy objects. A home where severity or even formality reigns, is like a garden in winter—is like turning a hot-house into an ice-house—Such a home will be the nursery not of noble men and women, but of mere worldlings at the best—more likely of openly vicious and criminal. We find among our clippings this sentiment:

We sometimes meet with men who seem to think that any indulgence in affectionate feeling is a weakness. They will return from a journey and greet their families with a distant dignity, and move among their children with the cold and lofty splendor of an iceberg, surrounded by its broken fragments.—C. C. Herald.

THE POPE AND HIS PROSPECTS.—An exchange very significantly says: "The most important item of Italian news is that Napoleon has given formal notice to the Pope's Minister of State that since the Pope declines to make the reform recommended by Napoleon, there is now no chance for retaining the legations, and also that the French troops will be withdrawn from Rome in February. Pio Nono is said to have exclaimed, 'We are forsaken and betrayed!' but Cardinal Antonelli put on a tone of defiance, and replied that the Bourbonic powers, Spain and Naples, would prove a better support to the Pope than the treacherous aid of France, which had pierced the hand leaning upon it. If the Papacy has only the feebleness of Spain and Naples to rely upon, its powers must be very soon completely broken down.

HEAT FROM THE STARS.—Dr. Lardner says:

"It is a startling fact, that if the earth were dependent alone upon the sun for heat, it would not get enough to make the existence of animal and vegetable life upon its surface. It results from the researches of Pouillet, that the stars furnish heat enough in the course of a year to melt a crust of ice seventy-five feet thick, almost as much as is supplied by the sun. This may appear strange when we consider how immeasurably small must be the amount of heat received from any one of these distant bodies. But the surprise vanishes, when we remember that the whole firmament is so thickly sown with stars, that in some places thousands are crowded together within a space no greater than that occupied by the full moon."

STRONG BELIEVERS.—Luther was a tower of strength, because his whole trust was in the Lord. Baxter was burning flames, because he lived hard by the mercy seat wherein the glory dwelt between the cherubim. Whitefield was "the voice of one crying in the wilderness," because, like John, his cry was, "behold the lamb of God." Chalmers flamed

ACCOUNTS—NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

All parties interested in the Advocate—Editor, Preachers, and Subscribers—are interested in avoiding confusion in accounts.

Those well acquainted with the credit system in the newspaper business know full well that, under that system, confusion in accounts never was, never will, never can be avoided.—Uncertain mails, unavoidable oversights in agents or clerks, forgetfulness in subscribers and others, and the wearying, vexatious details of this business over all others, render it impossible. We have tried, for years, and know.

To have the subscription begin and end with the year, and to pay, if not in advance, at least once a year, is the nearest approach to a remedy that we can devise,—and this is our plan.

Immediately after the Conferences, all the accounts will be made out to January, 1861, without reference to time of commencement, or time last paid to; and they will be sent to each subscriber who has not paid to January, 1861.

If all our subscribers and agents will patiently co-operate with us, this difficulty about accounts will be forever settled during the coming year. After that, when January, 1861, comes, $2 more will be due, and so on.

Will our brethren and friends, when they receive these accounts, immediately remit the money to the office, or pay to the preacher, taking a receipt? If any think the account incorrect, let him inform us, pleasantly, without quarreling. We never quarrel, though we have more cause than others.

The volume of the Advocate will hereafter begin and end with the year; and it is very desirable that subscriptions should conform to the same rule.

Those persons, new subscribers, who do not begin with the year, will please send, not two dollars, but an amount sufficient to pay for the paper till the end of the year, at the rate of Four Cents a Week.

Then, every subscriber will know, without being informed, that at the beginning of the year is the time to remit the subscription money.

And let us have scores, hundreds, thousands of new subscribers with which to begin the New Volume, January 1st, 1860.—We intend, if Providence smile on us, to make a better paper next year than ever before. Arrangements are made, and being made, for greatly increasing its attractions.—Some new writers, of the first order, will begin with the year. The paper is flatteringly approved now—we intend to merit higher approbation.

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

We have just returned from a most delightful trip to Jackson, Miss.—the seat of the recent session of the Mississippi Conference. Too much pressed for time to lose a day, we took the train on Tuesday evening, six o'clock, Nov 15. It was a long one, and densely crowded with people going to the State Fair. A night's ride in such is pleasant enough in the way of company, but not so pleasant in the way of sleep. We arrived at Jackson at day-light, and went, first, to the principal hotel—a very fine one. But such a crowd! The State Fair, the Legislature, the Federal and Supreme Courts, had filled even the parlors with beds. There was not even a sitting room for the ladies who had come on the cars. We were all crowded into the office—ladies and all—amid smoke and confusion. After it was fairly light, the clerical portion of us left for better quarters. We soon found a home with Col. C. S. Tarpley, who gave us the room prepared for the Bishop! "It is an ill wind that blows nobody any good." Col. Tarpley and his accomplished lady managed, seemingly without any trouble, to make twenty-one preachers as comfortable as a princely Southern hospitality can make any body. The next time the Mississippi Conference is held at Jackson, may we find a home at Col. Tarpley's. Indeed, it is yet a matter of surprise to us that, with such a crowd in the city, the people were able to entertain the Conference so satisfactorily. We visited the fair, and were pleased, delighted. We cannot attempt to describe it. We also had the privilege of hearing Senator Davis—Mississippi's favorite son—the Calhoun of the South-West—deliver an address on the political topics of the day. A more elegant gentleman, or a more statesmanlike bearing, we have not seen in many a day. His speech was dignified, conservative, classical in style, and intensely Southern in sentiment.

The forty-fourth session of the Mississippi Conference met on Wednesday morning, Nov. 16, 1859, and was opened with divine service—reading the Scriptures, singing and prayer—by Rev. B. M. Drake, D.D. The Bishop not having arrived, the Conference proceeded, according to provision of discipline, to ballot for a President pro tem, when, on the second ballot, Dr. Drake was elected. Other brethren received a considerable vote; among them, Rev. John G. Jones, Rev. L. Pierce, and others. Dr. Drake, upon taking the chair, made an appropriate and feeling address to the Conference. He had received many tokens of kindness, during his long association with them, from his brethren of the Mississippi Conference. He accepted the responsible position just assigned him, with fear and trembling. He would endeavor to discharge his official duties in the fear of God, depending upon the sympathy and prayers of his brethren, and upon the divine help. He was growing old and also infirm. He exhorted to unity and peace.—He concluded by requesting the Conference to again join in prayer for the special blessing of God upon its labors. Rev. John G. Jones led the devotions. Much pious emotion was manifested during the address and prayer.

Rev. H. G. Harris was elected secretary, and Rev. J. A. Godfrey assistant.

The rules of order were read. The certificates of lay-delegates were called and read. A larger number than ever before attended, and were cordially received and welcomed by the Conference. The usual committees were appointed. Communications and reports were called for. Rev. R. Abbey, Financial Secretary of the Publishing House, presented a communication from Rev. J. B. McFerrin, D.D., the General Book Agent, to the Mississippi Conference, and also the Annual Exhibit of the Publishing House, which is as follows:

Remarks.—A considerable amount embraced in the above list of Assets will never be realized: 1. The bad debts will likely amount to $20,000. 2. In the settlement of the Richmond Depository accounts, heavy losses are anticipated. 3. The debt of the Tract Society, from present appearances, will never be much less.

A communication from Rev. Thos. O. Summers, D.D. in reference to the Quarterly Review, was also read.—C. C. Gillespie presented the annual report of the New Orleans Christian Advocate. All referred to appropriate committees.

The following were admitted on trial: Joseph A. M'Pherson, Augusta Gottshall (German), Harvey F. Johnson, Nathan Coffee, Isaac N. Bedford, William F. Camp, Philip S. Petty, Lewis Kendall, Geo. W. Stewart and H. Ternune.

James Walton and William Flun were re-admitted.

James H. Laney, A. J. Smith, Thomas M. Ward, supernumeraries.

Geo. C. Light, Sewell Campbell, and Lysander Wiley were superannuated.

Jacob Mathews, James A. Light, and J. H. Merrill, were transferred to the Texas Conference, subject to the action of Bishop Kavanaugh, the President pro tem doubting his authority to transfer.

Washington Ford and Kenneth A. Jones, asked and obtained locations.

The following were received into full connection, and elected to Deacon's Orders: Jared W. M'Neill, John D. Shaw, Henry P. Lewis, Green C. Fure, Wm. R. Rainey, Asbury R. Hines, Geo. Jackson, Albert Beeton.

The Conference took the initiatory steps to secure the property of Madison College at Sharon, and the sum of fifty thousand dollars as an endowment therefor.

The following were elected to Deacon's Orders in the Local Ministry: George Cope, William H. Mullins, George E. Toole, James W. Kirkpatrick, William M. Jayne, David Scarborough, F. Finch, Hezekiah Harrison, Francis A. Alford, Joseph T. Harrington, Lafayette J. Lack, Elijah Graves.

The following were elected to Elder's Orders in the Local Ministry: Wm. F. Camp, Hollis H. Williams, Alexander Elliott, John Dean, Thomas S. Newman, Dempsey Sparkman, John T. Coleman.

The membership in the Conference is: white members, 13,760; colored members, 10,658; white probationers, 3,963; colored probationers, 3,913; total membership, 32,204—a decrease, in comparison with last year's statistics, of 453. We place no confidence, however, in Conference statistics. They are so irregularly and uncertainly gathered and reported, that a decrease may at any time appear, where there is a large increase. We cannot believe there has been a decrease in the Mississippi Conference this year. We think there has been a considerable increase. The missionary collections for the year fell off some $4,000. The Sunday-school statistics are too imperfectly reported to mention.

We enjoyed the session much. The Mississippi Conference is a fine body of Christian gentlemen. Peace and unity prevailed. The Advocate made a noble collection. We have not time to write more—off for Alabama. The worthy Secretary will send the Conference documents for publication in due time. A pen was presented him at the close of the session, from his brethren, in a neat speech by Rev. C. K. Marshall, D.D.

On the Sabbath we visited and preached in Vicksburg. The congregation was large, intelligent and refined. We have seen nowhere a finer-looking audience. At Jackson, on Sunday, we learned that the religious services were profitable. Dr. Drake preached a sermon of great spiritual power, as did also Rev. John G. Jones.

Having to leave just before the appointments were read out, we engaged a friend to procure a list for publication, which was done; but they have, somehow or other, failed to come into our hands. We trust they will reach the office before this paper goes to press.

BISHOPS SOULE AND EARLY.

The Richmond Christian Advocate says: It is doubtful whether any two living Methodist preachers have done more for the Church of God than these venerable fathers in our Israel, or whether the Church would feel more deeply the death of any two of her ministers than the death of these great and good men. Passed the age accessible to the influence of vain exultation, or the enchantment of the sweet voice of praise, they are inspired by the noblest motives that can animate the human breast, to gather up their remaining energies for expenditure to the last hour of activity in that cause to which they consecrated life more than half a century ago. Indeed, one of them "seems to have renewed his youth," and to be yet able to "dispatch the duties of the Chair and the Council-board with great ease and satisfaction;" while the other, with "honor, peace and triumph," tolls in the shadows of the evening illuminated,

"By well distinguished rays."

They need not the chisel of the sculptor, nor the pencil of the painter, nor the tongue of the orator, to perpetuate their fame, for their monument is already erected amid the imperishable triumphs of the Cross, and their fadeless glory prospective in heaven. The consciousness of rectitude has supported them in time of trial, and a corresponding hope grasps final reward from the Great Head of the Church. They are not the men to hold with a trembling hand the helm in a storm. They are the men in whom we would confide without alarm in a crisis. They are the men who would, if they must, stand up alone in an erring world. They were among the wisest of our legislators, and are now among the wisest and safest of our judges of law, and administrators of government. Their experience and penetration at a glance detect the nature and tendency of ecclesiastical speculations, and their firmness in resisting hurtful innovations is immovable. In times of doubtful conflict, they rely, not on the opinions of the selfish present, but on the just verdict of the impartial future. Rather than bend to the prejudices and errors of others, they are willing for time to vindicate the piety of their character, and the wisdom of their conduct. We do not venture too far when we express the belief, that they would rather sacrifice life than violate the legitimate prerogatives of their sacred and responsible office. Die they would rather than do it, and leave posterity to waive the flag of honor over their graves. Life however, has with them, in this respect, already anticipated death; they have lived to see the banner waive over their heads. Those that know them most love them best, and those that love them least fear them most—knowledge exciting in the former, and instinct instructive in the latter. Their influence fertilizes the present for the efflorescence and fruit of distant ages.

RIO GRANDE CONFERENCE.

BISHOP PIERCE.

A letter has been received at this office from Rev. Dr. Boring, San Antonio, Texas, giving some account of the recent session of the Rio Grande Conference, at Goliad. Bishop Pierce did not arrive until about the close of the session. Dr. Boring represents him, we are sorry to say, as so feeble in health as to cause a doubt of his being able to attend the sessions of the Texas and East Texas Conferences. Truly, a sad lesson seems necessary to induce us to efficiently strengthen our episcopacy.—Before this paper goes to press we shall hear, we trust, farther from Bishop Pierce.

Dr. Boring was elected president of the Rio Grande Conference in the absence of the Bishop. Five hundred dollars were raised at the missionary anniversary—a truly noble contribution from Goliad, and from this new Conference. The session was a pleasant and profitable one—souls converted and added to the Church. The preachers are laborious and faithful, and the cause is prospering.

LETTER FROM CHINA.

Shanghai, China, Sept. 1st, 1859.

Rev. C. C. Gillespie.

My Dear Brother: It has been but a few weeks since I wrote to you, but in these times of trouble I know you are anxious to know how things are going on in Shanghai. Myself, wife and little boy are very well, but our little daughter has been suffering from diarrhea for more than two months of this summer, and is still quite unwell. We have concluded to send her and her little brother to America for Christian education. We feel it a duty we owe to them and an unavoidable necessity. Some may think us wanting in parental affection—but it is that very affection for them, which would lead us to make so great a sacrifice. We believe it to be necessary to their temporal, as well as their spiritual welfare that they should leave a heathen land and go to the home of our Fathers. None but parents among a heathen, sin-loving people, can know the many difficulties attending the moral instruction of their children while in such close proximity to such a people. It is painfully distressing to see their young minds so early imbued with the superstitious beliefs current among the heathen. No one knows what we sometimes have suffered in consequence of this. Thus we feel the duty to be a plain one, though it may be painful, and in doing so we commend them to the care of a covenant-keeping God. It is only under the strongest convictions of duty to God and to our children, that we are led to take such a step. And we pray God, if it be His holy will, that they may be qualified to be missionaries of the cross, to bear the glad news of the gospel of our Saviour to a dying heathen people. Thus under these convictions, thy wife and our two children will leave Shanghai about the first of October, on the ship N. B. Palmer, in company with another missionary's wife and her two children, who leave here on account of her ill-health. Ask your prayers and the prayers of the Church in their behalf. Mrs. Lambuth will be in America but two or three months before she returns and I hope she may be able to see our dear Christian friends in New Orleans as well as in Mississippi. We both love the Missionary work, and if the Lord wills, we hope to spend many a long year in China, pointing the heathens to Jesus, as the only Saviour of the world. We both regret exceedingly, that one of us is to be separated from the Missionary field of labor, but it is only for a few months, and we hope that much good will be the result of her visit home, both to herself physically, and to the missionary cause.

Everything seems now more quiet in Shanghai, than it was two weeks since. A system of kidnapping Chinese for importation to the West Indies, was carried on by their own people after night-fall, in the disguise of foreigners, and the populace became so enraged, being under the impression that it was foreigners—so that it was dangerous at one time to go out of our houses. Several foreigners were killed by mobs and some wounded, at different periods of the excitement. We all fled from our houses at mid-night and the disturbance was more general than I had ever seen in Shanghai. But the truth will out in time, and three of their own people being caught in the very act, their heads are now suspended from the city wall to give warning to all others. The depot of the English, at the mouth of the Pi-ho, has greatly emboldened the people, and their actions to us now, are vastly different from what they have been. They are ready to insult you at every corner, were they not afraid of their own authorities. I was stoned at my own Church, but a kind Providence preserved me from all harm. Two other Missionaries have been stoned since then, but no harm done. Two churches were torn to pieces the morning or the night after I was stoned. Some two of the offenders were caught and imprisoned. One in each church with a yoke around their necks. And there they made their home for two months. The Churches are now being repaired and the expenses to be defrayed by the Chinese Government.

Our minister, Mr. Ward, has just returned from Peking. He was in the city, but did not see his Imperial Majesty, because he would not perform the "Ka-der," or, in English, to knock his head nine times to the floor in the presence of the Emperor. The Emperor seemed anxious to see Mr. Ward, but the customs of the court prevented it; so that the treaty could not be ratified in the Imperial City, unless Mr. Ward would consent to come before the Emperor as directed. He then left Peking immediately, and the treaty was ratified on their arrival back to the Pi-ho.

Our missionary circle in Shanghai has to lament the loss of one of our best missionaries, who died on his way from Peking, in company with Mr. Ward and some 20 others. His name is William Aitcherson. He has gone to his reward in heaven.

The letter which appeared in your paper some time since, seems to have created some unpleasant feelings. I have reference to the letter which I wrote to my father. I have not seen the paper which contained it, and have almost forgotten the contents of it, but be assured that what I wrote to my father on that subject was the truth and just what I felt at the time, that some one was at fault in this matter. I shall be grieved if what I have written causes any unpleasant feelings. But we can all testify, if it be necessary, that the delay of funds last year caused derangement in all our plans for working, and we were compelled, finaly, to borrow funds to buy our own bread.

The rest of our mission families are now in good health. Now, that all is becoming quiet again, our congregations are increasing in number; I cannot say in interest, for the people are very suspicious of foreigners since the late troubles in Shanghai. Although several of their own people have been beheaded for the very act of which they accuse us, yet they are too slow to acknowledge it, and still suspect us, one and all, as being engaged in kidnapping Chinese, though not one foreigner has been detected. Our native members, some of them, were quite alarmed at the existing state of affairs; but some were calm and decided for their Master, and said they were willing to suffer for His sake, if need be. I will send you a list of their names (eleven in all, and one on probation), that the Church may pray to God for them. Pray for them, my dear brethren, individually, that God would give them grace to sustain them in the midst of a thousand temptations. Remember us all in in prayer.

May God abundantly bless you and the whole church, is the prayer of your unworthy brother,

J. W. LAMBUTH.

Rev. Edward Stout, member of the New Jersey Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, departed this life at his residence in Haddonfield, on the 3d instant. Though extremely feeble for several years past, yet for the last few days he had seemed somewhat stronger and more cheerful, so that on the morning of the day he died, he walked nearly a mile, and conversed freely with his friends. He sat down with his family, at the usual time, to dine, when he was suddenly attacked with paralysis, and immediately expired without a struggle or a groan. He was in his seventy-fourth year, and had been in the ministry forty-six years.

True as Gospel.—The price paid for a newspaper is like seed sown in the ground; it brings back a thousand fold its value. Some people, however, don't believe it. They think a dollar and a half or two dollars a year, paid for a paper, is so much paid for a luxury, whereas, the truth is, it is so much paid for a prime necessity. A family without a newspaper: children brought up ignorant of the world and its concerns. Is there a family where the light of this "full-orbed" thought has not yet penetrated.

A SHORT SERMON FOR THANKSGIVING DAY.

Text: "Go your way, eat the fat, and drink the sweet, and send portions unto them for whom nothing is prepared.—Neh. viii, 10.

The Governors of twenty-five States of our Union have consented in the appointment of this day, Nov. 24, for thanksgiving to Almighty God. These Governors have done well. If moved by their own feelings to this acknowledgement of God over us, we ought to rejoice at the prevalence and power of such sentiments in high places. If moved by the demand of public opinion, and the moral exactions of the masses, so much the better.—We have pleasure in believing that to both these causes is due the appointment of a thanksgiving day.

Let us keep it. Surely there is a cause. God hath not dealt so with any nation; and as for his judgments, we have not known them. There is health in the land. Our civil, religious, benevolent, industrial, and educational institutions are prosperous. Our barns are full, affording all manner of store. We have peace at home and abroad. The only hindrance in gratitude is, alas! the too natural result of unbounded prosperity.

Like a birthday or a wedding anniversary in a family, so should this thanksgiving day be in the State. Come, let us all be cheerful. Break in upon the plodding monotony of common life. Begone, dull care. A truce to labor; for it has had its reward in the harvest. A penance on the man that looks sour and care-worn, and for the housekeeper that scolds, to-day. Smooth the ruffles out of your business face. Go home and play with your children. Let the joy of thanksgiving reach into your shop and into your field, to your man-servant and your maid-servant, so that it will seem the sun shines brighter to-day than common.

On this day bring out your best: "Eat the fat."—Landlord and "gude-wife," give the contents of your larder an airing, especially those best things that you are keeping till they spoil. Crown the hospitable board, as as Providence has crowned the year, with plenty. Don't be afraid you'll starve. For once, take no thought for the morrow or next year. Joy helps digestion; so be joyful.

And with all our eating, drink: "Drink the sweet." Clearly not brandy, whisky, and the like; for they need sweetening. Drink not to drunkness; and it is best not to drink that which makes drunk come. "Drink the sweet." Take off the cream to-day, and use it unscrupulously. Don't think how much butter it would have made, and how much the butter could have been sold for in the market. Such figuring is a death's-head at a feast, and sours the sweetest milk worse than a thunder-storm.

Avoiding gluttony and revelling, and keeping by the golden mean of temperance, eat and drink as much as you want. The good things of this life were not made for fools and knaves. It is a grand mistake to think that a man commends his soul to God by starving his body, or that he honors Him in despising the bounty of His providence. If He spread a table before us, we do not thank him by turning away from it. Those lines of the poet's universal prayer suit this day:

"What blessings thy free bounty gives,
Let me not cast away;
For God is paid when man receives:
To enjoy is to obey."

Don't forget God's house on such a day. Praise him in the congregation; praise is comely. "Enter into his gates with thanksgiving, and into his courts with praise; be thankful unto him, and bless his name." No preacher can be at a loss for a suitable text. The Bible is full of them; for our religion, like its Author, is benignant, and recognizes thanksgiving days and duties. The joy of the Lord is the strength of his people. Nothing is at once so sure a guard against intemperance, and all filthiness of flesh and spirit, and so refining and elevating to the fellowship of a thanksgiving day, as setting the Lord always before us, and, whether we eat or drink, do all to his glory. Him we own as the Giver of every good gift. The gratitude of the creature, and goodness of the Creator, make an overflowing cup. The man that don't preach a sermon to-day ought to say grace at the head of his table with more than ordinary unction, receiving his good things with thanksgiving, and sanctifying them by the word of God and prayer.

But this is not all, by much. What of the widow and the fatherless; what of your poor neighbors, and the stranger, for whom nothing is provided? Must they fast while you feast? Nay. Send portions to them. Make the widow's heart sing for joy—sweeter music in charity's ear than the music of the spheres. Remember the fatherless, if heretofore you have eaten your morsel alone, and the fatherless hath not eaten thereof. Disperse your store; scatter it abroad, and inherit the blessing. Don't send portions worthless, insipid. Cut into the "fat," and pour out the "sweet."

Now for, practical religion, Gratitude and charity walk well together. There is a communion in happiness, and we increase the happiness by enlarging the communion. It was a beautiful custom among the Jews, that on such occasions none went unprovided for; and the people rose up en mass and in arms against hunger, want, and care, and by acclamation put these enemies to rout.

Can you not call to mind a poor family in your neighborhood that sits by no cheerful fire to-day? A cart-load of wood or a few bushels of coal would be a god-send to them. This morning, to get her breakfast, some widow scraped the bottom of the barrel. Accept the heavenly commission, and fill it. To-day, in families not beyond your reach, there will be a frugal meal and unsavory, while your corn-crib and your smoke-house are full. Strange that men so seldom enjoy the luxury of doing good, when the happiness conferred is so great in proportion to its cost.

O for a general, hearty, scriptural thanksgiving day, throughout the States! We Americans especially need it—plodding, utilitarian, selfish, money-loving people that we are. One such day, well kept, would help the vital and moral statistics of the nation: it would make us live longer, be happier, and do better.

And now, not to detain you from the duties and pleasures of the day—"Go your way, eat the fat, and drink the sweet, and send portions to them for whom nothing is prepared."—Nashville Christian Advocate.

HOLSTON CONFERENCE.

This body held its annual session at Abingdon, Virginia, commencing on the 26th ult., Bishop Early presiding. The session closed on the 2d inst. From the Knoxville (Tenn.) Tri-Weekly Whig, of the 5th inst., we gather the following particulars:

"This Conference was organized the 27th of November, 1824, in the town of Knoxville, thirty-five years ago. Bishop Roberts presided at the time, and there were three presiding elders' districts, and forty-one traveling preachers, with a membership of 13,443 white, and 1491 colored members. Now there are nine presiding elders' districts, 130 traveling preachers, and a membership of 45,110 whites, and 4881 colored persons. The statistics of the Church here, as well as in all parts of the United States, show a great improvement in numbers, improvements, and all that makes a denomination useful and influential. The Northern Methodist Church now numbers 933,472 members; the Church South, numbers 700,000; the Canada Conference numbers 42,000; the East British American Conference numbers 13,300; Wesleyan Methodists in America, 20,000; the Methodist Protestants 70,000; the African Methodists number 29,000; the Albright Methodists are 20,000 strong. The total, therefore, of Methodists in the United States and North American British possessions, is about two millions of members."

A BRAHMIN'S ACCOUNT OF HIS COUNTRY.

The Rev. Mr. Gangooly, a converted Brahmin, now traveling in this country, delivered a lecture in New Bedford, a few nights since, on the manners and customs of his country.

He said the Hindoos were divided into thirty-four castes, of which the Brahmin reached the highest, and the banker, goldsmith and shoemaker were among the lowest. The blacksmith is of a high caste, because of his usefulness. If a Brahmin eats animal food, he loses his caste, which he can never regain. The subject of birth was next treated. The birth of a male child was always made the occasion of great rejoicing, while the birth of a female child was hardly noticed. The mother of five or six girls was always the subject of scorn and derision, and never went into society.

There were but three castes in India that could not read or write. The strictest attention is given to the education of boys in India, while girls never go to school. The discipline of Brahmin life in some instances was grand. A Brahmin rises as early as five o'clock, walks out and gathers flowers, and bathes before the sun rises; if the sun sees one of this class in bed, the fourteen generations of his ancestors will be punished in eternity. Women must bathe every morning before they go into the kitchen; if they do not, people will not eat their cooking. Brahmins must keep silent while at the table; if they speak while eating they are obliged to go without food the entire day.

The marriage system was next considered. Hindoos do not know, strictly, what marriages are. Neither the boys nor the girls have anything to do with this matter. Parents make all matches, and the parties have no idea to whom they are to unite their destinies until they arrive at the altar. The marriageable age of girls is from seven to ten, and that of boys from thirteen to twenty-five. A girl at thirteen years of age, unmarried, is considered an old maid past all redemption.

In regard to the burial ceremonies of the dead in India, many things had been said and written by travelers that were untrue. The burning of the bodies of widows upon funeral piles of the husband, was explained and accounted for by the fact that when a woman becomes a widow she must always remain in that situation, and they were never thought anything of or treated respectfully, and many of them, in view of these facts, preferred death. This custom has, said the speaker, been recently abolished by the British government.

A SPECIMEN LETTER.

In order that no injustice be done, we publish the following letter just as we received it, spelling, punctuation, and all.

Rankin County Miss November. 20th 1859

Mr. C. C. Gellspie

Dear Ser

I received yours of the fifth, And ser I have quit takeing the papers out of the ofice, And I deant intende to take any more out, You say ser that the number of M. waiters papers is on your books twise and you cant tel whither it is Morgan or Moses, I think ser that you are A fine book keeper to take mens name their and cant tel one from the other I consider ser that you or Parson Godfrey one or the other has acted the dog with me. I want you to send me A recelte for my paper for I have complied with the law and if you continue the paper it is at your own risk. Mr. C. C. I have A good deal of influance in Rankin County, and ser for your smartnes I do you all the injory from this out that I can

Morgan. Waiters.

As to "acting the dog," we have neither growled, barked, nor bit any body; we may, however, have unintentionally laid hold of an animal with an unpleasant odor. If so, we back out in true canine style, as speedily as may be. As to the writer's "influence in Rankin County," we cheerfully give him the benefit of our circulation. If the publication of his letter will increase it, we make no charge for the advertisement. We beg leave to assure other candidates for similar favors that there is no partiality in this; we shall be equally generous with them also. Our columns are not very much crowded just now, and we have room for a few more of the same sort. We wish, in conclusion, to tender our sympathetic condolence to "Parson Godfrey." He must be well nigh annihilated "in Rankin County," after this. We trust he will hear up. "Every dog has his day."

THE WALDENSES AS COLONISTS.

The Edinburgh Witness contains the following: It is known to many of our readers who take an interest in the inhabitants of the Valleys of Piedmont, that a small band has gone forth from their ancient home to colonize near Monte Video, South America. Their poverty, and not their will, made this step necessary. Amidst many difficulties and dangers they have established themselves in that remote land; and although in some respects it might have been better for them to separate and seek employment individually, they have resolved to stand by each other, and to worship together the God of their fathers.

An invaluable friend has been raised up for them in the person of the Rev. Mr. Pendleton, minister of the Church of England at Monte Video, who, throwing himself heartily into the cause of these expatriated Waldenses, is doing for them in South America what the honored Doctor Gilly, of Norham, did for their Church in the Valleys. By his influence with the authorities there Mr. Pendleton has secured for them liberty of worship, of which they at one time were likely to be deprived by the intrigues of the priests of the Church of Rome. Not contented with local efforts on their behalf, Mr. Pendleton proceeded to La Tour, and attended the late meeting of the Waldensian Synod to plead the claims of the colonists in South America to have a minister and schoolmaster sent to them. This has been arranged; and now Mr. Pendleton has come to Britain to obtain funds for endowing the minister and teacher, whose limited wants must be provided for, as the colonists themselves are unable to do so. In reality, it is the cause of a Protestant mission to South America; and in that land of much superstition and ignorance the Vaudois Church may assert once more its motto, Lux in Tenebris—a light to them that sit in darkness.

PROTESTANTISM IN TUSCANY.

A correspondent of the London Athenæum writes to that journal: An important sign of the times is the legal marriage of two Tuscans, converts from Roman Catholicism to that form of Protestantism called the Italian Evangelical Church in Florence. This union of two obscure individuals, under the full protection of their country's laws, in defiance of the Church of Rome, which has hitherto declared all such marriages invalid and the offspring illegitimate, strikes a severer blow at the insolent domineering sway of Rome than all the coquetting of practised diplomates, or the hollow kettle-drumming of reactionary princes, standing out for privileges, and haggling over concessions with the "Father of the Faithful." This notable change in the marriage laws of Tuscany is among the first fruits of the project of ecclesiastical reform undertaken, as I mentioned in a former letter, by Cav. Salvagnoli, with equal skill and firmness of purpose, to limit as far as may be the grasping power of the priests. The Italian Evangelical Church, an organized religious society, holding doctrines somewhat similar to those of our Plymouth brethren, has for some years been steadily gaining strength in Tuscany. Until the 27th of last April, however, its public worship (to speak paradoxically) was kept as secret as possible, to avoid the persecution which attended any avowed leaning to Protestantism. Since the revolution has given us full liberty of creed, a place of worship has been opened, and is fully attended every Sunday. This first Protestant Tuscan marriage was solemnized in presence of a large number of persons, and assuredly makes an era in this eventful time.

NEW METHODIST MISSION.

The Oregon Conference has moved in a new missionary enterprise—nothing less than a mission to the newly opened empire of Japan. It resolved that "Whereas it has transpired that Rev. L. T. Woodward, a member of this conference, has felt himself drawn to the missionary work in Japan, and has offered himself for the field of labor; and whereas the Oregon Conference has the high honor of having made the first contribution in our church specially for missions in Japan; and whereas nearly or quite $1,000 have been so contributed; and whereas we deem it entirely fitting that the Oregon Conference should send the first missionary to that field, it being next beyond us; and whereas we judge Brother Woodward to be eminently adapted to such a missionary work; therefore Resolved, That we recommend the establishment of a mission in Japan; that we recommend Rev. L. T. Woodward as entirely adapted to such work; that in the event of L. T. Woodward or any other member of this body being appointed a missionary to Japan, we pledge ourselves to raise a sum equivalent to his support, or $1,000 annually, to be placed at the disposition of the Missionary Board for that object, in addition to our usual missionary contributions; that if $1,000 shall fail to be raised otherwise, we, the members of the conference, agree to pay the sum necessary to make up the deficiency." It pledged $2,050, besides the above $1,000, toward beginning the mission.

Discovery of a Crypt.—A curious discovery of a crypt has lately been made at Christ Church, Hants, England. The Church was originally erected in the time of Saxons, but was rebuilt during the reign of William II., about A. D. 1100. A crypt has long been known to exist under the south transept, but a similar building under the north wing has only recently been laid open during the progress of some restoration now going on. It is upsidal measure 30 feet by 12 feet, and is 9 feet 7 inches high. The walls are 7 feet thick, and pierced on the south and west by loops. In the crypt were found about 1500 human bones, laid with great regularity and care. There is no record in regard to its construction or the use for which it was designed. "Ossuaires" are found in Switzerland of contemporaneous construction, which were the receptacles of skulls and bones, which, after a certain period, were disinterred to make room for other burials.

The Irish Revival Extended.—A correspondent of the Glasgow Christian News, writing from Connaught, says: "The revival movement is extending into this benighted section of Ireland. For a length of time past, prayer-meetings have been held every evening in the Presbyterian Church, Leitrim, and a revival has been anxiously and prayerfully sought. The attendance at these missions, the solemnity pervading them, and the deep anxiety of many people about the way of salvation, indicated an answer to faithful prayer, and that the Holy Spirit was beginning a great and blessed work. The province of Connaught embraces the western counties, and the people are mostly Romanists. The places mentioned are in the region of Sligo and Donegal Bay, quite across the Island, it will be noticed, from the region where the revival commenced.

The New Group of Asteroids.—The recent discovery by M. Leverrier of a new group of asteroids, is so remarkable an instance of the precision of astronomical observations and the power of mathematical genius, that it is worthy of more than passing note. This discovery was even of greater difficulty than that of Neptune. For that he had only to study the perturbations of Uranus, to ascertain in what the orbit of Uranus differed from what it should be theoretically, and to deduce from this difference the perturbing cause. The perturbations of Uranus had been definitely ascertained before he took hold of the problem. But the perturbations of Mercury are his own discovery, as well as the brilliant result which he has drawn from them.

Sunday-schools in Ireland.—For more than fifty years the Sunday-school Society has been at work in Ireland preparing its pupils to receive instructions from the Bible, and many depend upon that Society for ability to read the Bible. The total number of schools connected with it, January 1, was 2,690, with 216,216 scholars and 19,658 teachers; 140,717 of the scholars were reading in the Bible or Testament, and 57,697 were above the age of fifteen. It is estimated that 117,426 attended no other schools.

Mr. Burton, the African and Arabian traveler, has written a letter to the London Times, in which he states that the great lake supposed to occupy the center of Equatorial Africa, is in reality four lakes—the Ujiji, visited by him in May, 1857; the Nyanza, visited by Captain Speke in July, 1857; the Chama, whose position was fixed by Dr. Lacerda in 1790; and a fourth, the position of which has just been fixed by Dr. Livingstone. They lie ranged in crescent shape, with the horns toward the east.

Death of Wm. S. Reese.—Wm. S. Reese, formerly a famous street preacher in Cincinnati, died at Keokuk, Iowa, two weeks since, leaving a fortune of $150,000. An Englishman by birth, he left college at the age of sixteen, master of eight languages; came to New York in 1830, entered into mercantile business, and amassed a competency, which he lost in the panic of 1837, and then became a wanderer. He engaged in open-air preaching and subsequently went to Keokuk, where he made a small but productive investment in land.

The reason why the dying never weep, is because the manufactories of life stop forever; the human system has run out at last; every gland of the system has ceased its functions. In all diseases, the liver is the manufactory that first stops work; one by one the others follow, and all the fountains of life are at length dried up; there is no secretion anywhere. So the eye in death weeps not; not that all affection is dead in the heart, but because there is not a tear-drop in it, any more than there is moisture on the lip.—Dr. Hall.

Unitarianism at a Crisis.—Dr. Bellows recently told his congregation that "the time had arrived when Unitarianism has the option, either to lapse into rationalism, or turn more decidedly into the body of the Church of Christ, finding there its home, and communicating the joy of a son supposed to have been lost, returning strong and happy to his father's house."

Manners are the shadows of virtues; the momentary display of those qualities which our fellow-creatures love and respect. If we strive to become then what we strive to appear, manners may often be rendered useful guides to the performance of our duties.—Rev. Sidney Smith.

No man can tell whether he is rich or poor by turning to his ledger. It is the heart that makes the man rich. He is rich or poor according to what he is, not according to what he has.

The Memphis Methodist Episcopal Conference adjourned on Friday last. The next Conference will be held at Aberdeen, Miss.

The World.—Trust not the world, for it never payeth that it promiseth.

Love.—The two poles could sooner meet, than the love of Christ and the love of the world.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

EDITORIAL NOTICES.

ADVERTISING IN THE ADVOCATE.

The business public are slowly learning that the Advocate is THE GREAT ADVERTISING PAPER OF THE SOUTH AND WEST. Advertisements in it are more valuable than in any half dozen other papers.

1.—It has the largest circulation west of Charleston, and South of Cincinnati; larger than any other two weeklies in New Orleans, and is increasing rapidly—will, in a few years, double its present circulation.

2.—Of medium size, and not crowded with advertisements, an advertisement is not lost in it, but can be easily found.

3.—In our "Editorial Notices," which we give to every advertisement, we specify the page and column on which an advertisement may be found. We seek to make every advertisement valuable to the advertiser and to the paper.

4.—The circulation is spread out over Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, principally; Georgia, Florida, Tennessee, Kentucky, Arkansas, partially.

5.—It is the only weekly of large and widely-spread circulation in the great and growing metropolis of the South.

NEWS FROM OUR HOME WORK.

"To spread Scriptural Holiness over these Lands."

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

Bayou Boeuf Mission.—REV. E. W. GASWOEN writes: I reached my work on the 5th January last. I soon learned that this Bayou had been traveled years ago by our Itinerants; but while the country has been cleared up, and planters growing rich, and establishing themselves in growing sugar and cotton, Methodism has been dying out, at the same time Cumberlieism (or "the Christians," as they call themselves,) Baptists, and Episcopalians, have been growing stronger. These control the principal part of the people that are disposed to be religious at all. These and other influences will readily account for so little success by the Methodists, both among white and colored. Six miles below Cherryville I have one appointment embracing two plantations, (a few attend from other plantations, altogether over two hundred souls. I consider this in a prosperous condition. Thirteen have joined the Church, six baptized (only two of them by immersion.) One of the planters, Mr. Talbot, paid me; the other brother, John Dunwody, $10 in cash and $10 in corn. I think this appointment should be placed either on the Evergreen or Washington work.

On the upper portion of Bayou Boeuf and Calcasieu, with their tributaries, I have preached in nine different neighborhoods, have organized four classes, received sixty-seven members and probationers. There are other neighborhoods which I have not visited. I understand that they have been without preaching.

This section of country is from sixty to eighty miles long, thirty to fifty wide. Much of it is pine woods, very poor; many of the people poor also.

I think a preacher, with experience and energy, could do much in a spiritual point of view, and probably raise some $200 towards his support next year.

There have been several conversions during this year. My report stands thus: Appointments, 10; members, white, 50; do. do. colored, 16; probationers, white, 8; do. do. colored, 7; children catechized, 35; baptized children, white and colored, 27; do. do. adults 13; Sabbath schools 2; with prospects of another; officers 6; scholars 42; volumes in library 71; "Visitor" taken 35; money received on mission, $109 25.

Plaquemine Station.—REV. F. T. RAWSON writes: Here I found about thirty names on the book, with just ten members to be found. Since then by a dint of asking I have found out a few more. But the Lord was at work, and soon an opportunity was given for preaching in a settlement far down on Bayou Sowel.

To this place I went twice a month, traveling twelve miles by skiff, and fifteen by land. Here I found three who had joined on Grand River under Bro. White. I soon received twelve more, and baptized thirteen children. By the aid of Bro. Terry I circulated about thirty dollars worth of religious books, together with a large number of tracts &c. sent to me by friends about. I also obtained five or six subscribers to the Advocate. I think a great deal of good was done in the country—good that will doubtless be seen in the future. Recently many of them have sold out and will soon move to other places. In this district I have secured the valuable services of Bro. Terry as Bible agent and colporteur in the tide water swamps. He is to start in a few weeks in a boat built for the purpose. I expect much good to be done by his labors. He would like to have a minister go with him to preach in neighborhoods where he says an preaching is ever heard.

Subsequently I made an appointment at the Village on Plaquemine Bayou, when I received three members, and baptized three children. No permanent society could be formed here, but I obtained hearing from a goodly number for several months.

In Plaquemine much effect cannot be expected just now, but I believe a change will take place. We may confidently expect that the Presbyterian Church here will be instrumental of much good. They have means, zeal, and opportunities; besides they have an excellent High School under the care of Mr. Selleck, their pastor. He is evidently well fitted for his post, in that he possesses piety, scholarly attainments, and dignified address.

Our last Quarterly meeting will be held 19th and 20th inst., and I have invited several brethren to preach for us. It is hoped that something will be accomplished, and if there is I'll inform you.

Columbia Circuit.—REV. J. H. IDDLE writes: The fourth Quarterly meeting came off at Union chapel, on the twenty-second and twenty-third days of October. The Elder, J. A. Ivy, was with us, and preached with great acceptability. The result was that the Church much revived—nine accessions, eight whites, one black. The meeting closed Monday evening with some ten persons at the altar. This the first Methodist preaching that has taken place for three months, on the work. I have been crippled since the last week in July, and not able to preach. I feel thankful to God for the meeting under such discouraging circumstances. Brother Ivy had all the preaching to do himself. I am not able to stand on my feet long enough to preach yet, and he had no help from any other source.

Calcasieu Circuit.—REV. W. D. STAYTON writes: Our camp-meeting closed Monday morning last, with twenty-five conversions, eight accessions to the Church, one professed sanctification, the membership much revived. We had but three preachers to help us; they did us good service. We had during the year sixty conversions, fifty-one accessions, whites, thirty blacks; baptized sixty-five children, thirty adults; have preached to about four hundred people. Methodism has taken good hold in this parish. May the Lord fully establish it.

Grand Chane.—REV. JOEL SAUNDERS writes: I have formed one Society on my work of eighty members—fifty-seven whites and twenty-three colored. I sent an account to the Advocate, but it did not appear. I cannot tell why. (Nor can we. Every such notice is gladly published. Some oversight somewhere.—Editor.)

Shreveport District.—REV. JOHN PIPES writes: The labors of the preachers on the District are closing up for the year with pleasing results. Missionary collections good, preachers well supported, and best of all, nearly all have had glorious revivals of religion. The Lord be praised.

Caddo Circuit.—REV. S. J. HAWKINS writes: During ten days past fifteen have been added to the Church. About fifty have been converted on this circuit this month.

October 26th, 1859.

Caddo Circuit.—REV. S. J. HAWKINS writes: The Lord is reviving us, nine were converted and ten added to the Church this week at Friendship.

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Summerfield Station.—REV. W. MCMAHAN writes: Our community and Church in this place, have been visited again, with a most refreshing season of grace. For two weeks past we kept up preaching in the Church every night, occasionally prayer-meeting during the day; these were arranged so that the schools could attend, with but little interruption of study hours. A gracious influence pervaded the crowded congregations, more than fifty professed to have obtained the forgiveness of sins through faith in Jesus Christ; forty have joined the Church, and many believers strengthened and encouraged to go on their way rejoicing.

"O! magnify the Lord with me, and let us exalt His name together."

Our schools, are all prosperous, large, and daily increasing; promise better than at any period since I have been here. Better conducted, better teaching, better deportment, and better studying, I think than usual. I make this digression for the benefit of many friends who have anxious hearts and eyes turned to this locality. The rule with us is to try and get the pupils who come here to school converted, and I thank God to tell in this so far is the exception. Forbid it Lord, that this policy should ever be changed. The orderly, dignified deportment of most of the young people here during the present session, give me confidence in their home training, and inspire hopes for the Church and nation, such as I have but seldom indulged.

The Church generally is in a good condition. Our collections will all largely exceed our assessments—this you know makes a preacher feel comfortable, just as he is leaving for Conference. We wish all to do something to the cause of benevolence—Church and congregation, Sunday-school, both advanced and primary, and the colored people, and for all to have credit for what they do. This they shall have.

One thing only prevents this from being a most happy home, and model charge, for a laborious minister. We lack church room; the capacity of our house is quite insufficient to accommodate the crowded congregations. Will the next preacher labor to remedy this evil? I have limited at so many things in this, that you will hardly give it a place in the paper—well, do with it as you please.

Summerfield, Ala., Nov. 18th, 1859.

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

Pursuit of Cortlona into Mexico.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22.—It is stated here that a suggestion has been made to the Liberal Government of Mexico, through St. Marco, to allow our Government to punish such outlaws as Cortinas and his men, and thus aid in pacifying Mexico.

The British Withdrawn from San Juan.

ST. LOUIS, Nov. 22.—The overland mail brings voluminous dispatches concerning the San Juan difficulty. Among other things it is stated that the British naval forces have all withdrawn from San Juan Island, with the single exception of the Satellite. The Americans remain in full possession.

Oregon Debt Lobby Scheme.

NEW YORK, Nov. 22.—A grand scheme for lobbying the Oregon debt, which amounts to several million dollars, through the coming session of Congress, has been discovered here. The combination includes speculators of every political character, and even now, after the disclosure, will be difficult to resist.

Later from Sonora.

ST. LOUIS, Nov. 22.—The overland California mail arrived here to-day, bringing advices from Arizona to the 3d inst. The Arizona of that date says that Capt. Erven left Fort Buchanan for Sonora on the 31st ult., to protect Stone's party from expulsion from Sonora. The same paper says that Pesquiera recently expressed a strong desire that a general emigration into Sonora would take place.

Death of Kit Carson.

ST. LOUIS, Nov. 24.—The renowned trapper and explorer, Kit Carson, died at Taos, Taos county, New Mexico, on the 31st ult.

The Sioux Indians.

ST. LOUIS, Nov. 23.—Major Schoonover, Indian agent for the Upper Mississippi Sioux Indians, has arrived at St. Joseph, Mo. Major Schoonover reports that the Sioux tribe have very hostile feelings against the whites in their country, and have sworn deadly vengeance against them.

Major Schoonover also reports the Yellow Stone river as being navigable 900 miles above its confluence.

Organized Attempt to Rescue Brown.

CHARLESTOWN, VA., Nov. 22.—The recent excitement has entirely disappeared, and everything is now quiet.

A portion of the troops ordered here from Richmond, are returning home.

Governor Wise says that one thousand troops will be present at the execution of Brown. He also expresses the belief that regularly organized bands of of Abolitionists are being formed throughout the North and West, with a view of attempting to rescue Brown.

The Governor of South Carolina has tendered military aid to Gov. Wise, but Gov. Wise feeling the utmost confidence in the ability of Virginia to execute her own laws, declines the offer.

Gov. Wise also declares that he shall not interfere with the sentence pronounced by the court against the prisoners, either by a commutation of the sentence, or a postponement of the execution thereof.

Pennsylvania offers to Aid Virginia.

RICHMOND, VA., Nov. 23.—Governor Packer of Pennsylvania, has tendered to Gov. Wise the services of 10,000 men to be stationed along the dividing line between the two states, for the purpose of preventing the entrance into Virginia from the Northern States, of any abolitionists or body of men that come with the intent of rescuing Brown or his associate prisoners.

More Excitement in Virginia.

NORFOLK, VA., Nov. 23.—A special messenger has arrived here from Northampton, on the eastern shore of Virginia, for volunteers to go to that place to prevent a threatened attempt by abolitionists, on Friday next, to run off slaves. The news created a great excitement here.

Southern Pacific Railroad Convention.

LOUISVILLE, Nov. 23.—The stockholders of the Southern Pacific Railroad met in convention in this city last evening.

There was a large attendance from all sections of the Union and much spirit was manifested in carrying out the policy of the organization.

Of the $250,000 required by the Hon. Edgar Thompson, to be subscribed for commencing the construction of the road, as a condition of his acceptance of the presidency, $50,000 have been subscribed here in addition to the $100,000 already subscribed in Texas.

Later From California.

MEMPHIS, Nov. 25.—The overland mail has arrived with San Francisco dates to the 4th inst.

Business at San Francisco was dull.

The grand jury at San Francisco have indicted Judge Terry for "the murder" of Senator Broderick and have fixed his bail at $10,000.

Pennsylvania and Virginia.

HARRISBURG, PA., Nov. 25.—The report is existing without foundation, that Gov. Packer, of this State, had offered the services of 10,000 men to the Governor of Virginia, for the purpose of guarding the boundary line between this State and Virginia from an attack or invasion of the Abolitionists from the North, that might come with the intent to liberate old Brown or others of the condemned prisoners.

Clayton and Bulwer Treaty.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 23.—Official information received at the State Department warrants the belief that all differences between the United States and Great Britain growing out of the Clayton and Bulwer treaty will soon be satisfactorily adjusted.

Loss of the Steamship Indian.

PORTLAND, ME., Nov. 23.—An authentic report has reached here to the effect that the steamship Indian, from Liverpool, the 9th inst., for this port, has been wrecked at Cut Canso.

Only her mizzen mast is standing.

Her passengers are reported to have been saved by fishing vessels in the vicinity.

She had the regular English mails of the 9th inst. What their fate is, is not yet known.

She had a large and valuable cargo, which, together with the vessel was heavily insured.

SACKVILLE, N. B., Nov. 23.—The first report of the disaster to the Indian, was received here yesterday by the arrival of the schooner Victoria.

The Indian was due at Portland yesterday, with two days later advices than those received at Boston by the Canada.

The steamer went ashore near Guy's Bore, on the Coast of Nova Scotia, in a dense fog and high sea, and is a total wreck. She struck the rock nearly midship, and broke in two.

The forward part of the steamer, with the foremast, is still standing, but breaking up gradually.

Three lives are known to be lost.

The passengers and crew took to the boats, some of whom reached shore, but two boats, which left the steamer filled with passengers, are still missing, and it is feared many more lives are lost.

The Indian had on board a valuable cargo, and the numerous packages of goods floating about the wreck are being picked up by fishing vessels and boats from the shore.

The location of the wreck is such that it is very difficult to obtain full particulars of the disaster.

SACKVILLE, N. B., Nov. 25.—The schooner Latta, which was sent from this port to the assistance of the wrecked steamship Indian, is also herself a total wreck. She got into a heavy sea in her attempt to approach the Indian and becoming unmanageable she was finally driven on the breakers. Her crew were, however, fortunately saved.

Of the wreck of the Indian herself no particulars have yet come to hand, nor is the loss of life as yet ascertained. It is only known that she had thirty-eight passengers on board besides her crew, 100 in number—138 souls in all. She had also about 800 tons of freight on board, with a small quantity of specie. She left Liverpool on the 9th inst.

SACKVILLE, N. B., Nov. 26, 9 P. M.—Intelligence has been received here that one of the missing boats from the steamship Indian has reached the shore in safety. This boat had on board thirty-three passengers, mostly ladies with their families and husbands.

They report that twenty-seven of the passengers and crew, the former mostly steerage passengers, are known to have been lost.

It is also known that all the cabin passengers, eight in number, are all saved.

HALIFAX, Nov. 26.—The schooner Gladiator, sent out from this port, to the relief of the steamship Indian, has returned. She brings all the remaining survivors of the ill-fated steamship.

The passengers complain bitterly of the treatment they received from the inhabitants along the coast. They say that the people flocked from all quarters to the vicinity of the wreck so soon as the news had spread abroad, but instead of rendering assistance, immediately set themselves to work plundering everything the passengers could not carry with them. And this they could not prevent, as there was no means of defense or protection at hand.

The passengers report that the steamship herself has entirely gone to pieces, and that only a small part of her cargo was saved.

The mails, however, were fortunately saved and have been forwarded to Portland by the overland route.

The Indian's steerage passengers, who are lost, are mostly Germans and Hungarians, of the more intelligent class.

Important from Mexico.

New York, Nov. 28.—The New York Times publishes a dispatch from Mexico, received by the last California steamer via Panama, stating that the Conservative of Church troops under the command of Gen. Garda, attacked the liberal army under General Coronado, at Tepic, on or about the 8th inst., and a desperate battle was fought, in which the Reactionists finally came off victoriously, after General Coronado had been killed, with many of his men, in defending the place.

The Reactionists also sustained very heavy losses.

The Liberal troops retreated to Mazatlan, where Gen. Coronado had previously imprisoned the British Consul of the port because of his refusal to pay a second duty (?) on the treasure shipped by the British war steamer Calypso.

Upon the imprisonment of the Consul, the Captain of the British war steamer Amethyst, then in port, brought her broadside to bear upon the town, sent a force of mariners ashore and released the Consul, and was, on the 8th, blockading the port of Mazatlan.

He had already seized two Mexican ships, laden with cotton. Captain Stone has returned to Sonora.

Thanksgiving Day in Washington.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 24.—This day has been observed here almost universally as Thanksgiving Day. Several of the most prominent preachers here spoke forcibly in favor of the supremacy of the laws, and against false sympathy for condemned criminals, particularly with reference to the Charlestown convicts.

Death of Washington Irving.

NEW YORK, Nov. 29.—Washington Irving, the popular author, died in this city last evening. [Our dispatch does not state what he died of.—EDS. DELTA.]

The Harper's Ferry Excitement.

BALTIMORE, Nov. 27.—Additional reinforcements of troops have been ordered and are on their way to Charlestown, Virginia.

The additional force has been ordered on account of information which Gov. Wise and Mr. Hunter profess to have received, to the effect that an attack will be made upon Charlestown tonight, by an armed Abolition band, with a view of rescuing Brown and Cook.

The Governor of Georgia has tendered troops to Gov. Wise to aid in the defence of the prisoners.

The Governor of North Carolina has also offered the services of his troops for the same purpose, which offers Gov. Wise had respectfully declined.

Southern Pacific Railroad.

LOUISVILLE, Nov. 24.—The convention of the stockholders of the Southern Pacific Railroad, which met here on the 24th, closed its proceedings on Saturday, after an unlimited session, at which the people of Louisville came forward with more liberality than has been manifested at any point where the stock has been offered for sale.

The Hon. J. Edgar Thompson, of Pennsylvania, required as a condition of his acceptance of the office of President of the Pacific Road, that all the debts of the company should be paid, and that the sum of $250,000 should be raised on the sale of the stock, as a fund for the recommencement and continuation of the construction of the road.

President Fowlkes has now settled all the debts of the old and new companies, and this company is entirely free from all encumbrances.

At the convention Dr. Fowlkes, after stating these facts, announced that $150,000 cash had been raised on the sale of stock, at par, and $100,000 more was needed to place Mr. Thompson, one of the ablest railroad men in the country, in the presidential chair.

An appeal was made to the citizens of Louisville, and before the close of the convention $40,000 had been subscribed.

Since the adjournment of the convention, the remainder of the $250,000 has been raised in this city, and President Fowlkes leaves this city to-morrow for Nashville. From thence he goes direct to Philadelphia, for the purpose of surrendering the presidency to Mr. Thompson, who was elected at the meeting of the directors, at Marshall, to succeed Dr. Fowlkes.

Mexican Affairs.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 28.—It is believed in circles likely to be well informed on the subject, that France and Spain are intriguing in Mexican affairs, with a view of establishing a monarchy in that country under their protection.

Whatever designs France and Spain may have with regard to the future form of government in that country, there is no evidence here that England is united with them in the scheme.

The Government of Jefferson Territory.

LEAVENWORTH CITY, Nov. 23.—The Leavenworth and Denver City express has arrived here, bringing dates from the gold mines to the 25th inst.

The provisional government of Jefferson Territory is working harmoniously. The Legislature is perfecting the new code of law.

The mines are yielding largely.

ARRIVAL OF THE CIRCASSIA.

Great Britain and France.

The reported agreement between England and France, as to England's joining in the proposed Europeam Congress, and the reported settlement between these Governments, of the basis upon which they would act, proves to have been premature.

No such understanding seems to have been entered into; at least, no reliable information to that effect has transpired.

Reinforcements for China.

The English Government is actively engaged in forwarding reinforcements in China.

Two war steamers and four gun boats left England for China on the 10th inst.

Russia, Prussia and England.

A dispatch from Berlin, of the 8th inst., states upon what appears to be reliable authority, that at the late meeting between the Emperor of Russia and the Prince Regent of Prussia, the two sovereigns determined not to consent to any revision of the treaties of 1815, nor would they send a representative to a European Congress, unless England also consented to join in its proceedings.

Italian Affairs.

The Paris Constitutional exhorts the people of Italy to be moderate in their demands and exercise patriotic patience in awaiting the reforms which France will secure to them.

The provisional assembly of Tuscany has conferred the regency upon Prince Carignan, but the King of Sardinia refuses to allow him to accept it.

Turkey.

It is reported that the Sultan of Turkey has empowered his brother to grant the demands recently made by the Spanish Governments.

Mr. Ward in Japan.

Hon. Mr. Ward, our Minister to China, having secured the ratification of the treaty with that country, has gone to Japan.

Russia and Japan.

Advices from Japan state that a large Russian naval force had arrived at Jeddo, and it was feared that serious difficulty would arise between the two countries, owing to the recent murder of three Russian subjects by the Japanese.

Liverpool Markets.

LIVERPOOL, Nov. 12.—Of the 8000 bales of cotton sold on Friday, 1000 were taken by speculators and exporters.

Richardson, Spence & Co.'s circular reports that the flour closed quiet. Prices are very firm, and holders demand advance of 1s. per bbl.

Corn closed firm and prices have an advancing tendency.

Sugar closed firm generally at previous quotations.

Coffee closed dull, but the quotations by the Canada have been generally maintained.

MARRIAGES.

"It is not good for man to be alone."

On November 3rd, by the Rev. W. G. Millsaps, Mr. COLUMBUS W. CAMPBELL of Franklin county Mississippi, to Miss MARY E. COMPTON of Jefferson county.

In Jefferson, Marengo Co., Ala., by the Rev. L. M. Wilson, Mr. R. J. COMPTON, to Miss E. J. FINCH.

On Nov. 1st, by the Rev. J. Pipes, at Pleasant Hill La., W. D. BOOCH Esq., of Shreveport, to Miss JULIA H. CHILDRESS of P. Hill, La.

On the 17th November, at the residence of Mr. Wm. H. Stephens of Madison parish, Louisiana, by Rev. Thos. J. Upton, Mr. SAMUEL SPARROW to Miss MARGARET E. STEPHENS, all of Madison parish, La.

On the 17th inst., in Catahoula parish, at the residence of Rev H. Green, by Rev. P. H. DuCenwierth, Rev. THOS. H. MCCLENDON to Miss HETTIE GREEN.

At the residence of Joseph Patton, on the 24th of November by Rev. S. H. Cox, Mr. JOSIAH WRENN to Mrs. NANCY E. PATTEN, all of Sumpter County, Ala.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, November 28, 1859.

We condense the following statement from the New Orleans Price Current of the 26th instant:—

The limited intercourse with the interior, in consequence of low water, still tends to keep the operations of our market generally within comparatively narrow limits, and our dealers in general merchandize have as yet found but little outlet for their ample and well selected stocks. Among our export staples, Cotton continues to be the only article in which there is any movement of consequence, though the moderate receipts of Sugar and Molasses have found a ready market, at improved prices for the various qualities of the former article (sugar).—The transactions in the various articles of Western Produce are still confined mostly to the limited parcels required for home consumption.

COTTON.—With respect to prices, we have to remark that an advance of fully ¼ cent was realized in the early part of the week for the Middling and better grades, and these descriptions brought very full rates on Wednesday and Thursday; but the European advices received yesterday, checked the upper tendency, leaving quotations about the same, but with the advantage on the side of buyers. The lower qualities are seldom called for, and the occasional sales are at low and irregular prices.

The receipts at this port since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas,) are 684,675 bales, against 583,016 bales to same date last year, and the increase in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 133,282 bales.

New Orleans Classification:

Inferior	7 @ 8	Good Middling	11¾@11¾
Ordinary	8¾@ 9¾	Middling Fair	12¼@12½
Good Ordinary	9¾@10	Fair	—@—
Low Middling	10¾@10¾	Good Fair	—@—
Middling	11 @11¼	Good and Fine	—@—

SUGAR.—The sales of the week amount to 5000 hhds. We quote for Inferior and Refining 4½ to 5¾; Common to Good Common 5 to 6¾; Fair to Fully Fair 7 to 7¾; Prime to Choice 7¾ to 8; Centrifugal and Clarified 7 to 8¾ cents per pound. The above quotations apply to round lots, but small orders of 5 hhds and under, could not be filled without paying a further advance of ¼ to ½c per pound.

MOLASSES.—Total receipts of the week 11,421 barrels. The prices obtained during the week were: Inferior to Fair, 32 to 38 cents per gallon; and Prime to Choice, 40 to 41 cents; half barrels, 42 to 42½ cents per gallon.

FLOUR.—About 5,500 barrels have been sold during the past week, at from $5 75 to $5 87½ for superfine, $6 to 6 50 for ordinary to good extra, and $6 75 to $7 00 per bbl. for choice extra brands.

GRAIN.—The receipts of Corn continue light. About 27,000 sacks have been sold at from $0 62½ to 0 65 for ordinary, and $0 70 for good white. Oats have been in good request at 55c to 57c per bushel for good to prime St. Louis. Bran sells at $1 20 to $1 25 for ordinary to choice lots. Wheat sells at $1 15 per bushel for prime red.

PORK.—The principal sales reported through the week were at $15 25 to $15 50 per bbl. for Mess.

BEEF.—We quote Prime Mess at $14 00 per bbl. for extra brands.

BACON.—Shoulders 8½ to 8¾; Ribbed Sides 10½ to 10¾; Clear Sides 12½ to 12¾; Sugar-cured Hams 12 to 15 cents per pound.

LARD.—We quote 10¾ to 11c for prime to choice prime, in tcs., and 12¾ to 13c. for kegs.

BUTTER.—Western generally selling at 10 to 14 cents per pound, according to quality; and Cheese 11 to 12c.

BAGGING and BALE ROPE.—We quote Kentucky Bagging at 12 to 14½ cents per yard; India Bagging, 11¼ to 12c; Bale Rope, hand spun, 6¾ to 7¼, and machine made, 7¼ to 7¾ cents per pound.

THE SLEEPING CHILD.

BY MRS. JANE T. H. CROSS.

Thy snowy eyelid hides thine eye,
Thy face is quiet now and meek;
Thy light and silken ringlets lie
About thy rosy mouth and cheek.

Yet on thine eyelash hangs the tear,
And still with tears thy cheek is wet;
Thy fair young brow is scarcely clear,
And scarce in sleep canst thou forget.

Gay dreamy visions fill thy heart,
And float before thy slumbering eyes;
Yet, with involuntary start,
Thy bosom heaves with sobs and sighs.

And thus, methinks, when life is o'er,
And we repose in Paradise,
Whose strife and anguish come no more,
Nor sorrow's tears bedew thine eyes,—

Tho' in the bliss of Heaven at last,
Tho' high with joy the heart may throb,
A sudden memory of the past
Will come, at times, with tearful sob.

BITING DOGS.

I would be really glad, Mr. Editor, if you would write some sharp editorial against these miserable miscreants. It seems you are set to watch and warn the evils of the day, and I believe that this evil needs exposure, and a little cutting satire from your pen.

Now, if you will give us a little talk on this subject, I will supply you with a suitable text. It is this: "Beware of dogs."—Philippians iii, 2. There, if you cannot give a sharp anti-canine sermon on that, I shall think you are in the habit of keeping biting dogs yourself, and don't want the subject to come too near home.

It seems to me that it is almost semi-barbarous to keep one of these vicious animals. There may be instances where it is right, such as uninhabited yards and houses; and in some cases it may be excusable, as in the case of unprotected females, &c; but for a white man, and especially for a christian, to keep one of these beasts, to the manifest danger of all who visit him, is a relic of inhospitality we should do away with.

As it respects their guarding poultry, these vigilants oft fail, for the rogue goes prepared either to evade or deceive him, while the honest, unsuspecting man is taken.

There are uses, it is true, of the dog, but they should be kept as watchers, not as destroyers. It is praiseworthy and right to put out of the way all "dumb dogs that cannot bark," and get those that give warning of the approach of a stranger; but after that is done the dog has done his duty. He should not be left as the avenger of his master.

Why, sir, I heard some time ago of a vicious beast of a dog, in Pike County; Miss., having once got loose, and flying to the road as two little children were passing by from school, actually tore one of them to pieces; and yet all this is tolerated in a christian land, by christian people.

A few days ago, in company with a friend, I visited an afflicted man, and we had to be guarded with sticks and poles from the yard-gate to the door; nor did we dare to stir out of our prison, or come back to it if we went out, till we had mastered our guard with the usual weapons of defence. Now, sir, how can a generous-hearted, feeling man keep unchained such a beast? Indeed, a man better run the risk of losing a chicken turkey, or goose occasionally, than risk the life or limb of his friend and neighbor.

"But, christian, you should never let
Such vicious varmints loose,
Nor risk the life and limb of man
To save a paltry goose."

ANTI-CANO.

COALS OF FIRE ON THE HEAD.

The following anecdote relates to an exercise of Christian forgiveness: I heard from the lips of Joseph Konigmacher, Esq., a revolutionary incident which may well be told with pride by the descendants of this peculiar people, as illustrative of the sincerity of their fathers in the religious doctrine they professed. At the death of Beissel, (Father Peaceful,) which occurred, as I learned from the ancient slab which marks his tomb, on the 6th of July, 1768, Peter Miller, a man of great learning, and highly respected by the first men of the Revolution, became his successor. A certain Tory by the name of Michael Whitman—who owned several tracts of land near Ephrata, and who had alike distinguished himself for very base conduct toward the society of which Miller was now head, and treason to his country—being brought to trial for the latter offence, was found guilty, and condemned by the proper authorities to suffer the prescribed penalties, which were death and the confiscation of his estates.

The confiscation deed for the four properties owned by the Tory Whitman, given under date of March 15, 1780, over the signature of Joseph Reed, then President of the Supreme Executive Council, at Philadelphia, as the writer has seen, is still in an admirably preserved condition. Whitman was sentenced to be hung. No sooner had this been announced than Peter Miller, with motives which they who know experimentally what it is to love their enemies are alone qualified to appreciate, set out on foot to visit Gen. Washington at Philadelphia, for the purpose of interceding for Whitman's life. He had an interview with the General, and stated his petition, but in answer to it was told, with characteristic decision of purpose, that much as Washington esteemed his friendship, the prayer of Miller in behalf of his unfortunate friend Whitman could not be granted:

"My friend!" exclaimed Miller; "on the contrary, I have not a worse enemy living than this same Whitman."

"What!" rejoined Washington, "you have walked sixty miles to save the life of your enemy! That, in my judgment, places the matter in a different light; I will grant you his pardon."

The pardon was made out and placed in the hands of the disinterested petitioner, who, without losing a moment's time, proceeded on foot to old Chester, fifteen miles distant, where the execution was to take place in the afternoon of that day. Miller arrived at the spot just as Whitman was being conducted to the scaffold, who, seeing the man with his long friar rope and tall staff in the crowd which had assembled to witness his death, remarked to a bystander.

"There's old Peter Miller; he has walked all the way from Ephrata to have his revenge gratified to-day by seeing me hang."

These words had scarcely been spoken when he was made acquainted with the very different nature of Miller's visit. The criminal's life was spared, and the pleasure of that moment doubtless repaid the good man for the labor of his journey. He must have been past seventy at the time, as he deceased September 26th, 1796, at nearly eighty-seven years of age, and the event which I have here related occurredin 1780.—Philadelphia Press.

"NECK-TWISTING."

"It is a part of my religion," said a pious old lady, when asked why she went early to Church, "not to interrupt the religion of others." And we believe, that if many a country congregation made it a part of their religion not to twist their necks almost out of joint to witness the entrance of every person who passed up the aisle of the meeting-house, it would be better for both their necks and their religion. A gross abuse of religious decorum sometimes needs harsh medicine as a remedy. We do not know whether it would be proper for some of our good ministering brethren, who are sorely tried by the neck-twisting propensities of their congregations, to use the method adopted by Henry Clay Dean, who was one time chaplain of Congress; but we give it for their consideration. The anecdote is from the Pacific Methodist.

Being worried, one afternoon, by this turning practice in his congregation, Mr. Dean stopped in his sermon, and said:—

"Now you listen to me, and I'll tell you who the people are, as each one comes in."

He went on with his discourse, until a gentleman entered, when he bawled out like an usher, "Deacon A., who keeps the shop over the way," and then went on with his sermon.

Presently another man passed up the aisle, and he gave his name, residence and occupation; so he continued for some time.

At length some one entered the door who was unknown to Mr. Dean, when he cried out, "A little old man, with a drab coat, and an old white hat; don't know him, look for yourselves."

That congregation was cured.

THE ROMAN SENTINEL.

When Pompeii was destroyed there were very many buried in the ruins of it who were afterward found in very different situations. Those were some found who were in the streets, as if they had been attempting to make their escape. There were some found in deep vaults, as if they had gone thither for security. There were some found in lofty chambers; but where did they find the Roman sentinel? They found him standing at the city gate, with his hand still grasping the war weapon, where he had been placed by his captain, and there, while the heavens threatened him, there, while the earth shook beneath him, there, while the lava stream rolled, he had stood at his post, and there, after a thousand years had passed away, was he found. So let Christians learn to stand to their duty, willing to stand to the post at which their Captain has placed them, and they will find their duty will support and sustain them.—Rev. S. Croley.

A BEAUTIFUL REPLY.

A pious old man was one day walking to the sanctuary with a New Testament in his hand, when a friend who met him said:

"Good morning, Mr. Price."

"Ah, good morning," replied he; I am reading my father's will as I walk along."

"Well, what has he left you?" said his friend.

"Why he has bequeathed me a hundred-fold more in this life; and in the world to come life everlasting."

This beautiful reply was the means of comforting his Christian friend, who was at the time in sorrowful circumstances.

A TRUE FRIEND.—Thou mayest be sure that he that will in private tell thee thy faults, is thy friend, for he adventures thy dislike, and doth hazard thy hatred; for there are but few men who can endure it—every man, for the most part, delighting in self praise, which is one of the most universal follies that besiegeth mankind.

Means of moderate calibre ordinarily condemn every thing which is beyond their range.—La Rochefoucauld.

Children's Column.

FATHER STRONGARM AND THE GOOSE.

A fine old man was Father Strongarm, as strong and hearty as if he were only twenty-five, although white hair hung down from under his broad gray hat, curling almost to his shoulders, and the smile on his face, that was ready to beam on every child he met, was too quiet for a young man. It was he that in winter gave us the most and best apples, whose maple-sugar in spring we liked best, who never scolded us for running over his hay in summer, whose house was full of spinning-wheels, old clocks, etc., which he never used, and kept—so we used to think—on purpose that we might play with them.

But the one thing for which I now most admire him, was his habit of teaching us something from everything we saw, and doing it in such a pleasant way that we never felt as if we were taking a lecture. No wonder we children called him father! No wonder we loved to be with him!

One day in March he was carrying corn to the mill. It was somewhat cold and cloudy; but that did'nt prevent the little ones from going with him. Beside him sat a little girl, and on the sacks behind him, the boys. The road lay along the bank of the winding mill stream, and just before the mill came in sight we saw a single goose, white and plump, sailing around in the water as easily as if she were carried with the water without effort.

"I should think," said the little girl, "that goose would be uncomfortable enough when she comes out of the water, all wet, and on a day like this."

"But she will not come out of the water all wet," said Father Strongarm.

"Why, I don't see how she can come out at all then."

"As soon as she comes out the water will run off, and leave her as dry as before she went in. Water doesn't soak into her feathers as it does into your dresses."

"Last Saturday," said one of the boys, "I poured a whole pailful of water on a goose, and didn't wet her a bit."

"I wish I were so," said the girl, stroking her dress and looking at the sky.

"A great many children are like geese," said Father Strongarm. "I have seen boys who are sent to school by their parents, who have slates, and books, and paper provided for them, and everything done to help them to learn.—But instead of improving their time, they spent it in staring around the room and whispering, and then, when the end of the term came they knew nothing. Advantages and opportunities made no more impression on their minds than water on a goose's back."

"And I have seen little girls, whose parents wished to have them neat and tidy, and gave them many cautions about it, who would lay their playthings, books, and clothes all tumbled in a heap, and give themselves and their mothers a great deal of trouble." Caution had no effect on them.

"And I have seen boys who had been carefully taught their duty at church, at Sabbath-schools, and at home, but who took no pains to do what they ought any more than if they did not know it. And I have seen children who had been told how to treat their playmates so as to make their company agreeable and make others love them; but who were obstinate, surly, and teasing, so that nobody wished to have them around. Instruction ran off from their minds just as water runs off a goose's back.

"And so some persons read books, and forget what they read before bedtime. Some go on errands, and forget what they went for. Some, when a matter has been explained to them, must have it explained again the next day. Whenever you see any such persons, think of the goose in the water, and be careful not to be like her yourselves."—Observer.

A CHRISTIAN IN LITTLE THINGS.

During the revival last winter, a friend related this touching story of Willie. He had been a long time a lover of his Savior, and had long wished to publicly confess his love and join the disciples of Christ in their commemoration of his death. At last his longing was gratified. His parents, themselves earnest Christians, permitted him to take a place with those who came forward to unite with the Church of God. The Holy Communion was observed with great solemnity; and many hearts, that day experienced, as they had never before, how full, how satisfying was the sympathy and love of their Savior.

And Willie was not unhallowed by this service. Through the day and evening—while he was kind and gentlemanly as he always was—for boys can be gentlemanly—he seemed to feel that he had indeed taken solemn vows upon himself. But it was when alone that night, when there was no one, as he thought, to see or hear but his heavenly Father, that Willie showed how earnest was his desire to be a true Christian. While praying, as he thought, in secret, when his whole heart was laid open before God with a child's simple artlessness, these words were heard by another, upon whose mind they engraved themselves very deeply: "Oh God, make me a Christian in little things."

Such a petition in one so young as Willie proved him indeed a lamb of Christ's flock, especially as his entire life confirms the language of his heart. I have seldom seen a boy more consistent in his conduct, more kind in his actions, more gentlemanly in his intercourse with others, than Willie; and this language of his well explains why he is so.

Oftentimes since I heard this story, while engaged in my daily duties, many of which seem very little, but which sadly try my patience, does this prayer of Willie recur to my mind, with thoughts of his truthful consistency. And the more I have reflected upon these words, "Make me a Christian in little things," the more significant do they appear. Life is made up of little things. It is but one in thousands—yes, millions—who has been or will be remembered, ten years after his body has crumbled back to dust, by his great deeds. Millions have lived, millions are living and millions are yet to live, the daily record of whose lives will be made up of little things alone, and remembered only by him with whom nothing is too little to escape notice, nothing so small as to be forgotten. How important, then, does this petition become, when we remember that our lives are, in all probability, to be only many little things added together, and if we fail at living Christians in little things, we shall fail of living Christian lives at all.

There is another respect in which this simply prayer of Willie is worthy of earnest attention. By being Christians in the little things of life, we are far more likely to manifest a Christian spirit in greater matters. We see only learners in the school of Christ, and these constantly repeated lessons of our daily experience in which the little things are being learned, are to prepare us for greater tasks. But if, like many, we neglect these primary teachings, if we avoid these little lessons, how shall we be able to understand the more difficult ones to follow?

Remember what our Savior said—"He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much;" and "Because thou hast been faithful in a very little, have thou authority over ten cities." If, indeed, we should see this truth in its clearness, we should ask, with all Willie's earnest sincerity, "Oh God, make me a Christian in little things."

HOW MUCH ARE YOU IN DEBT?

"O, papa, how much you must owe the people, or what a lot they must owe you, for such a big book to be wanted to keep your accounts in!"

"It is hardly fair to judge by the size of my books."

"Why not, papa? Will not a large book hold more than a small one?"

"Yes; but different people have different plans of book-keeping. Some people who are deeply in debt do not keep any books at all."

"Indeed! that must be a very bad plan. Well nobody owes me anything, and I owe no one a single cent."

"I am not certain of that, my son; in fact, when I said there are some people deeply in debt who keep no books, I mean to include you among the number."

"Me! What! do you think I am in debt? I paid Lizzie the quarter she lent me yesterday, and I owe nobody a cent."

"What if, after all you have said, I should find you over head and ears in debt? What would you say then?"

"You are joking, papa; for no man can make it out that I am in debt. I do not owe a single cent."

"Well, if you are so sure, you can have no objection to my inquiring into your affairs a little."

"Not in the least. You may ask any question you like. You cannot make me in debt; that's certain."

"Very well; we shall see. Take your place there beside me, while I proceed as a committee of investigation. I might properly bring my own bill for ten years board, clothing, lodging and education, which would be many hundred dollers; but I will pass this by."

"O, I never thought of such things."

"And for that reason it is my duty to think of them in examining your affairs. I told you I thought you a very bad accountant. Your two principal creditors are your earthly father and your heavenly Father. What you owe the former is not worthy of being mentioned in comparison with what you are indebted to the latter."

"I suppose I shall soon be puzzled if you go on at this rate. I didn't mean these things."

"Well, correct me if I make a wrong charge. You are indebted to your heavenly Father for life, and all your senses of seeing, hearing, feeling, tasting and smelling. Would you part with them for hundreds of dollors each?"

"No, father, you know I would not. But then did not God give me all these?"

"Yes, he gave them to you; but he asks something of you in return. He says, 'Son, give me thy heart.' So I will put down a thousand dollars to begin with. Then there is your faculty of speech, your health—"

"Stop, stop! I see that you would make a much larger bill against me than I could ever pay. I confess I did not think of reckoning these things; but you will never hear me say again that I owe nothing."

"I trust not, Henry; I heartily hope not. I have said nothing yet of God's gracious gift of his own Son. "What shall we render to the Lord for all his benefits?"

YOUNG ADAM'S SCRUPLES.

A linen merchant in Coleraine, Ireland, offered Dr. Adam Clarke, when a youth, a situation in his warehouse, which was accepted by him, with the consent of his parents. The overseer in this establishment was a pious man, and tried to have the business conducted an strictly religious principles. The master being in the warehouse one day when preparations were being made for the great Dublin fair, found one of the pieces of cloth a little short of the desired measure. He took it up with the intention of stretching it to the required length. Knowing that the pious overseer would not assist him in this dishonest practice, he called out:

"Come, Adam, take hold of one end and pull against me."

But he soon discovered that he had mistaken the character of the boy addressed. Adam had neither ears, heart, nor hands, for such a proposal, and young as he was, he absolutely refused to do what he thought a dishonest thing. A long argument and expostulation followed, in which the usages of trade were strongly and vigorously enforced; but all in vain. Adam was immovable, and resolved rather to suffer than sin. Mr. B. was obliged to call to his old one of the men less scrupulous, and Adam quietly retired.

Soon after, Mr. B. informed his young friend, as he seemed pleased to call him, that it was very clear to his mind he was not fit for worldly business, and wished him to look out for some employment more congenial to his own mind, adding that he might depend on his friendship in any line of life into which he might enter.

God found Adam some other employment. He called him to the honorable and respectable work of the Christian ministry, in which field of labor he was eminently successful. He also became a very distinguished writer. His works are mostly on religious subjects; they are written with great ability, and have had a very extensive circulation, not only among the Methodists, to whom Dr. Clarke belonged, but among all other Christian denominations.

Boys, never be afraid to do right. Leave the consequences with God. He will never allow you to suffer for acts of integrity and kindness. If you would ever be rewarded or beloved, you must first be good. There is no true greatness without real goodness.

A PREACHER LOST IN THE MOUNTAINS.—The Canada Guardian contains an account of a Wesleyan minister who was lost in the mountains of New South Wales. He existed for six days and six nights, eating only one very slight meal previous to leaving home, without any fire or shelter, except what could be found in a hollow log. He was found in an almost helpless condition by a party in search of cattle. Being disabled for some time from preaching, he devoted his leisure hours in writing a book entitled, "Lost, but not forever."

HOLD ON, BOYS.

Hold on to your tongue when you are just ready to swear, lie, or speak harshly, or say any improper word.

Hold on to your hand when you are about to strike, pinch, scratch, steal, or do any improper act.

Hold on to your foot when you are on the point of kicking, running away from study, or pursuing the path of error, shame, or crime.

Hold on to your temper when you are angry, excited, or imposed upon, brothers are angry about you.

Hold on to your heart when evil associates seek your company, and invite you to join in their games, mirth, and revelry.

Hold on to your good name at all times, for it is more valuable to you than gold, high places, or fashionable attire.

Hold on to the truth, for it will serve well, and do you good throughout eternity.

Hold on to your virtue—it is above all price to you, in all times and places.

Hold on to your good character, for it is, and ever will be, your best wealth.

A CRACKED COMMANDMENT.

We heard a suggestive expression related the other day of a very little girl who was taken by her mother into a shop, where a tempting basket of oranges stood exposed for sale. While her mother was engaged in another part of the room, the little one fastened her eyes on the fruit, and nursed the temptation in her heart till it grew too strong to be resisted, and she hid one of the oranges under her apron and walked quickly away. But conscience remonstrated so strongly, that after a little reflection, she walked as quickly back, and as slily replaced the orange in the basket. Again the forbidden fruit, out of her possession, presented its tempting side, and again she yielded. After a sharper conflict than before, conscience gained a second victory, and the almost stolen orange was again and finally restored.

With a saddened countenance, she walked home with her mother and, when they were alone, burst into tears exclaiming, "O mother, I've cracked one of the commandments! I didn't break it, mother—quite—but, I'm sure I cracked it."—Ex.

Obituaries.

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

REV. AUGUSTUS V., son of Rev. E. V. Lebert, of the Ala. Conference, died Oct. 21, in Kemper county Miss. He was born in Greene county, Ala., Oct. 8, 1820, and connected himself with the M. E. Church at an early age, though he was never satisfied as to his conversion until the fall of 1849. In 1852 he was licensed to preach, and about two years ago was married to Miss Ulrica Tompkins of Sumpter county, Alabama.

In the language of his venerable father, "As a son and a brother, he was almost above praise, obedient, affectionate and gentle. It afforded him a pleasure to minister to the comfort and accommodation of others."

As a christian he was humble, devoted and consistent. As a preacher, he was diligent and useful, preaching as much as other engagements would admit of. His last sermon, is said by one who heard it, to have been peculiarly earnest and effective. During his last illness he was calm, patient and resigned, and died in the faith of that Gospel he had so earnestly preached to others.

The blow falls heavily upon the deeply grief-stricken wife, and the afflicted father, as well as upon other near relatives, but He, that does everything for the best, is able to sustain the bereaved and to sanctify their loss to their eternal salvation. They "sorrow not as those who have no hope."

Gainesville, Ala., Nov. 10, 1859. T. Y. RAMSEY.

MRS. MARY L. TROTH, consort of Mr. Robert W. Troth, died at Port Hudson, La. She was born in East Feliciana Parish, La., Nov. 8, 1830; married June 1, 1852; joined the M. E. Church in 1854; professed religion in April 1855, and departed this life Nov. 2, 1859, in the 30th year of her age.

Sister Troth was one of those amiable and winning spirits whose presence always favorably impresses all who come within the circle of their influence and acquaintance. Modest and retiring in manner, yet kind and social in feelings; ready and active in deeds of devotion and charity, it may be truly said of her—

"None knew her but to love,
None named her but to praise."

In her sudden and unexpected departure, society has lost a bright ornament, the church a worthy member, and her husband a devoted wife. Yet she was ready for the change. When interrogated by her husband and others, on her last request for eternity, she answered she was prepared for death, and that for years she had lived with a happy consciousness of her Saviour's love. May it be our happy lot to be thus prepared at life's last hour. She leaves two little children—one but nine days old, whose lot we more touchingly feel, because of their entire unconsciousness of their loss. G. T. VICKERS.

Port Hudson, La.

MRS. JANE EVELINE HOOPER, died at Indian Village, Iberville parish, La. Sister Hooper was born on Bayou Boeuf, Rapides Parish, La., November 19, 1827; and died of congestive chill at the above stated place, November 7, 1859. In 1852 she joined the church under Bro. Harp, and soon after moved to this Parish. Having but little chance to get to church, and being without religious companions, she grew cold, neglectful and backslidden. During the past summer I preached several times in her neighborhood, and she and her husband again united with the church. She has since then lived in the constant endeavor to please God, and get home to heaven. She was unconscious at the time of her death, but we are assured she has found a resting place with God. F. S. HAWSON, Pastor.

FRANCIS WEBSTER THOMAS, son of Daniel A. and Elizabeth D. Thomas, died November 8th, 1859, in Butler Co., Ala., aged one year and seven months. "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of Heaven."

HUNTSVILLE FEMALE COLLEGE, HUNTSVILLE, North Alabama.
REV. A. R. ERWIN, D. D., Principal.
This Establishment offers the following inducements to Southern patronage.
1. Huntsville is the nearest mountain location to the South and Southwest; and is proverbially healthful. The social elegance and beautiful scenery to be found here, are great auxiliaries in the formation of character.
2. The edifice is large and elegant—supplied with gas-light; and water in the greatest abundance by pipes, from a mammoth Spring in the town. It is 154 by 52 feet, three stories high, and well furnished.
3. The domestic arrangements are such as to secure not only comfort, but the social and domestic training of the pupils. Frugality, politeness and grace, as well as the virtues of the heart, are habitually cultivated.
4. The facilities of instruction are unsurpassed. There are fifteen teachers and attaches, some of whom are distinguished educators. The large patronage, from among the best families of nine of the Southern states, attest the good-will of the Institution.
5. Arrangements are made to accommodate Southern pupils during the Summer Vacation, and to furnish them with such instructions in the extra branches as may be desired. Pupils received at any time.
Apply for circular to Rev. A. R. ERWIN, D.D.,
ap6 Huntsville, Alabama.

COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE, BATON ROUGE.
The Exercises of this Institution will be resumed on the 12th of October next.
The Principal intends to spare neither labor nor expense to make the school in its Educational Facilities and its moral influences, equal to the very best Schools in the country.
As the number of pupils is limited, it is desirable that applications be made as early as possible.
Parents are earnestly advised of the importance of having their children at school as promptly as possible. The loss of a few days at the beginning, often proves a serious disadvantage to the pupils, and greatly increases the labor of the teachers for the whole session.
For information and Circulars, apply to Rev. J. H WALKER, New Orleans; Rev. C. H. Yancey, Monroe; T. P. Chilton, Esq., St. Joseph; Rev. J. A. Ivy, Alexandria; Rev. S. B. Sugar, Mansfield; or to

LETTER FROM NEW HAVEN.

"But see the many colored woods—
Shade deepening into shade the country round.
Embrown'd, a crowded umbrage dark, dress
Of every hue, from wan declining green
To sullen dark."—

"But
The pale descending year is pleasing still."—

No landscape in the world presents such a beautiful variety as the "fading graces of New England. They surpass all that Thompson ever saw in his poetical inspirations in the old world of which he sang so sweetly in his Book of the Seasons.

Our mountains are now radiant with beauty, pencilled up with the richest colors from the divine artist, with touches of inimitable splendor. The rock maple stands enthroned in primitive grandeur, with a robe more gorgeous than the proudest monarch of an Eastern court: its mantle of scarlet, green, and gold, is so beautifully blended,

"With shade deepening into shade," that it is a perfect ensemble of Oriental magnificence and splendor. It might well be said, that "Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these." No country in Europe have we seen which could boast of such trees as our American woodlands afford. From the tiuft of Mexico to Canada, they present all that is beautiful and grand in nature. There is something peculiarly pleasing in the fall of the year, although accompanied with melancholy associations as:

"The leaf incessant rustles from the mournful grove,
And, slowly circles through the waving air."—

We think of those who have passed away in the springtide of life, when the dews of heaven were thick upon the expanding flowers; while the passing breeze chants a requiem over the fresh made graves of those most tenderly beloved.

NEW HAVEN CEMETERY.

We passed through these grounds, laid out with great beauty and taste, to find the tombs of some of the ancient dead, associated with heart-memories of early life, and ancestral interest of maternal recollections. An uncle whom I never saw, yet whose history was like our household words, was dear to the memory of childhood from the "oft-repeated tale." His brief existence and experience was almost prophetic of the dawning light of christianity and the temperance cause which has since burst upon the world through the influence of Methodism. He had made a great fortune in the crisis of the Revolution, and possessed real estate in the centre of his city which would now be worth millions. He supplied the continental army with liquor and provisions. Death entered his dwelling, and took away his favorite child, which made a deep impression upon his mind.—While walking in one of the streets, meditating upon death and eternity, he was suddenly surrounded, as he thought, by a supernatural light above the brightness of the sun, with the appearance of our Saviour upon the cross. Struck dumb with astonishment, he returned, trembling and pale, to his home, and returned to his private apartment. His long absence then created alarm, and his wife followed to know the cause. She saw him upon his knees, with his hands clasped in prayer. She gazed silently upon him through the door for awhile, and then spoke. He rose from his knees a changed man and said his hands were still, and he had no power to unclasp them until Christ said, "Rise; thy sins are forgiven thee!" The light and joy was so great that it overpowered his reason, and he went to all the clergy in the city for instruction, and to explain the mystery; but found none to tell him what he thought was the right way, for he felt a call to preach the Gospel like St. John the Baptist, and immediately began his mission by going about calling sinners to repent, for the kingdom of heaven was at hand. He took the Bible for his guide, and followed it literally, giving his goods to feed the poor and clothe the naked, and like Zacheus, he would restore four-fold where he thought he had taken any advantage in the way of trade. He dealt largely in liquors, and would go to his cellar and knock in the heads of hogsheads of brandy and other spirituous liquors, and let them run upon the ground, so deeply was he impressed with the deadly traffic, and would neither give it away or sell it any more. He placed a sign over his door, "Entertainment for beggars and strangers." Finally, the city authorities took his possessions from him, lest he should make his children beggars; but he kept upon his mission for three years, calling sinners to repentance, wandering about like one deranged. He was a man of principle, of taciturn habits, and in this change he had only one theme—"Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand!" To finish out his mission he undertook to fast, like our Saviour, forty days, and would go out into the mountains to pray all night, and return in the morning. He continued for eleven days in this state, until he was compelled by his friends to take some food; but it was too late; he died away in a most glorious frame of mind, with the words of St. Paul upon his lips: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness which the Lord the Righteous Judge shall give me in that day: not unto me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing."

After the Methodist preachers came into New England, my mother used to tell them of his history, and they said could he have counselled with the itinerant ministers of the Gospel, he would be restored to the right use of his reason. Methodism has had hard struggles in this city, but it has gained a position, and taken root like the grain of mustard seed, forming a tree that is spreading wide its branches. Many a revival of religion in Yale College has taken place, in early days, from students who went to make sport of the little praying band in some obscure corner of the city, and returned converted of sin.

YALE COLLEGE

Stands with its hoary honors of bygone days, where may can trace their literary and scientific elevations within its walls. How many sons of former years, both North and South, have walked under those gothic elms, felt the kindling raptures of inspiring genius beneath her broad shadows over the grassy lawn, and revelled in the luxury of ideal beauty. Formerly, almost all the sons of the South sought these classic halls as the culminating point of mental culture. But now the tide is changed; schools and colleges have risen upon Southern soil, and occupy position with any here; and among them, far off, but not the least in consideration, is Centenary College, Jackson, La., which has a name and a claim of the first magnitude, and has an influence in the Sunny South, where

"The myrtle and orange tree bloom,
Perfuming with fragrance the air,
While winter is robbed of its gloom,
And birds from this clime now repair."

Long may that college live, and its intellectual and religious influence be felt like its founders; for the last pulsation of one dear to me clung to its interest with his dying breath, and the impress of his footsteps was heard in its halls as he passed away from earth. It has won trophies, and its sons have gone forth with the christian armour to battle with the stormy elements of a wicked world, well prepared for the contest.

ARNOLD THE TRAITOR.

There are two houses in a mean part of this city around which thought lingered with most gloomy associations; one in which the traitor was born, and another in which he lived in the day of his pride and glory. There they stand monuments of his treachery, no funeral pall has a shade more dark. What a history could be written upon their walls of unhallowed ambition? of heartbreaking? Associated with him was the unpitiable, and accomplished Maj. Andre, and his tragical death opened wounds never to be healed, in one of the most lovely and interesting families of England. In one of the Baronial halls of that country, he was seen by the family who were there draped in mourning—they shrank from his presence as from a serpent, and turned away with grief and scorn.

On his voyage to England he was driven upon the Coast of France, and lodged at a Hotel in Havre, when Prince Talleyrand was flying away from France as an exile, and thought of going to America. He was told that a distinguished American was lodging there, and sought a letter as an introduction to some of his friends. He gave him his name, and told him he had no friends in America! what a thought! he had betrayed his country, and deserved none.

THE STATE FAIR.

Thousands of people assembled in the great Park for days, to witness the display of the industrial improvements of the country. The mechanical skill was well represented, and the agricultural department was well supplied with fruits and vegetables, worthy of observation. Grapes of most tempting appearance, in large and delicious clusters.

But we afterwards saw them in a magnificent conservatory of a private residence of a gentleman in the city, which were equal in flavor to any upon the Rhine, or in Italy, and in size to those in Conservatory at the Palace of Chatsworth, England. The black, purple and white were still hanging in rich clusters, although a plentiful harvest had been gathered from the transparent walls.

CHIPS FROM AN ARKANSAS LOG CABIN.

We are now enjoying a most delightful "Indian Summer," instead of a "sad and melancholy time." This beautiful season casts over my spirit a subdued cheerfulness which increases my powers of enjoyment. I am happy because God has given me many things to make me happy.

It would be most ungrateful for me to gather the ills of life, to scold and grumble when I have so many blessings to cheer and sustain me. Let me ever remember that each "cloud has a silver lining," and that the "darkest hour is just before day."

I love the fall of the year, with its cool nights and mornings, cheerful fires, and pleasant sun-shiny days; and again I am unromantic enough to confess, that I love the Autumn, because of the wagon loads upon loads of corn, pumpkins and potatoes, that these beautiful days see housed, or rather stored away in the rail-pens about my log-cabin.

Though not very picturesque or fanciful, yet they bespeak solid comforts that are always grateful to the home-loving farmer.

Bro. Gillespie, pumpkin pies, potatoes, and new corn-bread, are all the "go" up here in Arkansas. If you are not too fashionable to relish the above named articles, come up and partake with us. As a further inducement I would hint to you that we do not live entirely on the above farinacious delicacies, but have "plenty" of fat coons and possums, rabbits, squirrels, and venison, not to mention the "small fry," such as wild ducks, fish, butter and egg, and et cetera. Look up editorial and all other cares in your sanctum, and come over and see for yourself how you will like us Arkansas country folks.

"Husband" shoulders the gun and walks off toward the gate; looking back, he sees "wife" at the door, who seems as if she would as lief go to hunting too, as not. "Wife" hears the words, "Do you want to go? well, come along then."—down comes the sun-bonnet, and off she runs to catch up. They walk along conversing gaily, each trying to entertain the other, as in their days of courtship. By the time they had consulted each other's views upon certain contemplated improvements, and the lady had exhausted her vocabulary of panegyries on the beautiful Autumn and her lovely attendant, "Indian Summer," they had arrived at the over-flowed land within the banks of the Bartholomew. Leaving the dusty road, a gorgeous landscape came in view; for near a mile the cool, clear stream of water, like a pale green ribbon, divided the "over-flow"—the tall pecan, hickories, cotton-wood, and gum tree, with their black stems half shorn of their many colored leaves—the great red sun, far to the South, casting long shadows, striped the leaf-covered ground, and wove a carpet of the most brilliant hues for this forest chamber. Walking lightly and quickly over the leaf-carpet, that rustled with a soothing, pleasant sound, they came to the water's edge. About fifty yards up the Bayou three ducks were gracefully swimming along. "Husband," with great strides, soon brought his rifle to bear on the graceful trio. Crack! went the rifle, and up flew the ducks for a more peaceful clime. "Husband" looked around a little abashed at his unsuccess, but as "wife" only gave him a smile that plainly said, "you may have better luck next time," his spirits arose, and they pursued along the bank of the Bayou. The tall tree waved to and fro, and a continuous shower of leaves came down in rustling, eddying currents. "Look," exclaimed "wife," "yonder is the big hawk, which takes my chickens, shoot him, quick!" Too late, the hawk is out of the reach of the ball. No game, not even a pigeon or a black bird to be seen. "The happy pair" retrace their steps. "Husband" gallantly assists "wife" over the brush and other obstructions in the way. For a change "husband" asks "wife" if she wants to shoot at a mark; certainly, as there was no game, she would like to exercise her skill in striking the centre. A large oak leaf is stuck up for a mark. "Wife" takes aim and feels pretty sure of making a "capital shot" and so she would if the ball had only went in the right direction. "Husband," as a gallant gentleman, by all the blame on himself for not loading the rifle aright, and insists on "wife's" trying it again; she agrees, and again the clear, sharp report rings on the air with but little better success. "Wife" now thinks baby must be crying, and they return to their log-cabin, made happier by their simple pleasures. M. A. C.

POWER OF CONSCIENCE.—Among the most striking evidences of the reality of the religious belief of Christian nations, is the fact that government in Christian countries is continually receiving sums of money from unknown individuals, who are driven thus to make restitution, not by the power of the law, or the fear of detection, but solely by the sting of conscience. In the settlement of their taxes, or the payment of duties or of postage, or in some other way, known only to themselves and to God, they have not rendered to the State all the money that was its due. But they have learned to fear a righteous God, who sees in secret and who will judge openly, and they dare not keep the unlawful gain. From a document just published in England by order of Parliament, it appears that the sum thus remitted to the Exchequer as "conscience money," during the last year, was more than $15,000.

LETTERS FROM TEXAS.—No. VI.

I have mentioned having attended service at Rutersville. To "stand where Moses stood," and "view the landscape o'er," would perhaps be the most delightful spectacle that this earth could afford; but it would be because the inner sense would perceive far more than the other. Is not Mount Olivet, with brow entwined with the emblem of peace, more beautiful than other proud eminences in the world which wear more glowing wreaths of oak and laurel? Yes, truly, for the light of the ascension still lingers about its heights, and lingers with a brighter hue, the modest grey foliage of its trees. One may stream flow with the mysterious music of the Jordan, whose tones were caught from the revelations of that Heavenly voice which said, "This is my beloved son, in whom I am well pleased," and whose waters are a constant reminder of the pledge which the Son of God gave for our salvation, when He stood upon its banks and dedicated Himself to that work which we can contemplate only with a hushed awe. Then it caught those strains of hope which it is still singing to the world; and into its waters the long drooping willows are dipping—are dipping, and growing green. Is any garden so fair as that whose flowers were hedewed by the drops of blood which bought the world? Is any valley so lovely as that which bore the impress of those blessed, weary, unresting feet? Is any sheet of water so glorious as that which rocked to rest the Divine form of Him who had not where to lay His head? Is there any spot so dear as the site of that stable where He was born, who had emptied Himself of His glory, and become poor that we through His poverty might be made rich, "who seemed as if He could find no place low enough by which to enter our world" of sin and humiliation? No, there is not in all our earth such a landscape as that viewed from Pisgah; but it is illuminated by the light of Divine love, and seen through our tears of penitence and gratitude.

Throw these associations aside, and it is, perhaps, not more charming than the wide scene that spreads around you, as you stand upon the eminence at Rutersville.—The prairies swell and sink, and look as if the winds might lift them into curling waves or toss them sportfully into the air. The eye rests upon a verdure so fresh and tender that it seems to be some newly created thing; and one might suppose that the eyes of Eve when she first opened them upon our Sinless world might have been satisfied with this vision. Here and there are clumps of live oak, making some little nook "dim with green twilight," and in the distance are herds of sleek, long-horned, spotted cattle, roaming at will. Nothing is wanting to this loveliness, but the glimpse of a sleeping lake or quiet river. It was to me like some great harmony, where there is the mingling of violins and flutes, and in looking upon it my whole being was filled with that ineffable delight which nature awakens when she seems enlarging the soul to take in our coming heaven. The polite and accomplished superintendant of the Military Institute, Col. Forshey, met us with a manner at once courteous and imposing, but bless me! it was impossible to tear the eyes away from the green hills, notwithstanding the Colonel's gloves were particularly white and white gloves always have, to me, a grandeur that is inexpressible. However, we did follow him into the house, and found him kind, attentive and hospitable.—The room was soon filled with a nice, intelligent-looking audience. One person particularly attracted my attention. It was an old gentleman who was assisted into the room during the prayer meeting. He set, with his crutches beside him, leaning back against one side of the fire-place. His frame was tremulous, as if his feet had already been slipped into the chill waters of the Jordan, but his complexion wore the clear hue of youth, and his eye shone with the light, whether of early manhood, or of that eternal youth to which he approaches, I know not. In the interval, between the prayer-meeting and preaching, some one, to my joy, offered to introduce me to him. "Father Haney," they said, and while he kindly expressed his pleasure at meeting me, I felt as if I could have fallen at his feet. There he sat—the laborer in the rough parts of the vineyard, the workman who had not shunned toil, nor hardship, nor danger. "I have worn out my constitution," he said, "and I would wear out fifty more, if I had them, in the same cause." I felt the warm tears coming up into my eyes as he said this. So near home! his tottering feet almost upon the threshhold of our Father's house! how could one but envy him? Not far from him sat his gentle, patient-looking, little wife. I saw her refuse a comfortable seat, and her manner of doing it impressed me with the opinion that she had not fretted much over the little disagreeabilities of life, but had learned, in whatsoever situation she was, therewith to be content." What a pleasant thing it is to sit down for a life long to this feast of a "contented heart." She and her husband had "Climbed life's hill together," and, as she sat there, she seemed to say, as confidingly as ever did John Anderson's wife,

"Now we maun totter down, Jo,
Yet baud in hand we'll go."

The old gentleman made one remark which still lingers about my heart in serious moments. He said:—"Methodism is spreading, and I thank God for it. We are becoming a more cultivated and a better taught people, and that is well. Let us embrace science and knowledge and accomplishments, but let us ever bear with them, a spirit of deep piety. Yes, let the stream widen, but at the same time let it grow deeper and deeper!" May this aspiration of a heart, in which heaven and earth already meet and mingle, be fulfilled!

I had the privilege of partaking of the Lord's Supper with this Father Haney and his wife—may we again partake of it in a place still more beautiful.

After preaching, we took dinner at the hospitable mansion of Bro. Thrall, and spent several hours with his pleasant family, and then we said farewell to this mount of visions.

WHO ARE THE GREAT PREACHERS?

The great preachers of the world have been those who were in direct sympathy with human life, and who had an end to gain with the men before them. But with culture and scholastic habits, men have interpreted the word of God, "Follow me and I will make you fishers of men," to mean, "Follow me and I will make you preachers of sermons." The end of preaching is not a good sermon, but a holy heart. Good sermons have nearly ruined good preaching. If ministers cared more for their people, and less for their own sermons, they would be more useful. Preaching has almost ceased to be a living business, between a man's heart and the wants of his congregation. Learning, rhetoric, eloquence, are good as collateral influences, but no man will win souls who does not feel the throbbing pulse of his whole congregation, who does not know their wants, who does not study their lives, who does not understand how to take the primary truths of Christianity, and apply them to the consciences of men in their daily business life. Such preachers, and only such, will be certainly efficacious, and such preaching is necessary to the filling of our churches. Were such preaching universal in our time, not only would our churches be filled to overflowing, but thousands have to be built. For you may depend upon it, there is never a man who preaches intelligent truth, and preaches it with living, sympathy for men, that people do not flock to hear him. There is nothing that interest men so much as religious truth applied to their real wants in life; and there is nothing that interests them so little as dry homilies, and sermons about theologies.

BEULAH.

It is like a memory of first love to glance at such a book as this. A page at random, any where, is enough to show that it is a very unlike the flood of fictions, on the tide of which it is set afloat. A professional book reader, if he have sympathy and geniality, is apt to surrender himself to the luxury of a genuine and heart-wrought work, and waive his prerogative of criticism, for his own indulgence and delight. We think he earns a title to this once in a while—the occasions are rare enough.

"Beulah" is the work of a self-educated and independent mind; and not being formed upon any model is an original and characteristic book, having a definite purpose, an earnest tone, and a soul of vitality and vigor. While it is the only American novel written by a woman which deserves to take rank with Jane Eyre and Adam Bede, it owes nothing to these works or their class, and does not remind us of them, except by the common traits of woman's mind, which, let us thank God, in the words of Coleridge, is, in spite of metaphysics and hard experience, "generally over ears in her heart."

Augusta J. Evans, whose proper name stands with simple dignity upon the title page, is a young lady of Alabama. We venture to say that this straightforwardness is in keeping with the sincere and truth-loving character which must belong to the writer of this crystal book. And it cannot be that she has not drawn, though in a measure unconsciously, a picture of her own spiritual struggles in the intensely interesting experience of her heroine. Such processes, such conflicts, such journeyings through quicksands, tangled swamps, and bottomless morasses, to regions of rockribbed ice and polar snows, have never been imagined by any human soul. It is as impossible as that any unaided human soul can reach the remedy, or grasp the resources which can lift it away from the winter-locked land of endless night, and place it upon the "Rock of Ages."

"Beulah" is the name of an orphan, and the book is the history of the first four and twenty years of her life. So poor as to be placed in an asylum at an early age, there the story begins. But God has given this girl a great gift of introspection, an intense subjectivity. From her earliest years it was a necessity to her to consider and understand herself. Her hard and lowly lot, and the unequal distributions of fortune which she could not but but observe, while they strengthened this craving of her nature, heavily obstructed its pursuit. At the same time, an unattractive person subjected her to continually recurring mortifications, and much embittered her heart. Through various vicissitudes she passed, more and more, in them, turned inward, taking her own counsel, and relying upon her proper resources. As she advanced in years, she sought in books of philosophy a solution of the spiritual problems which weighed upon her, and for which she had no living teacher. She trod paths over which few women have toiled, through the mazes of metaphysics. But a love of truth guided her, and a courageous and virtuous heart sustained her. Above all, God, who is infinitely solicitous for every true heart, had his eye upon her. The steps by which she was at length led to him are clearly indicated; a woman's tenderest heart and strongest mind working together toward the clear region of Christian faith and human trust.

It is no new thing for a woman to touch the sympathies of the other sex. If she is a true woman and he a true man, it is inevitable. It would not be surprising, then, if this book had power to move the heart. But it is rarely given to a woman to be, at the same time, the instructor of men in the abstract philosophies of the mind. To very few women does it become a necessity to explore this dark labyrinth. "Beulah," with all its tender attractions as a heart-work, will be the means of spiritual peace to many a man whose soul is rocked with religious doubts, and taken in the meshes of philosophy, where he struggles as a bird in a net. This is its vocation in the world in which it is sent forth.

"Beulah" cannot be termed "light reading" in the ordinary sense of these words. Those who love to sigh over delicate sentimentalities will think this book too rude and hearty for them; to relish it truly one must be conscious of an immortal soul and of its yearnings and longings. Yet we venture to promise that an earnest, healthful mind will find food in it, ministering to purity and strength, and that kind of "gentleness which makes men great."

It is not to be supposed that this early production of so young a writer is faultless. There are deficiencies, especially, in the style, of which we dare say the writer is abundantly conscious, and which she will correct. But we prefer to praise it because we enjoy it, and believe it calculated to do good; which is, or should be, the chief ambition of every author. We characterize it as loyal to nature and purity, earnest and inspiring; teaching honesty and self-reliance; leading to a pure religious faith; having a high ideal of manhood and womanhood; careless of precedent in book-craft; fresh, American, and unhackneyed to an exquisite degree.

Will the gifted young writer accept a fraternal caution, and while she by no means determines to be forever silent, pause, and be in no haste to issue another publication? It is because this is so good that we say so; for we are truly interested in a career so well begun.—N. Y. Chronicle.

SOUL-POWER.

We commend the following excellent article from the New York Chronicle, to all who have souls—no others can appreciate its worth:

Intellect quickened and directed by the religious sentiments realizes our highest conceptions of the human capabilities. Simple intellect with no such control from the religious sentiments, is capable of extensive attainments in science and in knowledge. The labors of Euclid and of Sir Isaac Newton in the mathematics, give us an extraordinary idea of mental powers.

But still, it is impossible to feel in the presence of such an intellect the same sense of secret might, as in the presence of a soul under the inspirations of the Almighty. What is a priest of science or of nature compared to a priest of God? What is Solon to Moses or Socrates to Isaiah? What is Pindar to David, or Epictetus to Solomon? The more the spiritual and heavenly element enters into a man's character, the more influence, other things being equal, he exerts upon human society. Thus our Savior, though He had few of those advantages for intellectual training, which we deem necessary to mental power, though His career on earth was a short one, and He left behind Him no written book or sentence, yet the moral and spiritual wrought in Him so powerfully as to make Him the emanating source of a stronger and more wide-spread influence than that of any other who ever lived among men. "I have known men," said Bonaparte, "I have seen what they can do, and I know that no mere man could have accomplished the work that Jesus Christ did." This was soul power in its highest perfection. "He had the Spirit without measure."

Just in proportion as we drink in the same Spirit, we shall be exalted in the scale of influence and usefulness. "The water that I give unto you, shall be in you a well of water springing up to everlasting life." His Spirit within is like a living spring on an elevated summit from which streams flow in every direction, carrying as they go beauty and fertility with them. Think of these streams issuing from such a character as John Howard or Robert Raikes. Millions of prisoners and of neglected children, feel the genial influence.—Think of the vast work wrought by Whitefield, by Wesley, by Carey and many others, the secret of whose success was manifestly in no extraordinary grasp of intellect, but in the quickkindling and animating force of spiritual and heavenly sentiments.

Passion for a thing is a wonderful quickener of the faculties in the ordinary affairs of life. The love of hoarding makes acute business men of some who have but a low order of intellectual power. Men of small minds are sometimes keen at bargain, and can see farther into the money mill-stone than the most gifted intellects who have no such hoarding propensity to quicken them. Daniel Webster in the power of money-making had a lower grade of talent than some of our scavengers and market women. Solomon says, "riches are not to men of understanding." The peculiar success of money-making which some of very ordinary abilities have, shows how much our power in every thing to which we put our hands, depends upon the heart or the soul which it enlists.

As a small body in rapid motion may do great execution, so little men, when impelled by passion, have sometimes very great power. Their scent is as keen as a terrier's, and their vision, like that of certain animals, is the more penetrating for the smallness of their visual organs.

It is the feeling or sentimental part of our nature that sets us in motion and that gives us power. And no sentiments have so much efficiency with us as those of religion, of God and immortality. No others have exerted a wider influence in the history of mankind. No others have more effectually subdued the ordinary impulses of our nature. What sacrifices; what sufferings, what dangers, what achievements have we sometimes witnessed, as the result of yielding oneself to an overmastering religious sentiment. The records of the inquisition and of martyrdoms in general, show how much men have been willing to endure for the sake of maintaining the faith of the saints or the heart's most cherished convictions. The soul is an invincible agency. Bodily sufferings cannot subdue its impulses. Chains and prisons cannot restrain them. The fires of the stake may kill the life of the body, but the soul stands forth in its integrity to assert its unconquered might and majesty.

A BEAUTIFUL THOUGHT.

The following is the closing paragraph of an interesting and able address delivered by Rev. H. B. Allen at the consecration of the Waterside Cemetery in Marblehead, Oct. 16, 1859. After recommending that the inscription "I am the Resurrection and the Life" be placed upon the door posts, he says:—

Let this be done, and in few years this will become a novel and oft frequent resort, where lessons of wisdom and piety may be learned, inspirations from the eternal world may be caught; and the heart may be saddened and made the better. What a stand-point in this from which to view the vanity of the world; the evanescence of all human glory. Here is the last end of man and the living will lay it to heart. And while the feet of filial affection pay their wonted visit to a mother's grave, or those of maternal love to the little mound where sleeps the first born; or other friends like Mary come to weep at the grave of buried love, and strew it with flowers and plant the rose to bloom there; oh, how will their faith in the certain resurrection of the sleepers here be quickened, as their eye shall rest upon that declaration of Him who conquered death and triumphed over the tomb, which we hope will grace the portals of this house of the dead. And as they walk through these avenues "beneath the rugged elms, the yew tree's shade," and behold the putting forth of the foliage, and the upspringing of the grass and the flowers after winter's death; and see all nature which had wrapped herself in the winter snows as her whpling sheet, laying aside her funeral robe, and springing in fresh and beautiful life from the grave; they will rejoice to see through the great fact of the resurrection revealed by God, analogies in these revivifications of nature, of the great and heart-cheering truth, which all the wisdom of the world has ever failed without that revelation, to reach in the same things. So that now the heart of such pious wanderer here, could not only sing, "O death! where is thy sting? O grave! where is thy victory?" but can sing also, as spring revives and nature smiles:—

Shall I be left abandoned in the dust,
When fate, relenting, lets the flower revive?
Shall nature's voice to man alone adjust,
Deny Him, doomed to perish, hope to live?
Is it for this fair virtue oft must strive
With disappointment, penury and pain?
No; heaven's immortal spring shall yet arrive,
And man's imposite beauty bloom again,
Bright through the eternal year of love's triumphant reign.

BIBLICAL HISTORY.

The Princeton Review, in noticing "Neil's Lecture on Biblical History," recently published, brings out the following results from several historical tables, showing how the longevity of the antediluvians supplied the want of historical records. A skeptical objection arises from the idea that the story must have passed through many narrations, and that few opportunities of comparing and correcting one account by another were enjoyed. Look at the table as illustrating these points. And, first, the number of times the story must be repeated by different persons. Noah and his three sons could receive the account of the creation at the second rehearsal, and through several distinct channels:

1. Adam could relate unto Enos for six hundred and ninety-five years, and Enos to Noah eighty-four years.

2. Adam during six hundred and five years could discourse it to Cainan, and Cainan could discourse it one hundred and seventy-nine years to Noah.

3. Adam could rehearse it for five hundred and thirty-five years to Mahalaleel, who had two hundred and twenty-four years to intrust it to Noah.

4. Adam had four hundred and seventy years to instruct Jared in these sublime facts, and Jared was cotemporary three hundred and sixty-six years with Noah.

Through these four distinct channels Noah could receive a distinct account from Adam.

5. Adam lived till Methuselah was two hundred and forty-three years old, time enough to obtain an accurate knowledge of all the facts pertaining to the dawn of created existence: and Methuselah lived six hundred years with Noah, and one hundred with his three sons.

And once more: 6. Adam lived to see Lamech, the father of Noah, till he was fifty years old, and Lamech lived with Noah five hundred and ninety-five years, with Shem, Ham, and Japhet. Through these six channels the account could be brought to the time of the flood.

All the generations from Adam to the flood were 11. Of all these Adam was cotemporary with 9, Seth 9, Enos 10, Cainan 10, Enoch 9, Methuselah 11, Lamech 11, Shem and brothers 4.

Thus there were never less than nine cotemporary generations from Adam to the flood; which would give us one lineal descent eighty-one channels through which the account might be transmitted.

WHAT AMUSEMENTS ARE SINFUL.

In deciding what amusements are lawful and what are sinful, we may apply a few general principles. Thus:

First. Every amusement is sinful which tends to the injury of the health and the physical constitution. God requires that even the body should be presented a living sacrifice in his service; and when, for the sake of momentary enjoyment, the physical system is deranged or weakened, God is robbed of what is rightfully his. Men shudder at the thought of the untimely death of those who, in a moment of insanity, or impelled by remorse of conscience have put an end to their earthly existence; and unless we have satisfactory evidence that they were insane, we have reason to tremble in view of their sins. But why is it any more self-murder to apply the halter or the knife, and thus end one's days, than to do the same thing by a round of dissipation or amusement. But,

Secondly. Every amusement is sinful which tends to weaken or destroy the intellectual powers. Man is distinguished from the lower order of created beings by the possession of the reasoning faculties. These are given to him for some good and noble purposes. If he pursues a course of conduct, or indulges in such amusements, as may disqualify him to exert these faculties for good, he sins against his own soul and against God. The youth who spends his time in storing his mind with vain and idle stories, or in reading novels or romances, is an instance in which this is effectually done.

Thirdly. Those amusements are sinful which have a tendency to dissipate from the mind sober, serious reflection. Man is living for eternity. It should be his great object to prepare him for that world to which he is hastening, and which will be pleasing to his heavenly Father and Judge. As a creature of God, he is bound to do whatever he does to the glory of God. Can there be any question, then, whether those amusements are sinful which are inconsistent with religion, or which inevitably draw the mind from those things that concerns the interests of the soul, and drive away the spirit of God?

RESIST BEGINNINGS.

The trees of the forest held a solemn parliament, wherein they consulted of the innumerable wrongs which the axe had done them; therefore they enacted that no tree should hereafter lend the axe wood for a handle, 'on pain of being cut down.' The axe travels up and down the forest, begs wood of the cedar, oak, ash, elm, even to the poplar; not one would lend him a chip. At last he desired so much as would serve him to cut down the briars and bushes, alleging that those shrubs did suck away the juice of the ground, hinder the growth, and obscure the glory of the fair and goodly trees. Hereon they were content to afford him so much. When he had gotten his handle, he cut down themselves also. These be the subtle reaches of sin; give it but a little advantage on the fair promise to remove thy troubles, and it will cut down thy soul also. Therefore resist beginnings; trust it not in the least. Consider a sin (as indeed it is) a crucifying of Christ; wilt thou say, I may crucify Christ a little? I may scourge his flesh, wound his side, pierce his heart a little. What man loves the Lord Jesus who would either say it or do it? Consider thy falling into sin, a harling of thyself down from some high pinnacle; wilt thou say, I may break my neck a little? Consider it a casting thyself into unquenchable fire; wilt thou say, I may burn my soul and body a little? As suffering we think the least misery too great, so sinning let up think the least iniquity too great.—Thomas Adams.

MATERIALS FOR HISTORY.

Hardly any great history has yet been composed, which has not been impeached almost as soon as written. Bancroft, Motley and Palfrey may prove to be exceptions; but without naming writers of former periods, we have just seen Prescott assailed before the grave had closed over him; Macaulay is denounced by Prof. Aytoun as "the most unscrupulous" of historians;—and, who would pin his faith upon Alison? Often with the most honest intention and the most laborious research on the part of the historian, his work falls in method, clearness, accuracy, or value, for lack of materials which have been heedlessly suffered to pass into oblivion. Few men or generations seem to be conscious that they are acting in their time, what future generations will seek to preserve as history. The Pilgrim Fathers, the leaders in the exodus of Religious Freedom, were gifted with that prophetic insight which faith in great principles is so apt to inspire, and they continually appealed to coming generations, and laid foundations for posterity. Hence before the first generation had passed away, pains were taken to reduce to an authentic narrative the principal events of the early settlement. But as the novelty of emigration wore away, and the perils of the wilderness grew familiar, and emigrants and colonies came over from mixed motives, and adventure and commerce began to dispute precedence with religious principle and the love of freedom, less importance attached to new settlements, and less care was had in making and preserving their records. Much that would have been of value to the historian, as tending to illustrate society, has perished through the careless destruction of documents, or with the unwritten traditions of the elders. Much, however, remains, which can be recovered by diligence, patience, and fidelity; and we rejoice that the historical spirit is thoroughly awakened, and that every fit occasion is seized upon to bring to light the names and deeds of the Past.

DEVIL'S RIVER.

After a run of two or three hours over a delightful road we found ourselves suddenly descending a canon in the mountains of the San Pedro or Devil's river. This is a very narrow gorge, and doubles some very sharp points—the high walls, almost perpendicular, loomed up on either side and threw out a deep, dark shadow, and, as you go down, down—the air gets damper and cooler, and you begin to think of tunnels and vaults and subterranean dungeons, and presently the roar of water breaks upon the ear, and then, suddenly, right at your feet, there rolls the brightest streams of pure rushing water, pouring over the ledges of its rocky bed, as if dancing in gladness to the sound of its own music.

At the point of crossing, the river is wide—the bottom a solid limestone rock—the banks fringed with green; the mountains, of fantastic shape, some looking like huge tumuli—the graves of the sons of Anak; others like temples in ruin; others, like the columnar memorials of past history; and, here and there a vast pile of boulders and fragmentary rocks—victims of some old earthquake—foot-prints of a geological upheaval (post-Adamite, I trow); here, too, are glens and gorges, cloud-capped towers, and humble nooks; caves of darkness and vistas of beauty; the lonely river, with its flashing waters, leaping and laughing as a child in its frolic; and, as it sweeps along to the base of some hoary rock, huge and high, pausing in its stillness—arrested, dumb, like the same child in the presence of wisdom and years. The impression is sublime, thrilling, religious. You feel like praising the God who made it. I felt, if I had such a retreat for daily prayer, I would be a better man. It humbles, exalts, awes, subdues, exhilirates. The vision is worth far more than all the toil and money it would cost to reach it—even though you came from Aroostook or the Capes of Florida. The Spanish fathers called the river San Pedro, (St. Peter) after the Apostle. Fit names, for the hills and rocks, and the waters preach adoration of God. What a barbarism!—almost a profanity—to call it Devil's River! Alas, we Americans are a practical, not an æsthetic people.—Bishop Pierce's Letters.

GETTING RELIGION—GETTING UP A REVIVAL.

It is written: "I will turn to the people a pure language," etc.

On this text Bishop Morris very justly remarks, in applying it to our day, that some forms of expression habitually used in what are alleged to be evangelical Churches, are not according to a "pure language." Among these he mentions those at the head of the article, "Getting religion," etc. He objects to this phrase, for the reason that religion is a comprehensive term, which implies all that a Christian should believe, experience, and practice through life, and is therefore not to be gotten at any one time, unless we could admit the erroneous doctrine that one act of grace in the hour of conversion saves us from all sin, future as well as past, and unconditionally secures heaven. It is more proper to say justified, converted, or born again, which expresses only one material part in the great work of experimental religion, and leaves room for a growth in grace.

"Getting up a revival," he adds, is a phrase highly objectionable, calculated to mislead the minds of many, as though we could originate a work of mercy. A revival is a work of grace, in the progress of which sinners are awakened, penitent seekers converted, ministers are clothed with salvation, and the saints shout for joy, under the overwhelming of the Holy Spirit. Such a work is not gotten up; it comes down from heaven. All the ingenuity and power of man can never convert one soul; it requires the same power to convert a sinner that was employed to create a world. We should pray for a revival to come down among us continually."

THE LOVING-KINDNESS OF GOD.

The loving-kindness of God! what a beautiful expression! How rich and consoling the thought contained in it! It is not mere good-will, nor mere complacent friendship, nor the mere neighborly kindness of human beings, although these are of high and precious account; it is the good-will, the friendship, the kindness of love—of the love of God, who is love itself. We know something of the loving-kindness of father and mother. We have been gently tended and nursed by this kindness; or parents ourselves, we know full well the throbbing of parental affection. Deep, earnest, self-sacrificing is human love in many tender relations. We trust in it fervently, and without fear. O! if there were human love in which we could trust, what a desolate place would this world be! But the loving-kindness of God, of that great incomprehensible being who fills the universe with his presence, and before whose majesty the pillars of heaven tremble—what a loving-kindness that must be! the kindness of infinite love wedded with infinite power? There is nothing that love can conceive of, or wish to do for its object, but is contained here, and rendered not only possible but absolutely certain.

A GOOD PASTOR.

The true emblems of a good minister are, a shepherd at the head of his flock, and a parent at the head of his family. The shepherd has an equal regard for all the flock, for the lambs as for the sheep; he seeks the wandering; he applies the remedies to the diseased; he gathers the lambs with his arms; he collects them into the fold at night, and counts them as they enter; so that none may be left without; and he leads them forth in the morning into the green pastures and beside the still waters. His care and watchfulness descends to all the flock.

And so the father of a family exercises special care over every member of it, and seeks, with equal care and diligence, the best good of them all. He exercises a general care over all, and a special care of each. So that a good minister should care for his people as a shepherd cares for his sheep—as a father c

New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Terms—$2 00 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1859.

ACCOUNTS—NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

All parties interested in the Advocate—Editor, Preachers, and Subscribers—are interested in avoiding confusion in accounts.

Those well acquainted with the credit system in the newspaper business know full well that, under that system, confusion in accounts never can, never will, never can be avoided.—Uncertain mails, unavoidable oversights in agents or clerks, forgetfulness in subscribers and others, and the wearying, vexatious details of this business over all others, render it impossible. We have tried, for years, and know.

To have the subscription begin and end with the year, and to pay, if not in advance, at least once a year, is the nearest approach to a remedy that we can devise,—and this is our

IMMEDIATELY after the Conferences, all the accounts will be made out to January, 1861, without reference to time of commencement, or time last paid to; and they will be sent to each subscriber who has not paid to January, 1861.

If all our subscribers and agents will patiently co-operate with us, this difficulty about accounts will be forever settled during the coming year. After that, when January, 1861, comes, $2 more will be due, and so on.

WILL our brethren and friends, when they receive these accounts, immediately remit the money to the office, or pay to the preacher, taking a receipt? If any think the account incorrect, let him inform us, pleasantly, without quarreling. We never quarrel, though we have more cause than others.

THE volume of the Advocate will hereafter begin and end with the year; and it is very desirable that subscriptions should conform to the same rule.

THEREFORE, new subscribers, who do not begin with the year, will please send, not two dollars, but an amount sufficient to pay for the paper till the end of the year, at the rate of FOUR CENTS A WEEK.

THEN, every subscriber will know, without being informed, that at the beginning of the year is the time to remit the subscription money.

AND let us have scores, hundreds, thousands of new subscribers with which to begin the New Volume, January 1st, 1860.—We intend, if Providence smile on us, to make it a better paper next year than ever before. Arrangements are made, and being made, for greatly increasing its attractions.—Some new writers, of the first order, will begin with the year. The paper is flatteringly approved now—we intend to merit higher approbation.

VIRGINIA CONFERENCE.

The Richmond Advocate contains the proceedings of the last three days. Dr. Rossa in giving a summary of the Conference doings, says:

The Conference adopted new and important measures on the subject of Sunday Schools and Education, the reports on which we shall publish next week, and these subjects we shall from time to time present to the consideration of our readers. A gratifying report of the young and accomplished Agent of our Depository was presented; and we hope the fiscal condition of the Advocate also has excited some hope throughout our bounds. The statistical reports of increase in the membership of the Church are very encouraging. Taking this increased strength as a basis of hope, why may not the coming year be far more abundant in spiritual fruits than the past? On the subject of Missions we might say much, though the aggregate amount reported is creditable—and yet, from the large amount contributed by a few stations and circuits, it is evident that fifty thousand dollars might have been obtained from the entire Conference. We offer the motion, that this amount be raised the current year, especially as we owe everything to God, and life is so short, and we have done so little heretofore for the noble cause, and several new missionary fields have been formed in our Conference.

We regret that the Conference Treasurer was able to report no larger dividend on the Conference Collection. This is sad. Dollar for dollar, and nothing less, should have been the announcement. It is enough to make our cheek burn with shame. There is no apology for this neglect. What insensibility! what ingratitude! A voice comes from the graves of the pious dead that should pierce our souls through and through.—There is not a nobler or more honorable debt than that which the Conference collection is designed to pay; alas, that the sense of obligation is so feeble! God may forgive us, but how can we forgive ourselves? Let us do better.

The three principle measures adopted by the Conference for the promotion of religion and education were the formation of a Conference Sunday School Society, a plan to endow a Biblical School in Randolph Macon College, and a Plan of Lay Co-Operation. To the last it is proper that we allude.

It is a better plan than that adopted by the preceding Conference, which was objectionable on the grounds, that it was unusual for any other than a legislative body to resolve itself into a committee of the whole—improper for a committee of the whole to be composed of any other elements than those contained in the original body—and unusual for the chairman of the committee of the whole to be appointed by any other than the President of the original body—all sound and valid reasons. The plan was therefore abandoned, and the one found to-day among the published proceedings, adopted. The adoption, we believe, was unanimous. It will be seen by reference to the plan, that the lay members are to be elected by the District Stewards' Meeting; one for the Committee on our Publishing Interest, who, with the one heretofore provided for on the Finance Committee, will give to each district three representatives. It was wise to fix the election at so early a period of the year: those elected will have the more time to give special attention to the great objects and interests contemplated We hope the laity will not decline the co-operation proposed, and that they will select able and suitable men to aid us in our deliberations and proceedings. We pledge for them a hearty welcome, and anticipate great advantage from their counsel and influence.

For the benefit of reference, we make the following synopsis of the proceedings.

Twenty young men were admitted on trial, raising the number in the Conference to about 200. The increase in the membership of the Church during the year, is 2000. The amount collected for Missions, $21,822 25. The dividend of the Conference Collection, 66 3-8 cents to the dollar. Amount raised for Randolph Macon College since last session, $6600 in bonds, and collected on subscriptions $30,500. Subscriptions obtained during the past year for the Wesleyan Female College, $7500, and collected for the same purpose $383 63. Amount of subscriptions to the Book and Tract Society of the Conference, $65,800; collected and paid into the treasury, $6236. Amount subscribed at Conference to the Young Men's Aid Society, about $700; to the Preachers' Daughters' Aid Society, $300. The Conference formed a Conference Sunday-school Society, adopted a constitution, and elected officers. The Conference passed resolutions approving the establishment of a school of Biblical Literature in Randolph Macon College, and the raising for it an endowment fund of $25,000. A new Plan of Lay Co-Operation was adopted. The Washington City Church received the cordial attention of the Conference. The month of May was designated as the time to take up Missionary collections, and the 1st Friday in April set apart as a day of fasting and prayer for the general prosperity of the Church. Resolutions commendatory of the Seamen's cause were passed. The next Conference will be held in Alexandria.

The following is the plan of lay co-operation adopted:

The session of the Virginia Conference of 1859 adopted a plan of lay Co-operation which the presiding officer of this Conference could not sanction with his views of the laws of the Church; and whereas the objects of that plan may be accomplished in a form less objectionable, if not, indeed, more desirable in itself. Therefore,

I. Resolved, That the following plan of "Lay Co-operation" in addition to that of the "Joint Board of Stewards" be, and the same is hereby adopted, in lieu of the plan adopted by this Conference at its last annual session, namely:

1. There shall be a joint committee of clerical and lay members, on the subject of the educational interests of our Church, within the bounds of this Conference, and a similar committee on the subject of our Publishing interests.

2. The Conference members of these committees shall be appointed by the President of the Conference, or by nomination and election, as the Conference may direct. They shall hold their office until the close of the ensuing annual session of the Conference. Their number shall be equal to the number of lay members hereafter provided for.

3. The lay members of each of these committees, shall be elected by the District Stewards' meeting assembled to estimate and apportion the claims of the Presiding Elders. They are requested to appoint one layman and an alternate residing within the bounds of the District they represented for the Committee on Education, and one and an alternate for the Committee on our Publishing interests. They should be elected without reference to any official station they may occupy in the Church, but with special regard to their capability to serve the objects of their appointment, and their willingness to engage in the duties thereof.

These committees, thus constituted, shall consider and report to the Conference, on all matters referred to them by the Conference.

5. The lay members of each of these committees shall hold the same relation to the Conference during its sessions, and have the same privileges of speaking and voting in the Conference, as are provided for in our long established "fiscal plan" for the Lay Stewards of the "Joint Board of Finance."

6. The District Stewards' meeting electing their committeemen, are requested to provide for the travelling expenses to and from Conference, of the members elect, in all cases in which they find it necessary to do so, in order to secure attendance.

II. Resolved, That all former action upon this subject by this Conference, be, and is hereby rescinded.

DR. DUFF.

THE Rev. Mr. Banme, a Methodist missionary in India, in a letter to the Northwestern Christian Advocate, thus speaks of an interview with the beloved and apostollo Dr. Duff.

July 25th.—Having previously called on Dr. Duff, I accepted his cordial invitation to take breakfast at his house, accompanied by Mrs. Banme. The doctor seems much worn from his excessive labours. He maintains, however, a genial spirit, a glow of energy that seems to defy both age and toil, and a heart richly mellowed by the grace of God. Thirty years of his active life have been consecrated to the evangelization of India, and though he may pass away before "the truth as it is in Jesus" achieves that conquest to which it is infallibly destined, he will have done much to secure such a triumph in the steady prosecution of his chosen work—the religious training of youth, and the raising up of a native agency—that is, ministers and catechists, to take the lead in the conversion of India. It can hardly be said, however, that the results, so far, justify such a conclusion, or that such an agency, on any scale commensurate with the wants of the country, can be created at an earlier day; it will be—if possible—a work of time, perhaps of generations.

Dr. Duff is not weary in well-doing; he has too deep an acquaintance with man's sinful nature, too profound and far-reaching views of the plans of God, too much love for souls—even the souls of the heathen—for whom Christ died, and too much faith in the word of God, to be discouraged in the absence of that immediate fruit which his ardent soul would desire to see. He can work and wait if needs be. He can work for all time, and all the generations of the future, if it must be; but he cannot give up an idea that is incorporated into his being—that has become part of himself, and is bound up with his life. I declare, reader, I could all but worship such a being, human and frail though he be. There is a grandeur about such a purpose and such a faith that defies estimate. To me it approaches the nearest to the proper counterpart of God's own calm, all knowing, all-comprehensive, and invisible purpose.

It is not intended, in these remarks, to undervalue the fruit already reaped by the doctor and the Church he represents, in this department of missionary effort. It is not intended to say that the schools established in Madras and Calcutta by the Free Church for this avowed purpose, have not been a success. In its measure, success has been realized, and of the most satisfactory character. Native ministers and catechists are now in the field, the fruit of these schools, doing a noble work. And what shall we say of the multitude of youth, of both sexes, that leave these schools annually, or within the period of a few years? Can they be heathen? Can they continue in the stolid ignorance of their fathers? Impossible; they at least are enlightened, though they are not converted; but the seed of the kingdom has been sown; they are prepared for the showers of divine influence which God may soon be pleased to send down upon this land.

How cheering the fact that more than twelve hundred youth are here receiving an elementary education, not for this life alone, but above and beyond all, for the life to come! And if I am able to form a correct estimate of the system of instruction, both secular and religious, here prosecuted, I should pronounce it amply liberal.

I took leave of Dr. Duff profoundly impressed with his simple greatness, and his absorbing devotion to the establishment of Christ's kingdom in India, toward which no man of his generation will contribute more effectually. Asking me some questions about the American revival, and commenting on its general character, "Ah," said he, "brother, that is what we want in India; the ground is parched—yes, parched; you know what that means," his eyes filling with tears and sparkling with hope while he continued the conversation. Blessed man! I could not resist the impression that I was standing in his presence for the last time on earth—that his work will soon be done, though the work of his life will outlive the Himalayas, and be more apparent in coming generations than in his own.

Noble, apostolic man; few and far between are thy compeers on earth! When the chariot of Israel is dispatched to bear thee hence to thy consummated triumphs and rewards, may thy descending mantle fall on a multitude of thy sons in the gospel!

JEWS OPPOSING THE BIBLE.—An address has been issued by a Mynheer Frank, in one of the New York papers, calling upon the Jewish people to protest against the reading of the Bible in the public schools. It is objected that the New Testament instead of the Old is used, and that the Bible, except some few passages, such as "Love your neighbor," etc., is not a proper book for the schools. If the Board of Education persist in demanding that the Bible shall be read in the schools, the address advises measures to be taken on the part of israelitish parents to secure to their children a different education from that provided in the public schools as they now exist.

DEBT.—He that hath an hundred and one and owes an hundred and two, the Lord have mercy upon him!

REV. H. GRATTAN GUINNESS.

We find the following portraiture of this distinguished young minister of the Gospel in the Presbyterian:—Many of our readers are familiar with the name of Rev. Henry Grattan Guinness, having so often seen it recently in connection with evangelistic labors in Great Britain and Ireland. We are gratified to state that he has now come to America, and is at present in Philadelphia. On Saturday afternoon last he preached his first sermon this side the Atlantic, in Jayne's Hall, and though but half a day's notice had been given, a large congregation was in attendance. A preparatory prayer-meeting, conducted by the Rev. John Chambers, was held at half-past three o'clock, and Mr. Guinness entered at four o'clock, and after a brief prayer commenced his sermon. He is a very young man, being only twenty-four years old; his figure is rather slender, his complexion delicate, his hair dark and thick, and his expression of countenance indicative of goodness. His voice is an uncommonly fine one, deep, rich, flexible and well-toned. Judging from his first discourse, and one other which we have heard from him, we should conclude that he is more remarkable for gospel fervor than for brilliancy or intellectual power His method is simple, his matter thoroughly evangelical his doctrine Calvinistic, his diction easy, flowing, and well chosen, and at times rising into very considerable beauty. His Saturday's discourse was from Eph. iii, 19, and his subject the Divine love, its cause, depth, tenderness, Immutability and duration. He occupied three different pulpits on the Sabbath, and has preached every evening since. After spending a short time in Philadelphia, he expects to visit New York, and thence to go West or South, and before returning home will probably go to California, Australia, the East Indies, and thus complete the circle of the globe.

Mr. Guinness was born in Dublin, his father being an officer in the army, and his mother the widow of the Captain D'Estere who was killed in a duel by Daniel O'Connell. It was at one time his intention to become a foreign missionary, but having abandoned that idea, he determined to devote himself to the work of an evangelist, and for the last four years he has labored in that capacity, wherever Providence has opened the way, preaching in all parts of Ireland, Scotland, and Wales, and at many points in England. He has been every where favorably received, and the blessing of God has attend his preaching. He was set apart for the ministry in Whitefield's chapel in London, to which congregation he also received a call. As many of our readers in various parts of the country will have the opportunity of hearing Mr. Guinness, we have thought that these items of his history might not be unacceptable. He comes not to collect money, but simply to deliver his Master's message. If he should not be regarded as a brilliant pulpit orator, we are sure he will be accepted as an interesting and impressive preacher and a very lovely man.

THE TREES OF NORTH AMERICA.

Although it is generally conceded that the arboreous luxuriance of this continent is perhaps unparalleled, and although several works treating of the sylva of various portions of North America have been published, there has been no short, concise statement of the number of species and locality of the different trees in this part of the world, until the Smithsonian Institute, in pursuance of their purpose of illustrating, in connection with the meteorological observations now in progress under the direction of this Institution and the Patent Office, the estimate of North America, engaged Dr. J. G. Cooper to prepare an article upon the sylva of this continent. From this document, published in pamphlet form by the Smithsonian Institute, we glean some interesting facts.

There are no less than one hundred and thirty-four different species of tree on the continent of North America, including a vast variety, from the rich tropical sylvan products of the Mexican districts to the stunted pines that pass their unseen sturdy lives among the snows of Labrador. The tallest trees are found in California, where is the giant redwood—the Sequoia gigantea of Torry, or the Wellingtonia gigantea of Hooker—which attains the prodigious height of four hundred and fifty feet from the ground, about half as high again as Trinity Church steeple. The yellow fir, or Abies grondis, which grows in Oregon, is also a very respectable tree, often reaching the height of two hundred and fifty feet. In Massachusetts they have the white-wood poplar, of one hundred and forty feet in height, and the same State also possesses a Zanthoxylum Americanum, which is more familiarly known as the toothache tree. In New Jersey there may be found a species of white beach one hundred and twenty feet high. After these it is quite a contrast to descend to a prickly pear tree of Mexico, which though rejoicing in the gorgeous title of Opuntia Athuothocarpa, is but six feet high. The Prunus Subcordato, a kind of plum tree, is another sylvan dwarf, and the Juniperus Pochypoloeo is also an arboreous pigmy, neither of those Mexican trees being over ten feet in height.

The Gulf of Mexico has an important effect upon forest growth in the United States. It is from the Gulf that many rain storms proceed, and they are blown easterly by westerly winds until they fall generally before reaching the Ohio. Thus, as they do not reach the Illinois region, that district is deprived of its fair share of rain. Without moisture there can be no trees, and that is the reason that Illinois and Michigan abound in treeless prairies that are not to be found in places where the rain storms from the Gulf fall. In Texas, where these Gulf storms do not travel, the moisture, and consequent vegetation, and sylva grow less and less as we proceed westward, until we come into the great deserts that exist in the Dacotah regions.

Dr. Cooper, in order to further explain his remarks on North American trees, has prepared a map of this continent, which he divides into arbitrary districts. The first of these districts or regions, the Algonquin, includes the eastern part of British America, Labrador, &c., and contains five species of trees. We live in the Canadian region, which possesses seventeen characteristic and one peculiar species of trees. The Tennessean district is the richest in sylvan treasures, possessing thirty-four characteristic, and seven peculiar species, while the Mississippian and Floridian regions are not far behind, each containing thirty-two characteristic, and the latter seventeen peculiar species.—New York Post.

A PREACHER'S WAY TO THE GREATEST USEFULNESS.

In Morphy's oversight of a chess-board, or Napoleon's oversight of Solferino, the secret of success has been a wide comprehension, not a view of here and there a point, with two or three antagonisms, or mutual dependences, but of a multiform range of means with complexness of details toward one end. A balloon observation was desirable preparatory to a great battle. If, as ministers, we would accomplish something momentous, let us by abstraction and introversion get the fullest view possible of our powers for usefulness and of the fields for their operation. As we move in places of clerical battle, let us not heedlessly or stumblingly get into some treadmill, some unenlarging routine for our precious days. If we walk aright and our eyes open, each ascending step will enable us to look farther and plan wider for the Divine glory in the salvation of souls. Let us test ourselves. Do we find daily a favorable varying, a change by growth, not a monotonous stand-still, or, worse, an unfavorable varying, a change by decrease in the closet, the study, the resting-place? If we are failing of the greatest usefulness, O let us at once awake before God to the remedy, lest our powers become rigid or collapsed in indolent habits.

OLD PREACHERS.

A writer in the editorial department of the Ladies' Repository thus discourses about old preachers: "As a general rule, young men are more sought after for ministers than elderly ones, and it very seldom happens that in other Churches a minister over fifty years old is 'settled' or sought after and invited by Methodist churches. At fifty years old a Methodist minister must either escape from the 'regular work,' or consent to occupy a subordinate place among his younger brethren; and yet it will be granted that in most cases the twenty years next following that fearful crisis aught to be the most valuable period in the public life of a minister of Christ. And were our work distributed as it is with our British brethren, associating two or three ministers in the same charge, all this ruinous and cruel sacrifice of the very cream of our ministerial talent could be avoided; and while there would thus be places where all would be desired, the character of the ministrations thus rendered would be positively improved. By our present system all the advantages of variety in preaching are thrown away; and because young men with no experience are made sole pastors of churches, often some of the largest and most important ones, the advantages of experience and counsel are needlessly sacrificed; and since no church desires an old stranger for a minister, our very best men often hang heavily on the hands of the appointing power at the very time of life when their capabilities for usefulness are greatest. We are drawing no fancy sketch in this writing, but we speak the words of truth and soberness. Very few of our ministers continue in the regular pastoral work after fifty years old, and of that few most are found in places of secondary importance. Let the reader look through the range of his own acquaintance; if a minister, his own conference, and see how few first-class charges are held by men of fifty years old and upward. Formerly men of mature age were compelled to leave our ministry for want of adequate pecuniary support; now they are leaving it, directly and indirectly, because they are not called for. Self-respect forbids them to hang as a burden on the hands of the bishops; nor can they descend to the meanness of begging to be put into the 'priest's office' that they may eat a piece of bread;' and so some locate to engage in secular callings; some accept agencies or become chaplains to this or that institution, and many, in the full strength of their physical and mental manhood, are returned on the Minutes 'sup'—whatever that may mean—and occupy themselves as best they may. A few succeed in reaching the presiding eldership, which position has, in some Conferences, come to be considered a sort of Hotels des Invalids, and still fewer obtain some General Conference appointment."

SIGNS OF THE DECAY OF IDOLATRY.

Rev. W. M. Pashon, says: There is not anywhere in the world a healthy superstition. Wherever the light has gone, if it has not dissipated, it has relieved the darkness. There is less cruelty than there used to be. Priests are less of princes and more of conjurers than they were a while ago. They are maintaining their power by sleight of hand rather than by the potent influence which superstition used to have upon the mind. The religion of China, if one can understand it at all, absurdly gay, as it has been well described, and as dead at heart as some Egyptian mummy, preserves, as long as its mummy life is continued to it, some remnant of its fantastic beauty; but clip the lid off, and let the air breathe upon it, and, like other mummies, it crumbles into rottenness and dust. Then the gorgeous superstitions of India have, on the confession of their votaries, ceased to aggress, and can hardly hold their own. Mohammedan empire and Mohammedan faith, twin-births of disaster, are ailing and shall die together. The Papacy dreams yet as insanely as ever it did. It is the most wonderful somnambulist that the world has ever known; but its reign is over. The city of its harlotry and its pride will speedily be overthrown; and soon—and may God hasten the time—shall there be a track made for the gospel chariot down the broadest street of the mystic Babylon. Everywhere in the ranks of the enemy, decrepitude and dismay! Every where in the army of Immanuel, the renewal of youth and the immortality of hope! Men begin to walk with firm tread, as if they were in a world whose restitution had already begun. The Redeemer is at hand. The world is full of the significant and deepening foretokens of his approach. Nothing can shake us from their majestic reliance. Though the heavens darken above us, though there be a shattering among thrones of power, though the world should be dissolved successfully by famine, and plague, and sword, this hope remaineth, and to its clear and crystal vision every portent is a prophecy, and every omen a pledge of blessing, as it sings,—

"Whatever fills the world befall
A pledge of endless good we call,
A sign of Jesus near:
His chariot will not long delay;
We hear the rumbling wheels and pray,
Triumphant Lord, appear."

LIMITS OF REASON.

THE intellectual stumbling blocks which men find in the doctrines of Revelation, are not the consequence of any improbability or error peculiar to the things revealed; but are such as the thinker brings with him to the examination of the question; such as meet him on every side, whether he thinks with or against the testimony of Scripture; being inherent in the constitution and laws of the human mind itself. But must we, therefore, acquiesce in the melancholy conclusion, that self-contradiction is the law of our intellectual being; that the light of reason, which is God's gift, no less than revelation, is a delusive light, which we follow to our own deception? Far from it; the examination of the limits of thought lends to a conclusion the very opposite of this. Reason does not deceive us, if we will only read her witness aright; and reason herself gives us warning when we are in danger of reading it wrong. The light that is within us is not darkness; only it cannot illuminate that which is beyond the sphere of its rays. The self-contradiction into which we inevitably fall, when we attempt certain courses of speculation, are the beacons placed by the hand of God, in the mind of man, to warn us that we are deviating from the track that he designs us to pursue; that we are striving to pass the barriers which He has planted around us. The flaming sword turns every way against those who strive in strength of their own reason, to force their passages to the tree of life.

Within her own province, and among her own objects, let reason go forth, conquering and to conquer. The finite objects, which she can clearly and distinctly conceive, are her lawful empire and her true glory. The countless phenomena of the visible world; the unseen things which lie in the depth of the human soul, these are given into her hand; and over them she may reign in unquestioned dominion. But when she strives to approach too near the hidden mysteries of the Infinite; when, not content with beholding afar off the partial and relative manifestations of God's presence, she would "turn aside and see this great sight," and know why God hath revealed himself thus; the voice of the Lord Himself is heard, as it were speaking in warning from the midst: "Draw not nigh hither; put off thy shoes from off thy feet; for the place whereupon thou standest is holy ground."—Mansel.

CLEANLINESS.—A gentleman not long since, referring to the improved appearance which the Catholics of Ireland present after embracing an evangelical faith, remarked: "It has been truly said, that Protestantism is the soap of the world."

ANOTHER BOOK.

THE writer has been favored with the perusal of the manuscript of a book by the Rev. Jas. A. Clement of the Alabama Conference, to be entitled, "An exposition of the pretensions of Baptists to Antiquity." The design of the writer is to give to the public a calm, scriptural and historical consideration of the pretensions of Baptists in their claims of being the only Church of Christ on earth.

That Baptists do set up such pretensions is known all over the country. And in their manner of presenting such claims, they unchurch all others not of their way of thinking, and by this means bring many into their fold.

With the intelligent part of society such claims will do little or no damage. But with a large class of mankind, who never examine into such matters, such claims have great weight.

The writer of the work evidently has spared no labor in examining into the question which he proposes to discuss, which he does with an array of facts, which are destined to make an impression on the Church not heretofore felt. That the work would contain many of the old things, often repeated in books of a like character, is what might be expected. But his manner in presenting these facts, is different in a great measure, from all other writers in Church controversy. He has struck out a course, peculiar to himself, in the discussion of his subject, which will cause thousands to see matters in an entirely new and different light, to what they have ever hitherto seen them, and will cause them to stop and ask "is this the church that boasts such things? Is this the Baptist Church?"

If Baptists ever give this work a perusal they will be amazed at their origin, and the weakness of their pretensions to antiquity.

"Theophilus Walton" has had a wide run, and still runs on, doing well the work assigned to it. Let the "Exposition" follow "Theophilus," let them go hand in hand to the battle-field, and victory will be the result; the majesty of truth will be established. M. E. B.

ANCIENT ASTRONOMY.

The following singular fact was stated by Prof. Mitchel, in a lecture on astronomy, recently delivered by him at Philadelphia: He not long since met, in the city of St. Louis, a man of great scientific attainments, who for forty years had been engaged in Egypt in deciphering the hieroglyphics of the ancients. The gentleman stated to him that he had lately unravelled the inscriptions upon the coffin of a mummy, now in the London Museum, and that by the aid of previous observations he had discovered the key to all the astronomical knowledge of the Egyptians. The Zodiac, with the exact positions of the planets, was delineated on this coffin, and the date to which they pointed was the autumnal equinox in the year 1722 before Christ or nearly thirty-six hundred years ago. Prof Mitchel employed his assistants to ascertain the exact position of the heavenly bodies belonging to our solar system on the equinox of that year (1722 B. C.) and sent him a correct diagram of them, without having communicated his object in doing so. In compliance with this the calculations were made, and to his astonishment, on comparing the result with the statements of his scientific friend already referred to, it was found that, on the 7th October, 1722 B. C., the moon and planets had occupied the exact points in the heavens marked upon the coffin in the London Museum.

PREVENTION OF SUICIDE.

The American Medical Gazette, for November, contains an article on the "Preventian of Suicide," from which we take the following: We (physicians) at least ought to know that when fixed melancholy overtakes man or woman, so that the apprehension of evil, the dread of some terrible mishap, and especially the fear of losing their senses or becoming mad, takes possession of the mind, so as to render life intolerable, there is no longer safety in delaying vigilance and restraint; and for the reason that the risk of suicide by sudden impulse, and homicide included, is exceedingly great. Moreover, we ought to know, and instruct all parties, that the probabilities of recovery are greatly increased, in all cases of insanity, by the early confinement of the party in an asylum where the medical and moral means of restoration may be promptly and perseveringly applied. The public at large can have no knowledge of the great number of insane persons cured in our asylum, and whom suicides have been prevented, by the restoration of such persons to their families and to society. Such cures have been the most frequent when no delay has occurred between the onset of the disease and the restraint of the patient."

GOD'S PLAN OF YOUR LIFE.

Never complain of your birth, your training, your employment, your hardships; never fancy that you could be something, if only you had a different lot and sphere assigned you. God understands his own plan, and he knows what you want a great deal better than you do. The very things that you most deprecate as fatal limitations or obstructions, are probably what you most want. What you call hindrances, obstacles, discouragements, are probably God's opportunities; and it is nothing new that the patient should dislike his medicines, or any certain proof that they are poisons. No! a truce to all such impatience! Choke that devilish envy which gnaws at your heart because you are not in the same lot with others; bring down your soul, or rather, bring it up to receive God's will, and do his work, in your lot, in your sphere, under your cloud of obscurity, against your temptations; and then you shall find that your condition is never opposed to your good, but really consistent with it.—Dr. Bushnell.

THE NEW ORLEANS & JACKSON RAILROAD.

MR. EDITOR: It must have been very mortifying to the good feelings of some dozen or more of the preachers of the Mississippi Conference, who, on last Thursday night, at Jackson, presented their free tickets to the proper officer of the railroad, when that official very gravely informed them that he had received no authority to give them a free passage. My good sir, could it have been possible that the managers of the aforesaid railroad would, unsolicited, and of their own free will, grant to the preachers of the Mississippi Conference free tickets to their homes, merely that they might enjoy, in anticipation, the shame and mortification of a disappointment? Could such a base motive, good sir, have prompted so cruel an insult?

AN OLD CITIZEN.

P.S.—The names of those preachers can be given, if necessary.

RICH MEN.—It were no bad comparison to liken mere rich men to camels or mules, for they often pursue their devious way over hills and mountains, laden with Indian purple, with gems, aromas, and generous wines upon their backs, attended, too, by a long line of servants, as a safe-guard on their way. Soon, however, they come to their evening halting place, and forthwith their precious burdens are taken from their backs, and they, now wearied and stripped of their lading and their retinue of slaves, show nothing but livid marks of stripes. So, also, those who glitter in gold and purple raiment, when the evening of life comes rushing on them, have nought to show but marks and wounds of sin impressed upon them by the evil use of riches.

"GONE, BUT NOT MISSED."—Dr. Brainerd says: There are some professors over whose graves it would be difficult for decent men to find great occasion for lamentation. Such persons would doubtless be missed in their families, places of business, and accustomed places of recreation; but as to her peculiar and noble offices, the Church would be compelled to say of them, "Gone, but not missed." She would not miss their charities for Christ and his poor; she would not miss them in her circles of prayer and benevolence; she would not miss them at the bedside of the sick, nor in the house of the mourner; she would not miss them when great trials were to be borne, or hard labor to be done for the extension of the Gospel. In her Sabbath school efforts and tract distributions—in her endeavors to evangelize our city, our land, our earth, with truth and holiness—she would not miss them, for they have not cheered those labors of love with their presence, their counsel, their charities, or their prayers. Like the on-hangers of an army, they move with the host to share the results of victory but are absent when martyrs are to bleed upon the field. The loss of such to the Church by death would be graded by the benefit which their lives confer upon the world; and hence you can judge whether devout men would make great lamentation over them. Stephen fell at his post, and this pointed the grief at his loss.

DEAN LETTERS.—The Washington Constitution, of the 22d ult., says: We examined yesterday the catalogue of articles which have accumulated in the above named office since 1848. The Department has used every effort to restore them to their proper owners, and, being unable to deliver them, they are now to be sold for the postage; the proceeds, if any, after paying charges, to be deposited in the United States Treasury, subject to order should the proper owners hereafter be found. The catalogue embraces coats, hats, socks, drawers gloves, scarfs, suspenders, patent inhaling tube, gold pens, pencils, and all kinds of small jewelry imaginable, undersleeves, furs, handkerchiefs, box of dissecting instruments, pocket-Bibles, children's dresses, lace collars, books, buttons, cloth, purses, slippers, chemises, bedquilts, boots, shirts, gaffs for game fowls, corn-field hoe, black silk basque, hoods, shawls, gaiters, cigar-case, snuff-box, spectacles, false teeth, night caps, brogans, aprons, pantelettes, ear-trumpet, shoulder-braces, silk flag, razors, 100 catechisms, watch crystals, nipple-glasses, tweel-veils, edging, and a thousand other things too numerous to mention. No pawnbroker's shop ever excelled, in variety, the collection of the Dead Letter Office.

GROW BEAUTIFUL.—Persons may outgrow disease and become healthy by proper attention to the laws of their physical constitution. By moderate and daily exercise men may become active and strong in limb and muscle. But to grow beautiful, how? Ago dims the lustre of the eye, and pales the roses on beauty's cheek; while crowfeet, and furrows, and wrinkles, and lost teeth, and gray hairs, and bald head, and tottering limbs, and limpfeet most sadly mar the human form divine. But dim as the eye is, as pallid and sunken as may be the face of beauty, and frail and feeble that once strong, erect and manly body, the immortal soul, just fledging its wings for its home in heaven, may look out through those faded windows as beautiful as the dewdrop of a summer's morning, as melting as the tears that glisten in affection's eye—by growing kindly, by cultivating sympathy with all human kind, by cherishing forbearance towards the follies and foibles of our race, and feeding, day by day, on that love to God and man which lifts us from the brute, and makes us akin to angels.

HAPPINESS AND SUCCESS IN LIFE.—Life without some necessity for exertion must ever lack real interest. That state is capable of the greatest enjoyment where necessity urges, but not painfully; where effort is required, but as much as possible without anxiety; where the spring and summer of life are preparatory to the harvest of autumn, and the repose of winter. Then is every season sweet, and in a well spent life, the last, the best, the season of calm enjoyment, the richest in collections, the brightest in hope. Good training and a fair start constitute a more desirable patrimony than wealth; and those parents who study their children's welfare, rather than the gratification of their own avarice or vanity would do well to think of this. It is better to run a successful race than to begin and end at the goal.

Masculine virtue, or courage, is as necessary to eminence as a powerful intellect. He who is deficient in either, will never, unless from the influence of fortuitous circumstances be able to place and maintain himself in the van of his fellows.

THE LOST IN THE ARCTIC REGIONS.—Captain Parker Snow, who was second in command of the Prince Albert Discovery-ship which engaged in the search for Franklin in the year 1850, in a public lecture lately delivered in London, gave a touching account of the discovery of the bodies in one of Franklin's boats, as already mentioned, gleaned from one of McClintock's men now in England. He said among other things: "Edward's, the ship's carpenter, was the one who discovered them, and, hastily calling his companions, he proceeded to remove the snow and ice. He describes it as the most awful moment in his life; and states that he could hardly help falling on his knees and returning thanks to the Almighty Father who had guided him thus successfully in his search. Underneath the head of one of the bodies was found the open prayer-book, and it was necessary to chop away the book from the head so hard was it frozen. On the hand of the other body was a mitten, and on attempting to take it off the finger nails came away with it."

DUTY.—How often hast thou found thyself at the entrance into a duty becalmed, as a ship which at first setting sail hath hardly wind to swell its sails, while under the shore and shadow of the trees, but meets a fresh gale of wind when got into open sea? Yea, didst thou never launch out to duty as the apostles to sea, with the wind in thy face, as if the Spirit of God, instead of helping thee on, meant to drive thee back, and yet hast found Christ walking to thee before the duty was done, and a prosperous voyage made of it at last? Abraham saw not the ram that God had provided for his sacrifice till he was in the mount. In the mount of prayer God is seen, even when the Christian does often go up the hill toward duty with a heavy heart, because he can as yet have no sight of him. Turn not, therefore, back, but go on with courage—he may be nearer than thou thinkest. "In that same hour," saith Christ, "it shall be given unto you," (Matt. x. 16.)—Gurnal.

CURIOUS HISTORICAL FACT.—During the troubles of the reign of Charles I, a country girl came to London, in search of a place as a servant-maid; but, not succeeding, she hired herself to carry out beer for a brew-house, and was one of those called tub-women. The brewer observing a good-looking girl in this low occupation, took her into his family as a servant, and after a short while married her; but he died while she was a young woman, and left her the bulk of his fortune. The business of the brewery was dropped, and Mr. Hyde was recommended to the young woman, as a skillful lawyer, to arrange her husband's affairs. Hyde, who was afterwards the Earl of Clarendon, finding the widow's fortune very considerable, married her. Of this marriage there was no other issue than a daughter, who was afterwards the wife of James II, and mother of Mary and Anne, Queens of England.

To act upon a determination made in anger, is like embarking in a vessel during a storm.

EDITORIAL NOTICES.

ADVERTISING IN THE ADVOCATE.

The business public are slowly learning that the Advocate is THE GREAT ADVERTISING PAPER OF THE SOUTH AND WEST. Advertisements in it are more valuable than in any half dozen other papers.

It has the largest circulation west of Charleston, and South of Cincinnati; larger than any other two weeklies in New Orleans, and is increasing rapidly—will, in a few years, double its present circulation.

Of medium size, and not crowded with advertisements, an advertisement is not lost in it, but can be easily found.

In our "Editorial Notices," which we give to every advertisement, we specify the page and column an which an advertisement may be found. We seek to make every advertisement valuable to the advertiser and to the paper.

The circulation is spread out over Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, principally; Georgia, Florida, Tennessee, Kentucky, Arkansas, partially.

It is the only weekly of large and widely-spread circulation in the great and growing metropolis of the South.

NEWS FROM OUR HOME WORK.

"To spread Scriptural Holiness over these Lands."

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

The Leche Mission.—Rev. Jas. F. Fountaine writes: The "Bayou Leche Mission" is still prosperous; its influence for good has been more perceptible the present year, than at any previous time. The word is gradually increasing in favor with all who are in any way connected with, or interested in it. There has been several applications recently, to add new appointments the ensuing conference year. There are at present on the mission, nine appointments, with an agreeable attendance of from six to seven hundred slaves, with one hundred and seventy members. Lastly, but not unimportant, the Leche Mission is self-supporting.

November 29, 1856.

Shreveport.—Rev. R. R. R. Alexander writes: Our Quarly Meeting was a good one to close the year with. It began well, with the Presiding Elder at his post as usual. He leaving, commended us to God; and the word of his grace edified the people. Through the earnest preaching of Brothers Suratt, Chapman and Hawkins, and prayer and "talk-meetings," many souls were made happy, a number were converted, and eighteen were added to the Church.

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Bladen Circuit.—Rev. W. M. Thomas writes—On this circuit gracious refreshings have been experienced by us this year. The congregations have been orderly and seriously attentive; society is undergoing a rapid and favorable change, and now is the time to give it the proper mould. We have a number of schools—a few excellent ones; the habits of the people are generally temperate, though once in a while we meet with one of those wayside retail shops, the bane of society; hope public opinion will soon put them down and their proprietors had better employment. We have had some very interesting religious meetings, and added to the Church over one hundred on probation, and twenty-five or thirty by letter. I think it has been a profitable year to all concerned. To God be all the glory, amen.

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

The Execution of John Brown.

CHARLESTON, Dec. 2.—There were three thousand military present at Brown's execution to-day and the proceedings were conducted with strict military discipline. The prisoner was conveyed at 11 o'clock from his cell to the gallows in a furniture wagon, sitting on his coffin. He was offered administerial aid, but he declined it in a scornful spirit. He surveyed the crowd sternly, both on the scaffold and on his way thither, but said nothing.

The work of preparation, after the arrival of the culprit on the scaffold, occupied about ten minutes. Everything was done quietly and in order, nor was there any excitement.

Brown died easy. The body hung about thirty minutes and was then cut down and conveyed to the jail, whence it is to be sent to Harper's Ferry and delivered over to the deceased's wife, who is now there. From Harper's Ferry it is to be taken North.

San Juan Island Difficulty.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 3.—Late official dispatches, brought by the overland route, were received at the department here, today, from Gen. Scott, at San Juan Island. The joint occupation of the Island has been restored according to the terms of the treaty, and all immediate difficulty thereby obviated. The original boundary question, however, with the right of eminent domain, remains to be settled by negotiations between the two countries.

Later from Nicaragua.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 3.—Official information has been received here from Nicaragua, which announces two important events. The first is, that the Nicargua Government have formerly declared the forfeiture of the contract with Monsieur Relly for opening an interoceanic canal, on account of his non-fulfillment of important preliminary conditions.

The second is, that Com. Vanderbilt's offer to open the transit route across Nicaragua, has also been rejected by the Government of that country.

Later from California.

JEFFERSON CITY, Mo., Dec. 2.—The California overland mail has arrived at this place, bringing San Francisco dates to the 11th ult.

The San Francisco sugar market closed dull. Crushed sugar is quoted at 11c. Coffee closed with an advancing tendency. Candles at 19 to 21c.

In the agricultural and mining business active.

There have been very heavy rains all over the country; so much as to almost stop all business prospects.

The new iron tubular bridge over the Yuba river has been swept away by the high water.

Judge Hoffman has decided against Henry Cabristan's claim to eleven square leagues of land, situated in Sacramento Valley, on the ground that an unnaturalized foreigner could not receive a Mexican grant.

James Jemesan, late Deputy Clerk of Sacramento, has absconded from Sacramento. He is found to have appropriated $36,000 belonging to the city.

Four highwaymen attempted to rob one of Wells, Fargo & Co.'s express stages, which contained a large sum of treasure, but they were defeated. Two of them were killed and one wounded.

Some fears are entertained concerning several New York vessels, which are now past overdue.

Grand National Union Meeting.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 5.—The late attempts on the rights and institutions of the South, in Virginia, and especially the support and sympathy it has received from anti-slavery presses and meetings at the North have created a profound sensation here, and in the neighboring cities of Baltimore and Philadelphia, among the reflecting men of all parties.

And now the popular excitement has somewhat subsided, it is proposed to hold a grand national meeting of conservative men, irrespective of party associations, to express their condemnation of the course now being pursued by ultra men at the North, and their abiding attachment to, and love of the Union.

The meeting will be held at Philadelphia where it was first proposed, and will more particularly express the sense of that community, which has lately been so much outraged and disturbed by abolition fanatics, on the subject of our federal relations. It will come off at Jayne's Hall, on Wednesday evening next, and preparations are already in progress on a grand scale for the occasion.

The meeting, however, will be in a measure a national one, comprising guests from the whole surrounding country—this city, Baltimore, New York, and the interior of Pennsylvania—and will be addressed not only by gentlemen residing in Philadelphia, but by many invited guests from abroad. A large number of members of Congress will also be present.

It will probably be one of the largest and most spirited meetings ever held in Philadelphia.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP EUROPA.

BOSTON, Dec. 3.—The royal mail steamship E a, before telegraphed from Halifax, arrived at this port last evening.

The Europa left Liverpool on Saturday the 19th, but called off at Queenstown on Sunday, the 20th, whence she brings the following additional intelligence, telegraphed from London and Liverpool just before her departure.

War Preparations in England.

LONDON, Nov. 20.—The London Times announces that the British Government has determined upon the establishment of an inland arsenal to be placed under the charge of the civilians.

The establishment of this arsenal is not in any way to supercede the great arsenal at Woolwich, but is intended as an additional security to the nation in case of an invasion.

The Times complains that the animosity now exhibited in France against England is engendered by the French Government, and that the army of France is taught to look upon war with England as by no means a remote contingency.

The Times appeals to the Emperor Napoleon to put a stop to this state of things, and says if he does not do so, his silence will produce gloomy forebodings of impending war between the two greatest powers in the world.

The British Government has adopted measures for the better protection of the harbor of Belfast.

The Morrocco War.

Advices from Madrid report that the Spanish troops in Morocco have obtained some additional successes over the Moors, the precise nature of which is not stated.

The report that Spain had received a diplomatic note from the English Government, protesting against the war with Morocco, has been officially contradicted.

Miscellaneous Intelligence.

The exchange of ratifications of the Zurich treaty of peace was settled for Nov. 21.

The European Congress will probably hold its session at Paris, and be composed, it is stated, of representatives of France, England, Russia, Prussia, Austria, Spain Portugal, Sweden, Sardinia, Rome and Naples.

It is reported that Cardinal Antonelli will represent the Pope in the Congress.

The Paris journals express the opinion that any unfriendly feeling that may exist between France and England is due to the unbridled licence and violence of the British press in misrepresenting everything relating to the French Emperor, and exciting the worst passions and prejudices of both nations. The Count Mortier is to go to Vienna as the French Embassador, and Latour D'Auvergne is to represent France at Berlin. So says a dispatch from Paris to the London journals.

Prince Metternich has received letters of credence from his government as Embassador at the court of France.

Great sensation was produced at Paris by an article in the London Times, on the 15th November, commenting on Count Walewski's late diplomatic circular in relation to Italian affairs.

Gen. Monlauban has been named as Commander-in-Chief of the French-Chinese expedition.

The appointment is stated to be unpopular with the army.

An awful gale has occurred in the harbor of Cronstadt, which, for a time, entirely interrupted communication between Cronstadt and St. Petersburg.

The gale extended along the coast of Russia, in the Baltic Sea, but the extent of damage done has not been ascertained.

The King of Naples has issued a decree granting permission to the Neapolitan exiles to return to their native land and resume the rights of citizenship.

Advices from St. Petersburg state that the financial pressure had somewhat abated.

Advices from Constantinople state that the reforms proposed by the newly appointed Grand Vizier, had been accepted by the Sultan, and the Vely Pacha is to be appointed Ambassador to Paris.

The official Gazette of Constantinople, declared that the Porte has not placed a definite vote on the projected construction of the Suez Canal by the French company, organized for that purpose.

Mr. Lever, the chief owner and director of the Galway Steamship Line, has made proposals to the directors of the steamship Great Eastern to charter her for eighteen months. The directors, however, decline the offer, preferring to run her on their own account.

The London Times, in a more moderate article upon the San Juan difficulty, expresses the opinion that the matter will, be calmly discussed at Washington as well as at London, while affairs at the Island itself will remain in statu quo.

NEW BOOKS.

THE VIRGINIANS. A Tale of the Last Century. By W. M. Thackeray. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1859.

The admirers of this author have generally read the "Virginians" as it came out in Harper's Monthly. This volume is in the same type and illustrations, neatly bound. To be had at White's, 105 Canal street, New Orleans.

THE PRAIRIE TRAVELER. A Hand-Book for Overland Expeditions. By Randolph B. Marcy, Capt. U.S. Army. Published by authority of the War Department. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1859.

This little volume is entertaining to the general reader, and must be of great value to those who meditate a trip across the plains. To be had at White's, 105 Canal street, New Orleans.

FISHER'S RIVER (North Carolina) SCENES AND CHARACTERS. By Skilt. Illustrated by John M'Lenan. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1859.

This purports to be a contribution to the humorous literature of the country. Perhaps it is. The reader must judge. We have only sampled the illustrations, which are certainly of the graphic and funny order. To be had at White's, 105 Canal st., New Orleans.

HARPER'S MONTHLY.—The number for December has been laid upon our table by H. D. M'Glauis, 56 Camp street.—It fully maintains its long established reputation.

ECLECTIC MAGAZINE.—This valuable periodical is received for December. Table of contents varied and valuable.—Cheap at five dollars a year. All should have it.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, December 4, 1859.

We condense the following statement from the New Orleans Price Current of the 3d instant:—

The general market has remained without any considerable activity during the past week, but it will be seen that our leading staple, Cotton, after a momentary check from adverse European advices, has again moved very freely, though at reduced prices. Sugar and Molasses, also, under the pressure of increased receipts and but a limited intercourse with the interior, have receded in favor of purchasers, while Tobacco is inactive. The transactions in the various articles of Western Produce are still confined mostly to the limited parcels required for home consumption.

COTTON.—With respect to prices, we have to remark that factors, in order to effect free sales, have been compelled to submit to a reduction of fully ¼ cent per pound in the Middling and lower grades, while the better qualities, being comparatively scarce, have been less affected.

The receipts at this port since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas,) are 779,052 bales, against 640,098 bales to same date last year, and the increase in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 127,245 bales.

New Orleans Classification:

Inferior	5 @ 7¾	Good Middling	11¾@11¾
Ordinary	8¼@ 9¾	Middling Fair	12¼@12¾
Good Ordinary	9¾@ 9¾	Fair	—@—
Low Middling	10¼@10¾	Good Fair	—@—
Middling	10¾@11	Good and Fine	—@—

SUGAR.—The sales of the week amount to 5500 hhds. We quote for Inferior end Refining 4¼ to 5¼; Common to Good Common 5¼ to 6¾; Fair to Fully Fair 7 to 7¼; Prime to Choice 7¾ to 8¼; Centrifugal and Clarified 6¾ to 9 cents per pound. The above quotations apply to round lots, but small orders of 5 hhds and under, could not be filled without paying a further advance of ¼ to ½c per pound.

MOLASSES.—Total receipts of the week 17,214 barrels. The prices obtained during the week were: Inferior to Fair, 33 to 37 cents per gallon; and Prime to Choice, 39 to 40 cents; half barrels, 40 to 42½ cents per gallon.

FLOUR.—About 6,500 barrels have been sold during the past week, at from $5 75 to $5 87½ for superfine, $6 to 6 50 for ordinary to good extra, and $6 75 to $7 00 per bbl. for choice extra brands.

GRAIN.—The receipts of Corn continue light. About 33,000 sacks have been sold at from $0 60 to 0 65 for ordinary, and $0 70 for good white. Oats have been in moderate request at 54c to 55c per bushel for good to prime St. Louis. Bran sells at $1 20 to $1 25 for ordinary to choice lots. Wheat sells at $1 15 per bushel for prime red.

PORK.—The principal sales reported through the week were at $15 25 to $15 50 per bbl. for Mess.

BEEF.—We quote Prime Mess at $14 00 per bbl. for extra brands.

BACON.—Shoulders 8¼ to 8¾; Ribbed Sides 10¼ to 10¾; Clear Sides 12¼ to 12¾; Sugar-cured Hams 12 to 15 cents per pound.

LARD.—We quote 10¾ to 11c for prime to choice prime, in tcs., and 12¾ to 13c. for kegs.

BUTTER.—Western generally selling at 10 to 11 cents per pound, according to quality; and Cheese 11 to 12c.

BAGGING AND BALE ROPE.—We quote Kentucky Bagging at 12 to 14¼ cents per yard; India Bagging, 11¾ to 12c; Bale Rope, hand spun, 6¾ to 7¾, and machine made, 7¼ to 7¾ cents per pound.

GUNNY BAGS.—Limited parcels sell at 10 cents for light and 11 to 11¼c. to heavy and extra heavy bags.

COFFEE.—We quote fair at 11 to 12, and prime at 12¼c. per pound.

LIVE-STOCK.—Beef Cattle—Western, 8 to 9c. per lb. net; Texas—ordinary to fair $14 to 20, and choice $25 to 38 per head.

Hogs, selling at 7 to 8c. per pound net.

Sheep—Selling at $2 50 to $5 00 per head.

Veal Cattle—Selling at $9 00 to $11 00 per head.

Milch Cows—Dull, at $30 to $60 per head.

MARANATHA.

Christ is coming! let creation
Bid her groans and travail cease;
Let the glorious proclamation
Hope restore and faith increase—
Maranatha!
Come thou blessed Prince of Peace!

Earth can now but tell the story
Of the bitter cross and pain;
She shall yet behold thy glory
When thou comest back to reign—
Maranatha!
Let each heart repeat the strain!

Though once cradled in a manger,
Oft on pillow but the sod;
Here an alien and a stranger,
Mocked of man, disavowed of God—
All creation
Yet shall own thy kindly rod.

Long thine exiles have been pining,
Far from rest, and home, and thee;
But, in heavenly vesture shining,
Soon they shall thy glory see—
Maranatha!
Haste the joyous jubilee!

With the watchword hope before us,
Let no harp remain unstrung;
Let the mighty advent chorus
Onward roll from tongue to tongue—
Maranatha!
Come, Lord Jesus, quickly come!

The Family Circle.

ONE WAY TO CURE DESPAIR.

The Congregationalist relates the following story of one of those desponding good men, who may be found in almost every church. A little of the fact shown by a friend which proved as effective in this case, would often give a turn to these gloomy thoughts, and lead the downcast spirit to look up with cheerful trust and hope.

In the city of S——, some years since, there lived an aged man known as "Old P——," whose religious experience was somewhat peculiar and instructive. It was remarked by his friends, that on every occasion when there was any special religious interest, or the Spirit of God seemed peculiarly present the old man was sure to lose his hope and go about sorrowing and in bitter despair. So well was this understood that it came at length to be regarded as one of the signs of the Holy Spirit's presence, whenever old Mr. P. made his appearance and began to entreat his friends to pray for him. In this state, all attempts to lift the cloud and revive his hope by appealing to the promises and encouragements of the Gospel appeared utterly vain. Notwithstanding the most affectionate assurances and allusions to his past Christian enjoyment, he still insisted that he was a poor, miserable, self-deceived hypocrite, and was going straight to hell. To divert, in some measure, his thoughts from himself—being willing to do any thing, even to the humblest service—he was encouraged to make arrangements and get up prayer meetings. In this work he engaged with earnestness.

From morning till night he was busy in fitting up places with chairs and benches, notifying the people, etc., but all the while felt his utter unworthiness to speak a word for Christ—and with a countenance bearing the marks of the deepest despair, did not venture to indulge the hope that he was His. Nevertheless it was manifest that he loved the cause, and loved to work for it—and above all things else loved the prayer meeting, and would get up one whenever and wherever he could. But still his mournful visits upon his friends—with weeping and entreating, would continue. These soon became burdensome.

At length a friend determined upon the following expedient. As old Mr. P. entered his store the next day, and began to bewail his condition as bound to the regions of the lost—instead of seeking to comfort him with the promises of the Gospel as heretofore—he joined in with him, and said:

"And when you get there, the first thing you will do, will be to go to work to get up a prayer meeting. This will at once attract the attention of Beelzebub, the prince of devils—and he will inquire what old P—— is about there—and the reply will be, he is getting up a prayer meeting, and can't live without one. Then the command will come, Turn him out—turn him out—we won't have him here—and you will have to go, Mr. P!"

This device proved effectual. The absurdity of his love for prayer meetings in such a place and in such company, was palpable—and the effect was, to bring hope within reach, and let sunlight of faith shine in upon his soul. Although disposed at first to think that he had committed the "unpardonable sin" by smiling, still as the result proved, this was the only effective course by which to dispel his singular delusions.

Similar cases are now and unfrequently met with—and always found most difficult to manage. The foregoing account may furnish a hint which may be of service to some in their dealings with unhappy cases of religious despondency.

RULES FOR HOME EDUCATION.

The following are worthy of being printed in letters of gold, and being placed in a conspicuous position in every household.

1. From your children's earliest infancy, inculcate the necessity of instant obedience.
2. Unite firmness with gentleness. Let your children always understand that you mean exactly what you say.
3. Never promise them anything unless you are sure you can give them what you promise.
4. If you tell a child to do anything, show him how to do it, and see that it is done.
5. Always punish your children for willfully disobeying you, but never punish in anger.
6. Never let them perceive that they can vex you, or make you lose your self-command.
7. If they give way to petulance and temper, wait till they are calm, and then gently reason with them on the impropriety of their conduct.
8. Remember that a little present punishment when the occasion arises, is much more effectual than the threatening of a greater punishment should the fault be renewed.
9. Never give your children anything because they cry for it.
10. On no account allow them to do at one time what you have forbidden, under the like circumstances, at another.
11. Teach them that the only sure and easy way to appear good, is to be good.
12. Accustom them to make their little recitals the perfect truth.
13. Never allow of tale bearing.
14. Teach them that self-denial not self-indulgence, is the appointed and sure method of securing happiness.

A GOOD FATHER.

One evening, as the wind was raging and howling with terrible force, shaking the house, and making timid people tremble for fear of fire, other accidents that might befal them, a number of grown persons were complaining of the wakeful and restless nights they had endured during the recent winter storms.

A little boy who listened unalarmed, with a sweet beaming trust in his face, said in his turn, "I sleep so well and sound because I've got such a good father. I know he would not let anything happen to me. If the house should catch fire, he would take me right up in his arms and run down stairs with me, and I'd be safe."

This went to my heart, and rebuked the fears of those who tremble and toss upon restless pillows, when He who holds the wind in his fist is their Father and friend. The remark of that dear boy has taught me a lesson which I hope to remember. When I go to his bedside, after he has been asleep for hours, and see his rudy cheeks and clustering ringlets, and watch his peaceful, innocent expression, and listen to his gentle breathing, knowing, as well as I do, that he is a timid child, often flying with fear from trifling causes of alarm, then I feel how deep and pervading must be his trust in a father's loving heart and strong arms, to cause such dreamless slumbers amid howling winds and storms. Can not the experienced Christian learn a lesson even from a babe's lip? Ought we not to rest peacefully amid causes of alarm, because we "have got such a good father!"

Children's Column.

JACK AND JEM.

"O dear!" sighed a half-starved, ragged little boy, one cold chilly night in the fall of 1829, as he sat, or rather half reclined on his elbow, on the cold damp step of one of the large fine houses in New York city; "how I wish I had only one of them nice cakes in that window!" And as he half muttered to himself, his dark tearful eyes watched the well-filled window of a large baker shop.

There he sat, hour after hour, with no friend to comfort him, and no warm bed to sleep in. The only friend he had, as he thought, was his Heavenly Father, for his mother had died the day before from starvation, and now he was left an orphan, to wander all alone through that large and wicked city.

Soon, however, he fell asleep, and his troubles left him for a time. He slept long and soundly. At last he was awaked from his sleep by the sound of a large clock striking five. The streets were very still, and there was not the same noise and commotion that there is on other mornings, for it was Sunday. There he sat, rubbing his eyes as though he were taking his morning bath.

Presently some one pulled him by the coat (or what might have once been called a coat) and said, "Come, Jem, wake up, it is long past daylight, and I am getting hungry. If you will come with me, I will tell you where we can get plenty to eat, for I saw a shopman shut his shuds without once locking them."

Jem looked up in real astonishment. "Will he give us something he asked."

"No; we can look it, you know; and he won't miss it, I know."

Jem looked up slowly and answered firmly: "I shan't steal, and you can't make me, any more, for I promised my mother, just as she died, I wouldn't. You may go, but I shan't."

Jack hung his head and said nothing. Soon, however, he muttered to himself, "You may starve to death, but I shan't;" then, raising his voice, he cried, "Hurrah! I'm going, any how, to get something to eat."

Jem walked off in the opposite direction, whistling to himself "Home, Sweet Home."

The bells were ringing for Sabbath-school, at nine o'clock. Jem happened to be passing St. Paul's chapel, and as he saw the boys and girls going in, he thought he would like to see the Church; so he entered, but not without first taking off his cap, and wiping his bare feet before he touched the step.

One of the teachers saw him, and asked him if he came to school. He was so much frightened he did not answer; but she put him in a class with some younger boys. After the session was over she came and closely questioned him, and finding him so honest and upright, she took him home with her and gave him his breakfast, and then learned from him his whole history. Her father, a celebrated lawyer of that city, happened to be in want of an office-boy. Jem accepted the offer of the vacant place, and kept his employer's office neat and clean, and was soon sent to school for instruction. He made the very best use of his time, improved very fast, and was soon admitted into the office as a clerk. He studied, became a proficient in law, kept up his habits of strict integrity and honour, was finally made a partner in the business of his employer, and in the year of grace, 1859, is one of the most popular judges in Western New York.

This little incident, dear little children, shows us that integrity wins its reward even in this world.

Jack was detected in his wickedness and sent to a place of confinement, to learn that "the way of transgressors is hard." Children's Magazine.

LITTLE SUNBEAM.

"Christmas is coming, isn't it grandpa?"

"I suppose it is, one of these days; what of that Sunbeam?"

"Snow storms are coming, too, aren't they, and the ground will be all white. Where will I stay then, grandpa?"

"Why in the house, the place for such a little Sunbeam as this, I should think."

"But the cold winds are roaring, too, they will whistle down the chimney, and creep in through the cracks of the door; what shall I do then?"

"Put more wood on the fire, and more clothes on your back," laughed grandpa.

"Jack Frost will get here by that time, and he'll be peeping in at the windows, and pinching our noses when we are asleep; won't he?"

"That he will, if we give him a chance; what next little questioner?"

There was quite a pause.

"You are a very rich man; aren't you grandpa?"

"Not at all, not at all," growled grandpa.

"Oh yes, but you are; I know you are; and do all little girls have rich grandpas, I wonder?"

"Why, no, child, what a question!"

"Then what do the poor things do, if they hav'n't any father nor mother like me?"

"God only knows," replied grandpa, with the tears in his eyes.

The little girl looked thoughtful for a moment, then with a bright smile, she said—

"Now, grandpa, what is my Christmas present going to be?"

"Just what your little heart wants most, I expect; that is always the way when you tease."

"Oh, that is nice! and you shall give me fifty dollars then, and I will be a rich grandpa to some poor little girls; isn't that a funny idea?

"Whew!" exclaimed grandpa, "I should think it was. Fifty dollars to give away? Why, I haven't it to spare; you little extravagance!"

"Oh yes, you have grandpa, I know you have."

"No, I can't possibly spare so much money, and I shall be cross if that is the tune."

"Now, grandpa, you love Sunbeam don't you?"

"What if I do?"

"Then you don't want to plague her, and make her cry, do you?" and the tears stood in the little one's eyes.

"Well, don't look at me so child. If you will be very good; I'll give you ten little gold dollars; won't that do?"

"But I want to be generous; and how can I be, grandpa, with only two dollars? And you have so many great heights, can't you spare me enough just to fill one? Now, do please give what she wants this time, and I won't tease you again, that's a dear good grandpa!"

"There, Mary, that will do, don't tease any more. You have made grandpa cross. I am not going to give you what you wish for this time. I must turn over a new leaf, that I must for it is high time. Didn't you know that grandpa could not let little girls tease his money away from him?" And grandpa gazed sternly into the little upturned face before him.

Sorrowfully did the soft dark eyes rest upon the old man's face for a moment; but seeing that he was really in earnest, the eyelids dropped; and hiding her face in her grandpa's bosom, the little girl sobbed as if her heart would break. Instantly grandpa's heart softened, as he exclaimed in a most despairing tone.

"There, now, I've done it, turned my little sunbeam into an April shower!—Oh dear, I ought to have known better. Come, now, don't you cry, there is a good little girl," he said coaxingly. "Don't cry, Sunbeam; you are always good, and grandpa knows it; and he won't be stingy any more; and you shall have all the money you want, for grandpa knows that you and aunt Ellen will do more good with it than I shall. Come, don't you feel so badly."

"I am all the little girl you've got," said the little Mary, with a fresh burst of tears.

"So you are, so you are."

"And you never spoke so cross before," she sobbed.

"No, I never did; but I won't again, child, if you will only smile, and cheer grandpa's old heart, for what would he do without his little Sunbeam? He is afraid that his house would be dark and dreary, and his heart would grow cold and hard. Yes," he continued, "your mother was right, for you do teach me to lay up treasures in heaven."

Thus mused the old man, while his darling gradually grew more quiet, and at length she lifted her head and putting her arms around his neck, she laid her soft curls against his face. The tears still glistened in her eyes, but they soon vanished before the fond caresses of the loving old man. April showers they were indeed, and the smiles soon brought back the flowers to Mary's cheeks. After a few minutes they were chatting almost as gaily as if nothing had happened.

"You are a spoiled child, Sunbeam, that's what you are," said grandpa, as he fumbled in his pocket book.

"Am I? what makes you spoil me then, grandpa?" said Mary; "I am sure I don't want to be spoiled."

"Because I can't help it, I suppose; I didn't know what else it can be. There, now, here are ten dollars for you, and the day before Christmas you shall have the rest. Will that please my little Sunbeam?"

"Now grandpa, you are just my own grandpa, and I do love you dearly don't I?"

"I shouldn't wonder, but there, I guess I can get along without any more hugs just this minute. There is danger of your loving old grandpa to death at this rate."

"Is there? then you shall have the rest when I come back."

"Well," she said, as she jingled the money into her little purse, "if all the Sunbeams carry as much money as this, I don't believe there ever will be any poor children left by-and-by. Now I must go right and ask aunt Ellen what to buy first; so, good by, grandpa," and giving him a parting kiss, she turned away.—"God is very good to me," mused the little child, as she climed the stairs to aunt Ellen's room, to give me so good a grandpa, when he took my papa and mama away to live with him; I mean to tell them all about it when I get to heaven."

A nice time did Sunbeam have with aunt Ellen, buying and making up the many things for Christmas presents; and the happiness that shone in her face on Christmas morning, as she started to distribute her bundles, could be compared only to a ray of the sunshine of heaven. So thought grandpa, as she waved her little hand to him from the carriage window, and as he turned away he murmured, unconsciously, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven."

Little Mary proved herself, that day, to be what her name signified, for she was indeed a real sunbeam; and scattering light and happiness in poverty-stricken homes, and filling many a dark heart with joy and gratitude, it was no wonder that as she left a blessing wherever her footsteps turned, blessings should follow her, and that in happy, grateful hearts, long afterwards, there should arise the beautiful picture of a child-angel.

Would that there were more such angel Sunbeams to gladden our earth, and to teach us the way, and help us to love, to lay up our treasures in heaven.

A NARROW ESCAPE.

"When I was a boy," says a certain writer, "I one day went gunning. I was to call for another boy who lived at a little distance from my father's. Having loaded my gun with a heavy charge of pigeon shot, and put in a new flint which would strike out a brilliant shower of sparks, I carefully put in the priming, and set out on my expedition. When arrived at the house of the boy who was to go with me, I leaned the gun against the side of the house, and waited a few moments for him to get ready. About a rod from the door where I was waiting there was another house. A little girl stood upon the windowseat looking out of the window. Another boy came along, and taking up the gun, not knowing that it was loaded and primed, took deliberate aim at the girl and pulled the trigger. But, mercy, the gun missed fire. Had it gone off, the girl's fure would have been blown all to pieces. I never can think of the danger she was in, even now, without trembling. The girl did not see the boy take aim at her, and does not know how narrow was her escape from death. She little supposed that, when standing in perfect health by the window of her own father's house, she was in danger of dropping down dead upon the floor."

I never like to see boys, or even young men, playing with fire-arms. Many fatal results have followed from their use, even when no danger was thought of. Let the case given above be a warning to boys to let alone the gun and all other weapons of death.

MEMOIRS OF THE REV. JOSEPH T. ABERNATHY.

Rev. Joseph T. Abernathy was, I think, born, and raised, in Macon county, Ala. Of his early history I know nothing save, having often heard him say, he was a poor, ignorant, wayward, thoughtless boy, until he was near twenty years of age, when one day, for the sake of some new sport, he and one or two other boys (kindred spirits,) went to church, and Rev. R. R. Dickinson preached. Bro. A. said after he got into the house and while, perhaps, the hymn was being sung, a strange feeling came upon him that he was unable to account for, and that it continued to increase as the services advanced, until he could no longer refrain from tears and trembling. Under that sermon his vows were made, and he engaged in good earnest in seeking religion. Before the services closed the door of the church was opened, Bro. A. resolved to do everything the preacher said, (if he could,) went forward and joined the Church, in the very act of which, he was most powerfully converted—for a few months after he, joined the Church he enjoyed but little religion, but was soon quickened again, and felt impressed by the Spirit to warn sinners to flee the wrath to come; this he thought he could not do (for he was entirely illiterate,) and so thought his friends; no one encouraged him to try; but the spirit within him burned like "fire in his bones," he could not hold his peace without offending his God. This he dare not do; and he began to try, and in order to succeed he procured a Webster's Spelling-book and with the aid of his wife (for he was married in his 21st year,) he learned to read a little by spelling most of his words as he went, and memorizing a hymn for each occasion. Thus he went on, working hard by day and spelling and learning to read at night, until he was licensed to preach, quite contrary to the expected rough tion of many of his best friends. Many amusing scenes were connected with his earlier ministry, growing out of his utter absence of cultivation; he, however, was sincere and mixed much fervent prayer to God with all he done. He was subsequently admitted on trial in the Alabama Conference, and he traveled and preached with increasing acceptability, until he closed his labors and his life together Sept. 15, 1859. My personal acquaintance with our beloved and lamented Abernathy began near three years ago, since which time we have been associated in the same District till the time, and I am free to say the more I knew of him the better I loved him. I am satisfied that his real worth ever was known but by few. At the time of his death he was rapidly developing a most gigantic intellect. This, may astonish some, but is nevertheless true. Our Bro. A. was a man of no ordinary mind, but his extraordinary success was more attributable to his mighty faith, his burning zeal, and manly courage in his work than any thing else. The worst of sinners stood in awe of him, and trembled when he spoke, for he reproved sin wherever he met it, and did it in language plain and pointed, yet in the spirit of love and meekness; at one time (as he told me not long before he died) he found his zeal running before his knowledge, and himself becoming severe and sarcastic in contending for what he considered the faith once delivered to the Saints, but said he I think God found out that was not the best plan. He afterwards drank more deeply from the fountain of love, and more of the persuasive element, pervaded all his subsequent labors. I met him at his third Quarterly Meeting in feeble health, but full of the "Holy Ghost and faith," the morning became more exciting and was protracted two days. We had a joyful time on Monday morning in prayer meeting; Bro. A. led the services, and his exortation and prayer struck me, especially the prayer, as having more of heavenly wisdom and holy spirit than anything I had ever listened to, and I thought as I stood upon my knees, O how rapidly is Bro. Abernathy growing in grace. At 11 o'clock on Monday the preacher's theme was prayer for unconverted friends, those in whom we felt a special interest. At the close every one was melted to tears; the preacher walked down into the altar, and invited, that every one who had a particular friend for whom they were and had been praying, to come forward and call the name of that friend, and the preachers would engage with them in praying for those friends. And Oh, what a time we had, and none present were happier than Bro. Abernathy; when penitents were invited forward, Bro. A., at the suggestion of the minister, stepped forward and gave one of the most forcible, poluted, and powerful exhortations I ever heard. On Tuesday night the meeting closed, Bro. A. rode a short distance to a brother's house and spent the night, rose next morning quite unwell, and left for home; traveled eight or ten miles and gave out; had to stop, take his bed immediately from which he was taken a corpse. During a portion of his illness he was irrational but had lucid intervals, when he was perfectly himself, and his theme all the time was religion; in his wandering spells he would sometimes get into a discussion upon questioned points of Christian Theology, and address the most masterly arguments, and draw some of the most logical conclusions ever listened to; the day before he died, he awoke from one of his wanderings unspeakably happy, and said, I never was so happy before in all my life, said I have been out of my head till I am in myself now. As perfectly as ever in my life, I am going to die and my way is as clear as the noon-day sun. Called each one present by name, and delivered them an exhortation suitable to the circumstances, and made to all present some most powerful appeals, taking last his beloved wife, and mentioned many incidents connected with their married life, and said: "I left you and went into the high ways and hedges" to invite sinners to the marriage feast, because I could not please God without it." He sleeps in Jesus. He died in one of the kindest families in the world, and every attention was given him that kindness could invent. I bespeak for his bereaved widow and orphan children the prayers and sympathies of the whole Church.

W. D. MATHEWS.

W. P. SWIFT, died Nov. 2, 1859, at his residence in Summerfield, Alabama.

The subject of this obituary was born in April, 1813, and from childhood to manhood his whole character was marked and distinguished by a pure morality, never given to dissipation or addicted to any of the fashionable vices of the age, he became in early life a skilful and successful business man. Quickness to decide promptness to act, and an unflagging energy in the persecution of his purpose, characterized all his business intercourse. His was naturally a kind heart—its outgoings were benevolence, and his hand followed its promptings in a genuine benevolence. He never cherished a feeling of malice or hatred to any human being; in this respect he fully followed the spirit of the teaching of divine writ, for the sun never went down on his anger, and conscientiously in all his business transactions, which were many and varied, he caused no bitter enmities—engendered no malignant hatreds.

Self-reliant, he never complained, never murmured, never replied—but when difficulties and embarrassments surrounded him, worked his way hopefully through them, and success crowned his efforts.

As a neighbor and friend he was both very kind and very unostentatious. It may be safely said of him that no worthy object of suffering was presented to him when both heart and hand did not conspire to extend appropriate relief.

As a master he was indulgent; ever attentive to the comfort of his servants. It was his pleasure to condnce in their happiness.

As a father and husband, none but the heart of the orphan and the love of an idolizing wife can appreciate him. In his dying moments the ejaculations of an anguished wife as, surrounded by her weeping children, she leaned over him and spoke into his unheeding ear: "Oh, how kind! oh, how good! I shall never again watch for your coming, form the most touching and eloquent tribute that could be paid by his worth.

In 1854, at a revival, he was converted and joined the M. E. Church, South, of which he continued an acceptable member until the close of his life. His death was sudden; returning home on the evening of the 2d he was seized with congestion of the brain, soon became unconscious, and on the following night breathed his last of earth. Of him this life, and death, it may be truly said in the midst of life we are in death—for with a large business on hand, arranging his plans for the future, body and mind constantly and actively engaged, at evening like he retires from the busy haunts of life to his loved and loving home—never more to go forth among the walks of men, but although thus suddenly snatched from the agitations and excitements of this life, yet loved and respected by—both the communities of Selma and Summerfield, he has passed away from the Church militant on earth, to join that great multitude who have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. H.

MISS MARY B. SAUNDERS, died in Dayton, Ala., in the 20th year of her age. Of this sweet spirited young lady very much might be said. But she has gone to that bright world where the praises of her surviving friends are not needed. She was for four years previous to her death a quite consistent member of the Methodist Church.

While living she evinced a spirit gentle, meek, and mild; and as the Christian does, she calmly passed away to join friends that had already crossed the flood.

MRS. FRANCES E. SAUNDERS, wife of Jos. H. Saunders, died in Dayton, Alabama, September 8th, in the 54th year of her age.

She was an exemplary member of the Methodist Church for thirty years previous to her death. And truly may it be said of her, "She hath come up out of great tribulations.

When I visited her the first time after becoming her pastor, I found her on a bed of affliction, from which she was never permanently raised. And although her sickness was painful and protracted, I always found her cheerful. On one occasion when death seemed to be near, she said: "I now see that religion is all that is really worth anything in this life. Nothing else can do me any good now. In a short time she was followed by her youngest child,

MARGARET P. SAUNDERS, who died Oct. 15, in her 12th year. Never have I before witnessed so much affliction in one family during one year.

God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform.

May this broken and deeply afflicted family all meet in Heaven at last. GEO. F. ELLIS.

EMILY A., only daughter of J. M. and Eliza S. Clark, of Beauregard county, Miss., died after a short illness on the 17th inst., at the residence of her parents. Aged two years, ten months and seventeen days.

"Calm on the bosom of her God,
Fair spirit rest thee now;
E'en while on earth thy footsteps trod,
His seal was on thy brow."

HUNTSVILLE FEMALE COLLEGE, HUNTSVILLE, North Alabama.
REV. A. R. ERWIN, M. D., Principal.
This Establishment offers the following inducements to Southern patronage.
1. Huntsville is the nearest mountain location to the South and Southwest; and is proverbially healthful. The social elegance and beautiful scenery to be found here, are great auxiliaries in the formation of character.
2. The edifice is large and elegant—supplied with gas-light; and water in the greatest abundance by pipes, from a mammoth Spring in the town. It is 167 by 52 feet, three stories high, and well furnished.
3. The domestic arrangements are such as to secure not only comfort, but the social and domestic training of the pupils. Frugality, neatness and grace, as well as the virtues of the heart, are habitually cultivated.
4. The facilities of Instruction are unsurpassed. There are fifteen teachers and attaches, some of whom are distinguished educators. The large patronage, from among the best families of nine of the Southern States, attest the good will of the Institution.
5. Arrangements are made to accommodate Southern pupils during the Summer Vacation, and to furnish them with such instructions in the extra branches as may be desired. Pupil receive at any time.
Apply for a circular to REV. A. R. ERWIN, D. D.,

COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE, BATON ROUGE.
The Exercises of this Institution will be resumed on the 12th of October next.
The Principal intends to spare neither labor nor expense to make the school in its Educational Facilities and its moral influences, equal to the very best Schools in the country.
As the number of pupils is limited, it is desirable that applications be made as early as possible.
Parents are earnestly advised of the importance of having their children at Schools promptly as possible. The loss of a few days at the beginning, often proves a serious check to things in the pupils, and greatly increases the labor of the teachers for the whole session.

THE REVIVAL IN IRELAND.

We quote from a private letter to a lady in this city, from her brother—a Wesleyan minister,—dated Shinnco, Nov. 8th, 1859:

"I am glad to have to tell you that, since you left, there has broken out a glorious work of revival over nearly the whole of Ulster. I suppose you will have heard of it long before this. It commenced down in the neighborhood of Ballymena, County Antrim, and has spread through most of the counties in the province. The Presbyterians have been generally, not always, foremost, and have shared very largely in it. But the glory of it is that it is not confined to any section of the Church—Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Methodists, all have a glorious share, and a most blessed harvest.

"I have seen in some meeting-houses such scenes of holy disorder, as, some time ago, most of those quiet people would have denominated madness. It would have far surpassed the most noisy meeting you ever saw in Lowtherstown. One very peculiar feature in it is, that many are stricken down as suddenly, both in and out of meetings, as if they were shot. Some of them lie for some time as if insensible, and after some time regain some consciousness, and then begin most piteously to cry for mercy. Others cry and scream for it immediately upon their falling; but in every case there seems to be a sudden and overwhelming sense of the guilt and burden of sin, the danger of the soul, and instant need of Divine mercy and pardon, to keep them from dropping into hell. Some remain in this state for hours; some for days, like Saul of Tarsus; food or sleep are in almost every instance out of the question. Persons will be taken with it in meeting, in the field, in the bed, at the fireside, on the road, in the market—everywhere. Wherever it has gone, it has entirely changed the tone of conversation and the aspect of society, almost from the highest to the lowest. True, there are mockers and scoffers; but in the end most of them cease to rail, for the subjects of the work afterwards bring forth the fruit of the Spirit in their lives; while on the mockers themselves the heaviest judgments have fallen. In some instances the mockers have been stricken down dead; in others, have been taken suddenly and alarmingly ill, and suffered the most agonizing pain till they have expired; but, thank God, many of them have been overtaken in mercy, have been stricken down, and led for hours or days to cry for mercy till they found it, and have afterwards become monuments of God's power to save.—Some of the worst specimens of humanity have become living manifestations of God's power to save. The drunkard, the blasphemer, the Sabbath-breaker, the liar, the prayerless, the Pharisee, all have been reformed; yes, and there and there a Roman Catholic has been stricken and converted too. Of course this has set the enemies of the Lord and religion quite on edge; but still the work goes on. At the same time I would not have you imagine that all, nor even the majority, are converted to God, for the majority in most neighborhoods are still far from God.

"But what about Carrick? you ask. Well, I may tell you, in the first place, that the aristocracy, the clergy, and the devil are resolved not to let the revival into Carrick. But what might seem equally strange, I heard it stated last night, by one of the converts, that there are about or above forty converted in Mr. Gibson's congregation! There had been a few stricken and converted before my being here a month ago. Then, on that night (I had two converts with me from Ballieborough) the service was in Mrs. Lurdy's barn; an overflowing congregation; several were stricken; several others sought and found mercy in the ordinary way. At the conclusion of the meeting, near twelve o'clock, I said I would have a meeting in the morning, and give those who wished it an opportunity of telling what the Lord had done for them (for this has got rather common among all sections now), and what do you think, but thirteen or fourteen stood up and told us what God had done for their souls! Then, after that, we had a great many more stricken and converted, among whom were four of Mrs. Lurdy's own children, their uncle Richey, three or four of the Whytes, &c., &c.

After that those converted held meetings of their own and thus the work goes. Even after Gordon dismisses the scholars, they often remain in the school-room to pray.

"Last night we were in Mrs. Lurdy's barn again; full to overflowing; one or two were stricken; some found peace. We have not got a class formed yet, having no leader. I think our numbers will be doubled or more this year on the circuit. We have had a glorious work both in Cootehill and about Ballieborough.

"I intended writing to you much sooner, but did not solely for want of time. We have been, for about three months past, as busy as we could be, almost night and day. In many instances our meetings have continued till 10 o'clock, 12 o'clock, four o'clock and even to six o'clock in the morning; and some of them, in country places, followed by meetings in the morning as well. So that you will see our hands have been full."

AFRICAN EXPLORATIONS.

Africa is being opened to the world. Travelers are penetrating its territory on almost every side, and a knowledge has been secured of the climate, soil, productions, natural history, geography, resources and races, which is of the utmost importance to the future intercourse and progress of the continent.

Within a brief period, the lakes Tchad and Ngami have been brought into notice; the city of Timbuctoo has been verified as to existence, extent and resources; the white Nile, the Zambezi, and the Niger have been traced far up in their meanderings; prairies and fertile regions of vast extent visited; cotton, sugar, rice, wheat, corn, and all the rich products of tropical regions found to be successively cultivated, and a people possessing claims to civilization met with in the remote interior. These promises a large population, and point to Africa's higher agency in the world's affairs.

The work of African explorations and discoveries still goes on. Advices have been received from Dr. Livingstone's Exploring Company. A letter from Mr. Kirk, the Doctor's companion, states that a trip had been made to a lake considerably above the Zambezi. Mr. Kirk adds: "During our walk, which took us three days, going about twenty miles a day, we met some curious people, but were glad to find all friendly. I returned thus quickly, as I expected the Doctor back from Tete, whither he had gone on his first trip with the pewder, which it would have been useful to have left in a country at present at war. I received, however, instead, a letter from him, stating that the water is so low at places where the river spreads to an excessive width, that the pinnace could not be taken up at once, until the channel had been previously surveyed by the launch; that the pinnace was left somewhat a little beyond Senan, in charge of Baines; that the launch would proceed to Tete, return, pick up the pinnace; and afterwards return to Chupanga."

The great problem of the source of the Nile may now be considered as definitely solved. Captains Burton and Speke discovered a lake, called by the natives Nyanza, but by the Arabs, Ukerewe. It extends from 2° 30 south to 3° 30 north latitude, lying across the equator in east longitude 33°. Captain Burton has written a letter to the London Times, in which he states that the great lake supposed to occupy the centre of Equatorial Africa, is in reality four lakes—the Ujiji, visited by him in May, 1857, the Nyanza, visited by Capt. Speake in July, 1857; the Chuma, whose position was fixed by Dr. Lacerda in 1799; and a fourth, the position of which had just been fixed by Dr. Livingstone. They lie ranged in crescent shape, with the horns towards the east.—Col. Journal.

A STRANGE PEOPLE.

There are many old countries in the world (says one of our periodical writers) whose inhabitants rejoice in many odd customs; but for the oddest of people, and the queerest of manners, commend us to those islands included in the sovereignty of Japan.

Until a very recent date, no Europeans were permitted to trespass beyond the sacred limits of this most exclusive of empires, nor were any Japanese allowed to quit their native shores. Even now, when you land at Nagasaki, your movements are watched by regular sentries who report every step you take to their superiors, while to prevent the Japanese themselves from running to foreign lands, all those found at both the ports are guarded, with open sterns, so that long sea voyages are impossible; and if they exclude us from visiting them, they are in turn equally debarred from visiting us.

They need not be afraid of visitors, from any possibility of being overpowered by numbers; for the thousand and one isles which make up the empire of Japan, contain thirteen thousand densely-populated towns. Jeddo, the capital, seated in the island of Niphon, has a population nearly equal to that of London: and we are told by travellers that the castle in which resides the secular Emperor (there are two Emperors—one sacred, one secular) could accommodate 40,000 men. Miako, a city covering twelve square miles, could raise a battalion of 52,000 priests alone; while Osacca, the Birmingham of the Empire, could itself send forth an army of 80,000. "You scarcely emerge from one borough," says Kempfer, "but you enter another: and you may travel many miles, as it were, in one street, without knowing it to be composed of many villages save by the different names that were formerly given them, and which they after retained, though joined to one another."

Earthquakes are disastrously frequent in Japan, and are of terribly long duration. One in 1595 lasted, with varying intensity, for forty days. Two hundred thousand perished at Jeddo during the convulsion of 1703; and a large city was prostrated by that of 1792. It becomes impossible, therefore, for the Japanese architects to construct lofty piles out of clay and bamboo, and the chimnies of the Manchester factories would be out of place in Niphon. The law restricts the height of a dwelling to six kins, or forty-four feet three inches; and there are few houses which boast of more than one storey.

Let us walk into a Japanese house, passing without notice the worthy householder, who sits in a tub of water at the door, performing his ablations with a refreshing freedom from bashfulness. You notice that the floor is slightly raised above the level of the earth, and thickly covered with mats of rushes and rice straw elegantly decorated. These mats are used instead of chairs; and there are no tables, but you will be provided with a little raised tray when you take refreshments. There are no beds; you must sleep upon mats, smoke upon mats, and fidget upon mats.

Observe that the rooms are separated by folding screens of gilt or colored papers; and lighted by windows of oiled paper, for glass is unknown. You cannot warm yourself at the fire; there is, alas! no fire-place; but in the middle of the room you may crouch down on the brink of the square-tiled hole, from which ascend the fumes of charcoal. The said charcoal, by the by, is always burning, and over it a kettle of hot water is always boiling. The Japanese drink tea as voraciously as old women in England; but they use little sugar, don't put many spoonfuls into the pot, and serve it up in porcelain cups.

The bath-room resembles European bath-rooms in its general appointments; but it is more frequently resorted to than in our chilly British Isles. The Japanese men bathe, the women bathe, the children bathe, indoors and out of doors, morning, noon and night. The water movement is universal, and is, indeed, most zealously followed out.

At the top of the house is a large tub of water as a resource in the not unfrequent event of a conflagration. No London Insurance Company, we fancy, would insure at any premium the inflammable structures of bamboos, screens, oiled paper, mats, and timber, reared by the Japanese houses. There are wooden tanks in the streets, and rude fire engines at appointed stations, where the alarm is given by the patrols, who, on discovering the first shooting flames, strike forcibly the thick planks suspended from posts for that purpose.

The Japanese women, according to recent travellers, are models of amiability and good temper, graceful in their manners, and attractive in their persons. But they die their lips a fierce scarlet, their cheeks a violet, and stain their teeth black, with a detestable gangrenous compound; practices scarcely in harmony with the toilet artifices of an English belle. They are fond of dress, of course, or would they be women?

The Japanese gentleman is, generally, a well-looking, intelligent, and active individual. He wears two swords—a large and a small one; while the middle-class man is only entitled to one sword; and the "lower orders" carry none. He carries a fan wherever he goes, and whatever he does; and he delights in huge trowsers, like a sheet, "stitched up between the legs, though open at the sides, in order to allow of the play of the feet whilst walking." His shoes, and his horse's shoes are made of plaited straw. Consequently they wear out with unequalled rapidity, and forces upon their wearer a shambling, shuffling gait, like Robinson's in the "Wandering Minstrels." Runners and carriers are not in good odour in Japan; for they have to touch the bodies of the dead—a necessity which the Japanese religion singularly enough resents.

Rendall in his "Memorials of the Empire of Japan," pronounces an opinion on the Japanese character which seems admirably impartial: "They carry, he says, their notions of honor to the verge of fanaticism, and they are haughty, vindictive, and licentious. On the other hand, brawlers, braggarts, and back-biters are held in the most supreme contempt. The slightest infraction of truth is punished with severity; they are open-hearted, hospitable, and as friends faithful to death. It is represented that there is no peril a Japanese will not encounter to save a friend; that no torture will compel him to break a trust; and that even a stranger who seeks aid, will be protected to the last drop of blood.—Christian Miscellany.

IMPORTANT DISCOVERY.

Rev. Mr. Seeley, formerly of this city, now in Paris, communicates to the Republican the following interesting particulars of a promising discovery in France for purposes of health, agriculture and surgery:—

This discovery, made by Messrs. Corne and Demeaux, and thus far known as "Corne and Demeaux's Disinfecting powder," or, as the "French Disinfecting Powder," is as simple in its character as its results promise to be important. These gentlemen, in the course of some experiments, ascertained that a simple mixture of the ordinary plaster of Paris and coal-tar (which is produced by the distillation of coal for gas) has very powerful antiseptic properties. The proportions of the ingredients are, one hundred parts of the plaster of Paris to from one to three parts of the coal-tar; and the mixture to be thoroughly made with a mortar and pestle, or in a hand mill, or by such other method as the quantity desired and the means of the operator may dictate. The process cannot be very difficult, since the article fully prepared is sold in Paris for about ten cents per pound. It is used for disinfecting, or anti-septic purposes, some of which I will indicate. For preventing the disagreeable of sinks, etc., the effect is instantaneous, and it is so much cheaper that chloride of lime must entirely fall into disuse. Two pounds of the powder are sufficient to disolve in twenty-two gallons of water; or a tablespoonful dissolved in 3 3-4 pints of water, is sufficient per day to render inodorous the refuse of a household of four or five persons. A morsel, the size of a pin's head, will render limpid and fit for use a pint and a half of water, which is beginning to become putrescent. The value of such a discovery for those who travel in the East, and especially for ships at sea, cannot well be overstated.

But it has also an important relation to agriculture. One-half pound of the powder, dissolved in five or six gallons of water and sprinkled on the litter of a stable, will deprive one cubic yard of manure of all odor, and prevent the loss of its fertilizing qualities. It was on this feature of the case that I thought you might easily institute experiments, and, if successful, you will not fail to see what a boon such a discovery must prove to all those farmers who comprehend the necessity of preserving in the best possible condition, and making the best possible use of all the fertilizing materials produced on the farm. It is probably no exaggeration to affirm that tens of thousands of dollars are evaporated every year from the exposed and smoking manure heaps around the barns and out-houses of the Massachusetts farmers; and if there be any virtue in this alleged discovery, coal-tar enough to prevent all this waste is furnished by any gas establishment in the State. Every farmer is wont to use plaster, more or less, on his land. Let him apply a small portion of it in the form and manner here suggested, and its usefulness will be much more certain, in all cases, than at present.

But the relations of the discovery, which are regarded with most interest in France, just at present, are those which it sustains to surgery. It is claimed that, applied as an ointment (made of the mixture) or in the simple form of a powder, to severe wounds and sores, to cancerous ulcers, and to suppurating abscesses, it instantaneously deprives them of all odor, and brings the wound into such a state that the ordinary healing applications act successfully. Doctor Velpeau, has reported to the Imperial Academy of Medicine, expressing high approbation of it as a dressing for wounds. Immediately after this report, the suggestion was made that it might be of great service to the wounded of the army in Italy. Accordingly it was tried in the hospitals at Milan, by direction of Baron Larrey, physician in chief to the Emperor. I give a translation of a brief report on the subject, made to Marshal Vaillant, major general of the army of Italy, by the surgeon, Dr. Cruveilhier, under whose eye the experiments were made:

"In conformity with your orders, and following the instructions left by Dr. Larrey, the powder of coal-tar has been employed in the hospital of Milan on the wounded in whose wounds the gangrenous process, or hospital suppuration had commenced. The first applications of the remedy, both in powder and as an ointment, were made on the 1st of August. The immediate results were very favorable, and the disinfecting properties of the topic were versified in the cases of more than twenty patients who were treated by different physicians. Still farther, it has been proved that under the influence of this preparation and of good living, the wounds, being disinfected, are then modified, and in a few days the greater part of them present a greatly improved appearance. The application of the disinfectant is not omitted till the wounds, restored to a normal condition, are able to feel the action of the medicaments namely employed to promote the healing process. Twenty observations made in the hospitals in Milan put these conclusions beyond all doubt."

From the foregoing may be learned what appears to be the general opinion among French surgeons as to the effect of the mixture on wounds, though there have been some difference of opinion as to whether the powder is or is not strictly to be regarded as a disinfectant. That it is a powerful anti-septic, no one doubts, and time will discover whether or not it also possesses disinfecting properties.

TURKS ASKING FOR THE WAY OF LIFE.

The Rev. Mr. Bliss, Agent of the American Bible Society in Turkey, states in a letter dated August 30th, 1859, that about 100 copies of the bible had been sold to Mohammedans during the past year.

Some of the Mohammedans, (he says) "have been led to accept of Christ as their Saviour, and many others have gratified their hungerings and thirstings for better spiritual food than that furnished them in the absurdities and contradictions of the Koran. The missionary he then best acquainted with some of these Bible-reading Turks, believe that a deep spiritual work is in progress in their hearts. The number of inquiries after the way of life is on the increase. For a few weeks past the house of Mr. Williams has been seldom free from visitors. If we sift out the 'curious' and the 'disputatious,' a goodly number is left of those to whom, by night and by day, this brother has opportunity to explain and enforce the truth which the Bible unfolds and which, when understood, the Holy Spirit so often, even in these dark lands, graciously sanctifies to the salvation of the soul. Among these are individuals from far distant Persia, men of wealth and station, intelligent, earnest men, who, with tears in their eyes, have avowed their love for the Lord Jesus Christ, and their desire henceforth to serve him alone. Among them also are persons connected with families of the best and most influential Turks in this city, (Constantinople,) who seem ready to suffer, if need be, for Christ's sake.—Letters from other cities indicate a similar state of things. One speaks of two Mohammedan inquirers, and many other Turks, who are known to be carefully reading the Scriptures.' Another reports 'More copies of the Turkish Scriptures sold by colporteurs and others, than during any previous year;' and adds, that 'we know of several Mussulmans who are daily reading the New Testament with deep interest.' Another letter from the interior speaks of a Turk who gives good evidence of conversion, and from his unswerving avowal of the truth, is suffering much persecution. Two others are in sympathy with him, and seem almost ready to suffer with him for the truth's sake.

I will add a few incidents of our city colportage. A few days since, one of our most earnest laborers in this department, accosted a Turkish officer as he was passing along the street. He offered him a Testament in Turkish.—The officer took it, and after examining it a few moments, said, 'I am very glad to get this book. Have you the Bible also?' The colporteur had none with him, but promised, (if he would tell him where to leave it,) to furnish him with one the next day. But I shall not be here to-morrow,' said the man. 'Then,' said the colporteur, 'I will go with you now to your dwelling, and then go to my room and get a copy and bring it to you to night.' This the colporteur accomplished, and received not only the price of the book, but the most hearty thanks of the officer. The same colporteur, in his modest, unassuming way offered a French Bible to a Turk of high rank, while sitting in his splendid carriage in front of one of the hotels in Pera. This gentleman took it but immediately returned it and asked for one in Turkish. The colporteur handed him a Testament, which he took and read aloud for some time. Before he finished, quite a company were listening to him."

"FROM HOUSE TO HOUSE."

Apostolic labors give the key to apostolic success. The same principles which wrought revolutions in ancient times will produce like effects now. It is pitiful to see the work of God committed to the hands of drones. It is a spectacle which might make angels sigh—that forlorn, spiritless, unsuccessful charge, cursed by the pastorate of a drawling, pointless, indolent and ignorant pretender to the ministry. Success is the fruit of a holy life and a laborious ministry—soul-saving success. We must have success in our work, or have nothing. Let no man suppose himself excusable when he flouts at successful ministers, as though to have a revival were a crime. No we must preach for effect, labor for grand results, and go from house to house to urge the people to seek salvation. Mr. Wesley says in his Journal: "In the evening I reached Colchester. I found the society had decreased since I——C—— went away, and yet they had full as good preachers. But this is not sufficient. By repeated experiments we learn that though a man preach like an angel he will neither collect nor preserve a society which is collected, without visiting them from house to house."

One hundred years of Methodistic labors, sufferings and successes have greatly added to the strength of this remark of John Wesley.

Every presiding elder knows how hard it is to get places for men who will not visit from house to house. Every one knows that a man of moderate abilities, who has a warm heart, and is a good pastor, is always valued by the people, always sought after, always successful.

Now the great harvest is ripe, the fields are white, we are sent to gather the plenteous fruits. No amount of oratory will compensate for want of piety, and want of piety is the chief obstacle to teaching from house to house. If your faith is weak, if your souls are almost famished, if you fear you cannot succeed in the pulpit, go from house to house. Try your talents at prayer, and at home thrusts at backsliding at the fireside. Try to speak like a messenger of God personally, to the dying sinner you may meet. If you have the slightest respect for the church, for your character, for the examples of good men, do not disgrace all, reproach all, by becoming a clerical lounger.—Dangers to piety are think in the resorts of the villages go not there but to warn the wicked. When we say we have no time for pastoral visiting, we lie to the Holy Ghost. It is simply false—a hollow pretence of industry in study, which deceives no one but the victim who makes the mean excuse. I will venture to say that I can take that preacher's place, who has no time for pastoral visiting, read, write, study and work more than he does fourfold, and then visit one-half of every day. It is wrong to cheat ourselves of the rich rewards of a clean conscience, a buoyant faith, and an irrepressible love, for the puerile consideration that we have not time. If God ever sent men to work, he has sent us now and here. We must work fast, or the moral pestilence which has fallen in spots on our country, will ravage all our coasts. Hell is hurling its shaft at us, not at our mules and dogs, but at our men, women, and at our senators, statesmen and ministers. Sin is bold, rampant, universal. Now is the time to work, and not to snivel. Now is the day of battle, and men are needed, not camp followers, not mere drones who are in for booty.—N. Y. Christian Adv.

There is thought to be very little use in a man's meaning well, if he cannot express his meanings by his acts.

THE WORK IN NORWAY AND SWEDEN.

Dr. Baird, in the Observer gives an encouraging view of the work of God in these northern countries. He says:

But one of the most important means of keeping alive and extending the truth in both Sweden and Norway has been the holding of little meetings for prayer, praise and the reading of the Bible and religious tracts and books in private houses in the villages and hamlets, and in the summer time often in the forests, on the hill or mountain side. I can never forget the scenes which I myself have witnessed in these little meetings in the northern part of Sweden in the summer of 1841. At one of them, in a most romantic spot high up the side of a hill, from which there was a delightful view of the beautiful valley to the west, nearly one hundred persons assembled in the afternoon of one of the long days that the inhabitants of that part of Sweden enjoy at that season of the year. An hour and a half was spent in religious services. Besides portions of the Scripture, a few chapters from the life of Martin Boos, one of the most remarkable men of our times, were read; several hymns were sung, and several prayers were offered up. It was indeed good to be there.

It cannot be doubted that these little meetings, conducted in many places by pious and often poor farmers and mechanics, have been a great means of reviving vital godliness in the Central and Northern parts of Sweden. In many places at first and for a long time, the unconverted pastors of the National Church, as well as the openly wicked, greatly opposed these meetings. Fines, imprisonments, and other modes of punishment were resorted to, but in vain. Several thousands, indeed, emigrated to America, and are now to be found in Illinois and Wisconsin; but the good work has gone forward. Within the last eight or ten months, such has been its extension and power, that almost all parts of the kingdom have felt its influence. It is believed that nearly if not a quarter of a million, in a population of, at the very utmost, 3,500,000, have embraced religion. This is a great blessing for that poor and sparsely populated country, and calls for devout thanks on our part; for the spread of the gospel in any part of the world, and especially in countries from which hundreds and thousands are every year coming to us, ought to interest us.

In conclusion, I have to say that this good work is making a decided impression on the literature of Sweden. There is now a great demand for good books. Not are the higher classes in all cases unaffected by this great movement. A member of the royal family, the Princess Eugenie, the sister of the king, has been occupying herself with the task of translating, and the "Vineyard and the Laborer" has come from her pen. And though her brother, the king, is far from having her spirit and character, yet as he has many subjects who pray for him every day of their lives, who can fail to hope well for him?

MORE HINTS FOR SPEAKERS.

Don't offer old Wares. I wonder how often I've heard upon the platform the story of Samuel Crowther's capture and conversion—told year after year, sometimes by the same speaker to the same hearers. I wonder how often I've heard of New Zealand, the capture of the ship "Boyd," and the destruction of its crew by the cannibal inhabitants; of the first visit of Marsden to its shores; the gradual progress of the gospel in its midst, until the whole became leavened; of the present auspicious aspect of the island and its inhabitants. I wonder how often I've heard the changes rung upon the old aphorism, "Charity begins at home." I wonder how often I've heard that anecdote of Doddridge's, of Hervey's encounter with a young lady in a stage coach, who was expatiating in glowing terms upon the pleasure of going to a theatre, who summed up its attractions as three-fold—those of anticipation, enjoyment and recollection, and to whom the preacher said, "You have forgotten another, one pleasure—the pleasure of remembering it upon your death-bed."

Now, if you are going to speak—to address a teachers' or mechanical institute, or a young men's association, a Sunday-school or a prayer-meeting, look out for new thoughts and new facts. Try to instruct your auditory—to tell them something they did not know before; or to place in a more impressive aspect before them something that they did not know. Scripture is not barren, science is not barren, life is not barren. Glorious discoveries are turning up every day in each of these spheres. Dive down into the ocean in good earnest, and you shall find the pearls. Patiently search for the hidden treasures and it shall come precious and sparkling to your hand.

Avoid Bombast. Don't attempt to climb the mountains, or fathom the ocean, or count the stars in every speech you make. Indeed, if you climb, you may show, like the ape, your deformity by climbing. Try to instruct rather than to astonish; to utter good sense rather than high-flowing sentiments. I shall never forget a speech I once heard on a Bible Society platform. Such a wealth of language, and such a poverty of thought, were surely never before conjoined. I am sure the composition of that speech must have occupied its author several hours, and yet though he was about twenty-five minutes speaking, he did not leave behind him the impression of one idea. His hearers, or at least the discerning part of them, felt that what they had heard was simply a hotch-potch of long and magnificent words, of noisy tones, of arms flying about like mill-sails, and of bluster all about nothing—in short, a "roaring catnract of nonsense."

I know that all this rant and fuss pleases some. There are those who are like the poor negro that valued his shoes in proportion to the squeak leather in them, and who specially ordered an extra shilling's worth of the imposing ingredient. They don't care about preaching or speaking unless it be incomprehensible in matter, and unless in its delivery it oat-heroics. Here. Far be it from you to cultivate so vulgar a taste, to forget that what is great is generally simple—that sense and power are in the majority of instances indirectly in inverse ratio to gaudy parade and outward sound.—*S. PRESERVATION OF THE DEAD.

A citizen of Albany, New York, has invited and obtained a patent for constructing coffins of glass, whereby, he claims, the bodies of those committed to the tomb "may be preserved in their natural state for all time to come; and when placed in vaults, can always be accessible to the gaze of those who are left behind."

The coffin is made in the ordinary form, of glass, from one half to one inch in thickness, cast in two pieces. In the upper edge of the body of the coffin is a groove in which a tongue in the lid loosely fits. When a corpse is placed in the coffin, this groove is filled with melted cement; the lid is placed on, and firmly held by three iron bands till the cement is hardened. Through a small hole in the top of the coffin, the air is then extracted by means of an air pump, and finally the opening is hermetically sealed.

It is stated that the expense of these coffins will not exceed that of the ordinary wooden ones; hence the expectation is indulged by some, that if their preserving qualities are found to be as great as the inventor states, they will soon come into general use.

There are those who question the wisdom of attempting to prevent the body from returning to the earth, after the spirit has returned to God who gave it. In all times, however, of which we have recorded, affection and reverence have striven to preserve the form and memory of those who, when alive, were loved or worshiped. The mummies of Egypt, in her days of greatest glory, embalmed with the greatest skill and care, perfumed with the richest spices, and wrapped in the finest fabrics; the Mammoth Cave of Kentucky, with its hundreds of smoke-dried Indian mummies, dressed in the skins of wild animals and ornamented with beads, shells, and feathers; the marble vault of modern times, surrounded by fragrant flowers and evergreens; and the humble cross at the head of the peasant's grave, on which, in rude and irregular characters, the name and age of the buried babe is inscribed—all attest this. We are not competent to decide the question between reason and affection; each one must do it for himself. To the loving and unreasoning ones, at least, the glass coffin will come as a welcome boon.

A Test.—One of the best ways of ascertaining the nature of things is to ask dying sinners. They commonly speak clearly and uniformly. Not one of them has ever pronounced gold or earthly honor or carnal pleasure of real value to a dying man. Not one of them has ever pronounced a life of sin wise, or a death of sin desirable. Nor do dying sinners testify to the value of their strong delusions, even when they hug them fast. The utmost terror can do in that awful hour, is to make those embracing it sullen or irritable. It never kindles up the countenance with an unearthly smile: it never gives songs in the night. "The doctrine of the cross is the only religion for a dying sinner." Nothing else bears the soul above the world.

EXTRAVAGANCE OF THE AGE.

A shrewd writer, who is in the habit of telling home truths which go direct to the heart of the popular follies of the day, has the following in relation to the pernicious system of domestic education, so fatally prevalent at the present time:

"In the town of Somewhere lives Mr. Manygirls. He is a toilsome merchant, his wife a hard-working housekeeper. Once they were poor, now they are ruinously rich. They have seven daughters, whom they train up in utter idleness. They spend much money, but not in works of humanity, not even in elegant accomplishments, in painting, dancing, music, and the like; and so paying in spiritual beauty what they take in material means. They never read nor sing; they are know-nothings, null, only in vain show, as useless as a ghost, and as ignorant as the blocks on which their bonnets are made. Now, these seven 'ladies,' as the newspapers call the poor things, so ignorant and helpless, are not only idle, can earn nothing, but consume much. What a load of finery is on their shoulders, and heads, and necks! Mr. Manygirls hires many men and women to wait on his daughters' idleness, and these servants are withdrawn from productive work in nursing these seven grown-up babies.

On the other side of the way, the Hon. Mr. Manysons has seven sons, who are the exact match for the merchant's daughters; rich, idle, some of them dissolute; debauchery coming before their beard; all useless, earning nothing, spending much, wasting more. The only labor is to kill time; and in summer they emigrate from pond to pond, from lake to lake, having a fishing line with a worm at one end and a fool at the other. These are fast families in Somewhere. Their idleness is counted pleasure. Six of these sons will marry, and five perhaps of Manygirls's daughters, and what families they will found to live on the toil of their grandfather's bones; till a commercial crisis, and the wear and tear of time has dissipated their fortunes, and they are forced reluctantly to toil.

Besides, there is an enormous waste of food, fuel, clothing, of every thing. We are the least economical civilized people on earth. Of course the poor are wasteful every where, they do not know how to economize, and they have not the means. They must live from hand to mouth, and half that is put into the hand perishes before it reaches the mouth. So likewise are the rich wasteful who have inherited money, almost never such who have earned it. The great mass of the people are not economical, but wasteful. It is the habit of the whole country.

CLERICAL ODDITIES.

Dr. John Blair Smith, President of Union College, was an eloquent extemporaneous preacher. His custom was to hold a small Bible in his hand, in which was fitted a bit of paper, which he would bring to his eye at each new turn of his discourse. One day in an animated burst of feeling, his thumb, which held down the paper to its place, let go its charge, and the fugitive "notes" sailed away on the breeze into the broad aisle. The doctor very quietly tore off a small piece of newspaper which he had in his pocket, put it under his thumb aforesaid, and then went on as usual with his sermon, lifting his "notes" to his eye as before, to help his mental motions, much to the amusement of some of the spectators.

Dr. James Muir, of the District of Columbia, wrote all his sermons, and recited them memoriter. But unless the manuscript was in his pocket he could not go on at all, though he never used it. One day, having left it at home, he was obliged to send for it before he could begin the recitation. He was buried, at his own request, in a grave thirteen feet deep under his pulpit.

In writing sermons, Dr. Muir was in the habit of folding the requisite amount of paper and then scattering catch-words along the pages; after which he would proceed to fill at intervals with the thoughts which he had already carefully studied in his own mind.

Dr. David Porter was a great oddity. A Napoleon head, joined by a short neck upon a very portly body, which stood upon a pair of remarkably spindle legs, cased in small clothes and silk hose, was the striking figure of as uncommon a mind. When fairly under way in the pulpit, his short, terse sentences, jerked out with a nod of the head and a stamp of the foot, or the rap of his cane, which he sometimes did not lay aside even in preaching, told like hitting of bullets. In the lecture-room he would not only traverse the platform, but at times descended to the floor, step over a bench to some open space, walk there awhile, step over another bench, and get back to the desk from the opposite side, and all the while carrying on his address without a break.

Dr. Porter was very absent-minded. Praying with his eyes open, as was his habit, at a "neighborhood meeting," he chanced to see a friend just arrived in the company, when, to the surprise of every body, he crossed the room and extended his hand, exclaiming, with a voice of pleasure, "O! how do'do?"—not seeming aware at all of the eccentric movement.—Sprague's Annals.

LORD BROUGHAM.

His parents, though neither wealthy nor distinguished by aristocratic titles, were in comfortable circumstances, and occupied a highly respectable social position. In childhood he was delicate and feeble to such a degree—being subject to frequent attacks of illness—that only faint hopes were entertained that he would ever attain the age of manhood. The apprehensions thus excited were rather increased than diminished by the precocious development of his mental faculties—another child of the Brougham family, whose intelligence and memory had been equally remarkable, having died in his tenth year—for young Henry had not only learned to read with facility, and to perform the simpler operations in arithmetic, when six years old, but was capable of reciting whole passages from Waller, Dryden and Pope, with unerring accuracy. The family physician concurred in the opinion that it was not desirable to encourage his intellectual progress as long as his health continued in this precarious state. For over six months the child was scarcely permitted to see a book. Finding that he was nothing the better physically, if not the worse, for this privation, his aunt—a liberally educated, sensible maiden lady—took upon herself the responsibility not only of furnishing him such books as he wished, but devoted herself earnestly to teaching him. She had been engaged nearly a year at this labor of love before the secret was discovered; and, as "little Harry" had then become as healthy as any of his playmates, it is almost needless to say, that she did not receive much blame from his parents; although the doctor felt somewhat mortified, when it became evident that, after all, it was not his learned and skillful advice which was attended with such excellent results. This little episode, trifling as it is in itself, and early in the life of Brougham as it occurred, is worth mentioning thus parenthetically, as an additional instance of the important influence exercised by woman on the early education of illustrious men. It is one to which Lord Brougham refers himself with pride and gratitude this day; and the remembrance of which has rendered him through life the uncompromising friend of the gentle sex.—E. I. Sears in Harnard's Journal of Education.

A PICTURE OF WAR.

"What, speaking in quite unofficial language, is the net purport and upshot of war? To my own knowledge, for example, there dwell and toil, in the British village of Dundrudge, usually some five hundred souls. From these, by certain natural enemies of the French, there are successively selected, during the French war, say thirty able-bodied men; Dundrudge, at her own expense, has suckled and nursed them; she has, not without difficulty and sorrow, fed them up to manhood, and even trained them up to crafts, so that one can weave, another build, another hammer, and the weakest stand under thirty stone avoirdupois. Nevertheless, amid much weeping and swearing, they are selected, all dressed in red, and shipped away at the public charge, some two thousand miles, or say only to the South of Spain; and fed there till wanted. And now, to that same spot in the South of Spain, are thirty similar French artisans from some French Dundrudge, in like manner weeding, till at length, after infinite effort, the two parties come into actual juxtaposition; and thirty stands fronting thirty, each with a gun to his head. Straightway the word 'Fire!' is given; and they blow the souls out of one another; and in the place of sixty brisk, useful craftsmen, the world has sixty dead carcasses, which it must bury, and anew shed tears for. Had these men any quarrel? No! Busy as the Devil is, not the smallest. They lived far enough apart; were they entirely strangers? Nay: in so wide a universe there was even unconsciously, by commerce, some mutual helpfulness between them. How then? Simpleton! their governors had fallen out; and instead of shooting one another, had the cunning to make these poor blockheads shoot. Alas! so it is in our land, and hitherto, in all other lands; still as of old, what devilry soever kings do, the people must pay the piper!"—Carlyle.

THE FIRST PRAYER IN CONGRESS.

There is a note in Thatcher's Military Journal, under date of December, 1777, containing the identical "first prayer in Congress," made by the Rev. Jacob Duche, of Philadelphia, which we copy as a historical reminiscence in that day of trial.

O Lord, our heavenly Father, high and mighty King of kings, and Lord of lords, who dost from thy throne behold all the dwellers on earth, and reignest with power supreme and uncontrolled over all the kingdoms, empires, and governments; look down in mercy, we beseech thee, on these American States, who have fled to thee from the rod of the oppressor, and thrown themselves on thy gracious protection, desiring to be henceforth only dependent on thee; to thee they have appealed for the righteousness of their cause; to thee do they now look up for that countenance and support which thou alone canst give: take them, therefore, heavenly Father, under thy nurturing care; give them wisdom in council and valor in the field; defeat the malicious designs of our cruel adversaries; convince them of the unrighteousness of their cause; and if they still persist in their sanguinary purposes, O! let the voice of thine own unerring justice, sounding in their hearts, constrain them to drop the weapons of war from their unnerved hands in the day of battle. Be thou present, O God of Wisdom, and direct the councils of this honorable assembly; enable them to settle things on the best and surest foundation, that the scene of blood may be speedily closed, that order, harmony, and peace, may be effectually restored; and truth and justice, religion and piety, prevail and flourish amongst thy people. Preserve the health of their bodies and the vigor of their minds; shower down on them and the millions they here represent, such temporal blessings as thou seest expedient for them in this world, and crown them with everlasting glory in the world to come. All this we ask in the name and through the merits of Jesus Christ, thy Son, our Savior. Amen!

SILENT INFLUENCES.

Silent influences are continually about us on every side, and they are quietly performing their mystic work. Unnoted, in secret the diligent task goes on, till the gigantic result in all the finished completeness of a masterhand that never errs, startles us into the belief a miracle is wrought. Noiselessly, with untiring vigilance, secret agents toil in nature's vast laboratory, and their grand and mighty achievements awaken our admiration and awe. Stealthily, silently has the mighty water changed its course, and where first but a glimpse of the silvery sheet could be caught, the foaming billows now roll and dance in their wild sports; and terra firma has arisen on the other side far beyond, where but a little time ago, and the sheeny wave danced at our very feet. The workings of a power unseen spreads from the tiny acorn to the majestic oak. Atom by atom, grain by grain, rock against rock, pile the lofty mountains, whose cloud curtained summits clouded in eternal snows, pierce far heavenward, "where the eagle builds her nest, and the startled chamois fears to climb." Within us, around us, on either hand silent influences toil on their mystic m

New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Terms—$2 00 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1859.

ACCOUNTS—NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

All parties interested in the Advocate—Editor, Preachers, and Subscribers—are interested in avoiding confusion in accounts.

Those well acquainted with the credit system in the newspaper business know full well that, under that system, confusion in accounts never was, never will, never can be avoided.—Uncertain mails, unavoidable oversights in agents or clerks, forgetfulness in subscribers and others, and the wearying, vexatious details of this business over all others, render it impossible. We have tried, for years, and know.

To have the subscription begin and end with the year, and to pay, if not in advance, at least once a year, is the nearest approach to a remedy that we can devise,—and this is our plan.

Immediately after the Conferences, all the accounts will be made out to January, 1861, without reference to time of commencement, or time last paid to; and they will be sent to each subscriber who has not paid to January, 1861.

If all our subscribers and agents will patiently co-operate with us, this difficulty about accounts will be forever settled during the coming year. After that, when January, 1861, comes, $2 more will be due, and so on.

Will our brethren and friends, when they receive these accounts, immediately remit the money to the office, or pay to the preacher, taking a receipt? If any think the account incorrect, let him inform us, pleasantly, without quarreling. We never quarrel, though we have more cause than others.

The volume of the Advocate will hereafter begin and end with the year; and it is very desirable that subscriptions should conform to the same rule.

Therefore, new subscribers, who do not begin with the year, will please send, not two dollars, but an amount sufficient to pay for the paper till the end of the year, at the rate of Four Cents a Week.

Then, every subscriber will know, without being informed, that at the beginning of the year is the time to remit the subscription money.

And let us have scores, hundreds, thousands of new subscribers with which to begin the New Volume, January 1st, 1860.—We intend, if Providence smile on us, to make a better paper next year than ever before. Arrangements are made, and being made, for greatly increasing its attractions.—Some new writers, of the first order, will begin with the year. The paper is flatteringly approved now—we intend to merit higher approbation.

THE ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

The Editor of the Advocate has not yet returned from the Alabama Conference, nor have we heard when the session closed. We are expecting the Editor's arrival hourly, with the Conference documents; but this number of the paper can wait no longer for those documents. Next week our readers may expect to see them published in full. In the meantime we append some items concerning the opening of the Alabama Conference, which we gather from a letter to the Charleston Advocate, dated "Eufaula, Ala., Dec. 2nd, 1859:"

The Conference assembled at nine o'clock with Bishop Kavanaugh in the Chair. This is the first Conference the Bishop has been able to attend since his long and dangerous illness in the summer and fall, and he has not yet recovered his former strength. Mrs. Kavanaugh is here with him.

This Conference is the largest in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, having over two hundred members It has become rather unwieldy, and will probably be divided at next General Conference.

Dr. Wightman is here, having been transferred from the South Carolina Conference It was gratifying to grasp the hand, among so many strangers, of one who has been to me for the last twenty years so true and valuable a friend as the new President of the Southern University at Greensboro, Alabama. With grief at our loss of him in South Carolina, is mingled congratulation to our friends in Alabama on their gain. All happiness and success to him in his new position.

Dr. Sassnett is here also, the President of the East Alabama Male College at Auburn—just transferred from the Georgia Conference. With what it had before and a few such transfers as these, the Alabama Conference will surely become strong enough after a while.

But little business of importance has as yet transpired beyond the appointment of the usual committees, to whom have been referred the various documents presented to the body; and the reports of the examining committees, together with the consideration of the cases of the many applicants for admission to deacon's and elder's orders. Those for admission on trial have not yet been considered; so the number is not yet known, but a large class of them appeared before the Bishop in the preliminary examination.

Dr. Summers is here as a member of this Conference. Rev. R. Abbey, Financial Secretary of the Publishing House, and Rev. C. C. Gillespie, Editor of the New Orleans Christian Advocate, are also present. Dr Hamilton also appears among his brethren, but in feeble health.—He will probably go to Central America on a tour of observation for Missionary purposes, as well as on account of his health.

A PRISONER FOR THE GOSPEL IN SPAIN.

At a late meeting of the Evangelical Alliance mention was made of the case of Escalante, a British subject, who is in prison at Cadiz for the "crime" of giving away a copy of the Bible. The following particulars are given in the correspondence of the London News of the Churches:

"Escalante, who was arrested in the beginning of May for the crime of disturbing the Bible or New Testament, still languishes in his prison at Cadiz. He is said to be well treated, but those who have felt the sun of Andalusia may imagine what he has suffered during the past summer. He has been afflicted with fever, and still complains of weakness and trembling in his limbs. His father lately died at Gibralter of palsy, and his poor wife gave birth to a little girl, and is in delicate health. Such a load of sorrows has failed to move the Government or its directors, the priests, whose policy is now, as ever, when they have the power, to wear out the saints of the Most High. Escalante is a native of Gibraltar, and was born under the protection of the British power, and, as yet, he has invoked that protection to little purpose. It is true consuls and ambassadors have not overlooked the case. They offered bail, but it was refused, and yet there is no word of Escalante being brought to trial. The manly Cromwell spirit is gone in high quarters, and instead, we have a poor, uncertain, vacillating policy, truckling to the loudest and strongest party. Statesmen fear the Popish party at home, and they hesitate to carry out their own convictions, unless backed by the voice of the people. If justice is not very openly done to our fellow-subject now in prison for the gospel's sake, and for obeying his Lord's commandment, the Churches and Christian bodies of Britain must bestir themselves, and, as in the case of the Madiai, force Rome to give up her suffering victim. Lord John Russel has, it is said, instructed our Ambassador to request the release of Escalante from the Queen of Spain, and his request has been communicated to the Foreign Minister, but, according to the last accounts, Escalante is still in prison."

ARRIVAL OF BISHOP PIERCE.

It is with pleasure that we announce the safe arrival in our city, of Bishop Pierce and family from California. The Church will rejoice to hear that the Bishop's health has improved, still he is not looking robust and strong as when he left us. The Bishop and his family will remain but a few days in this city, and are the guests of our friend, W. R. Smart.

REPORT OF TREASURER OF MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

Natchez, Miss., Nov. 28, 1859.

Rev. C. C. Gillespie,

Rev. and Dear Brother: I make haste to furnish you with the items of our Missionary collections for publication, requesting brethren, should they discover any error, to give me immediate information, so that I may publish the corrected report in the minutes.

Yours,

W. H. WATKINS, Tr.

How they do it.—The Leeds (England) Methodists are famous for their missionary contributions, sometimes giving ten thousand dollars a year! An English correspondent of the Southern Christian Advocate explains how they do it. He says: "The secret of the success of this lies in the simple fact, that they do not leave the result to accident, or their contributions to impulse.—One gentleman invites a large number of friends to breakfast; all have their minds directed beforehand to the question, What ought they to do in behalf of the missions? And when they meet, the result of individual decision is put together, so that when the public meeting comes, the bulk of the contributors are ready. This year names were put down after breakfast for £1,600 ($8,000), being $1,500 more than last year."

How to Move an Audience.—Chrysostom, speaking of the composition of a sermon, says, as in a reverie: "I had a vision. I thought I saw the communion rails crowded with angels listening to the sermon. When a man speaks as in the sight of God, with an open heaven—with Christ and angels before him—he catches the true prophetic fire; he offers a present salvation from a present Saviour; the spirit of glory and grace descends, and the flame communicates to the auditory, and accompanies them to their houses."

DEATH OF WASHINGTON IRVING.

This venerable and distinguished author died at Sunnyside, on the Hudson, near Tarrytown, on Monday evening, Nov. 28, 1859, aged 76 years and seven months. He retired to his room about ten o'clock, and feeling more languid than usual, and complaining of pain in his side, but apparently not more unwell than he had been for several months past. Just as he reached his room, and while his niece was near him, he suddenly fell and in a moment was gone. A physician was soon with him, but no mortal aid could avail to bring him back. He was born April 3, 1783, in New York, near the corner of Fulton and William streets, close by the old church where the daily prayer meetings are now held. The Evening Post says that after receiving a common school education, he began at the age of sixteen the study of the law, but he was even then a dabbler in literature. To the Morning Chronicle, of which his brother Peter Irving, was editor, he contributed a series of papers, under the signature of Jonathan Oldstyle. These juvenile essays attracted so much public attention that they were afterwards gathered in a book. In 1804, in consequence of ill-health, Mr. Irving made his first visit to Europe, where he resided for two years, making the usual journey through the south of France to Italy. On his return to New York, he took part in preparing the series of whimsical papers which appeared under the name of "Salmagundi." In 1808 Mr. Irving made a decided impression by his humorous History of New York, purporting to be from the pen of Diederich Knickerbocker. At the close of the war of 1812 he went to Europe, for the purpose of making a second tour, but the commercial reverses which overtook mercantile affairs involved the house of his brothers, and left him in a condition in which it is impossible to prosecute his purposes. Mr. Irving found himself in Liverpool, in embarrassed circumstances, and he resolved to trust to the resources of his pen. In 1820, after several unsuccessful trials, he found a publisher for a collection of desultory essays, descriptive of life in both the old and new world, to which he gave the unpretending name of the Sketch Book. The mingled humor and pathos of these essays, the exquisite grace of the style, the genial feeling, and the elevated sentiment, won Mr. Irving a high European reputation. Murray, the publisher who took the manuscript off the hands of Miller by whom it was first undertaken, paid the author two hundred pounds for the copy-right, to which he afterwards generously added one hundred pounds more, because of the unexpectedly large sales of the work. Mr. Irving had previously made the acquaintance of many of the most distinguished British writers, Sir Walter Scott among the number, and was now welcomed among them as an ornament to English literature. Of course, in his own country his rising fame was acknowledged with enthusiasm and pleasure. His success stimulated his activity. In 1822 appeared "Bracebridge Hall;" in 1823, the Tales of a Traveller, both of the same general character as the "Sketch-Book," and then he went to Spain, to gather the materials for a "Life of Columbus," which he had projected. The year 1825 he passed in the South of France, and from 1826 to 1828 at Madrid. His, to us, most beautiful narrative, "The Conquest of Granada," and the "Tales of the Alhambra," were given to the world as episodes to his more serious historical studies. They added greatly to his reputation as a writer, evincing maturer power but the same unabated charms of style. It is sufficient to say of his "Life of Columbus," which was published in 1828, that it procured Mr. Irving one of the two fifty guinea gold medals instituted by George IV., for eminence in historical composition, the other having been given to Mr. Hallam. In the spring of 1832 Mr. Irving returned to New York after an absence of seventeen years; but he returned only to renew as on a fresh field his literary labors. The fruit of the impulses which he derived from the history and life of this country, were his "Tour of the Prairies," his "Astoria," his "Adventures of Captain Bonneville," and a variety of contributions to the Knickerbocker Magazine, among them a Visit to Abbotsford. He also published in 1849, "A Life of Mohammed and his successors," which was pleasant reading, but scarcely adequate to the greatness of the subject. Mr. Irving had now arrived at a period of life when his advancing years, his ripened fame, and his affluence as well as his love of domestic retirement, might have suggested his withdrawal from active labor. But he had long cherished a scheme for writing the life of Washington, which he could not forego. The remainder of his life was therefore devoted to that great work. Mr. Irving was one of the most amiable and gentle of men; a man of exceeding modesty, never willing to set forth his own pretensions, and leave to the public the care of his literary reputation. He had no taste for controversy of any sort. His manners were mild, and his conversation in the society of those with whom he was intimate, was most genial and playful. The funeral of Mr. Irving took place at Tarrytown, N. Y., on Thursday afternoon, Dec 1. It was an occasion long to be remembered. Business was suspended. Stores were closed. From almost every house mourning drapery was hung. The bells of the churches tolled for some hours. From the surrounding country, and from New York and other cities, thousands of people assembled, in and about the church, where the funeral services took place. A procession, more than a mile in length, followed the remains of the deceased to the grave, where, besides many of the most distinguished men of New York, were nearly all the Episcopal clergy, including the Provisional Bishop of the Diocese. The New York Common Council and the Trustees of the Astor Library were present; and the Historical Society was well represented. The services at the church and at the grave were well conducted by the Rev. Dr. Creighton, Pastor of the church at Tarrytown, of which Mr. Irving was a member.

THE JEWS ADOPTING THE CHRISTIAN SABBATH.

It is said that the Jews of New York are moving to substitute the Christian for the Jewish Sabbath. It has been proposed to have their usual synagogue services on the first day of the week, and this proposition has so far gained favor with them that a considerable number have hired a suitable chapel up town, and seceded from the synagogues of which they were members. The reformers are gaining numerically, and the new system may become prevalent, at least in this country. Their motives, no doubt, are those of mere commercial and financial convenience; but we hope that the adoption of the Christian Sabbath may ultimately lead them to the adoption of the Christian system. The observance of the Christian Sabbath is the distinctive outward badge of Christians. Its non-observance is characteristic of infidelity and Romanism. But the Jews might adopt the Christian Sabbath and still, very incongruously, retain the rest of the Jewish system and faith, and remain unidentified with Christians—still reject Christ and the New Testament revelation.

"As to the motives which actuate this proposed new reform, Harper's Weekly says: It is well known that the Jews are among the foremost merchants of the world.—Many of our leading bankers and mercantile men are Jews. To these persons the existing rites of the sanctuary are very inconvenient. They cannot obey the precept of their Church and abstain from labor on Saturday without injuring their business; nor is it of any use to them to be able to work on Sunday, for the ordinary marts of trade are closed, and there is no one to do business with. In the specie business, for instance, in the which the proportion of Jews is large, Saturday is the busiest day of the week, as it is on that day that the heaviest specie shipments are made from this port. In Europe the monetary power of the Jews is such that they are enabled to impose their law upon the financial world; at Paris, London, and Frankfort, Saturday is always a dull day among financiers; governments have been known to postpone the award of a public loan so that it should not fall on a Jewish festival. Here, numerous, influential and wealthy as the Jews are, they possess no controlling power; it has never been expected that Commodore Vanderbilt would alter the sailing day of his steamers, or that the General Government would change the fixed programme of its loans, in order to defer to Jewish custom. Our Jews are forced to choose between neglecting their religion or their business; they cannot do justice to both unless they adopt the new plan, and begin to keep Sunday, instead of Saturday, as their Sabbath.

While, however, we think the new movement stands a fair chance of success, people must not regard it as a step toward the general Christianization of the Jews, and the ultimate disappearance of the distinctive Jewish element. It must always be remembered that Judaism is something more than a religion. It is a nationality, and a nationality independent of the accident of birth. All the baptism in the world cannot turn Jews into anything else than Jews. And though there is no reason to question the sincerity of Jewish converts, or of the good men who are laboring among the Jews in order to convert them, all experience proves that neither argument, nor conversion, nor time, nor climate, nor custom, can alter, in any material degree, the marked lineaments which have been the characteristics of the Jewish race from the time of the bondage in Egypt to the present day.

The late Prince Metternich—no mean prophet—told Monsieur Veuillot that, in his opinion, the most dangerous element of modern Germany was the German Jews. They were, he said, persons of unusual energy and invariable education; they were rapidly rising to the head of all the trades and professions, in the teeth of the most illiberal disabilities; they were leading the bar, stamping their impress on letters, and controlling the financial world; and they were, he added, with an emphasis that can be imagined, almost invariably "rabid Liberals."—Of this race, thus singled out by the great Austrian statesman, we have a large representation in this country. Relatively, we believe that the proportion of Jews among the thriving Germans of the large cities of the United States, is very large indeed. And so far as industry, shrewdness, energy, and success are concerned, they are certainly verifying Prince Metternich's eulogy. Their future in this country, as in Europe, is a problem which is well deserving of sober thought.

A FRATERNAL SCENE.

The Lynchburg Virginian says a most interesting episode in the proceedings of the Methodist Episcopal Conference, now in session in this city, occurred yesterday. For several years past prominent members of the Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal and Methodist Protestant Churches in Virginia have sought to secure more cordial relations between the two bodies. It is generally known that the doctrines and usages of these different branches of the great Methodist family are identical; the separation between them, which occurred in the year 1828, having originated solely in questions of governmental policy. Some asperity marked the early dissensions begotten of these questions, and mutual estrangements succeeded. The lapse of time, however, and the influence of wiser counsels, have prevailed to remove even the partial obstructions that have hitherto prevented the existence of cordial relations between the two official bodies. The Virginia Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church took the iniative in the matter, and at its session in 1857 adopted a resolution expressive of a desire to cultivate a spirit of reciprocity and fraternal intercourse; but here the subject rested until the next succeeding Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Virginia took up the question, responded to the suggestion, and actually appointed a member of the body, Rev. L. M. Lee, D.D., to hear their expressions of good will to their sister Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church. In pursuance of the appointment, Dr. Lee appeared at the Conference of this denomination, recently held in Norfolk, presented his credentials, and was received with great kindness and cordiality; his bland and genial manners, no less than the object of his mission, eliciting the most general expression of fraternal good will.

Thus much in explanation of the subject which we now introduce. The Methodist Protestant Conference responded to the notion of the Methodist Episcopal, by appointing the Rev. R. B. Thomson, D.D., and Rev. J. Whitfield, fraternal messengers to the present session of the latter body.

Other engagements have prevented Mr. Whitfield from discharging his part of the duty, but Dr. Thompson was present, and being introduced to the Conference by Dr. Lee, in some kind and complimentary remarks, made a highly interesting and appropriate address, referring chiefly to the peculiarities of Methodism, the privations and sacrifices of the early itinerants, the perfect analogy in doctrine and usage existing between the branches—thus proving that the seceding body had not departed from the faith of their fathers, and cherished as cordially as their parent branch the memory of the Wesleys, of Whitfield, and of Fletcher. Upon these facts the speaker based his plea in favor of more cordial and fraternal intercourses, and concluded with a solemn invocation of the Divine blessing upon the body to which he was accredited.

To these sentiments the venerable Chairman, Bishop Early, responded in appropriate terms, expressing his high regard for Dr. Thompson personally, and remarking that he had always regretted the existence of divisions in the Church, had never joined in persecuting or publicly condemning any other denominations—that Methodists had enough to do to attend to their own business; and concluded by expressing his gratification at the scene before him, inviting Dr. Thomson to take his seat in the body, and participate in the debates whenever he felt inclined to do so.

Dr. D. S. Drogget followed the Bishop, and gave vent to the warm feelings of his heart which the circumstances and the occasion had awakened, and in closing his remarks, moved the appointment of a committee to prepare a suitable response to the resolutions presented by Dr. Thomson from his Conference. Drs. Drogget, Smith and Lee were appointed the committee, and thus ended for the time being one of the most pleasant interchangings of fraternal feeling it has ever been our good fortune to witness.

Missionary Society in Germany.—Germany has at present the following foreign Missionary societies: 1. The Moravian which has labored since 1732; 2. The Basel Society, which though its center is in Switzerland, receives the larger part of its contributions from Germany: it has lately published its forty-third annual report; 3. The Rhenish Mission; 4. The Berlin Society; 5. Gossner's Society, established in 1836; 6. The North German Missionary Society; 7. The Leipzic Lutheran Society; 8. The Society of Hermannsburg. The Societies of Berlin and Hermannsburg are under the control of High Church Lutherans; all the others are evangelical. The number of foreign missionary papers amounted in 1857 to twenty, among which that of Burman had the largest circulation (15,000). But since 1857 the circulation of several papers has more than doubled.

Let faith teach thee how to sleep and how to die while it assures that as sleep is a short death, so death is only a longer sleep; and that the same God watches over thee in thy bed and in thy grave.

ICELAND.

An interesting paper relating to this far distant island of the frozen seas, was read at a recent meeting of the Geographical Society, in New York city. It was written by an Icelander and is, in substance, as follows:

"Iceland was discovered in the year 863, and since that time has had its archæology and its literature. Long before the birth of Columbus, its 'Northmen' discovered America. At an early period it had trial by jury. The long Winter nights made the people poetical. The Skalds, or wandering bands, traveling from farm-house to farm-house were, and are even to this day, a feature of the intellectual life of the Icelanders. On the the shelves of the public libraries of Copenhagen and Stockholm were hundreds of printed volumes and thousands of manuscripts, illustrative of the genius of those primitive people, for poetry and romance. They were conquered by the Norwegians. They were conquered by the Danes, and for a long time their scholars belonged rather to Denmark than the native island—a little island, 312 miles in length by 200 miles broad, with large portions uninhabitable, containing, in 1855, fifty-six thousand inhabitants, and in the present year, sixty-nine thousand five hundred; noticeable, as we all know, for its natural phenomena, its geysers, or hot springs. In the latter half of the eighteenth century the Danish government thought this little island worthy of being represented in the legislature of Copenhagen, and allowed it to send two delegates.

"The language spoken in Iceland is the old Scandinavian, closely akin to the Saxon, with no admixture of Greek or Latin roots. It has, singularly enough, a literature 900 years old. There are four presses on the island, and four newspapers. About 60 volumes are published in a year, but most of them are printed in Copenhagen. There are colleges and academies of medicine there, and common schools. But most of the education is domestic in its character. The fathers teach the children so effectually that a young Iceland boy or girl of eight years old cannot be found who does not know how to read and write. A servant girl was known to the writer of the article read to the society who could dictate one of Scott's novels from memory. Wandering minstrels, like those of the old time in Scotland and Germany, were still to be found traversing the country, and dropping in on families happy to receive them, who gladly gave them a night's supper and lodging in exchange for their lay. The Icelandic Church is Lutheran. There are 199 churches on the island, with 280 clergymen. For a little time the Mormons disturbed the regular church-going members, but their influence soon waned. The clergy waxed in vigilance, and brought the feeble-minded back to the faith of their fathers."

DOCTRINAL PARODIES

How absurd does the Biblical requirement of faith seem to the unbelieving and the misbelieving among us! What! say they, can it be possible that on so small matter as one's belief, salvation and perdition are made to depend. What can be more unjust or irrational than to make faith, and not work, the test of character?

"For modes of faith let graceless bigots fight,
He can't be wrong whose life is in the right."

Thus men, ignorant of the word of Truth, talk and feel respecting evangelical faith. And yet such discourse, while it may have an air of independence, betrays a real shallowness of reasoning, that would be ludicrous were it not so full of peril. For reflect a moment, and see how this mode of thought will fit the conduct of men in the common concerns of life. One is sick, and would fain be delivered from his disease. But there are many ways of treating disease, and he is perplexed. So to relieve himself from the burden of care involved in any discriminating difference between quacks and physicians, he straightway concludes to remain passive, and changes the couplet we have quoted thus:

"For modes of cure let greedy doctors strive,
He can't be dead who yet remains alive."

Or, this same man may be drawn into a law-suit and the safety of all his possessions become endangered through the craft and cruelty of others. But the intricacies and the uncertainty withal of the law appal him, and so he says:

"Let legal quirks let lawyers hold debate,
He can't be poor who yet has his estate."

Soils are many, and seasons vary, and enemies innumerable assail the vegetative products of the earth, and so a farmer, true to this religious maxim, might declare:

"Let others wrangle about nature's laws,
I seek effect and nothing care for cause."

The same careful reasoner burns with ardent patriotism and desires heartily the welfare of his country; but parties differ and platforms oppose each other, and so he adopts an easy creed, which he thus enunciates:

"All party strife the noble mind belittles;
He is the patriot who has clothes and victuals."

Ridicule is not always the test of truth, but it is a sharp opponent of error. And when a principle of, belief or of conduct can be run down and demolished by a few words of transparent sarcasm, it is safe to conclude that the principle is not worth the holding, and cannot be trusted, especially in so grave and solemn a matter as the possible future of one's soul—Christian Intelligencer.

ALL THINGS WORKING TOGETHER.

There is another sense in which these material agencies are working a moral progress and so promoting the scheme of God. Looking up at the weather-cock, says the Sage of Vanity, "Woe's me for this weary wind! There it was, south this morning and now it is north! How many ways it blows, and never long the same! What's the use of all this whirling? And if it were only to make the vane spin round, the air as well might stagnate: there were no need of such wasted power. But whilst the valetudinarian is looking at the vane, the wind is careering over a continent, and doing the Creator's work in a hundred lands. It has called at yon city, fetid with miasma, and groaning with pestilence; and with its bosom of brisk pinions it has swept the plague away. It has looked into yon haven, and found a forest of laden ships sleeping over their freights, and it has chased them all to sea. And finding the harvest arrested in a broad and fertile realm—the earth chapped, and the crops withering—it is now hurrying with a black armament of clouds to drench it in lifesome irrigation.

To narrow observation or to selfishness, that wind is an annoyance; to faith it is God's angel forwarding the mighty plan. 'Tis boisterous night, and Pictish savages curse the noisy blast which shakes their peat hovels round their ears; but that noisy blast has landed the gospel on St. Andrew's shore. It blows a fearful tempest, and it sets some rheumatic joints on aching; but the morrow shows dashed in pieces the awful Armada which was fetching the Spanish Inquisitions to our British isle. The wind blows east and detains James' ship at Harwich; but it guides King William of Torbay. Yes; "the wind blows south, and the wind blows north; it whirleth about continually, and it returneth again according to its circuits." But in the course of these circuits the wind has blown to our little speck of seagirt happiness the gospel, and Protestantism, and civil and liberty. And so, not of our islet only, but of our globe entire, and its continuous population. So as the individual is concerned, so far as it affects the weather-index, in the wind there may be little seeming progress; nay, so far as concerns any plan which society purposes to itself, the favoring gale may shift and shift again, and the story of a nation be little better than the register of a stationary vane pirouetting on its windy pivot; but so far as affects the scheme of God, there is an aura in the universe which always drives one way. Predestination is a vane which never vibrates, and Providence a wind which never whirls about. The breath of the Spirit and the strength of God's purpose are steadily wafting our world, and all the worlds, in one mighty convoy towards God's appointed haven in the distant future.—Dr. Hamilton.

UNITARIANISM.

Amongst the confessions, multiplying of late, of Unitarianism is a failure, read the following from Martineau, one of the leading Unitarians of England: "I am constrained to say that neither my intellectual preference nor my moral admiration goes heartily with Unitarian heroes, sects, or productions of any kind. Ebionites, Arians, Socinians, all seem to me to contend unfavorably with their opponents, and to exhibit a type of thought and character far less worthy, on the whole, of the true genius of Christianity. I am conscious of my deepest obligations, as a learner from others, in almost every department, to writers not of my own creed. In philosophy I have had to unlearn most that I had imbibed from my early text books, and the authors in chief favor with them. In Biblical interpretation I derive from Calvin and Whitby the help which fails in Crell and Belsham. In devotional literature and religious thought, I find nothing of ours that does not pale before Augustin, Thaler, and Pascal. And in the poetry of the Church, it is the Latin or the German hymns, or the lines of Charles Wesley, or of Keble that fasten on my memory, and heart, and make all else seem poor and cold. I can not help this; I can only say that it is no perversity; and I believe the preference is to be founded in reason and nature, and is already widespread amongst us. A man's Church must be the home of whatever he most deeply loves, trusts, admires, and reveres—or whatever most divinely expresses the essential meaning of the Christian faith and life, and to be torn away from the great company I have named, and transferred to the ranks which commanded a far inferior allegiance, it is unnatural, and for me an inadmissible fate."

PRESENT CONDITION OF POPERY.

A correspondent of the New York Observer, writing from France, makes the following remarks in regard to the present condition of Popery: The Roman Pontiff, it must be confessed, do not sleep upon a bed of roses, and their triple crown has become very heavy. The time has passed when these pretended successors of St. Peter dictated laws to all the States of Europe, crowned princes to appear at their feet, and disposed, at will, of the treasures of Christendom. In those remote ages the Pope could live effeminately, intoxicated with their supreme power, and surrounded by the splendors of the fine arts. In our iron age everything is changed. Popery receives but little money, and much reproach. Every day brings some fresh cause of trouble. Sometimes a rebellious nation confiscates the wealth of the clergy, and then laughs at the Pontiff's anathemas; or declares, ex cathedra, that is the property of God. Sometimes discontented princes sternly reproach the Roman Bishop, treating like a poor school-boy the man who claims to be the representative of the Lord upon earth. Now, to cap the climax of misfortune, the Pope's own subjects revolt against his temporal government, standing before the world that it is the most absurd and intolerable of tyrannies. At Rome, this power is only maintained by means of the French bayonets. In the provinces, as soon as the population is freed from the presence of foreign soldiers, the Popish magistrates are forced to fly precipitately before public indignation. tempora! O mores! The times are dull—very bad for the Holy See.

TENDENCY OF ERROR.

The Christian Secretary says that Gerrit Smith long since published as an "Advertisement" in the New York Tribune, a downright infidel discourse, which he or his friends are now sending all over the country. It is as badly infidel as Tom Paine himself—though of course more polished in style, and mincing in phraseology.

The course of Mr. Smith strikingly illustrates the fact that all error is down hill in its progress. Once he was a colonizationist—then an abolitionist—then a very high and radical abolitionist—then a Seventh-day Baptist—then an all-days-alike man, giving political harangues on the Sabbath; then a perfectionist—then a spiritualist—and now an infidel—not keeping his infidelity to himself, but discoursing it in public addresses, which he prints in the Tribune, and which even that paper will not publish till paid for it, as a regular advertisement.

How true it is, that all departures from the word of God become greater and greater—and that the errorist, like one on an inclined and icy plain, slides faster and farther from his starting point, every moment. Beware of the beginning of evil in every form.

Sympathy of the Nerves.—When the nerves, from long habit, have become accustomed to transmit their messages from distinct parts, and are suddenly cut off from them, they will retain along their trunks the sympathetic or sensational actions. Thus, a man who has had a leg amputated will feel distinctly along the course of the trunk of the nerve, sensation from toes which no longer exist. The mind is also influenced by this; and frequently this peculiar direct nervous action can only be allayed by that which is negative and reflex. A curious instance occurred within my own experience. An old sailor suffered much from this. He retained his limb ceased not too long, but at last consented to an amputation. I knew him with only a wooden leg. When he had his nervous pains he always called for hot water into which he put his wooden stump. If told of his folly in supposing that such a proceeding could do any good, he would become enraged and his paroxym of pain would increase; but if gratified, he took things easy and the process actually appeared to do him good though all must know there could be no real benefit. Still, here is the effect of mind over matter.—N. Y. Medical Press.

A New Church in England.—The London Morning Advertiser announces a secession of clergymen, who are about to form a new Church of England, to be called the Free Church of England. From sixty to seventy clergymen of the Establishment, all of them distinguished for their evangelical views, and a number of them popular preachers, met some days ago in London, from all parts of the country, for the purpose of concerting such measures as may give the greatest effect to the intended secession. They all leave the Establishment on purely conscientious grounds, some of them because of their objection to the principle of a religious establishment; others because of the prevalence of popery under the guise of Puseyism in the Church, with the connivance of the Bishops; and the rest because of both reasons combined.

With the same height of desire that thou hast sinned with the like depth of sorrow thou must repent; then that hast sinned to-day, defer not thy repentance till to-morrow; He that hath promised pardon to thy repentance hath not promised life till thou repent.

Serving God.—Those that resolve to serve God must not mind being singular in it, nor be drawn by the crowd to forsake his service. Those that are bound for heaven must be willing to swim against the stream, and must not do as the most do, but as the best do.

The Louisiana Conference is now in session.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

DECEMBER 14, 1859.

EDITORIAL NOTICES.

ADVERTISING IN THE ADVOCATE.

The business public are slowly learning that the Advocate is the GREAT ADVERTISING PAPER OF THE SOUTH AND WEST. Advertisements in it are more valuable than in any half dozen other papers.

1. It has the largest circulation west of Charleston, and South of Cincinnati; larger than any other two weeklies in New Orleans, and is increasing rapidly—will, in a few years, double its present circulation.
2. Of medium size, and not crowded with advertisements, an advertisement is not lost in it, but can be easily found.
3. In our "Editorial Notices," which we give to every advertisement, we specify the page and column on which an advertisement may be found. We seek to make every advertisement valuable to the advertiser and to the paper.
4. The circulation is spread out over Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, principally; Georgia, Florida, Tennessee, Kentucky, Arkansas, partially.
5. It is the only weekly of large and widely-spread circulation in the great and growing metropolis of the South.

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

Congressional Proceedings.

Washington, Dec. 8.—In the House of Representatives today, (Wednesday,) after an animated discussion upon Clarke's resolution, a second attempt was made to elect a Speaker, which resulted as follows: Sherman, Rep., 107; Bocock, Dem., 88; Gilmer, 22; scattering, 11.

In the Senate, the discussion was continued upon Mason's resolutions, without coming to any action in the matter.

Talking Against Time.

Washington, Dec. 9.—In the Senate to-day Mr. Trumbull, in discussing the Mason resolution, underwent a lengthy cross-examination by Southern Senators, which produced much excitement for a time.

The Senate adjourned over to Monday.

In the House a rambling and general discussion was kept up upon Clarke's resolution, and other matters, with the object, as is supposed, to consume time till parties can see me the attendance of members now absent.

First Quarrel.

At the time during the discussion, much excitement prevailed, owing to an allegation which took place between Mr. Kellogg, of Michigan, and Mr. Logan, of Illinois, which amounted almost to a quarrel, but they were prevented from coming to blows by the interference of members.

The difficulty arose from the former using objective language toward Senator Douglas, in coupling Douglas with Greeley in an attempt to sell the votes of Illinois last fall to secure the election of Douglas.

In the Senate, Mr. Trumbull, in explaining the principles of the Republican party, advocated the purchase of a contiguous territory to ours, for the purpose of transporting thither our free negroes instead of sending them to Africa.

Third Ballot for Speaker.

Washington, Dec. 9.—In the House to-day, after a rambling discussion, which consumed nearly the entire session, a third ballot was taken, which resulted as follows: Sherman, 116; Bocock 88; Gilmer 20; scattering 13. After which the House adjourned.

Destructive Fire in New York.

New York, Dec. 9.—A destructive fire occurred here to-day, which entirely consumed the large piano manufactory of Bradbury & Co. Their loss is estimated at $125,000.

Large Fire in Cincinnati.

Cincinnati, Dec. 9.—The retort house of the candle factory belonging to Messrs. Hall & Woods, was this morning discovered to be on fire, and, notwithstanding the efforts of our city firemen to subdue the flames, the entire building was destroyed. Messrs. Hall & Woods' loss amounts to $20,000 but they were insured to that amount.

Kansas State Election.

Leavenworth City, Dec. 9.—The returns of the State election, as far as heard from, indicate the election of the entire Republican ticket for State offices.

Democratic Meeting at Frankfort.

Frankfort, Ky., Dec. 9.—The Democratic members of the Legislature of this State, held a meeting here to-day, and after preliminary business having been through with, nominated Mr. Breckenridge, the present Vice President, as the candidate for the Presidential chair for the next term.

Large Union Meeting in Philadelphia.

Philadelphia, Dec. 9.—A large and enthusiastic meeting of Union men was held here to-day, in which the members expressed their abhorrence of all anti-slavery fanatics, and also expressed their earnest sympathies in regard to and with Virginia.

Death of Theodore Sedgwick.

Boston, Dec. 9.—Theodore Sedgwick died at South Bridge, Mass., to-day.

Arrival of Minister Preston.

New York, Dec. 9.—Mr. Preston, our late Minister to Spain, has arrived here from Europe. He came a passenger in the steamship Persia from Liverpool.

Failure of the Chicago and Fort Wayne Railroad.

Pittsburg, Dec. 9.—The property of the Chicago, Fort Wayne and Pittsburg railroad has been sequestrated, and a receiver has been appointed to attend to the affairs of the Company.

House of Representatives still Unorganized.

Washington, Dec. 12.—The House of Representatives met to-day at the usual hour, and immediately resumed the discussion of Mr. Clarke's resolution, touching the doctrines of such candidates as had endorsed the treasonable sentiments of the Black Republican circular. No vote was taken for Speaker, nor was any attempted.

It is now believed that another week will be consumed by political disputes and personal explanations.

Proceedings of the Senate.

In the Senate Mr. Iverson, of Georgia, made a personal explanation, in the course of which he said, that in the remarks he made the other day upon the subserviousness of the Democratic party, North, he had not intended to charge Senators, or leading men of the party with complicity in the John Brown foray, but merely intended to say that the position of Senator Douglas in regard to the territorial rights of the Southern people was not sound, and a large portion of the Democrats agree with Douglas upon that question.

Mr. Bigler defended the Northern Democracy from the charge of leaning toward Abolitionism.

Johnson, of Tennessee, made a speech against the Republicans and in defence of the Union. He denounced John Brown and his confederates as fanatics and murderers. He also criticised Senator Seward's Rochester speech very severely, after which the Senate adjourned.

United States Senator from Kentucky.

Washington, Dec. 12.—A dispatch from Frankfort, Ky., announces that Vice President Breckenridge was to-day elected by the Legislature of Kentucky as United States Senator from that State.

Breckenridge's majority on joint ballot was 29.

Boston Municipal Election.

Boston, Dec. 12.—Mayor Lincoln was re-elected Mayor of this city to-day by about 1200 majority. A majority of the Common Council of the Lincoln stripe are also elected.

Later from California.

The overland California mail, from San Francisco the 18th ult., has arrived in St. Louis with four days later intelligence from the Pacific.

Business at San Francisco is very steady and firm although money is scarce.

The overland mail from St. Louis to California, with St. Louis dates to the 21st ult., was passed by the return mail at Malley station.

Gen. Scott has arrived at San Francisco from Vancouver's Island. He was enthusiastically received by all classes of citizens.

The steamer Cortez, from New York, with passengers, has not arrived at San Francisco up to the 18th ult.

The Cortez left New York on the 20th of October, and had had full time to reach her destination. Very serious apprehensions are entertained for her safety.

The steamer Northerner has been several days overdue from Puget's Sound.

The case of Boggs vs. The Merced Mining Company, which case has been in court some length of time, has been decided in favor of Boggs, which substantially gives the gold as well as the land to J. C. Fremont.

Later from Sonora.

St. Louis, Dec. 12.—By way of Arizona, the overland mail brings news from Sonora that Capt. Ewall has been successful in his interview with Pesquiera.

The new Juarez Government has been recognized by Pesquiera.

Later from Carson Valley.

St. Louis, Dec. 12.—The overland mail brings news from Carson Valley of the election of Jno. J. Musser, as delegate to Congress, from the Territory of Nevada.

A very large and rich silver lode has been discovered in Carson Valley, which is supposed to be a continuation of the Comstock vein.

Kentucky Female College Burnt.

Lousville, Dec. 12.—A large fire broke out at Harrodsburg, in the State, Saturday night last, which consumed the large building occupied by the pupils and teachers of the Harrodsburg Female College. No lives were lost by the conflagration.

Gen. Scott and the San Juan Difficulty.

Panama, Dec. 13.—The U. S. mail steamship Granada, from New York and Havana, arrived here this morning, and has passed up the river.

Gen. Scott arrived at San Francisco on the 20th, by the steamer Republic, from San Juan Island. He also came on to the steamer which left San Francisco on the 21st with passengers for New York.

The San Juan Island question is mutually settled on the principle of temporary joint occupancy proposed by Gen. Scott, though the English were not, when the General left, actually in joint possession.

The U. S. troops, however, which have been stationed on the Island, have been withdrawn, excepting only a company under the command of Captain Hunt, who have been left to protect the whites from the Indians.

Gen. Scott proposed to Gov. Douglass to send an equal number of British troops to occupy the island conjointly, though he left the matter to the decision of the British Government.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMER PERSIA.

New York, Dec. 9.—The mails by the Persia, report an unusually large number of disasters to American shipping, severe storms having prevailed for several weeks.

General Intelligence.

The General and political news by the Persia possesses considerable interest, as indicating new complications in the affairs of Europe.

It is now positively asserted that France has not issued invitations to a congress, as was reported, owing to the fact that new difficulties have been started, which might indefinitely postpone the meeting.

The nature of these difficulties is not known, but Lord Cowley had suddenly left Paris on a mission to London, with a view, as is supposed, of attempting an amicable arrangement between France and England.

It is reported that the Emperor Napoleon has proposed a general disarmament as a preliminary to the proposed Congress.

The latest accounts from India and China were still more encouraging.

It is reported that Austria has raised a difficulty respecting the Italian regency, strongly opposing it, but Victor Emanuel has refused to withdraw the Chevalier Buoncompagne's nomination.

It is also stated that the Emperor Napoleon has converted his acceptance of the regency in Central Italy on the Tuscany threatens to oppose in the Congress the restoration of the Grand Dukes by force.

The Austrian Government has granted a full amnesty to all Italians.

India.

Further advices have been received from India, which, however, do not confirm the death of Nena Sahib.

The English army of India was to be augmented by a force equivalent to eleven regiments.

France.

The French papers have been requested to advocate the plan of a general disarmament, according to the suggestions of the Emperor.

The London Post thinks the Emperor's proposal to disarm is simply absurd, and thinks that the preliminaries for the assembling of a Congress are in a fair way of being settled.

NEW BOOKS.

The Food of Quality; or, The History of Henry Earl of Moreland, by Henry Brooke, Esq. A New Revised Edition; with an Introduction by Rev. W. P. Strickland, D.D., and a Biographical Preface by Rev. Charles Kingsley, M.A. Complete in two volumes. New York: Derby & Jackson, 1859.

These are 12mo. volumes, in muslin, handsomely printed.—We are indebted to our neighbor, H. H. McGinnis, 36 Camp-st., for them. Dr. Strickland says in his introduction, "Nearly a hundred years ago, there appeared, in England, a novel, in five volumes, bearing the quaint and singular title, 'The Food of Quality.' Its author, Henry Brooke, was a man of decided genius, who had passed through many of the vicissitudes of his lot. He was born in Ireland, and became in early life the disciple of Sheridan, Swift and Pope, and was subsequently the friend of Lyttleton and Pitt, the favorite of the Prince of Wales, and others of the nobility of that day." The author was an acquaintance and contemporary of John Wesley. "The Food of Quality was revised by the founder of Methodism, expurgated, and published for the use of the Methodist public. Wesley says in his preface, "I now venture to recommend the following treatise as the most excellent in its kind that I have seen in the English or any other language. The lowest excellence therein is the style, which is not only pure in the highest degree, not only clear and proper, every word being used in its true, genuine meaning, but frequently beautiful and elegant, and, where there is room for it, truly sublime. But what is of far greater value is the admirable sense which is conveyed therein, as it sets forth in full view most of the important truths which are revealed in the oracles of God." And much more does Wesley say of the work, and in the same strain of commendation. He had in view, however, his own expurgated and revised edition. We have no doubt the work will be read, and by religious people. We have not had time to read it, but may recur to it again when we have perused it.

MARRIAGES.

"It is not good for man to be alone."

At the residence of W. C. Chamberlin, in the city of Natchez, on Sunday evening, Dec. 4th, by Dr. Watkins, the Rev. N. S. Cornell, of the Mississippi Conference, to Miss M. A. Chamberlin, daughter of Griffin Chamberlin, Esq., of Belvidere, Illinois.

COMMERCIAL.

Monday Evening, December 14, 1859.

We condense the following statement from the New Orleans Price Current of the 10th instant:

With rather unfavorable weather during a portion of the time, and recent adverse European advices, the movement in our leading staple, Cotton, has been rather less active than we had occasion to notice last week, but Sugar and molasses have continued in active request, and the receipts have found ready sale at improved prices. In Tobacco we are still without any transactions of consequence to notice, but in Western Produce there has been rather more activity, at advanced rates for Pork and some other articles.

COTTON. With respect to prices, we have to remark that factors, in order to effect free sales, have been compelled to submit to a reduction of fully ¼ cent per pound in the Middling and lower grades, while the better qualities, being comparatively scarce, have been less affected.

The receipts at this port since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas,) are 779,042 bales, against 640,008 bales to same date last year, and the increase in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 197,215 bales.

Poetry.

For the New Orleans Christian Advocate.

A MORN IN WINTER.

The frosty wreaths of winter morn
Hung on the leafless forest trees,
And icy branches lightly shook
In the chill, northern breeze;

When glad, returning sunlight tipped
Each rocky peak and flinty spire,
And tree-tops in the old grey woods
Gleamed with the purple fire.

Rich coronals of frosty spray
Glittered with many a twinkling gem,
And stars of glory danced upon
The winter's diadem.

I thought of Eden's garden fair
Waving to heaven's kindliest breeze,
Where Adam saw such starry fruit
Hang on the tall, green trees.

Upon the spotless sheets of snow,
Erewhile so soft and purely white,
Myriads of diamonds leaped right up
To kiss the sunny light.

Again returned the happy hours,
When the young heart within my breast
Bounded to greet the wintry morn
Upon the sun-streaked East.

The forest giants' polished arms,
Their helms and shields were glistening sleet,
And sunbeams danced in merriest glee
On earth's fair winding sheet.

HOME AT LAST!

Home at last! home at last!
From an earthly shore,
For O! I've joined the ransomed ones
Who passed on long before.
Here each tear is wiped away
By God the Holy One;
There's nought but songs of praise and joy
Round the eternal throne.

The pure in heart! the pure in heart!
Robed in spotless white,
All here, with starry crowns of joy
All gloriously bright.
And some I've loved so long ago,
Who left me sad and lone,
Within our Father's house
Safe at home! safe at home!

Safe at home! safe at home!
O! let the echo go,
To soothe the hearts that mourn me yet
In that fast house below.
For His dear arms are round me now
Who was for sinners slain;
Through Him I've won my life—
For me to die is gain.

Safe at home! safe at home!
From an earthly shore;
I'll bless and praise thee, O my God,
For ever, evermore!

HUNTING RARE ANIMALS IN AFRICA.

Having been for these last four years hunting in the immense wilds of Western Central Africa, and having had many times the opportunity of hunting after that most formidable animal, the Troglodytes Gorilla, or African Nigina, Ngila, or Ngia, and having met with many and killed a few, I have tried to study, to the best of my abilities, its habits, mode of living, and other peculiarities. And without pride, I may count myself as the first white man who has seen alive, met, and killed this wild animal; and I have sent off lately, the largest and best preserved specimen in America or Europe. More than two years ago, I sent perfect specimens of adult Gorilla females to Philadelphia; and six months ago I sent to the same academy the specimen of the largest Gorilla ever seen. No bigger ones can be possibly found or killed; its size was a great object of wonder to the natives. This animal belongs in some degree to the Orang Outang Chimpanzee family, but is far more formidable than any of them. Below is the measurement of two sent to Philadelphia. One male measured from the extremity of one arm to the other seven feet four inches; his height was six feet and a half; the circumference of his big toe was five inches and a half. The other measured from the extremity of one arm to the other, nine feet and four inches; his height was almost seven feet and a half; and the circumference of his toe six inches and a half. You may judge by these measurements of the immense size of these animals. The jaws of the Ngina are immensely powerful, especially in the male, the head of which is also marked by a crest, rising gradually from the forehead up. This peculiarity makes it quite different from the skull of a man. The hair is short, and is of a reddish brown color; the hair of the body in the female is black. I have killed one of which the lower part of the back was of reddish brown also. Among the males the hair is shorter, greyish, and thin in the middle of the back; many have long black hair on the arms; the face, hands and feet are intensely black; the eyes are grey. The muscular power of their arms, and the size of their fingers indicate a prodigious force. I have seen a tree three or four inches in diameter broken by them. Their arms are much longer in proportion to their legs, but the bones of the latter are much stronger and thicker; and the capacity of the chest shows also the immense power of the animal. The skeleton of man is very slim and delicate in comparison. The intensely exaggerated feature of the face, its large and deep eye-balls give to the animal, especially the male, an expression of savage ferocity, seen, I think, in no other animal.

I have met with the Gorilla, or Ngina, or Ngia, as it is indifferently called, along the waters of the Muni River, as far as the Sierra del Crystal mountains; how much further north or east they are found I cannot tell. It is found also on the head waters of the Gaboon River, and in the undulating prairies and woodlands of the interior between Gaboon and Lake Lopez. In the Camma country, where pine-apples are very abundant, they feed on the white portions of the leaves, which they pluck out of the pine-apple plant.

At certain seasons they live in pairs, but I have most frequently seen them in troops of five, four females and one male. I have never seen more than five together. The old males are found wandering alone in the forest.

The Gorilla is very shy, and when met several together I have never seen them face a man. It is then exceedingly difficult to approach them; the least noise generally distorts them in their retreat. They sometimes inhabit the forest near the towns, and come during the still hours of early morning to eat the plantains and sugar-cane planted by the natives. The Gorilla is to be dreaded chiefly when the male is surprised with the female, or when he is looking for her; but the most to be feared above all, is the solid and lonely male, which, when disturbed in his solitude, offers you battle wherever you meet him. While in the Ashira country, I was hunting with the best Ashira hunter, Gambo by name, and we were following the tracks of one which seemed to avoid us. When he finally got tired of being pursued, he made a stand for us, and while we were crawling through the forest, he startled us by the most formidable cry I ever heard, resembling in some measure the barking of a dog. Often I had heard Nginas three miles off roaring like lions. This old inhabitant of the forest eyed us and squatted down, and uttering frightful roars, quite enough to frighten anybody, beat his bare chest several times with his powerful hands, then advanced a few steps, and repeated the same motions. It was a moment of life or death with us. We aimed at him and shot him dead—I shooting him right through the heart, and Gambo through the neck. When wounded, the male Ngina pursues the hunter and kills him, and the natives of the interior say that in his wild rage he will break the gun and twist the barrel as if it were lead. From the strength of the animal, I can easily believe this.

Unlike the Chimpanzee, the Gorillas never build or construct nests; they sleep on the ground. The old males never sleep on a tree. The natives have told me that sometimes the females sleep on branches of trees, while the male keeps at the foot of it to watch them; but this I think is seldom the case. I have always seen the Ngina, when unsuspected, sleeping on the ground, protected either by big rocks or big trees. I have only seen them on trees while eating, and then the male often watches at the foot of the tree. Their mode of progression is on all fours, using their hands as feet. They sometimes walk erect towards fruits which oblige them to do so in order to get them, but otherwise never.

In many countries where the Gorilla was very common, it has been impossible for me to get near them they were so shy, and after two or three days' hunt in the the forest, none could be seen for twenty or thirty miles round. They dislike to be disturbed in their solitude; and though they come round the villages, as I have said, as soon as they perceive that they are tracked, they will leave the place.

I have made the discovery of another animal while traveling in the Kong mountains—a specie between the Ngina and Chimpanzee, and similar in some respect to both of them. It is called Koula, or Koulam Kamba; it is very curious, and its face is surrounded by whiskers. I have had but a single specimen of this extraordinary new species, which is considered very rare by the natives of the interior. It is much larger than the Chimpanzee or female Ngina, but not so large as the male Ngina.

A BILL FROM THE TOWN PUMP.

Noon, by the north clock! Noon, by the east! High noon, too, by those hot sunbeams which fall, scarcely aslope, upon my head, and almost make the water bubble and smoke in the trough under my nose. Truly public characters have a tough time of it! And among all the town officers, chosen at March meeting, where is he that sustains, for a single year, the burden of such manifold duties as are imposed, in perpetuity, upon the Town Pump? The title of "town treasurer" is rightfully mine as guardian of the best treasure that the town has. The overseers of the poor ought to make me their chairman, since I provide bountifully for the pauper, without expense to him that pays taxes. I am at the head of the fire department, and one of the physicians to the board of health. As a keeper of the peace, all water drinkers will confess me equal to the constable. I perform some of the duties of the town clerk, by promulgating public notices, when they are pasted on my front. To speak within bounds, I am the chief person of the municipality, and exhibit, moreover, an admirable pattern to my brother officers, by the cool, steady, upright, downright and impartial discharge of my business, and the constancy with which I stand to my post. Summer and winter, nobody seeks me in vain; for all day long I am seen at the busiest corner, just above the market, thrusting out my arms to rich and poor alike; and at night I hold a lantern over my head, both to show where I am, and to keep people out of the gutters. At this sultry noon-tide I am cup-bearer to the parched populace, for whose benefit an iron goblet is chained to my waist. Like a dram-seller on the wharf, at muster-day, I cry aloud to all and sundry in my plainest accents, and at the very tip-top of my voice—Here it is, gentlemen! Here is the good liquor! Walk up, walk up, gentlemen, walk up, walk up! Here is the superior sniff! Here is the unadulterated ale of father Adam—better than Cognacs, Hollands, Jamaica, strong beer, or wine of any price. Here it is by the hogshead or the single glass, and not a cent to pay!—Walk up, gentlemen, and help yourselves! It were a pity if all this oratory should not draw customers. Here they come. A hot day, gentlemen. Quaff, and away again, so as to keep yourselves in a nice cool sweat. You, my friend, will need another cupful, to wash the dust out of your throat, if it be as thick there as it is on your cow-hide shoes. I see that you have trudged half a score miles to-day; and, like a wise man, have paused by the taverns, and stopped at the running brooks and well-curbs. Otherwise, betwixt heel without and fire within, you would have been burnt to a cinder, or melted down to nothing at all in the fashion of a jelly-fish. Drink, and make room for that other fellow, who seeks my aid to quench the fiery fever of last night's potations, which he drained from no cup of mine. Welcome, most rubicund sir! You and I have been great strangers hitherto; nor, to express the truth, will my nose be anxious for a closer lathmacy, till the fumes of your breath be a little less potent. Mercy on you, man! the water absolutely hisses down your red-hot gullet, and is converted quite to steam in the miniature Tophet which you raise-take for a stomach. Fill again, and tell me, on the word of an honest toper, did you ever in cellar, tavern, or any kind of a dram shop, spend the price of your children's food for a swig half so delicious? Now, for the first time these ten years, you know the flavor of water.—Good lyre; and, whenever you are thirsty, remember that I keep a constant supply at the old stand. Who next? Oh, my little friend, you are let loose from school, and come hither to scrub your blooming face, and drown the memory of certain tapa of the ferule, and other school-boy troubles, in a draught from the Town Pump. Take it, pure as the current of your young life. Take it, and may your heart and tongue never be scorched with a fiercer thirst than now! There, my dear child, put down the cup, and yield your place to this elderly gentleman, who treads so tenderly over the stones, that I suspect he's afraid of breaking them. What! he limps by without so much as thanking me, as if my hospitable offers were meant only for people who have no wine cellars. Well, well, sir, no harm done, I hope! Go, draw the cork, tip the decanter; but when your gout toe shall see you a roarting, it will be no affair of mine. If gentlemen love the pleasant titillation of the gout, it is all one to the Town Pump. This thirsty dog, with his red tongue lolling out, does not scorn my hospitality, but stands on his hind legs, and laps eagerly out of the trough. See how lightly he capers away again, Jowler, did your worship ever have the gout?—Half hours with the Best Authors.

Children's Column.

A BEAUTIFUL INCIDENT.

We have not for a long time, says the Boston Journal, read a more interesting incident than is described in the following extract, as having taken place at the gathering of the Sabbath School connected with the Plymouth Church, in Cleaveland, Ohio. Many of the Congregationalists of Boston and vicinity, feel a special interest in this religious enterprise, from the fact that they contributed from $1,500 to $2,000 last summer towards completing the beautiful church which it has just erected and dedicated to the worship of God. The gathering was held on the day succeeding the dedicating of the church. After speeches, singing, etc., the presentation of Bibles to some twenty of the scholars coming out and standing around the pulpit platform; one little fellow, five years old, stood on the platform that he might be seen. What followed is thus described.

"After the superintendent had prepared the way, the pastor of the church, Rev. Mr. White, stated the history of these Bible gifts, and addressed those who were to receive them in remarks of deepest interest. He spoke to them of a ship at sea, guided through the midnight darkness, and over the tempestuous oceans amid greatest dangers all unseen, by the light and the compass in her binnacle, directly under the eye of the man at the helm. 'So, children,' said he, 'take this heavenly chart and compass, put it safe in your binnacle, with the heavenly light shining upon it, keep it directly under your eye, and with steady hand on the helm, launch out upon life's tempestuous and treacherous ocean, and you shall gain the port of heavenly bliss securely.'

"By this time the whole audience were in melting sympathy with the scene. A brief word, and one after another took their new and beautiful presents, and returned to their seats. In giving the littlest fellow his Bible, the good pastor took him in his hands, lifted him before all the the people, kissed him, and implored a divine benediction. But there was one thing more to come, the crowning scene of this interesting occasion. Rev. Mr. White took the audience all by surprise; no one, save the superintendent, knew what was coming. He began with a brief reference to the struggles and sacrifices of this society in securing this new and attractive edifice. Homeless, and almost friendless and penniless, the great effort was made some six months ago to raise a sufficient subscription among themselves. The pastor told us that in passing the subscription papers, one of the Sabbath School boys, of his own accord, said to his mother, 'I am going to put down $25; I have got it now, which I have been saving to buy a watch, I'll give that, and guess I can work out the other six somehow.' So down went the $25, and with it the hopes and savings of some years. The subscription has been promptly paid. How tha boy got his other six dollars he did not know.

"During the summer Mr. White was in New England; making an appeal for and in behalf of tha new church. In appealing to the Congregational Church and Society in Sommerfield, Mass., one evening, he told them of the great efforts of his own people, and incidentally cited, as an illustration, tha case of this boy, with others. Ie coming down from the pulpit, a gentlemen remarked to him; 'I don't like the idea of that boy losing his watch.' 'Nor I,' said another. 'And would you give a dollar to buy him one?' said the first. 'Yes, two dollars,' was the reply. 'And I two,' said a third and the matter stopped not until —(and here the pastor took from his pocket a watch,) saying as he held it up, 'there it is, a gold lever, sixteen carats fine, double bottom, gold dial, gold balance, twelve jeweled, Johnson, Liverpool. From friends in Boston; Prov. II; 24, 25; 1857; original cost $75.' But who was the boy? No one know but the boy himself. Was he there? All eyes and hearts, were waiting, beating, weeping. Now came the name, slowly, and all turned to the poor fellow, who was getting his head under the seat, crying like a little child. A second and third call brought him out. A modest lad of fifteen he was, in took the watch, scarcely a word more could he said. The scene was beyond description."—Bible Society Record.

SHORT SERMON FOR THE LITTLE FOLKS.

Many of our little friends have by some means given themselves a very foolish habit of making use of many words end phrases which are of no use to any one, and do not at all relieve the mind of the speaker. This practice is not only very foolish and silly, but it is very wrong. Let me illustrate this by a case in point:

Here is Harry Hillis, a smart little boy of six or seven summers, loved by all who know him. His mother is our neighbor, and a low picket fence divides our gardens. A few days ago, while I was weeding a plot near the fence, I heard some one exclaim, impatiently:

"By jiminy, that's too mean!"

I looked up, and saw Harry, who colored up to the roots of his hair, as I asked:

"What's too mean?"

"Why, you see, I was raking here in the garden, and my rake caught in a root, and three of the teeth of my beautiful rake came out."

"Yes, Harry, I see; but suppose all the teeth had come out, or even the rake broke, so that it would be impossible to use it, is that any reason you should swear about it?"

"But I uldn't swear; I only said ——"

"Yes, Harry, I am sorry to say you did. 'By jiminy' is just as much an oath as is any other. By anything, no matter how small, is swearing, and the fact is you take an oath. Do you understand?"

Harry did, and the bright tears rolled down his cheeks, as I talked to him of "little oaths," and showed him tha step was small from these to the time when he would, without thinking, take the name of his Creator in vain.

Since that time, I have not heard Harry use any word not necessary to show his meaning. Children, think of this, and remember to "swear not at all."—Independent.

THE LITTLE MAIDEN'S PRAYER.

She keelt her down so meekly,
Believing none were nigh,
Clasped her little hands so sweetly,
And then, with upturned eye,

Said: "Father, please to bless me
Through all the long, long day,
And keep me all so safely
Till I come again to pray."

She simply asked forgiveness
For evil she had done,
Then said, "Now I'm forgiven,
Through Christ, God's own dear Son."

She prayed for loved ones near her,
For friends both far and wide,
That God would "kindly bless them,
And all the world beside."

THE ADOPTION.

There was a lad once who was left an orphan, his father having died at sea, and what was to be done with the poor fellow no one knew. There was no money left to support him, and the neighbors in the little fishing town, where the boy lived, said he must go to the workhouse, for times were hard, and they had, most of them, little enough to live upon.

There was one old man, a grey-haired fisherman, who heard the sad story, and he said, "the boy shall not go to the workhouse, nor shall he go off to sea, like his brothers, until he has been taught a little of his duty to God and his neighbor. I will adopt him, and treat him as my child."

"Why," asked one old lady, a richer person than the kind old fisherman, "was his father a friend of yours?"

"Not at all," was the reply; "the reverse, but I pity the boy and I will adopt him."

Now many people knew that the boy's father had injured this good old man, died deeply in his debt, and had never shown him either kindness or gratitude. They knew, too, that the boy was much such a lad as the son of such a father was likely to be: selfish, ungrateful and disobedient. As to his valuing the offered home or love, they rightly judged he would do nothing of the sort.

But, nevertheless, the kind man adopted him, and when they tried to laugh him out of his resolution, he said, "God manifested his love to us in that when we were yet sinners Christ died for us. We were not friends, but enemies, when God sent Jesus to reconcile us. I shall adopt the lad."

And the boy was taken home, he was fed, and clad, taught, and tended carefully, and in time learned to love his father, for the love which that father showed his adopted child excited love in the child's heart; he loved him because of his love.

Now you are exactly in the position of that boy. Neither by nature, nor by life, have you deserved God's favor; nor done, nor felt anything that he should love you. Yet he does love you and if you believe in His son Jesus, whom He sent, you may call Him Father.—Mrs. Geldart.

A NOBLE BOY.

We met a bright little fellow in Boston the other day, whose conduct was of the most refreshing nature in these days of rampant selfishness, and which left an impression on our memory which cannot be effaced. Not more than eight or ten summers had passed over his head, and yet his act would have gilded with beauty and manliness any human being of any age. He was neatly clad, and his manners indicated good training. A little girl, four or five years of age, in attempting to cross the street near the Winthrop House, fell, and besides badly soiling her dress, hurt herself. Her dress and everything about her showed that she was the child of poor parents; and she was sadly bewailing her condition, when our hero approached her, and after, with boyish artlessness, asking her name and where she lived, took her by the hand, and with a countenance which reflected the benevolence of his nature, started for the home of his little charge, she seeming to forget her dirty dress and hurts under the escort of her chivalrous gallant, whose noble conduct elicited the admiration of the bystanders, drawing from them such remarks as, "He's a fine boy," "That's a noble little fellow," "He'll be a man, God bless him!" and if he lives to be a man and does not make himself known to the world, it will not be for want of a generous nature, and, as we believe, a good mother.—Fall River Monitor.

"THE OLD MAN."

"George, you used to attend the Bible class; where are you now? Why don't you come?"

"Don't like to," answered George; "I only came there because the old man made me."

There was something wrong in this young man's answer, not only in his dislike to the Bible class, but in the disrespectful and unfeeling manner in which he spoke of an excellent father. "The old man," and all similar terms which boys sometimes use in speaking of their father, show a coarse, unfilial spirit, which has no grateful and affectionate sense of a father's worth. In fact it is a bad symtom; for a boy who does not honor his father, and speak of him with respect, will be likely to break away from parental restraint, and run a course of disobedience and folly.

MODESTY.

Not all the bright jewels and gay apparel that kings and queens can put on, are so adorning as the graces of meekness and modesty.

No brilliancy of art, no wealth, no learning, nor beauty, nor life, can make up for the absence of modesty in man or woman. It is the chief grace which makes all other graces more beautiful, and nothing is more quickly noticed or more universally condemned than its absence. It commends itself to all as a mantle of virtue and good sense, and opens the way to universal esteem and influence. Modesty and humility are sure to be exalted, while a haughty spirit is sure to be abased.

As the soil however rich it may be, cannot be productive without culture, so the mind without cultivation, can never produce good fruit.—Seneca.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

BROTHER EWELL M. RANDOLPH, son of Rev. J. M. Randolph, died near Winnsboro' in Franklin parish, La., on the 13th inst., after a short but severe illness. Bro. Randolph was born in Franklin parish, on the 14th of August, 1842. Aged upwards of seventeen years. Bro. Randolph was a member of the M. E. Church. Though he had not obtained a remission of his sins, seemed to desire the association of the good people of God, the means of grace so peculiar to the M. E. Church. Having been raised by religious parents, and amid the institutions of Christianity, he was early taught the importance of a preparation of heart to meet his God in peace. But not unlike many others, he deferred this, until he felt his death summons find coma. Through the prayers of his parents and many kind friends—about thirty-six hours previous to his death, after many hours of unmitigated struggle, he obtained the forgiveness of his sins—called parents and friends to his side, and told them all was well. Thus with an unclouded sun, after a very short life of toil, he receded from the care and trouble of earth, no more to hail his bereaved relatives and friends till in the untarnished plains of glory they clasp anew the immortal hand.

THOS. H. MCCLENDON.

NEWTON S. RANDOLPH, son of Rev. J. M. Randolph, died at his father's residence in the Parish of Franklin, after a protracted illness. He was born in Franklin parish, La., Sept. 22, 1844. He died on the 18th of Nov., 1859. He, like the above, had the advantage of early Christian examples; though not a member of the Church, yet he was a dutiful and loving son. Although he was of but fifteen short summers, yet doubtless but few are better prepared for the society of the blessed than was he. From the calmness with which he met the "King of Terrors," he doubtless passed safely into "joys of the blessed," and is seated amid flowers and zephyrs of the sunny field of perannial peace and happiness.

Wiped by the wind's untimely blast,
Parch'd by the sun's directed ray,
The mumentary glories waste,
The short-lived beauties die away.

BASCOM, son of Rev. B. and Mary Millen, died in the 11th year of his age, in Sumpter county Ala., on Nov. 30. Bascom was a good boy. He was obedient to his parents and teachers, kind and generous to his brothers and associates. He was loved by all who knew him because he possessed every trait that is calculated to make one lovable. Little Bascom has left his parents and brothers, his schoolmates and friend to mourn his loss. But, "Suffer not your hearts to be troubled." "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away—Blessed be the name of the Lord."

MRS. ELIZABETH JANE STEED, consort of S. P. Steed, died at the residence of her husband, in Jefferson county, Ark., the 18th Sept., 1859. She was born in Morgan county, Ala., Dec. 21st 1823. Shortly after her father removed to Talladega county, where she married S. P. Steed, Aug. 31st, 1843. She embraced religion, and joined the M. E. Church in the year 1841, in which she lived a member till her death. She leaves a husband, seven children, and many relations and friends to mourn her loss.

HUNTSVILLE FEMALE COLLEGE, HUNTSVILLE, North Alabama.
REV. A. R. ERWIN, D. D., Principal.
This Establishment offers the following inducements to Southern patronage.
1. Huntsville is the nearest mountain location to the South and Southwest; and is proverbially healthful. The social elegance and beautiful scenery to be found here, are great auxiliaries in the formation of character.
2. The edifice is large and elegant—supplied with gas light; and water in the greatest abundance by pipes, from a mammoth Spring in the town. It is 161 by 62 feet, three stories high, and well furnished.
3. The domestic arrangements are such as to secure not only comfort, but the social and domestic training of the pupils. Frugality, propriety and grace, as well as the virtues of the heart, are habitually cultivated.
4. The facilities of instruction are unsurpassed. There are fifteen teachers and attaches, some of whom are distinguished educators. The large patronage, from among the best families of nine of the Southern States, attests the good-will of the Institution.
5. Arrangements are made to accommodate Southern pupils during the Summer Vacation, and to furnish them with such instructions in the extra branches as may be desired. Pupils received at any time.

COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE, BATON ROUGE. The Exercises of this Institution will be resumed on the 12th of October next.
The Principal intends to spare neither labor nor expense to make the school in its Educational facilities and its moral influences, equal to the very best Schools in the country.
As the number of pupils is limited, it is desirable that applications be made as early as possible.
Parents are call ed to the importance of having their children at School as promptly as possible. The loss of a few days at the beginning, often proves a serious disadvantage to the pupils, and greatly increases the labor of the teachers for the whole session.

HUMBOLDT'S ASCENT OF CHIMBORAZO.

From the life, travels, and books of Alexander Von Humboldt, we extract the following interesting account:

On the 22d day of June, the birthday of his brother, Humboldt commenced his ascent of Chimborazo, accompanied by Bonpland and Carlos-de Montufar, a young Spanish naturalist. They started from the plain of Tapia, at an elevation of over nine thousand feet. This aired table land was near the village of Lican; the ancient residence of the sovereigns of Quito. From Lican to the summit of Chimborazo was nearly five leagues in a straight line. They followed the plain, leaving behind them groups of Indians bound to the market of Lican, and slowly ascending, halted for the night at the village of Calpi. They were now at the foot of Chimborazo. It rose before them stupendously in the light of the setting sun. The foreground was veiled in the vaporous dimness that striped the lower strata of the air, but as they cast their eyes toward the summit it detached itself from the deep blue sky. They saw above the region of ligneous plants and alpine shrubs a broad belt of grass like a gilded-yellow carpet. Beyond this was a region of porphyritic rocks, and beyond these rocks eternal ice and snow. As the earth below grew darker, the heaven above seemed to grow brighter, and their sight was dazzled with the refulgent splendor of the snow.

Early the next morning their Indian guides awoke them, and they began to climb the mountain on the south-eastern side, traversing the great plain which rose like terraces, one above another, until they reached the plain of Sisgun, twelve thousand four hundred feet above the level of the sea. Here Humboldt wished to make a trigonometrical measurement to ascertain the height of the summit, but it was shrouded in thick clouds. From time to time they caught a momentary glimpse of it through openings in the clouds, but the sky was gradually darkening. They continued to ascend till they arrived at the little lake of Yana Cocha, a circular basin one hundred and thirty feet in diameter. It was the most elevated spot yet reached by man on the ridge of mountains, three thousand three hundred feet higher than the summit of Mont Blanc. Here they left their mules. The barometer showed a height of fourteen thousand three hundred and fifty feet. Crossing the yellow belt of grass which they had seen over night, they came to a region of magite. Here rocks rose in columns of fifty or sixty feet high and looked like the trunks of trees. Traversing the isles of this enchanted forest of stone, over fields of new-fallen snow, they gained a narrow ridge which led directly to the summit of Chimborazo, and by which alone they might hope to reach it, for the snow around was too soft and yielding to be ventured upon.—The path became steeper and narrower, and at last the guides refused to go any further. When they were sixteen thousand five hundred feet high, all but one left them. Nothing daunted, however, the travelers went on, enveloped in a thick mist. The path which they were ascending was in many places not more than eight or ten inches broad—the natives called it "knife-blade." On one hand was a declivity of snow covered with a glassy coating of ice, on the other a chasm one thousand feet deep, the bottom of which was covered with masses of naked rocks. They inclined their bodies over the chasm, dangerous as it was, for they dared not trust themselves to the snowy ditch on the other side. Had they stumbled they would have been buried in the mingled snow and ice, or would have rolled down the steep. The character of the rock, which was brittle and crumbling, increased the difficulty of the ascent. Here and there they were obliged to crawl on their hands and feet—the sharp edges of the rock wounding them, and they left behind a bloody trail. They marched in single file, testing with their poles the stability of the rock before them. This precaution was very necessary, as many of the rocks were lying loose on the brink of the precipice. Desirous of knowing how much of the mountain remained to be ascended, for the summit was continually hidden from their sight, Humboldt opened the barometer on a point where the path was broad enough to allow two persons to sit by side—the mercury indicated a height of eighteen thousand three hundred and eighty feet. The temperature of the air was eighty-three degrees, and that of the earth one hundred and seven degrees.

They proceeded for another hour, and found the rocky path less steep; the mist, however, was thicker than ever. They now began to suffer severely from the extreme rarefaction of the air. They breathed with difficulty, and, what was still more disagreeable, felt like vomiting. Their heads swam, their lips and gums bled profusely, and their eyelids and eyeballs were charged with blood.

From time to time great birds, probably condors, came swooping down the terrible pass, sailing grandly away, and little winged insects, resembling flies, fluttered gayly around. It was impossible to catch them, owing to the narrowness of the ledge, but Humboldt judged that they were Dipteras. Bonpland saw yellow butterflies, a little lower down, and flying very near the ground.

Finally the belts of clouds parted, and they saw on a sudden the vast dome of Chimborazo. It seemed near them, so near that in a few minutes they might reach it. The ledge, too, seemed to favor them by becoming yet broader. They hurried onward for a short distance, excited with the hope of soon standing on the pinnacle.—All at once the path was stopped by a chasm four hundred feet deep and sixty feet broad. There was no way by which they could cross it—the difficulty was insurmountable. To tantalize them still further, they saw that the path went forward on the other side of the ledge, evidently reaching the summit. If they could have but crossed that chasm!

It was one o'clock in the afternoon, and they were benumbed with cold. They were nineteen thousand two hundred feet above the level of the sea.

The belt of clouds closed again, and the peak was lost. The mist grew thicker and thicker, and everything indicated a storm. There was nothing left them but to descend. Halting only long enough to collect a few specimens of the rock, they retraced their steps. A storm of hail overtook them, but as they descended into a lower atmosphere it changed into snow. When they had reached the little lake of Yana Cocha, where they left their mules, they found the ground covered with snow to the depth of several inches. Before dusk they reached the Indian village of Calpi, and were entertained that night by the priest.

So ended the attempt to scale the lofty summit of Chimborazo.

DISCOVERIES IN SOUTH AUSTRALIA.

The important discoveries made by Mr. Stuart, during a late journey of exploration in the sister province of South Australia, are thus described by an Australian paper:

"Mr. Stuart returned to Adelaide on the 17th of July, in the Marian steamer, from Port Augusta, after an absence of six months. His party consisted of two persons besides himself, and they had with them about four pack, and four or five saddle-horses. Mr. Stuart's first business was to survey and lay off the ruins discovered and claimed by him some time ago. After that work was finished, he started with his party on a further exploratory expedition, and the result has been an immense tract of country, exceeding in richness of pasturage and abundance of water anything that has yet been met with. The distance traversed was 300 miles beyond the furthest point reached by Mr. Babbage and Major Warburton, and the country was found to be luxuriant beyond description. Mr. Stuart started from the Emerald Springs about the beginning of April, and reached latitude 26 deg. S. the northern boundary of his colony about the middle of May, and during the entire journey there and back, he states that he was never a single day without water. The country traversed consists chiefly of immense plains, interspersed with numerous hillocks from 100 to 150 feet high, from the summit of which gushed pure fresh water, intersecting the plains and discharging themselves into numerous creeks and rivers running in an easterly direction.

"One of the rivers discovered is reported by Mr. Stuart to be three miles broad in one part of its course. The range flanking the plain is chiefly table-topped, and about 1000 feet high. Mr. Stuart made a detour occasionally of from 20 to 30 miles on each side of his track, and found the country everywhere of the same beautiful description; and it seemed to be of a similar character as far as the eye could reach beyond the furthest point attained by him. Indeed, he seems to have turned back through sufficit of good country. He thinks there would not be any difficulty whatever in crossing over to the Gulf of Carpentaria, or to any other portion of the north coast. His impression is that an inland lake or sea exists to the eastward, which probably discharges its waters into Stoke's Victoria River to the northwest. At any rate, the theory that the centre of New Holland is nothing but a desert may now be exploded. Mr. Stuart has brought back specimens of the grasses, seeds, and minerals of the country, the last of which are said to include some specimens of stones. A considerable portion of the district traversed is represented as auriferous.

ON THE FEAR OF DEATH.

When people have nothing more to live for, why should they be afraid of death? I do not understand it. When life is but just begun, and before experience has made us tired of it, I can well appreciate why it should be dear, and why we should be loth to give it up. Then the hope of future joys are bright, and many untoiled pleasures are anticipated. Then we look forward to the future with fancy-colored expectation. In youth we envy the greater freedom and capacity of those who are a few years in advance of us. At ten, we long to be twenty. At twenty we have tasted care, and are beginning to feel anxious about our future, and think that at thirty a position in life will be established. We will not then be thinking who will be our life partner; we will not be devoured with jealousy; will not be "sighing like a furnace with woeful ballad," but will be settled down with the one we love, and winning our way to wealth and fame. Oh, yes, the difficulties, struggles, and anxieties of twenty will be all past at thirty, and then we will be in the full enjoyment of life.

But thirty comes, and with it comes its own cares and disappointments. The love of thirty is not the love of twenty. The glow, the enthusiasm, the bright pictures, the Platonic love, to be lengthened into a perpetual honey moon, have all passed and gone, and sober reality has come; and instead of that which was anticipated, the disappointment that embitters, and the sharp intellect that criticises, and encases its possessor in cynicism and disgust.

At this period the observant and reflecting mind can well decide the question whether this world which we inhabit has anything worth living for. If it has not, why then does any one wish to live?

I will suppose the case of one who has run the round of sensual pleasures, or rather of one who has been so far as to find that there is no real sensual pleasure to be found in the world—that what passes for pleasure of that kind is but the vaporings of excitement, to be distilled into repentance and pain. He looks forward to nothing different. In that direction in which he had hoped for a higher pleasure, a more spiritual and etherial life, he has been cut off by the fickleness and faithlessness of some one to whom he had, like a clinging barnacle, attached his heart. Beyond and in the future, he sees nothing that he cares for; nothing worth striving for; nothing that he thinks worth attaining. Why, then, should he wish to live? Why be he afraid of death? He looks back on the days that are gone, and asks himself if there has been more of sorrow than of joy; more of pleasure than of pain, in the year just passed. His answer, if he dares to listen to it, is no; and if he could foresee that each future year would be like those which are gone, he would very likely say with Jonah, "It is better for me to die than to live."

It is improbable that it one half of the people we meet with in our intercourse with the world, were to be asked if they would care to live over again the events of the last five years, they would say, unhesitatingly, no. If asked if they had any reason to suppose that the future would be any brighter than the past, they would say no. If then asked what they wanted to live for, they would say they did not, but they were afraid to die—they stood in awe of death.

Such dread of a natural termination of a life that is admitted to be unhappy, is unreasonable, irreligious, and weak. The same power will be above us then as now. Why, then, be afraid of death? It is unphilosophical and absurd. Reason says thus when death is or is not near at hand, and it is weak to fear it when it comes nearer. Why should we dread to-morrow that which we think we could welcome to-day?

Thus I reason. It is true I might quake and tremble when I saw the grim monster before me, inevitable, fixed, inexorable; yet it seems to me that the man of clear conscience could in the line of duty meet him as indifferently, resolutely, and conscientiously, as he could eat his dinner.

I leave quite out of view the religious aspect of the case. I come down to truth, reason, and philosophy, and I ask why man should be afraid of death? This fear is, as I maintain, unreasonable, and, as I believe, founded on false doctrine. We are taught, or at least the most of us are, from our childhood, that death is something very solemn and dreadful, and we are made to look forward to it as of all things to be feared and shunned.

Hence, the fear of it assumes the form of second nature. It seems to be an instinctive dread, whereas it is only the fear resulting from false education.

I hold that it is an accusation against Divine mercy to assume that death is to be feared. It is irreligion that dictates it, or rather it is that religion which believes in a God of anger, rather than a God of love.—The joys and sorrows of this world we know, for we have experienced them, but of the world to come we are to judge by revelation and analogy. I leave the former out of the question, and, judging by the latter, we have no reason to expect the world to come will be any worse than this. The same Being will rule over us, and the same external laws of right, and justice, and love, will prevail; and why should we fear to trust ourselves in "that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler returns?".

It is not that men regret to leave this world that they are afraid to enter another. The two influences are separate and distinct.

Could a man have entire faith that at the end of forty or one hundred, or a thousand years, he could return to this earth and live out the balance of his days, how many would choose to take a centennial nap? But they think as they are going to another world, "to an undiscovered country," there must be something very dreadful about it. They seem to forget that the same God rules in the heavens as in the earth, and they blaspheme him by their fears, for their fears say that His arm is shortened, that He cannot save.

The infidel may ask me how I know there's a future state, and he may say that it is the dread of a final putting out of the light of the spirit, the last of man's existence in any form or sphere, that causes him to fear to "shuffle off the mortal coil." This cannot be so, for the reason that not one in ten thousand believes when he comes to die that it is to be death of the soul as well as of the body. The few who have believed otherwise have arrived at their conclusion only by the hardest kind of disputation. They have studied and reasoned themselves into a belief that the unlearned could never reach. So, the fear of death comes not from the dread of annihilation. It comes from a lack of faith in God's power and goodness. It is an unreasonable belief. Death will in no wise separate us from the love of God. "Yea, I am persuaded" that neither death nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come—nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

ABIDETH FOREVER.

A late number of the North British Review contains the following very truthful statement, regarding the preservation of the original writings of the Holy Scriptures:

"It is a matter of congratulation that the Bible has passed triumphantly through the ordeal of verbal criticism. English infidels of the last century raised a premature pean over the discovery and publication of so many various readings. They imagined that the popular mind would be rudely and thoroughly shaken, that Christianity would be placed in imminent peril of extinction, and that the church would be dispersed, and ashamed at the sight of tattered shreds of its Magna Charta. But the result has blasted all their hopes, and the oracles of God are found to have been preserved in immaculate integrity.

The storm which shakes the oak only loosens the earth around its roots, and its violence enables the tree to strike its roots deeper in the soil. So it is that Scripture has gloriously surmounted every trial. There gather around it a dense "cloud of witnesses," from the ruins of Nineveh and the valleys of the Nile; from the slabs and bas-reliefs of Sennacherib, and the tombs and monuments of Pharoah; from rolls of Chaldee paraphrast and Syrian versionists; from the cells and libraries of monastic scribes, and the dry and dusty labors of scholars and antiquarians.

Our present Bibles are undilated by the lapse of ages. These Oracles, written amidst such strange diversity of time, place and condition—among the sands and cliffs of Arabia, the fields and hills of Palestine, in the palaces of Babylon, and in the dungeons of Rome—have come down to us in such unimpaired fullness and accuracy, that we are placed as advantageously toward them as the generation which hung on the lips of Jesus, as he recited a parable on the shores of the Galilean lake or those churches which received from Paul or Peter one of their epistles of warning exposition.

Yes! the river of life, which issues out from beneath the throne of God and of the Lamb, may, as it flows through so many countries, sometimes bear with it the earthly evidences of its chequered progress; but the great volume of its water has neither been dimmed in its transparency nor bereft of its healing virtue.

VOICE AND SPEECH.

A manual with this title, by James Hunt, has been published in London. The volume contains scientific descriptions of the vocal organs, and other learned matters, which are intelligible to the initiated only. But besides these, there is quite a collection of facts of universal interest. We cull a few:

That the dumb animals to a certain extent understand one another is generally admitted. The cock has one cry for announcing the approach of dawn, another for his love speech, and quite another for his shout of victory. The cries of the hen, after laying, differ from those uttered when her brood has been hatched, and again from those which she emits when her progeny are in danger. A French author, M. Dupont, acting upon the hint suggested by these obvious facts, has attempted the task of studying the languages of animals, and forming a sort of vocabulary of them. He professes to have learned twelve pigeon-words, twelve words of the common fowls, twenty-one of cattle-language, thirteen of dog-language, fourteen of cat-language, and he thinks he understands the entire language of rooks.

"Clergyman's sore throat" is ascribed by Mr. Hunt to the sudden transition of the vocal organ from repose to activity. He says that throat affections are most prevalent among those clergymen who read their sermons. In reading the head stoops, the larynx is compressed, and the free action of its muscles is impeded. The extemporaneous preacher, on the contrary, raises his head, throws back his shoulders, and thus gives the muscles of the throat fair play. Any one who tries the experiment soon finds that half an hour's reading from a book affects his voice more than an hour's extemporaneous speaking; unless indeed, he has by practice acquired the art of reading in such a manner that it differs but little from speaking.

The speaking, as preachers frequently do, in an assumed tone, in order to impart solemnity to their sermons, is decidedly injurious. Nothing likewise fatigues the voice so much as singing in an unnatural tone. The best time for what young ladies call "practising" (the voice) is between ten and twelve in the morning, and from five to eight in the afternoon. The duration of the lessons is also of some consequence. Children should never be kept at them longer than half an hour and a quarter. The pupils should practice in an erect position, and all grimaces of the mouth and face should be strictly forbidden.

Loud vociferations in the open air, when walking up hill, and against the wind, are, with due caution of great use for strengthening the voice. Children are instinctively given to vociferation. Nothing can be more absurd than to bid children "play quietly," and to whispers. Those who cannot hear the noise of children, in which their fun consists, are certainly not fit to be with them. The value of loud outcries to the voice is manifest from the fact that itinerant peddlers, street-criers, and ballad-singers, although constantly exposed to the vicissitudes of the weather, are liable neither to colds nor to pulmonary affections.

Among the disorders of the voice, that of periodical or temporary dumbness seems the most unaccountable. One young man, a German, is mentioned, who during fourteen years has spoken only for a couple of hours each day, from noon till two o'clock. Another person, aged sixty, becomes dumb from seven to eight o'clock every morning. A girl of sixteen remains speechless for a fortnight, at regular intervals of three months. A boy often hears well, and understands what is said to him, yet never makes any attempt at articulation; but when he wishes to attract attention he contents himself with uttering a loud, sharp bark, like a dog.

Dr. Gregory used in his lectures to mention the case of a clergyman, who, while laboring under an affection of the brain, spoke nothing but Hebrew, the last language he had acquired. Dr. Prichard mentions an English lady, who, in recovering from an apoplectic attack, always spoke to her attendants in French, as she had actually lost the knowledge of the English language. This continued about a month.

The celebrated Dr. Broussonet lost, after a slight apoplectic attack, the power of pronouncing substantive nouns, whether in French or Latin. Thus, when he wished to pronounce apple, he described it by its qualities. When the noun was shown to him, written or printed, he immediately recognized it but had no power to designate it spontaneously.

A frequent modification of mutism consists in putting one name for another, but always using the words in the same sense: thus, a gentleman, when he wanted coals put upon the fire, always called for paper, and when he wanted paper, called for coals; and these words he always used in a similar case.

SPAIN AND MOROCCO.

The last intelligence from Europe is that Spain was about to commence hostilities on Morroco, and some of the accounts state that France would be her ally.

Morocco has an area of about two hundred and twenty thousand square miles, and has Algeria for its boundary. It has a line of coast on the Mediterranean two hundred and thirty miles in extent. The territory has two principal features, the mountainous region and the level country. The Berbers and Shelluhs live in the mountains, the former, a wild and barbarous race, living in caves and tents, and the latter, the Shelluhs, more civilized, live in stone houses, and are agriculturalists. The level portions are occupied by the Arabs proper, the descendants of the Mahommedan pioneers, who retain the manner of life of their kindred of the Arabian desert; but the greater number of the inhabitants of this level country are the Moors, who form the dominant race, and occupy the towns and villages along the coast. In a word, the population of Morocco, about six millions, consists of different races who never amalgamated, but remain to-day quite distinct from each other.

The Empire is divided into four territories which are subject to the Sultan: These are Fez, occupying the northern portion, between Tamer-Begh and the Mediterranean; Morocco, the centre, between this river and the Attas; Susa in the south, and Tafilet, to the east of the Attas. The Sultan is supreme in power, sole lord of the life, liberty, and property of his subjects. There is no law in Morocco but his will and that of his subordinates; and he is entitled "Lord of the Faithful," and "Viceroy of God upon Earth." His subordinates plunder the people and they are plundered by the Sultan. The Sultan, however, has never been able to reduce the fierce tribes of the mountains to his authority.

The regular military force of the Sultan consists of 5000 negroes, who form his body guard; and this is the only standing army in Morocco. This is a sort of militia, who are occasionally called out, and as a compensation which they visit the capital, receive a small gratuity and a horse; and though quite undisciplined and ineffective, are said to be good horsemen and marksmen. This is certainly not a very formidable force; but in population so large as six millions an army can be gathered that can make serious work for invaders as was seen in the last French war with this Power.

There is a weary history of Morocco, but we have space only to notice its fortunes since 1844. Then the famous Ameer of Algiers, Abd-el-Kader, stirred up the Moors to war against France. He sought refuge after disasters with the French troops, in the Moorish territories, whence, with aid derived from the Sultan, he would issue from the desert and attack the French military posts. France in vain remonstrated, but the Moorish Court always gave evasive answers. At length, in August, 1844, the Prince de Joinville, in the Pintau war steamer, attacked the fortifications of Tangier, and eighty pieces of artillery returned the fire; but in an hour their fire was silenced and their batteries dismantled. The French lost three killed and sixteen wounded; the Moors lost one hundred and fifty killed and four hundred wounded. The Prince de Joinville next attacked Mogadore, which he bombarded for a whole day and met in return a severe fire from the Moorish batteries. Then he resolved to carry them by storm, and it was done with five hundred picked men. The fight was terrible; one-half of the Moorish garrison died with their yataghans in their hands. The French were successful, and then commenced a frightful destruction of the town. The inhabitants fled to the interior; the Kabyles from the hills rushed into the town and plundered the houses. Meantime Marshal Bugeud, from Algeria, sought battle with the Moorish army twenty thousand strong, in its camp, and won a complete victory, taking sixteen standards, eleven cannon, and a thousand tents; but the Moors fought well and the French suffered severely. These disasters brought the Moorish Court to terms; it yielded all the French demands, and since that time there has been peace.

The present war grows out of the depredations of the Riff pirates of Morrocco on Spanish commerce. They long have been pests to trade; within a few years French, Spanish, and Prussian vessels have suffered severely from their outrages. In 1856 the French Government obtained an indemnity for these outrages—the first time any Government succeeded in that. Spain is resolved to pursue the course that France took in 1844, and there can be little doubt as to the issue.—Boston Post.

DR. GUTHRIE'S APPEAL.

At the annual meeting of the Scottish Temperance League, noticed last month, the Rev. Dr. Guthrie concluded one of his inimitable appeals, by the following touching allusion to a case which had passed under his observation that very day:

"I was visiting to-day, and I hold in my hand a letter written by a dying man. His home, three years ago, was one of the happiest, sweetest, tidiest and most comfortable homes of any working man in Edinburgh. He is now dying of consumption, his life is draining away, his cheek is hollow, his eye is prominent, his voice sepulchral. There he lies on his dying bed. When I first went to see him, beside him lay a child of three years old, which was lifted out of the bed beside him by its mother. Of all the pitiable, touching objects, I ever looked on, it was one of the most touching. Its limbs and arms were reduced to skin and bone. Its cheeks were bandaged up with scrofulous sores, and its mouth was drawn together. It had the sweetest face I almost ever saw. There was the dying husband, and there was the dying child, and there was a woman—three years ago, as respectable, genteel like, and I know as kind, tender, loving a mother as was in all Edinburgh. And six days ago the missionary of the district was heard to say that that woman had smitten her dying husband and was like to kill her child; and when I went there this day, with the tears falling on the face of that poor young corpse, I gave God thanks the child was dead. On the Sabbath morning the grey dawn looked in upon a room, and what saw it there? A mother lying in the bed, the pillow where that child was lying stained with its life-blood—the child dead, and the mother dead drunk—and with that poor infant corpse before her but yesterday—I think that scene, as I told her, might have sobered a buccaneer—she took a chair and hurled it at her husband, the dying man, far gone in consumption. Can men see that, and go quietly back to their work. May all the curses of a gracious heaven be upon that vice; may God blast that tree that can produce such scenes of misery in this world. I detested drinking before, I detest it ten times more now. And how ministers of the Gospel—how Christian elders in the face of this vice can go on, with their indulgences, is to me a mystery; I cannot understand it. I do not condemn them—by their own hands they stand or fall; but before them I charge drink with breaking more hearts—with destroying the ties of more families—with ruining more bodies; with sending more souls to perdition than almost all the other vices in this country put together. And I would appeal to my brethren if there were any of them here. You are no better of it—you are the worse of it. It does your body no good—it is, I believe, the mightiest agent the devil ever invented to ruin souls. I call upon them, as I did last time I was here, on their knees, over their Bibles, with the example of Christ before them, to consider this question; and I am certain if they do so in a right spirit, they will come to a right conclusion. They will do what I have done, and I have never regretted it, and I know I never will regret it, by giving myself heart and hand to this cause, until by God's blessing we triumph.

CURIOSITIES OF THE SUNBEAM.

Simple as a white ray of the sun's light appears, it is found, on close observation, to be composed of at least three distinct elements, and to possess many curious and wonderful properties. The three elements of which we speak are light, heat, and chemical force; and they may be separated from each other by means of a very simple instrument. Darken a room, and bore a small hole through one of the window-shutters, so as to admit a ray of light from the sun. Place a triangular prism of glass horizontally across the ray, with the edge down, so that the light may pass through it. The ray will be bent upward, and will strike the wall a higher point than it did before the prism was interposed. It will not, however, all be bent equally so as to make the round spot it did before, but will form an elongated image of seven brilliant and most delicate colors, which shade into each other and fade away indefinitely at the ends of the image. The lowest of these colors, when the prism is placed as directed, is always red; and the others in order as we ascend are orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo, and violet. Suspend a delicate thermometer in each of the colored rays, and it will be found that the violet ray imparts the least heat, and that the heat increases as we pass down through the several colors. If we continue our observations with the thermometer down beyond the red ray, we find a point, where no light falls, where the thermometer receives more heat than it does anywhere within the light. The rays of light are separated by the prism from those of heat.

Another curious fact which has been observed also proves that the light and heat of the sunbeam are distinct elements. If we suspend a thermometer in the vicinity of a close stove, which emits heat but not light, the heat radiating from the stove will raise the mercury in the thermometer. But if we interpose a plate of transparent glass, none of these dark rays of heat pass through it; it is entirely opaque to them. If we now increase the temperature of the stove until it becomes red-hot, the rays of heat begin to pass through the glass and affect the thermometer; and if we raise the temperature to a white heat, the rays pass freely through the glass. If we vary the experiment, and use crystals of rock salt, instead of glass, we find that the dark rays of heat pass out as freely through the salt as do those which are accompanied with light.

Some of the alchemists discovered, centuries ago, that the chloride of silver, which is as white as snow, turns black on exposure to the light; and more recently it has been found that a large number of bodies are thus affected by light. It is this power of light which is used in the daguerrotype and photograph processes. By more than one means, the force of this element can be measured in the several parts of the spectrum, and it is found to be most powerful in the violet ray and to extend entirely beyond the light. It is not visible to the eye; it does not affect the thermometer; and it is therefore neither light nor heat. It is easy, after thus dividing the sunbeam, to recombine its parts, when the white ray will produce the several effects of light, of heat, and of chemical change, which are produced separately by its several elements.—Scientific American.

HATE NOT.

Hate not. It is not worth while. Your life is not long enough to make it pay to cherish ill-will or hard thoughts toward any one. What if that man has cheated you, or that woman has played you false? What if this friend has forsaken you in your time of need, or that one having won your utmost confidence, your warmest love, has concluded that he prefers to consider and treat you as a stranger? Let it all pass. What difference will it make to you in a few years, when you go hence to the "undiscovered country?" All who ill-treat you now will be more sorry for it then, than you, even in your deepest disappointment and grief, can be.

Do not commit the folly of hating, or feeling revengeful toward the frail beings for whom, if you are a true child of God, your soul is yet to yearn in agonizing pity, or to burn with quenchless love.

A little while and all misunderstandings, differences, and heart burnings are to be over forever; and how you will then regret that ever you had an unkind thought of any known being.

When one, who is your enemy, or worse, your ungenerous and untreatable friend, refuses to favor you, or makes a thrust at your interest or your feelings, if you feel the motions of that revengeful tiger that has his lair in every heart; if he lift himself up and shake his fierce head and say, "Beware, I have it in my power to bring you forcibly to terms, or at least surely to punish you," hold that tiger down. He is a child of the devil, and his business is to tease you, and to drive you, to rend, and destroy. Listen not to him, but look upon the one he asks for his victim and say: "He is but dust and ashes as I am. His heart has its own burdens and sorrows, though his eyes now have that hard and steely light, and though their glances are cold as ice when they turn on me, yet they have wept tears of anguish, and they will weep again before they close forever. He will have enough to bear, let not me torment him. When we stand in judgment before God, if his doom is to go into banishment, how thankful shall I be that I forgive the wrong he did me, or that I did not add a feather to the trouble of his life; and if he and I are welcomed to the Holy City, surely then, I shall rejoice that I avenged not myself against him. It may be hard now to love when I am not loved, it may be a struggle freely to forgive, but it is not worth while to do aught else; for the dying should never contend with the dying, nor be anything but patient and pitiful with each other. And verily, we are all worms together, and soon we shall be hidden together in the earth."

A few more smiles, a few more tears, some pleasure, much pain, a little longer hurrying and worrying through the world, some hasty greetings, and abrupt farewells, and our play will be "played out," and the injurer and the injured will be led away, and ere long forgotten. Is it worth while to hate each other?—N. Y Evangelist.

THE RUSSIAN TRADE IN CHINA.

At the British Association, Sept. 17th, Sir Jno. Bowring made the following remarks on the Russian trade in China:

"That trade is now about to undergo a great change. It had flourished as far as any trade could flourish under the baneful influence of monopoly. Whether from commercial, political, or other motives he could not know, but in view of the great prospective change alluded to, it was perhaps not undesirable that the British merchants should anticipate the state of things which was coming on in consequence of the late treaties which Russia had made with China. The Russians, with admirable sagacity, were using the elements which have been presented to them in China, with a foresight and anticipation of future benefits of which by and by there would be seen the development. Representing only the interests of peace, they had obtained possessions of vast tracts in Chinese Tartary, and the time was at hand in which we should have to anticipate the new position of Russia. Russia at present is excluded from the Atlantic and Pacific by the Dardanels or Bosphorus, and the belt. It is impossible that Russia could make her way there unless on amicable terms with Turkey and with the maritime Powers. And descending from the Baltic, the winter comes on and compels the return of her ships, so that they cannot go long voyages, and can only remain at sea for a few months until their seas are closed in by frosts. But now a state of things is going on which must be regarded with great interest, and he had no doubt that matters would be so overruled that the progress of Russia would be found advantageous to British interests. But it was no less true that we must not lose sight of what was going on. It was no less true that Russia had found an outlet for her fleets into the Great Southern Ocean, and that she possessed, in the western Indian region, some of the most remarkable and most secure harbors of the world: it was quite true that Russia was passing down that remarkable river, the Amoor, towards the south, where large cities were being established, and considerable commerce springing up, and here he would venture to say was a far more promising object for Russia than Turkey was. He had no wish to enter into the political bearing of the subject, but in Constantinople, he might say, the views of Russia might be checked. She is surrounded there by the representatives of great and jealous nations, and whatever her plans and purposes may be, they will be thwarted by greater power and greater sagacity than her own. But as regards the action of Russia upon China, he did not see what was to stop her course. Already large cities exist on the Amoor with thousands and thousands of armed men there, and hundreds of settlers, encouraged by the Government, are drawn "towards the sun," from the less hospitable climate of Siberia, down to the attractive region of the Flowery Land. They would have to meet Russia there.

MASSACRE OF MISSIONARIES.

The July report of the Rhenish Mission Society contains the painful statement that the increasingly hopeful field of labor of that Society in Borneo, has been suddenly destroyed by the cruel massacre of a number of the missionaries. The hearts of the missionaries had just been refreshed and encouraged by the arrival of reinforcements from Europe, when the unexpected blow fell upon them. Five of the missionaries, and one formerly a missionary, three of their wives and three children, were brutally killed; the wife of another, and twelve children, together with several European women and children, were dragged into captivity. The rest of the mission, consisting of six missionaries and their families, fled to Banjermassing, where, among a population of 40,000 Mohammedans, besides many thousands of enemies around the town, their situation at the last account was precarious. The mission-stations were destroyed and completely pillaged, and the fleeing missionaries deprived of everything. All the Europeans who could not reach that town or a neighboring fort were murdered, and their wives and children either killed or carried into captivity.

The island of Borneo, with the neighboring island of Java, belong to the Dutch. The inhabitants are partly Mahommedan and partly heathen. The Rhenish Missionary Society is the only one laboring there, and has met with much success, especially among the Dayak tribe, where Christianity found free access from the first. These scenes are to be considered as a sequel to the rebellion in India, and, like that, were commenced by the Mohammedans. The occasion was taken of the appointment of a new sultan by the Dutch, against whom one of his relatives raised a conspiracy, determined to shake off the yoke of the Dutch, and to kill all the Europeans.

The converted Dayaks stood faithfully to their teachers, aiding them as much as was within their power, while several of them sealed their testimony with their blood. One named Andrew, when seized, together with several others, openly confessed that he was a Christian. His freedom was promised him if he would turn Mahommedan, and a form of prayer was said before him, which he refused to repeat, when he was pierced through. May it prove true in Borneo, as it has in other countries where the followers of Christ have been called to suffer persecution, that the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church.

SELFISHNESS.

Selfishness directs the course of the intellect, just as surely as the rudder does the ship; or rather, like an engine, furious with internal heat, it draws the entire train of the mind's powers after it. Thus, one it makes a mere mammonist, stuffing his thoughts by day, and his dreams by night, with projects of accumulation. Here, selfishness thirsts for gold.

Another it converts into a professional trickster, keen and venomous as a spider, and, like it, ready to devour whatever may be entrapped in its toils.

Another it shapes into a monster of female vanity, covering all feminine beauty with the ugly features that selfishness may choose to take under the mask of fashion or of outward respectability. This varnished gaud may be spangled with ornaments, but all beneath the gay exterior is hollow and false.

But how can we particularize the forms in which selfishness shapes the mind? Their name is Legion. Of the churchman it makes a bigot; of the politician, a lying partisan; of the merchant, a conventional rogue; of the physician, a charlatan; of the lawyer, a pick pocket, and of the priest, a sacrilegious trafficker in most holy things.

Thus selfishness, first perverting our moral nature, and depraving it more and more, and then corrupting the entire action of the mental powers, may be clearly seen to be the original, native, and damning leprosy of the soul. And what joy of life can there be to the man in bondage to this original sin? Toward his fellows, he can scarcely and rarely exhibit anything else than distrust, suspicion, hatred, emulation, and wrath; toward God, nothing than unbelief, murmuring, and arrogant disobedience. He has parted company from his Maker. He has taken up a position of hostility against the world of human kind. He moves in a crowd and is alone. He sees sorrow, and feels no brother's pain. The many voices of love sound in his ear only like harsh discords; and to his eyes the universe is but a dark and cumbrous mass of mysteries, from which no rays of celestial light flash the splendors of a coming glory.

A BIBLE AGENT IN BRAZIL.

Many of our readers will remember the pains taken, two years since, by the Board to circulate the Scriptures in the Valley of the Amazon, by Mr. Robert Nesbit, who died in the service. While Mr. Nesbit was at Para, at the mouth of the river, he employed one of our young countrymen whom he found there, Mr. J. W. Stone, to take a parcel of his books from time to time and dispose of them in the contiguous villages. Such was the success of this experiment, that when Mr. Nesbit died, Mr. Stone was requested to ascend the river, taking the books left, and dispose of them, and make report. This he has done, and made a report much to the satisfaction of the Board.

He ascended the Amazon by steamer two thousand miles, as far as Tabatinga, on the borders of Peru. From thence he proceeded by canoe for forty-eight days, and conveyed his Spanish books farther up the Amazon to Nauta, and thence by the Southern Branch Hallaga, nearly one thousand miles further to the place of landing, then by mules ten days more to Moyabamba, a town of twelve thousand inhabitants, among the mountains of Peru. In this long tour, and on his return, he disposed of some 1300 Bibles and Testaments, nearly all his stock. He was remunerated for his services by a small per-centage on these sold. Owing to the great expense of transportation, in some instances 3500 miles, little has been realized to the Society for sales. The Board feel, however, that a great and good work has been performed, and the way opened for wider distribution at less expense in future.—Bible Society Record.

THE CONQUEST OF DEATH.

Like other great monarchs, death also has his harbingers to proclaim and prepare his approach. He sends before him the most agonizing pains and afflictions; diseases that consume our strength and vigor, and sometimes induce us to expect his arrival every moment. By the trembling joints, the dimness of the eyes, the changed countenance, the breaking of the bowl at the cistern, and the loosening of the silver cord, we know that he is near at hand. There is a shadow cast before him extending according to the height of his terrible majesty, and stretching over part of the vale of life. Yes, all that precedes our dissolution, all that is preparatory to the last stroke, are harbingers of death, afflictive in themselves, and to be dreaded on their own account, but peculiarly fearful as the precursors of this great adversary. As these are his forerunners, so he has innumerable and dreadful instruments to destroy. The famine and the pestilence are in his hand; he kindles the fury of the battle, and riots in the field of slaughter; he wings the forked lightning and expands the jaws of the devouring earthquake; the air we breathe, the elements by which we are supplied, and the food upon which we subsist, are often converted into instruments of death; he levies a contribution upon all, extracts the poison of mortality from that which is given for the sustentation of life. The Empire of death, which it has required so many ages to overthrow, which has seemed to recover from its defeats, will at last sink by one powerful stroke, never to rise again. It will not require more than a moment of time to arise all the dead, to lay open every sepulchre, to restore every particle of dust that is fit to be restored to its proper body, and for all the bodies of the saints to be prepared for the mansion of eternal glory. How inspired and tame are the histories of all these kingdoms and empires, when compared with the grand and wonderful achievements of the King Immortal and the fall of death beneath his power, and the giving up of all his prey. Death shall be known and feared no more. Millions of millions shall join in everlasting praise to Him whom all the redeemed will acknowledge as the Great Deliverer.—Robert Hall.

REFUGE FROM STRIFE.

I have all along been (says the late Dr. Chalmers,) vastly too much disquieted by the misconstructions of those who did not comprehend me, and having suffered much, both from the fatigue of refuting and explaining the same thing a hundred times over, and from the vex

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Terms—$2 00 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1859.

ACCOUNTS—NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

All parties interested in the Advocate—Editor, Preachers, and Subscribers—are interested in avoiding confusion in accounts.

Those well acquainted with the credit system in the newspaper business know full well that, under that system, confusion in accounts never was, never will, never can be avoided.—Uncertain mails, unavoidable oversights in agents or clerks, forgetfulness in subscribers and others, and the wearying, vexatious details of this business over all others, render it impossible. We have tried, for years, and know.

To have the subscription begin and end with the year, and to pay, if not in advance, at least once a year, is the nearest approach to a remedy that we can devise,—and this is our plan.

Immediately after the Conferences, all the accounts will be made out to January, 1861, without reference to time of commencement, or time last paid to; and they will be sent to each subscriber who has not paid to January, 1861.

If all our subscribers and agents will patiently co-operate with us, this difficulty about accounts will be forever settled during the coming year. After that, when January, 1861, comes, $2 more will be due, and so on.

Will our brethren and friends, when they receive these accounts, immediately remit the money to the office, or pay to the preacher, taking a receipt? If any think the account incorrect, let him inform us, pleasantly, without quarreling. We never quarrel, though we have more cause than others.

The volume of the Advocate will hereafter begin and end with the year; and it is very desirable that subscriptions should conform to the same rule.

Therefore, new subscribers, who do not begin with the year, will please send, not two dollars, but an amount sufficient to pay for the paper till the end of the year, at the rate of Four Cents a Week.

Thus, every subscriber will know, without being informed, that at the beginning of the year is the time to remit the subscription money.

And let us have scores, hundreds, thousands of new subscribers with which to begin the New Volume, January 1st, 1860.—We intend, if Providence smile on us, to make a better paper next year than ever before. Arrangements are made, and being made, for greatly increasing its attractions.—Some new writers, of the first order, will begin with the year. The paper is flatteringly approved now—we intend to merit higher approbation.

The route to the Alabama Conference led through Mobile, Montgomery, Columbus, Ga., to Eufaula, Ala., the place of the session. Pressed for time, we could not wait for the leisurely comfort of a steamer from Mobile to Montgomery, but took the bay mail steamer to Stockton, then stage for a night and day to Greenville, Butler county, Ala., and then the cars to Montgomery. Leaving Mobile at noon, we took tea in Montgomery the evening of the next day, and the following morning ate breakfast in Columbus. There we had choice of steamer down the Chattahoochee to Eufaula, or the Mobile and Girard railroad to Silver Run, and then stage for twenty-six miles.

Having promised, last Summer, to call on our good friends, Rev. Thomas H. Dawson and lady, we took the latter route, which gave us a delightful night's rest in the Doctor's pleasant mansion, and an exhilirating drive next day to Eufaula, behind a span of splendid horses, with our host for driver—to say nothing of spending a happy evening in his home and family. Our traveling companion, Mr. Oliver, was accommodated with a separate buggy, driven by Mrs. Dawson's carriage driver. This latter vehicle was furnished by our friend and brother, Homer Howard, Esq., who, with his amiable lady, helped to enliven the evening spent at the Doctor's.

There are so many noble men and charming women in this world that it would seem to be a pity we cannot gather them all together in one happy community. We felt thus when we left the Mississippi Conference, and now, having returned from the Alabama Conference, we have become strengthened in the pleasantly sad sentiment.

Having to wait a half day in Columbus, we availed ourselves of the privilege of calling upon the venerable and beloved Lovick Pierce, D.D. We were grieved to find him in deep affliction from the painful and protracted illness of his once most beautiful daughter, Mrs. Gambrill, who died a few days afterwards. In mid-summer we found him at her bed-side, and in mid-winter we found him there still. She was a favorite child. Her house had been his house for years. Her death was hard to bear, but harder still to the affectionate parent, were her strangely protracted sufferings. But she bade farewell to the "sufferings of this present time" a little before the arrival of her brother, Bishop Pierce, from California, who was hastening homeward as fast as his Conferences and his broken health would permit, that he might see her once more in the flesh. But it was ordered otherwise by him who doeth all things well.

Not many years since, Dr. Pierce was surrounded by an unbroken family, and such a family as might fill any man's heart with gratitude and delight. But how sad, has that happy family been despoiled by inexorable death! First, his wife, the worthy companion of his long and eventful life, died during his absence. His son-in-law died in Texas during the present year. While on a visit to his widowed daughter, a son died in Georgia. We had to discharge the painful duty of informing him thereof on his arrival in New Orleans. Soon after he left her, the widowed daughter lost two of her little children. And now another is gone. And the fond father is further afflicted by the apprehension, without ground we trust, that the health of the son of his pride and joy is broken down for good by his recent tour to California.

Nevertheless, "the old man eloquent" preaches such sermons every Sunday in his new Church, St. Paul's, as would awake the inhabitants of London as did the blast of the trumpets of the Crusaders the knights of the olden time. How it may be with the people of Columbus, we know not, nor do we care. A prince in Israel lingers among them, with his crown of gray hairs, and his richer crown of worth, wisdom and usefulness. He will soon leave his ashes among them—a treasure of which many much more notable cities are laudably covetous. They enjoy, every Sabbath, what thousands of the people of Europe and America would travel many miles weekly to enjoy—the sermons of the last years of Lovick Pierce.

Bishop Kavanaugh, accompanied by his worthy and pious lady, arrived at Eufaula in time for the opening of the conference, and though in feeble health, presided with his usual patience, amiability, and impartiality. He preached on Sunday, to a crowded audience, one of the most spiritual, powerful, and pathetic sermons we ever heard. Tears of penitence, gratitude and joy attested the power of the gospel and the presence of the Spirit. He went from thence to the Georgia Conference, and has still to attend the Florida Conference.

Rev. William M. Wightman, D.D., recently installed President of the Southern University at Greensboro', now a member of the Alabama Conference, was present during the session. He was warmly welcomed by that body, as he certainly deserves to be. The institution over which he presides has opened with flattering prospects of success. It has the sympathies and prayers of all Southern Methodism. Dr. Wightman preached on Sabbath at three o'clock, one of his most finished, fervent and eloquent sermons.

Rev. Wm. J. Sasnett, D.D., President of East Alabama Male College, at Auburn, was also present. His address at the Missionary Anniversary was pronounced a master-piece of Christian thought, logic, and eloquence. He will hereafter be a member of the Alabama Conference, and is already popular among them. The College was tendered to the Conference and accepted, and is highly prosperous.

Rev. Dr. Taylor, Corresponding Secretary of the Sunday School Society of the M. E. Church, South, was present, and also Rev. Richard Abbey, Financial Secretary of the Publishing House, both laboring faithfully and earnestly in discharge of their respective duties.

Rev. Mr. Wane, of the Virginia Conference, stationed for the present year at Fredericksburg, was present in behalf of the Washington City Church, and made a most beautiful speech before the Conference, which resulted in an immediate collection of over $600.

Our own Dr. Hamilton was present, we are sorry to say, in very feeble health, but vigorous as ever in the discharge of the duties pertaining to Conference duties—a class of duties in which he excels, and in faithful attention to which for over twenty years, he has been largely instrumental in developing the present remarkable character and power of the Alabama Conference. He has labored hard during the whole year, when not confined by sickness, when he ought not to have labored at all. He was appointed to the Mobile City Mission, with the understanding that he shall make a missionary tour to Central America during the year. Since the close of Conference, Bishop Pierce has called upon him to take charge of the Church in San Francisco, California, and, with the consent of Bishop Kavanaugh, we hope he will accept. That country needs him and he needs its climate.

Dr. Summers, Book Editor, and Editor of the Quarterly Review, was present, in better health and spirits than for years past. He is a general favorite, whether at Conference, or in discharge of his duty at Nashville. The Quarterly is attracting attention, and exciting interest throughout the Union. It will prosper.

Dr. Neely reported eminent success as Agent of the Book and Tract Society. One year ago it was resolved to raise $100,000. Over $91,000 have already been raised. Near $10,000 was raised at Eufaula, at the Anniversary, and during the session. Dr. Neely was the solo orator on the occasion of the anniversary. The amount contributed is the best evidence of his eloquence—an eloquence not surpassed by that of any man in the country. He is continued in the agency for the present year, and it is intended to swell the amount to $150,000. It is intended, in this way, to contribute all the money demanded of the Conference by Dr. Taylor's plan of a Sunday School Publication Fund of $100,000. They endow the Publishing House, and raise the Sunday School and all under the same system. They can raise the whole amount of the $200,000 "free cash capital" for the Publishing House in Alabama if they choose; and no man in the Southern Church is better adapted to the work than Dr. Neely. Had Dr. Hamilton's health been such as to have enabled him also to work all the year, there is no telling what they might have done. The Mission of Alabama is to endow the Publishing House, and she intends to do it. So be it! It is but fair to say that the "Genealogical Family Bible," has been no mean element of strength in this movement in Alabama. "Honor to whom honor is due." The Depository, also, under the efficient management of John F. Early, Esq., has done excellently well during the year.

The missionary collection for the year is a magnificent one—$38,000—$6,000 over that of last year, and $3,700 over the amount the Conference had resolved to raise. The assessment for the ensuing year is $40,000. They can raise $50,000 easily.

Alabama is leading the van in education also. In the State of Alabama, the Methodists have about $720,000 invested in the cause of education; and in the Conference proper, about $620,000; most of which has been raised during the last four years. And they have no thought of stopping where they are. The endowment of the Southern University alone is to be swelled to $500,000, and East Alabama College is swelling her endowment as rapidly as possible.

The Ministerial Education Society of that Conference is a noble institution. It is composed of ministers and laymen—looks to the education of young men called of God to the ministry, and not able to educate themselves. It has no fund, but collects annually, in a private way, enough money to pay the board and tuition of from ten to twenty young men constantly, until they are deemed suitable for the itinerant work. The Southern University also has a fund of $50,000—part of the amount above mentioned—for the education and board of indigent young men—most of which will doubtless be applied to the help of those who are qualifying themselves for the ministry. From ten to fifteen ministerial candidates are now studying at Summerfield, for whom $2,000 will be needed by the first of July next. Those wishing to contribute to this cause will address Rev. T. W Dorman, D. D., Selma, Ala. There is not a nobler or more valuable enterprise than this in the Southern Church.

The fund known as the "Thompson Fund," a legacy left the Conference by Mr. and Mrs. Thompson of $16,000 was divided between the three female colleges of the Conference as follows: Centenary Institute, $7,000; Tuskegee Female College, $5,000; Tuskaloosa Female College, $4,000; each guaranteeing the interest in the board and tuition of daughters of members of the Conference.

The Preachers' Aid Society is doing a noble work. With a capital of about $15,000, the interest is applied to the relief of those preachers, or widows and orphans of preachers who are in necessitous circumstances. Many an anxious heart has thus been relieved.

The Conference Claims (of those who have not received their support, and of the widows and orphans of such,) was estimated one year ago to be about $8,000 for the past year, and the amount was raised. The claims, however, amounted to considerably more. The estimate for the ensuing year is $12,000, and we think they will raise it.

The entire membership of the Church in the Alabama Conference, whites and blacks, probationers and all, is 71,944, an increase over last year of 1672. All such reports are partial and imperfect, and the increase is doubtless much more. The number of preachers laboring in connection with the Conference, supplies and all, is about 240. Deacons ordained at the recent session, 34—18 of them itinerant. Elders ordained, 17—11 of them itinerant. Probationers received, 18. Re-admitted, 2. The old idea of dividing the Conference was revived, and a Committee was appointed to report, at the next session upon the expediency, and the line, if they deem division expedient. We know not what may be the result.

The Conference was entertained by the good people of Eufaula in the most hospitable manner. They had been asking for the privilege for about fifteen years, and nobly did they improve it. Our own home was with our old friend, William H. Chambers, Esq., formerly of Columbus, Ga., now a popular member of the Alabama Legislature. But, being among our old parishioners, we had a home in every house. All denominations, and the citizens, opened their doors, and it was a happy time generally.

The New Orleans Christian Advocate, we are happy to state, is on rising ground in this Conference, as well as in the Mississippi Conference. The amount collected from the agents during the session was an exceedingly fine one—a third more than ever before—which was also the case at the Mississippi Conference. At both Conferences resolutions endorsing it, and favoring its increased circulation, were unanimously adopted. A general movement in the patronizing Conferences would easily double its circulation during the ensuing year. Nothing is needed to secure this desirable end but the determination of each preacher to do all he can for it. Will this be the case? We shall see.

About one o'clock on Thursday night, the Conference adjourned, with the benediction by the Bishop, after the announcement of the appointments—which will be found on the third page of this paper—having been in session nine days and nearly one night. The reading of the appointments in this large Conference, in such leisurely way as to allow the secretaries time to take them down, is no light matter.

The number of laymen attending the session, their labors on committees, their freedom of speech on the Conference floor, and the influence they exerted especially upon all the financial movements of the Conference, were pleasant to witness. In this Conference, they do not spend the afternoon "in committee of the whole in lay session," as in the Mississippi and Louisiana Conferences. The usual committees are appointed in the old way, half ministers and half laymen. In no Conference do the laymen exert more influence than in the Alabama Conference. There are some laymen—among them R. A. Baker Esq., and Mr. Duke W. Goodwin, both of Mobile, who "follow the Conference up," from year to year. This is the sort of lay influence we need.

At Eufaula we had another sort of lay influence that was pleasant indeed; beautiful, accomplished, and "honorable women not a few," with citizens, and members of other churches, attended the session daily, and the Methodist Church seemed to be regarded by them all as "our Church."

After bidding our Eufaula friends adieu, about eighty or ninety of us went on board a little steamer with a cabin cabin, about ten o'clock on Friday night, for Columbus, Ga. The scene, during the whole night, was indescribably amusing. Only a few women and children had berths—the rest of us sat up and stood up all night. We had to sit and stand by turns. We never saw a church more densely packed than that cabin. A gang of Texas cattle crowding together from fright is the best illustration we can give. But it was a glorious night—"a feast of reason and a flow of soul"—whatever the physical discomforts. Wit and humor abounded. Sacred song, from near a hundred voices, drowned the commingled roar of the river and the steamer, and awoke the echoes of the night along each bank of the narrow stream. There was many a pious tear, and many a smile of hopeful joy. Happy gayeties came out from behind grave faces that had concealed them effectually for many a year. It was a time that will be remembered. The boat had left the bishop and his lady, with some other friends, though it took their baggage, which added to the irresistibly contagious mirth.

Sunday was spent, by the writer, in that charming village, or rather city, Tuskegee—the seat of that increasingly celebrated school, the Tuskegee Female College. How pleasant to meet old and dear friends! How sad that we see them only once in a while, and then in haste. Thus we felt both in Eufaula and Tuskegee. In the old well remembered pulpits of both places we felt much as we imagine the Jewish priests felt when ministering in the temple for the first time after returning from the Babylonish captivity. One of the principal citizens, a much valued friend, Maj. James H. Smith, sat no longer near our left hand, and his family sat in the old accustomed place, dressed in the sable habiliments of bereavement.

We spent Saturday evening, and Sunday morning till service time in the pleasant family of our friend, Capt. R. F. Ligon. We spent Saturday night with that good and great man, Rev. A. A. Lipscomb, D.D. The witching hour of midnight found us still in "sweet counsel." Apart from his well-earned reputation as a preacher, writer and educator of woman, he will never be forgotten as long as Tuskegee Female College sends out its high toned and refined graduates among the christian women of the land. He has done there an immortal work. Having resigned the Presidency, he now lectures on Literature, Poetry and Art. His friend and "true Yoke-fellow," Rev Geo. W. F. Price, one of his Professors from the beginning, now most worthily occupies the college presidency. The School has had a wonderful prosperity from the beginning, and is growing constantly in character, reputation, and numbers. Indeed, if such an institution as Tuskegee Female College were not appreciated, it were useless to spend money and brains to build up institutions calculated to impart the highest and most refined christian culture to the women of this land.

At Montgomery, we had the pleasure of hearing Dr. Garland, President of the University of Alabama, deliver an able address in its behalf before the Legislature.

A HAPPY RE-UNION.

During the session of the Alabama Conference, at Enfaula, we witnessed a scene which for beauty and pathos exceeded anything of the kind with which our unworthy life has ever been blessed. It was a re-union, by invitation of Mrs. M'Donald, one of the oldest members of the Methodist Church in that place, at her dinner-table, of all the ministers present who had ever been stationed there. There were twelve of them, viz.: Revs. William B. Neal, John W. Starr, Stephen F. Pilley, James A. Heard, Oliver R. Blue, Clayton C. Gillespie, Mark S. Andrews, Francis M. Grace, James L. Cotton, William A. M'Carty, Allen S. Andrews, and William M. Motley. Rev. F. G. Ferguson, late Presiding Elder of the district, and Rev. President Price, of Tuskegee Female College, also attended. The pastoral memories of the place there concentrated, reached back over a period of twenty-two years, during all which time Mrs. M'Donald had been there, a devoted member and Sunday School teacher, the friend of the pastors and their families, their nurse in sickness, their counsellor in troubles, their ministering angel in bereavement. During the time, all her own family had been buried, and for many years she had been a lone, childless widow, devoted to the Church and its successive pastors, dispensing a gracious and refined hospitality among her friends.

At dinner, with Mrs. M'Donald presiding, in happy unconsciousness of anything but the entertainment of her friends, the table was occupied entirely by the gentlemen named. The time occupied in discussing "the creature comforts" before them passed pleasantly away in friendly converse. Mrs. M'Donald had slightly pushed back her chair as an intimation that there were others to dine, when it was signified that her company was desirable a few moments longer.

Rev. John W. Starr, the chairman chosen for the occasion, without rising, in subdued tones, said: "Brethren, this is a pleasant, a remarkable meeting. In the providence of God, twelve of the pastors of this charge are yet living, yet in the faith, yet in the itinerant ministry; and we are now all present before God, seated at one table—the table of our sister, who has been with us from the beginning of this station, a period of twenty-two years.

What troubles have we seen!
What conflicts have we past!
* * * * * *
But out of all the Lord
Hath brought us by His love;
And still He doth His help afford,
And hides our life above.

Three of our dear brethren, our fellow-pastors in this charge, have gone to their reward. The first I will mention is Rev. Thomas H. P. Scales, commonly known among us as "Uncle Hardin Scales."

Rev. F. G. Ferguson, amid the flowing tears of the company, himself deeply moved, here rose, and said: "Brethren, I can hardly trust myself, on this touching occasion, to say anything in memory of the venerable brother whose name has just been mentioned. I knew him long and well—before any of you knew him—in Tennessee, long before he became a member of the Alabama Conference. He was there, what you all knew him as long to be here: a man of God in the highest sense—a holy man, deeply spiritual in his experience and in his preaching—never preaching without earnestly and affectionately insisting upon that holiness of heart without which no man shall see the Lord."

Mr. Starr then called the name of Rev. Thomas H. Foster, another of the departed pastors of the Methodist Church at Eufaula, when Rev. O. R. Blue rose and said: "I knew Thomas H. Foster well. Our paths in life approached and touched each other at several very interesting points. Our first acquaintance, when boys, in Montgomery, Ala., was in a personal collision. Our next association was at the altar of the Church, both of us rejoicing in newly-found pardon and peace. His manly disposition and kindling talents attracting the attention of friends, he was sent, through their benevolence, to Transylvania University, where he graduated under the lamented Tuscan. Returning home, he entered, according to his original intention, the Methodist itinerancy in the Alabama Conference. He lived and died in that work. A kind student, and thirsting for the truth, he was at one time in danger of wandering from "the faith once delivered to the saints," amid the uncertainties of German rationalism. But his early training in evangelical truth, and his personal experience of its saving power, ultimately triumphed. Transferring to the Louisiana Conference, he was stationed at Baton Rouge, and when the epidemic spread death and desolation among the inhabitants, he remained to comfort the dying and the bereaved, and fell at his post, himself a victim of the scourge."

The Chairman then called the name of Rev. John L. Saunders, still another of the deceased Eufaula pastors. Rev. S. F. Pilley rose and said: "I scarcely know how to perform the task assigned me. You all knew John L. Saunders well. In many respects he was a remarkable man. He was a man of indomitable will, unbending integrity, and of stoical courage and perseverance. Remarkable in person, he was also eccentric in matters.—But he was a true christian, a devoted minister, a generous friend, and a tender husband. I was in charge of the circuit when the people of Enon, Chunnenuggee and adjacent churches, raised the money to send a missionary to California, and chose John L. Saunders. In that land he maintained the same characteristics that had distinguished him in this, and not long since died in the faith. He was a self-made man, not blessed with early educational and social advantages; but he rose to be a preacher of considerable ability and energy."

At this point, a certificate of life-membership in the Sunday School Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, having the names of the twelve ministers above-mentioned inscribed on it, was placed in the hands of Rev. C. C. Gillespie, who rose, and turning to the hostess whose eyes bore testimony to the depth of her feelings, said: "Sister McDonald: To us, the yet living pastors of the Eufaula charge, it is a solemn pleasure to meet once more around your hospitable board, which, for more than twenty-two years, has been spread for our entertainment and comfort, including our wives and children, and our brethren in the ministry. It is a blessing of a gracious providence that we are, so many of us, yet alive, and permitted to be present. In all probability we shall never enjoy this privilege again. It has been thought meet to commemorate it by something pleasant to us, and grateful to you—some slight testimonial of our esteem and love for you, which will also keep this day, and our names, in your memory. You have been the unfailing friend of the Church, and the host of its pastors. But your greatest usefulness, as was appropriate to your sex and your widowed condition, has been in the Sunday School. Remembering, as we all do, your devoted labors in this behalf, through a long series of years, especially since bereft of all immediate family, we feel that the lines of Mr. Wesley have a beautiful aptness in your case:

"I have no babes to hold me here,
But children more securely dear
For mine I humbly claim."

I am appointed by my brethren to present you with this certificate of life-membership in the Sunday School Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, whose interests you have so long and so faithfully served. May you be long spared to the Church, and be blessed with many more children "in the Lord." Wherever we wander, we shall tenderly remember this happy scene, and remember you in our prayers. When you look upon this, hanging upon your wall, you will remember us and ours at a throne of grace.

Rev. J. L. Cotton received the certificate in Mrs. McDonald's name, and replied on her behalf. His address was too long to be remembered and recorded here, but not too long for the occasion. Indeed, it was a glorious speech, brimming over with beauty, pathos, and powerful eloquence. He recounted the circumstances attending Mrs. McDonald's preventing the station from falling back into the circuit, by bravely proposing to support the pastor herself. He described the burial of her own noble husband by one of the pastors present—Rev. Jos. A. Heard. He described the death of a minister's child in her nursing arms—it was his own babe. Every heart was full to overflowing—every eye was a fountain of tears—every cheek was bedewed. It was a precious time—one never to be forgotten—and the more so as it was entirely impromptu and spontaneous—nothing having been agreed upon in the way of speeches, until the company were moving from the parlor into the dining room. At the conclusion all knelt, and Rev. A. S. Andrews led the devotions in a prayer of great appropriateness and fervency. This account is wholly from memory, and falls far short of the reality; but it gives the substance of what was done and said. It was good to be there.

The Meetings for United Prayer.—It has recently been stated that one hundred and eleven prayer-meetings are held weekly in Belfast, and seventy in Glasgow. For considerable time past a weekly meeting has been held at Exeter, and at the Athenæum, at intervals during the day; and at seven o'clock in the Bible Christian Chapel, Northernhay-street, which will seat from 1000 to 1200 persons, and was crowded. An invitation to united prayer was "addressed to the Church of Christ throughout the world" by the missionaries and their friends at Lodiana, Northwest India. The period fixed in the invitation for special intercession for the outpouring of the Spirit is the second week in January, 1860, from Monday, the 8th of that month, to Sunday, the 14th. Union Prayer-meetings have been extensively held in India and Burmah all this year, and have included many thousand converts as well as European and American Christians.

Valuable Historical Work.—One of the most laborious works of modern times is about being finished, after fifteen years uninterrupted labour. We allude to the work of the Brothers Haag, La France Protestante, or "Lives of French Protestants who have made themselves a Name in History." Nine large volume are already out, to be followed by a tenth of additions, rectifications, indexes, &c. Though scarcely known, even by name, in this country, it is the great source from which all information about the Huguenot families of settlers in the New World and descendants must in future be drawn.

Jerusalem.—A letter from Jerusalem states that it is no longer the city "which no man seeketh after," but it is now the resort of the wealthy and great ones of the earth. Large purchases of houses and lands are made by agents of European governments, and establishments on a large and magnificent scale will shortly be made in the neighborhood.

THE VIRGINIA CONFERENCE.

Mr. Editor: The recent session of this body was distinguished for harmony of view and feeling. This was a matter of frequent congratulation among the members. There was an unpleasant jostle at first in consequence of legal objections which our Presiding officer, Bishop Early, interposed to the carrying out of a scheme of lay co-operation that had been adopted at the previous session. This plan, I understand, was modeled after the one which has been in successful operation for several years in the Louisiana Conference. Every station and circuit was authorised to choose a layman who should sit with the Conference as a committee of the whole during each afternoon of the session, and this joint committee of ministers and laymen should report their action on the secular interests of the Church to the Conference proper for final decision. The Bishop declared the plan illegal, because a committee of the whole is not known to our laws; and if it were, must be composed of the same members as the body that thus resolves itself, and the appointing of a chairman should belong to the President of the Conference, and not to the Conference itself as this plan provided. It seems to me that these objections apply rather to the name than to the thing itself, and would therefore be obviated by simply changing the designation of the plan.

However, the plan was objectionable to most all of us on grounds of expediency as too cumbrous. It may suit the Louisiana Conference, which is, I believe, a considerably smaller body than the Virginia, but it would be too extensive a machinery among us for the work to be accomplished. A substitute was suggested by Rev. Mr. Wheelwright, and shaped by Dr. Smith, which secured the approval of the Bishop and of the entire Conference. Each district stewards' meeting is instructed to elect not only a Conference Steward or lay member of the board of finance, as hitherto, but also a lay member of a committee on our educational, and a lay member of a committee on our publishing interests. These committees will consist of an equal number of ministers to be chosen by the Conference, and of laymen to be chosen as just explained, and the laymen have the right to vote in Conference on all financial matters. Our territory is divided into nine districts; hence we will have twenty-seven laymen to aid us in our deliberations on the great enterprises of the Church, and the scheme can be enlarged by the appointment of other committees, to any extent which we may find advisable. The absolute unanimity with which this measure was adopted, is very gratifying and promises great good. There was another measure of importance in which the vote was unanimous. We resolved to endow a chair of Biblical Literature at Randolph, Macon. The efficient agent of this institution, Rev. H. B. Coules, was requested to raise $25,000 for this purpose. We have an idea that it is necessary only to inform him what amount of money we desire for any good cause, in order to obtain it. He executes the order with the facility and promptness of Captain Bragg. If my memory does not deceive me, the Bench of Bishops recommended that such a chair should be attached to every one of our colleges, and the General Conference, perhaps of 1854, concurred in the advice. It is designed for the instruction of sound things, not only of those who expect to enter upon the work of the ministry, though to them it will be a peculiar and invaluable aid, but also of all the pupils who feel an interest in the study of the word of God.

You have seen a full account of the interchange of friendly messages between the Virginia District Conference of the M. P. Church and our own Conference. This was in itself a pleasant and edifying occurence, yet of course it has an ulterior design to the recognition of each other by these two bodies as worthy branches of the Methodist family. No proposition concerning an union has been submitted. The way to this measure does not seem quite open, and it must be brought before the General Conference if anywhere. But there is a growing of opinion on both sides that we are nearing the time of the flowing together of these two streams. The M. P. Church are willing to drop all objections to bishops and presiding elders, and the M. E. Church seems to acknowledge an increasing need for the introduction of the lay element in our councils. A paternal intercourse is a mean for helping on this result. Those among us who are opposed to any modification of our present plan, may nevertheless approve these christian courtesies on account of their influence in allaying strife and promoting brotherly love.

Our agents for raising $100,000 in behalf of the Publishing House at Nashville and the Depository at Richmond, have presented the work with energy and with encouraging success. Rev. B. R. Duval continues in this important field. We organized a Conference Sunday School Society, and determined to raise $10,000 toward a fund for the publication and circulation of Sunday School literature for our own Church.

Very cordial was our vote of thanks to Bishop Early for the kind and able manner in which he presided over us. Long and faithfully has he labored among us, and wherever he goes through our bounds he finds living epistles of commendation. Our prayers ascend that an even larger measure of spiritual blessing and usefulness may crown his remaining days.

LETTER FROM REV. R. ABBEY.

To the Editor:

I am very much gratified to find that the Church is waking up more and more to the importance of her publishing interests. We are all of us a little further along in the practical details of this important branch of the ecclesiastical service than we were a year ago. Experience does us good, the best and wisest of us.

I have now attended seven Conferences this fall, and had considerable correspondence and intercourse with many of the leading members of several others, and I am glad to learn that there is generally, I believe I might say, universally—first, a growing interest on the subject, and secondly, a closer union of view and sentiment as to the best modes of operation in this field of enterprise.

Who shall educate our children, and how shall they be educated? are important questions to be sure; but the answer is not comparatively of great importance, unless coupled with a proper answer to this other question. What shall the people, children and all, read, and to what extent shall they be supplied?

This latter question is the corner stone of our Educational, Missionary, Sabbath-school, Ministerial-support and Church-extension interests. It is getting to be regarded in its true light. For my own part I am sure I am getting to understand the "theory and practice" better than I did. Our social influence in the country is immense. We form one full fourth, if not a third portion of the entire citizenship of this whole South. What an immense idea! Look at its national magnitude.

And now see it in the midst of this immense field of patronage our Publishing House stands, with its surrounding Conference Auxiliaries—without a competitor. Its vantage-ground position is thus far superior to that of any other Publishing House in the Union, save the American Bible Society. Every Publishing House at the North has twenty powerful competitors for the same patronage. Ours has none.

Books from Methodist presses are going into circulation now with far greater rapidity than ever before.

The Depositories going into operation meet with a demand for books far, very far beyond their anticipations.

The great difficulty to be feared and to be provided against now is, that our means of supply are going to fall so far short of the demand. The demand is now great, as compared with former years, and it is increasing every day.

The only way to meet this difficulty is, to increase the capital of the Publishing House.

Heretofore the House has furnished the Church, say in round numbers, $100,000 worth of books a year. How is it to furnish two, three, four times that amount without an increased capital?

We have the best ecclesiastical publishing system in the United States. Let us pursue it. Many portions of the country are doing well, and all parts are expected to do equally well. We are on rising ground. Let us congratulate and encourage each other.

The Mississippi Conference Depository, at Vicksburg, is doing as well as its funds have anticipated. Invincible perseverance and unwearied will accomplish anything that ought to be accomplished.

The following resolve of the Mississippi Conference, a few days ago, relates to this establishment.

Yours Truly, R. Abbey, Fin. Sec.

New Orleans, Nov. 26th, 1859.

Resolution of the Mississippi Conference.

Resolved, That the Book and Tract Depository of this Conference, at Vicksburg, is an institution of great value to the Church, one which may be, and ought to be wielded largely and powerfully in furtherance of our publishing interests and of religion generally. And that we will by all proper means in our power, directly and indirectly, encourage and patronise the same to the extent of our ability.

And Further, That we appeal earnestly and affectionately to them indebted to this Depository for stock-notes or otherwise, to make prompt and immediate payment.

A FEW SUGGESTIONS TO METHODISTS.

1. Do you pray? do you pray in secret, and if so how often and in what way? Is it a delight to enter your closet and pour out your soul to God, or is it a trial rather, and done with dragging of spirit?

2. Do you pray in your family? How often? with what unction? Every Sunday morning, and all other days neglect, or every night and morning of the week?

3. Do you spend much of your time reading the daily newspaper, and is it your long cherished view that there will be morning and evening papers worked on eight-cylinder presses in heaven? or do you find some satisfaction in reading the gospels of the New Testament? and is it the burden of your heart to comprehend with all saints the exceeding richness and fullness of the Gospel of Christ?

4. Suppose your minister were to preach a sermon of plainness against some certain sin, and suppose further, that conscience condemned you as guilty of the sin described, and suppose still further, that you became angry in consequence, how would you explain your conduct? Must a preacher put on cloth slippers, and walk daintily about for fear of hurting the feelings of some of his double dealing and dishonest members? Is it expected, on the part of a gospel minister, that he offer polluted bread on the altar of God or that he discuss the position of the signs of the zodiac, or the color of the sea-water in the Straits of Gibraltar, rather than show the people their sins? Why preach at all, unless men are stirred to a reformation of this life.

5. You and your family were, not long since, at a great gathering, and, after certain preliminaries were gone through with, the evening's conversation turned to scandal and the exercises terminated with a dance. You encouraged your children in the matter, though young and they had their names on a class book. How much better were your children? The man who appropriates to his own use stealthily the property of others, fleeces a ruse when the charge of theft is made against him. He has good cause for his excitement. You defend dancing, and when any one wishes quietly to argue with you on the subject, in fit of excitement or rage shown himself. You say you are as good as your accuser or as good as any professor—"better" perhaps is your word. How is this? If better than others, your heart must be full of grace, it must be able to bear an infinite amount of reproach and attack, and be quiet. But you are not quiet, your heart rises with invective, as your better attempts to reason, and when he leaves you it is with the words possibly dropping from your lips, "whether right or wrong I will do as I please in regard to worldly amusements."

These are a few suggestions; others could readily be made. We leave you to the work.

Most lamentable is it that the piety of the age, in many instances, is a trifling piety—a piety of dances and folly, a piety that has but a faint fellowship with the closet, and that knows the least of all knowledge about the Holy Scriptures. If the world is to be saved, the church must be saved, and purified, and men and women must show more attention to Christ than they have hitherto shown to dressing, and to parties, and to folly in earthly fashion. We have had the leaves of an outward profession glistening long enough. We have walked in the way of holiday soldiering long enough, and it is high meridian now of fight. It will not do for two armies—the world and the church—to be wearing the same epaulets and dallying the same banners. They are destined as the sun and the night, and we who profess to be of Christ must fight for him, or turn traitors and join the powers of darkness. The Lord stir us to conflict.

DISCOVERY OF RARE MSS.

Professor Tischendorf, who had been sent by the Russian Government on a journey of scientific exploration, in a letter from Cairo, dated the 15th of March, addressed to the minister of Saxony, Herr Falkenstein, that he has succeeded in making some valuable discoveries relative to the Bible. The most important of these discoveries is a manuscript of the Holy Scriptures from the fourth century, consequently as old as the famous manuscripts of the Vatican, which hitherto, in all collections, maintained the first rank. This it will have to share in future with the newly discovered manuscript. Herr Tischendorf be not mistaken. In 346 beautiful fine parchment leaves, of such size that only two could have been got out of one skin, it contains the greater part of the Prophets, the Psalms, the Book of Job, the Book Jesus Sirach, the Proverbs, the Song of Solomon, and several of the Apocryphal Books of the Old Testament; but then the whole of the New Testament complete. Another valuable discovery of Professor Tischendorf's is described as an undoubted and complete manuscript of the Epistle of Barnabas, and of the Shepherd of Hermas, both belonging to the second century of the Christian era, and originally standing in the canon of Scriptural epistles. Herr Tischendorf hopes that from the munificence of the Russian government that he will be enabled to give immediate publication to these three manuscripts.—Evangelist.

In the English Chapel in Geneva, Switzerland, the only church in that city where the service is conducted in the English language, a prayer for the President of the United States has been recently introduced into the service. A written form of prayer is used in most of the Presbyterian Churches on the continent of Europe.

The Christian Inquirer says within two or three years the Unitarians have lost Rev. Messrs. Cooke, Gage and Huntington, and they have gained Rev. D. Sheldon, D.D., and the Rev. Messrs. Collyer, Babbitt, Harris, Frozier, L. Bushnell, and others.

Convicts' Thanksgiving Dinner.—The Agent of Auburn (New York,) State prison treated the convicts to a Thanksgiving Dinner. He had 850 pies baked and over 3000 pounds of cake.

EDITORIAL NOTICES.

ADVERTISING IN THE ADVOCATE.

The business public are slowly learning that the Advocate is THE GREAT ADVERTISING PAPER OF THE SOUTH AND WEST. Advertisements in it are more valuable than in any half dozen other papers.

1.—It has the largest circulation west of Charleston, and South of Cincinnati; larger than any other two weeklies in New Orleans, and is increasing rapidly—will, in a few years, double its present circulation.

2.—Of medium size, and not crowded with advertisements, an advertisement is not lost in it, but can be easily found.

3.—In our "Editorial Notices," which we give to every advertisement, we specify the page and column on which an advertisement may be found. We seek to make every advertisement valuable to the advertiser and to the paper.

4.—The circulation is spread out over Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, principally; Georgia, Florida, Tennessee, Kentucky, Arkansas, partially.

5.—It is the only weekly of large and widely-spread circulation in the great and growing metropolis of the South.

TEXAS LAND AND STOCK FOR SALE.—You will find a notice, with the above heading, in the fifth column of third page. A splendid opportunity this for some enterprizing person to make a profitable investment.

DR. MORTIMORE.—This famous physician has a notice in our columns, which will be found in the fourth column of third page.

THE SAN ANTONIO FEMALE COLLEGE.—On the fourth page, fourth column, will be found the advertisement of this very excellent institution.

SEWING MACHINES.—E. L. Nimmo advertises these very useful labor-saving machines for sale at No. 9 Camp St..

CURE FOR SORE EYELIDS, &c.—See advertisement headed Roman Eye Balsam, fifth column, third page.

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

Proceedings of Congress.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 19.—The Senate to-day elected Mr. Fitzpatrick President pro tem. of the Senate, in place of Vice President Breckinridge, who is absent.

Mr. Mason's Harper's Ferry committee was authorized to employ the services of a clerk for their investigation.

In the House to-day, Mr. Gilmer, in replying to insinuations made against him, concerning Helper's book, indignantly denied his having any knowledge concerning it.

Senator Pugh made an effort to call the resolution, that a committee on Territories be requested to inquire into the expediency of repealing the clause in the act of organization of the Territories of Utah and New Mexico, which requires their territorial laws to be submitted to congress for approval or rejection. Hale of New Hampshire, said that legislative business could not proceed before the organization of the House had been completed. Pugh then rose to a point of order, and in the course of his remarks defended Northern Democrats from the censure bestowed upon them by Senator Iverson, a few days since.

In the House, after a sharp discussion between Singleton and Hickman, the House proceeded to the eleventh ballot for Speaker, which resulted as follows:

Sherman, 112; Bocock, 85; Botelar, 21; scattering, 12.

Bocock then withdrew, and the House proceeded to the 12th ballot, as follows:

Sherman, 112; Botelar, 23; Bocock, 70; Miles Taylor, 12; Phelps, 14; the remainder were scattering.

Thirteenth ballot—Botelar, 31; Taylor, 17; Sherman, 110; rest scattering. Necessary to a choice, 114.

The House then adjourned.

The Harper's Ferry Executions.

CHARLESTOWN, Va. Dec. 16.—Cook and Copple, who were executed to-day, came very near making their escape. They had already gotten beyond the enclosure when they were discovered by the sentinels and fired upon, but missed. They were subsequently captured, however, and recommitted to jail.

They were executed at ten minutes to one o'clock, P M.

Green and Copeland, the negro convicts, were executed at half past 11 o'clock, A M. Everything passed off quietly.

Diplomatic Intelligence.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 16.—The Government has as yet received no official advices of the conclusion of the Melane treaty with Mexico.

It is reported here, and generally credited, that Francis J. Grund is to be appointed United States Consular Agent at Havre.

Brown Sympathy Meeting at New York.

NEW YORK, Dec. 16.—The anti-slavery fanatics and abolitionists held a Brown sympathy meeting here last evening. The proceedings were very noisy and riotous. At one time it was feared there would be bloodshed, but the police interfered and quelled the disturbance.

Fatal Shooting Affray.

COLUMBUS, Miss., Dec. 16.—A street fight occurred here last night between Jas. Blair and Dr. Wm. M. Shepherd, of Texas, formerly Secretary of Navy of that Republic. Shepherd was shot and almost instantly killed.

General Scott for the Presidency.

NEW YORK, Dec. 20.—An immense Union meeting assembled at the Academy of Music last night. Not less than thirty thousand were present during the evening, inside and out.

Resolutions were adopted nominating Lieut. General Scott for the Presidency in 1860.

Later from Havana and South America.

NEW YORK, Dec. 20.—The steamer De Soto, from New Orleans via Havana, has arrived at this port, with advices from Havana to the 16th inst.

The bark Restless, from Santa Martha, New Grenada, reports that a battle was expected between Gen. Nietos, at the head of the Liberal forces, and Gen. Posado, of Barangnilla.

The latter was holding that place on the 25th of November. Business everywhere was entirely suspended.

Later from California.

ST. LOUIS, Dec. 17.—The overland California mail, from San Francisco the 25th ult., has arrived at Malloy's Station, the westernmost terminus of the Pacific telegraph line.

There was considerable excitement in political circles in the State, because of a change which had passed between Judge Miller of Shasta county, and Jas. Gallagher, District Attorney of Trinity county. The preliminaries of the meeting were being arranged when the mail left.

Mr. James Haworth, President of the California Staga Company, says that he is prepared to contract with the U. S. Government to run a daily mail between Sacramento and St. Louis at a million per annum, the trip to be run in fourteen days.

Later from South America.

NEW YORK, Dec. 18.—The Brazilian Mail of November 8th, says a battle was fought between Urquisa and the army of Brazil near Buenos Ayers. The latter were defeated and took flight. Urquiza is marching on Buenos Ayers.

ARRIVAL OF THE NOVA SCOTIAN.

PORTLAND, ME., Dec. 16.—The British Parliament has been prorogued to the 27th January next.

It is stated from Paris that Count Walewski has assured Prince Metternich, the Austrian Ambassador at Paris, that France will continue to favor the policy of the spontaneous recall of the Grand Dukes by the people, but not their return by force.

The Paris Opinion National has received a first official warning, for an offensive article on the temporary power of the Pope.

Cardinal Antonelli is to represent the Pope in the Congress.

The Government of Belgium has accepted a loan from the Rothschilds for the purpose of enabling the Government to complete the fortifications at Antwerp.

General Hermann succeeds Bonin as Prussian Minister of War.

Advices from Morocco, via Madrid, state that on the 25th ult., over 4000 Moorish troops attacked the redoubt before Ceruilla, and were repulsed three times before they finally yielded, and were completely defeated.

An extra corps d'armee was crossing the Straits from Spain to Africa, and fresh regiments are daily disembarking at Ceuta and Giard.

It appears that neither Tangeria or Zetran were taken by the French squadron, as reported. A French steamer merely disembarked a small fort, on the coast of Morocco which had fired upon her.

Constantinople advices report that a terrible storm has occurred in the Euxine sea, and about eighty vessels have been lost.

Later advices from China furnishes nothing important.

The missionaries in Cochin China complain of ill treatment from the natives.

Sicilian Police Director Stabbed.

A letter from Naples, dated the 3d Dec., says that the Director of the Sicilian police had been stabbed in the streets of that city. The wound inflicted was not mortal. Fears were entertained that an insurrection would follow; but tranquility was soon restored.

The East Indian Archipelago.

The natives of the Island of Celebes, under Dutch authority, have revolted, from some of them being put on small trading vessels as cruiles, who were concerned in a previous conspiracy at Panga to murder the European residents, but were discovered in time by the authorities.

Further to curb the spirit of the natives, who are a fierce, revengeful race, the Dutch have sent an armed expedition from Batavia, against the important native town of Broni, on the Gulf of Broni, in the Island of Celebes.

The expedition set sail from Batavia on the 22d October last It was expected the natives would oppose a landing by force but the expedition was prepared to meet all attacks.

The Jesuits Banished from the Romagna.

Advices from Turin state that crowds of Jesuits are seeking refuge in Sardinia, on account of the suppression of their order by the Provisional Government of the Romagna.

French Minister to Washington.

Count Mercier has been appointed Ambassador of the French Government at Washington, in place of Count Sartiges, who has been appointed to the Ambassadorship at Holland.

Napoleon's Pacific Intentions.

The Emperor Napoleon having received a printed letter from Messrs. Lehan, Mellotzy & Co., Blackwell, England, respecting the fear entertained in England of an invasion by France, the private secretary of the Emperor replies in the name of the Emperor Napoleon, assuring them that the Emperor has no other than peaceful intentions toward England.

The French and English journals are principally occupied with discussions of the European Congress, which it is now certain will soon commence, as all the powers which were parties to the treaties of 1815, have given their consent to it.

The Moorish War.

A despatch from Marseilles announces that the French fleet in the Mediterranean had bombarded and destroyed two Moorish forts at the mouth of the Tetuan, in retaliation for the insult offered to France by firing into a French steamer, as previously reported.

The forts destroyed, hostilities were suspended, and the fleet withdrew to its former station.

MARRIAGES.

"It is not good for man to be alone."

On the 1st of December, at the residence of the bride, by the Rev. Moss, of Union Springs, Col. J C. LEWIS of Russel county, Alabama, to Miss ELIZA J. KENNAICA, of Macon county, Ala.

On the 27th ult, at the residence of Maj. Samuel Neill, at Carrol parish, La., by Rev. Thos. J. Upton, Mr. ABSALOM LEONETT of Madison parish, La., to Miss JENNIE L. NEILL, of the former place.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, December 19, 1859.

We condense the following statement from the New Orleans Price Current of the 17th instant:—

Quite a fair extent of business has been transacted in our principal staples within the week just closed. Cotton has continued full prices, and Sugar and Molasses have met with quite ready sale, prices for the latter having slightly improved. In Tobacco there is still no movement of much consequence though some few hundred hogsheads of the low qualities have been taken, and the transactions in the various articles of Western Produce are mostly confined to limited parcels for home consumption, though generally with firm prices.

COTTON.—With respect to prices, we have to remark that they have continued very full for the Middling and better grades, Stem Cottons, especially, commanding outside figures, and in some instances a fraction above, while the grades below Middling, being abundant and comparatively neglected, are depressed and may be bought at easy rates. Among the purchases of the week we notice several hundred bales of Fine Selections at 14 to 15 cents per pound.

The receipts at this port since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas,) are 929,890 bales, against 760,428 bales to same date last year, and the increase in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 273,238 bales.

New Orleans Classification:

TO THE READERS OF THE ADVOCATE.

DR. MORTIMORE, of Louisville, Ky., has made arrangements to spend the winter in New Orleans, and has taken rooms at No. 9 Camp street, opposite the City Hotel.

Dr. M. gives his sole attention to the treatment of Rheumatism in all its various forms; also Sciatica, Neuralgia, Paralysis, Disease of the Kidney and Spine, Dyspepsia (Indigestion), General Debility, and Nervous affections.

Probably no other physician of the present day has had such unbounded success in the treatment of the above complaints. He has, by personal treatment and the use of his remedies, furnished by him through the agency of physicians and druggists, cured over twenty thousand cases of Rheumatism alone; many of these had visited the various springs, both in this country and Europe, and had been treated and given up as hopeless, incurable cripples; yet, after all others failed, he has restored the use of their limbs and perfect health.

Dr. M. prepares his own remedies, suited to each case, on examination of patients; when inconvenient to visit him, they can write to him, giving history and description of their affliction. He will return answer with his terms of treatment, &c.

RELICS OF THE LOST.

"A large boat; within her were two human skeletons—a small Bible, underlined in many places, with numerous references written in the margin."—Captain M'Clintock's Journal.

Our stout hearts brave the ice-winds blank,
Our keen eyes scan the endless snow;
All sign or trace of those we seek
Has passed and perished long ago.

O, dash of hope! O, joyous thrill!
Onward with throbbing hearts we haste,
For leaning through the ice-fog chill,
A lonely boat is on the waste.

And recompense of all our toil,
Wrung from the iron realms of frost,
A mournful but a precious spoil,—
A reliquary of the lost.

Here lie the arms, the sail, the oar,
Dank with the storms of winters ten,
And by their unexhausted store
The bones that once were stalwart men.

Their last dark record none may learn;
Whether, in fretfulness and pain,
Heart-sick they watched for the return
Of those who never came again:

Or, if amid the stillness drear
They felt the drowsy death-chill creep,
Then stretched them on their snowy bier,
And slumbered to their last long sleep:

He only knows, whose Word of Hope
Was with them in the closing strife,
And taught their spirits how to cope
With agony that wins to life—

He only knows, whose Word of Might Watched by them in their slow decay—
Sure pledge that Death's long polar night,
Should brighten into endless day—

And when the sun with face unveiled
Was circling through the summer sky,
With silent words of promise hailed
The symbol of Eternity.

Welcome, dear relic! witness rare!
Faithful as if an angel wrote:
Though Death has set his signet there,
The Lord of Life was in the boat.

THE HEAVENLY SOWING.

Sower Divine,
Sow the good seed in me,
Seed for eternity:
'Tis a rough, barren soil,
Yet, by thy care and toil,
Make it a fruitful field,
A hundred fold to yield:
Sower Divine,
Plough up this heart of mine.

Sower Divine,
Quit not this humble field
Till thou hast made it yield;
Sow thou by day and night,
In darkness and in light;
Stay not thy hand, but sow,
Then shall the harvest grow:
Sower Divine,
Sow deep this heart of mine.

Sower Divine,
Let not this barren clay
Lead thee to turn away;
Let not my fruitlessness
Provoke thee not to bless;
Let not my field be dry,
Sower Divine,
Water this heart of mine.

The Family Circle.

AN EXCITING SCENE.

Years ago, when I was a youngster, I became an assistant of Dr. B., the superintendent of a public insane asylum. As in all insane asylums, it is generally the case that some of the patients were docile and tractable, and had the freedom of a high-walled garden; while others, being violent and dangerous in their madness, were confined to their rooms. Sometimes one of the last named gentlemen would get loose, a fact which he generally announced by breaking things generally, upon which announcement the doctor would repair to the spot at which he was "elevating the ancient Henry," and advancing upon him with a steadfast gaze, would march him off to his room. We had one lunatic by the name of Jones, large and strong as an ostrich. He had broken out of his room two or three times, but had always gone back docilely when any one of us made our appearance.

The asylum had a saloon in the centre with a door at each end; and one of the doors requiring fixing, once upon a time, a carpenter was engaged upon it, when in trundled Mr. Jones, and quietly perched himself of a long, sharp chisel. When the carpenter looked around the madman gave a grin and a poke of the chisel at him; whereupon the man of chips scuttled out and locked the door—then, while the enemy, still laboring away at it, he rushed around and locked the door at the other end. Having thus caged Jones he gave the alarm; and I supposing it was an ordinary case, which I could control, unlocked [illegible] and entered boldly, whereupon he made a rush at me. I accordingly retired. The doctor was sent for. He came, reconnoitering through the key-hole, and ascertaining that the enemy was at the other end of the room he opened the door and saw at once he could do nothing with the loose maniac. Here was apparently a dilemma. A crazy individual, as strong as a bull, perfectly uncontrollable, and armed with a weapon. To capture him by force was a difficult and dangerous undertaking, and to starve him would be a tedious affair. The doctor did not hesitate very long.

"Alfred," said he, "go down into the surgery, fill the largest syringe with hartshorn, and bring it up."

I caught the idea, rushed down, and brought back a quart syringe with hartshorn diluted, for I didn't want to kill the man. Then the doctor, the carpenter and myself, formed an army of invasion. We threw open the door, and entered in the following battle array: I being the shortest of the three marched first, holding a chair in front of me by the back, so that the legs might keep off a rush if our popgun flashed in the pan. Then came the carpenter, with the syringe resting on my shoulder, like a piece of flying artillery. Finally, in the rear, in the safest place, like all great generals, came Dr. B.

The lunatic sat at the other end of the hall on a chair, eyeing us keenly and savagely. Slowly, very slowly, we advanced towards him. The nearer we got, the more wicked that chisel looked, and the handle seemed to increase until it was very long. When we got within a few feet of him, he jumped up and sprang towards me. While I spatter I spleah I went the quart of hartshorn into his countenance—down he went like a log—it would have knocked down a battalion; and while he was catching his breath we caught him.—From Recollections of a Physician.

THE COVENANTER'S ESCAPE.

In the dark persecution in Scotland nearly two centuries ago, of which our readers have heard as the black '65," one of God's most worthy servants is recorded to have escaped his enemies by a daring leap. This man, whose name was William Craig, was surprised by the dragoons one day on a moor in Galloway. He could not get to his house as they had cut off his retreat. All he could do was to run for a bog, where he had often hidden from his foes, but long before he could reach it he was overtaken and led back to his door. There the brutal soldiery amused themselves by insulting his wife's terrors.

At length they decided to take him to a ridge half a mile distant, overlooking the source of a beautiful stream, and to shoot him, and leave his body to the care of any one whose love for Christ might outweigh their fear of enemies and induce them to give it the rites of burial. They set out, having tied their prisoner behind a dragoon for greater safety. His practised eye followed the windings of the stream, and he saw that they had selected the only spot where he had the slightest hope of escape. Suddenly from the horse the instant his bonds were untied, he sprang out from the bank, and alighted twenty feet down the descent. Instantly grasping his feet in his hands he rolled down words over the soft sward as rapidly, that though the bullets from his foes whistled round him, he was untouched. A dense mist rose suddenly, and hid him from his pursuers, and in its friendly gloom he found a safe retreat till they were gone.

It was the last escape he had, for ere long the persecution ceased, and he came back to his dwelling by the frith. He survived the persecution for upwards of fifty years, and told the story of his escape to his children's children to the third generation.

His family suffered peculiarly in these dark ages. Ne fewer than five of his relatives experienced the severity of Claverhouse One of them was shot, herding his sheep, and at dead of night his wife buried his body. One made his escape from a threatening party by hiding in the sewage of Cowgate for many hours. Some were banished. He returned and slept with his fathers in peace long after Dundee and his myrmidons had passed to their account. Their descendants are to be found at this day wealthy and respected, verifying the promise, "Those that honor me I will honor."—American Messenger.

A TOUCHING MEETING.

An affecting and highly dramatic incident occurred about a week since in the neighborhood of Milan. The Certosa, as the name implies, is a Carthusian monastery, situate at a distance of [illegible] from Milan, and between that city and Pavia.—The [illegible] is a monument of rare beauty, teeming with costly frescoes and noble works of art, is a constant object of attraction to all travellers visiting that part of Italy. The monks, to the number of thirty-five, are subjected to the severest discipline, and are never [illegible] allowed to speak, except on those rare days when, in accordance with their statutes, a faint rays of comfort is suffered to shoot in upon the gloom of an existence dedicated to prayer and bodily mortification. A body of French officers on a visit to this remarkable spot, had obtained leave from the Superior to attend vespers, which are performed every afternoon at three o'clock in the magnificent choir of the church by the whole monastic body.

One of the visitors was charged to fix his eyes intently on the countenance of the monk who was, like the rest, engaged in the act of chanting the service. Suddenly, to the surprise of all present, he sprang forward with a cry, caught the monk in his arms, and strained him to his bosom in a long and fervent embrace. The monk was in fact a brother lost for many a year to his family, and supposed to be dead. The Carthusian rebuked aloud, but mindful of the rule of his order, which [illegible] absolute silence, held his peace until a signal from the Superior permitted his contrabund emotion to find relief in words. By a special relaxation of the regulations of the society, the long lost ones may meet again twice before the departure of the elder saint, to which the one is attached, separates them never to meet forever.

The truth of the anecdote which I have just related is guaranteed to me by a friend, who received it from one of the party in question.—From the Milan Correspondence of the Morning Herald.

[illegible] slippers of Ned, and his tread is noiseless. The [illegible] softly dawning, one after another; they creak in at the door; their fresh morning air is grateful to the lips that [illegible] their music is sweet to the ear that listens to it;—[illegible] we know it, a whole life of days has possession of [illegible] and time has taken us for its own.

Children's Column.

THE TIMELY WARNING.

A THRILLING STORY.

My father, after an absence of three years, returned to the house so dear to him. He had made his last voyage, and rejoiced to have reached a haven of rest from the perils of the sea. During his absence I had grown from a child and baby of my mother's (for I was her youngest) into a rough, careless and headstrong boy. Her gentle voice no longer restrained me. I was often willful and sometimes disobedient. I thought it indicated manly superiority to be independent of woman's influence. My father's return was a fortunate circumstance for me. He soon perceived the spirit of insubordination stirring within me. I saw by his manners that it displeased him, although for a few days he said nothing to me about it.

It was an afternoon in October, bright and golden, that my father told me to get my hat and take a walk with him. We turned down a narrow lane into a fine open field—a favorable play-ground for the children in the neighborhood. After talking cheerfully on different topics for a while, my father asked me if I observed that huge shadow, thrown by a mass of rocks that stood in the middle of the field. I replied that I did.

"My father owned this land," said he. "It was my playground when a boy. That rock stood there then. To me it is a beacon, and whenever I look at it I recall a dark spot in my life—an event so painful to dwell upon, that if it were not as a warning to you, I should not bleek of it. I laden, then, my dear boy, and learn wisdom from your father's errors:

"My father died when I was a mere child. I was the only son. My mother was a gentle, loving woman, devoted to her children, and beloved by everybody. I remember her pale, beautiful face, her sweet, affectionate smile, her kind and tender voice. In my childhood I loved her intensely. I was never happy apart from her; and she, fearing that I was becoming too much of a baby, sent me to the high school in the village. After associating a time with rude, rough boys, I lost, in a measure, my fondness for home, and my reverence for my mother; and it became more and more difficult for her to restrain my impetuous nature. I thought it indicated a want of manliness to yield to her authority, or to appear penitent, although I know that my conduct pained her. The epithet I most dreaded was girl-boy. I could not bear to hear it said by my companions that 'I was tied to my mother's apron strings.' From a quiet, home-loving child, I soon became a wild, roistering boy. My dear mother used every persuasion to induce me to seek happiness within the precincts of home. She exerted herself to make our fireside attractive, and my sister, following her self-sacrificing example, sought to entice me, planning games and diversions for my entertainment. I saw all this, but did not heed it.

"It was on an afternoon like this, that I was about leaving the dining-table, to spend the intermission between morning and evening school in the street, as usual, my mother laid her hand on my shoulder, and said mildly but firmly, 'my son, I wish you to come with me.' I would have rebelled, but something in her manner awed me. She put on her bonnet and said to me, 'We will take a little walk together,' I followed her in silence; as I was passing out the door I observed one of my rude companions skulking about the house, and I knew he was waiting for me. He sneered as I went past him. My pride was wounded to the quick. He was a very bad boy, but being some years older than myself, he exercised a great influence over me. I followed my mother sullenly, till we reached the shadow of this huge rock. O, my boy! could that hour be blotted from my memory, which has cast a dark shadow over my whole life, gladly would I exchange all that the world can offer me for the quiet peace of mind I should enjoy. But no! like this huge unsightly pile, stands the monument of my guilt forever.

"My mother being feeble in health, sat down, and beckoned me to sit beside her. Her look, so full of tender sorrow, is present to me now. I would not sit, but continued standing sullen by her side. 'Alfred, my dearson,' said she, 'have you lost all love for your mother?' I did not reply. 'I fear you have,' she continued; 'and may God help you to see your own heart, and me to do my duty!' She then talked to me of my misdeeds—of the dreadful consequences of the course I was pursuing. By tears, and entreaties, and prayers, she tried to make an impression on me. She placed before me the lives and examples of great and good men; she sought to stimulate my ambition. I was moved but too prond to show it, and remained standing in dogged silence beside her. I thought, 'What will my companions say, if, after all my boasting, I yield at last, and submit to be led by a women?'

"What agony was visible on my mother's face when she saw that all who said and suffered failed to move me! She rose to go home, and I followed at a distance. She spoke no more to me till we reached our own door.

"'It is school time now,' said she. 'In, my son, and once more let me beseech you to think upon what I have said.'

"'I shan't go to school,' said I.

"She looked astonished at my boldness, but replied firmly, 'Certainly you will go; Alfred, I command you.'

"'I will not,' said I, with a tone of defiance.

"'One of these two things you must do, Alfred; either go to school this moment, or I will lock you in your room, and keep you there till you are ready to promise implicit obedience to my wishes in future.'

"'I dare you to do it,' said I; 'you can't get me up stairs.'

"'Alfred choose now,' said my mother, who laid her hand upon my arm. She trembled violently and was deadly pale.

"'If you touch me I will kick you,' said I in a terrible rage. God knows I knew what I said.

"'Will you go, Alfred?'

"'No!' I replied, but quailed before her eyes.

"'Then follow me,' said she, as she grasped my arm firmly. I raised my foot—O, my son, hear me!—I raised my foot, and kicked her—my sainted mother! How my head reels as the torrent of memory rushes over me! I kicked my mother—a feeble woman—my mother! She staggered back a few steps and leaned against the wall. She did not look at me. I saw her heart beat against her breast. 'O heavenly Father!' she cried, 'forgive him; he knows not what he does. The gardener just then passed the door, and seeing my mother pale, and almost unable to support herself, he stepped; she beckoned him in. 'Take this boy up stairs and lock him in his own room.' Looking back, as she was entering her room, she gave me such a look—it will forever follow me. It was a look of agony, mingled with the intensest love—it was the last unutterance prung from a heart that was broken.

"In a moment I found myself a prisoner in my own room. I thought, for a moment, I would fling myself from the window, and dash my brains out; but I felt afraid to die. I was not penitent. At times my heart was subdued, but my stubborn pride rose in an instant and bade me not yield. The pale face of my mother haunted me. I flung myself on the bed and fell asleep. I woke at midnight, stiffened by the damp night air, terrified with frightful dreams. I would have sought my mother at that moment, for I trembled with fear; but my door was fast. With the day-light my terrors were dissipated, and I became bold in resisting all good impulses. The servant brought my meals, but I did not taste them. I thought the day would never end. Just at twilight I heard a light footstep approach the door. It was my sister who called me by name.

"'What may I tell mother from you?' she asked.

"'Nothing!' I replied.

"'O, Alfred, for my sake, for all our sakes, say that you are sorry. She longs to forgive you.'

"'I won't be driven to school against my will,' I said.

"'But you will go if she wishes it, dear Alfred,' said my sister; pleadingly.

"'No! won't,' said I, 'and you needn't say a word more about it.'

"'O brother, you will kill her, you will kill her, and then you can never have a happy moment.'

"I made no reply to this. My feelings were touched, but I still resisted their influence. My sister called me, but I would not answer. I heard her footsteps slowly retreating, and again I flung myself on the bed to pass another wretched and fearful night. O God, how wretched I how fearful I did not know.

"Another footstep, slower and feebler than my sister's, disturbed me. A voice called me by name. It was my mother's.

"'Alfred, my son, shall I come in? Are you sorry for what you have done?' she asked.

"I cannot tell what influence operating at that moment, made me speak adverse to my feelings. The gentle voice of my mother that thrilled through me, melted the ice from my obdurate heart, and I longed to fling myself on her neck, but I did not. No, my boy I did not. But my words gave the lie to my heart, when I said I was not sorry. I heard her withdraw. I heard her groan. I longed to call her back, but I did not.

"I was awakened from an uneasy slumber by hearing my name called loudly, and my sister stood by my bedside.

"'Get up, Alfred! O! don't wait a moment! Get up and come with me. Mother is dying!'

"I thought I was dreaming, but I got up mechanically, and followed my sister. On the bed, pale, and cold as marble, lay my mother. She had not undressed, but had thrown herself on the bed to rest. Arising to go again to me, she was seized with a palpitation of the heart, and borne senseless to her room.

"I cannot tell you my agony as I looked upon her—my remorse was ten-fold more bitter from the thought that she would never know it. I believed myself to be a murderer. I fell on the bed beside her—I could not weep; my heart burned in my bosom; my brain was all on fire. My sister threw her arms around me and wept in silence. Suddenly we saw a slight motion of my mother's hand—her eyes unclosed. She had recovered consciousness, but not speech. She looked at me, and moved her lips. I could not understand her words. 'Mother, mother!' I shrieked, 'say only that you forgive me!' She could not say it with her lips, but her hand pressed mine. She smiled upon me, and lifting her thin white hands, clasped mine within them, and cast her eyes upward. She moved her lips in prayer, and thus she died. I remained still kneeling beside that dear form till my gentle sister removed me. She comforted me, for she knew the heavy load of sorrow at my heart; heavier than grief for the loss of a mother; for it was a load of sorrow for sin. The joy of youth had left me for ever.

"My son, the suffering such memories awake, must continue as long as life. God is merciful; but remorse for past misdeeds is a canker-worm in the heart, that preys upon it for ever."

My father ceased speaking and buried his face in his hands. He saw and felt the bearing his narrative had upon my character and conduct. I have never forgotten it. Boys who spurn a mother's control, who are ashamed to own that they are wrong, who think it manly to resist her authority, or yield to her influence, beware! Lay not up for yourself bitter memories for your future years.

GETTING OUT.

As I was passing through one of the streets of our city, I met two boys who were walking slowly along, and glancing occasionally at the ward school-house, which stood on the opposite side of the street. They looked like truants.

"Hallo!" said one of the boys, addressing a third, who came from an opposite direction, "Jim Ryan's cotoing out at one o'clock!"

"Has he got a note?"

"Yes."

"Did he write it?"

"Yes. Look at the one I wrote;" and the boy's countenance expressed as much satisfaction as if he had really performed a noble deed.

Now, those boys had deceived their teacher merely to obtain a few hours' longer play-time. Do you think they felt any happier? I think not. Boys who do wrong to obtain their desires, seldom enjoy themselves as well as those who do have the consciousness of having done right.

There is such a feeling of content where one does right, or as nearly right as he can do, that I wonder any one will sacrifice that feeling to obtain any desired good.

Never act a lie. Though you may deceive your parents or your teachers, you cannot deceive God. His eye is ever upon you, and he knoweth all your thoughts.

THE NEW KEY.

"Aunty," said a little girl, "I believe I have found a key to unlock people's hearts, and make them so willing: fur you know, aunty, God took my father and my mother and they want people to be kind to their little daughter."

"What is the Key?" asked aunty.

"It's only one little word—guess what?"

But aunty was no guesser.

"It is please," said the child; "if I ask one of the great girls in school, "Please show me my parsing lessons?" she says, "O yes," and helps me. If I ask Sarah, "please do this for me?" no matter, she'll take her hands out of the suds. If I ask uncle, "please," he says, "Yes, pass. If I can;" and if I say, "please," aunty—"

"What does aunty do?" asked herself.

"O, you look and smile just like mother, and that is best of all," cried the little girl throwing her arms around aunty's neck, with a tear in her eye.

Perhaps other children will like to know about the key, and I hope they will use it also; for there is great power in the small, kind courtesies of life.

OAK LEAVES AND ACORNS.

How much is contained within a small acorn cup! When a little child holds an acorn in his hand, it holds but a small not only, but a forest; for folded within its tiny shell lies trees, and their children-trees—even a whole forest.

"How wonderful was the command of God! "Let the earth bring forth, . . . the tree yielding fruit whose seed is in itself." it is a miracle to make a tree; but how much more wonderful a miracle to give to the tree the power of producing other trees in long succession for countless years!

A watch is perhaps one of the most beautiful and wonderful things ever made by man; but what would you think of a watch which, if put in the ground, could produce many more watches? Does not this comparison show us how much greater God's work is than man's?

STORY BUILDING,
CORNER OF CAMP AND COMMON STREETS,
Entrance on both streets.
OPEN DAY AND EVENING.

N. B.—There are apartments and Professors for Book Keeping, Penmanship, Mathematics, French, Spanish, German, English, etc., so as to save the time of business men.
Persons from 12 to 60 years attend to any branch they wish, and until as perfect as they wish to be. There are probably not less than 200 of the former students in the banks and business houses to this city. Merchants apply here for Clerks and Book keepers. Country merchants, Steamboat Clerks, etc., can learn IN A FEW DAYS to keep their books correctly, or write a fine, handsome hand. Catalogues, with Terms and Opinions of the Press, the leading men of the nation, etc., sent to all who apply at the above. There is the only Chartered Commercial College in the South-west, and the oldest in the United States, and has about FOUR TIMES AS MANY PUPILS AS ANY OTHER in its own limits alone.
Board can be had with the Professors or other good families, paying English Branches, Spanish or German, from $5 to $6 per week.
N. B.—To prevent mistakes or impositions, students intended for this College should bring this Advertisement as Special Directions, as there are every winter temporary rooms open for a few months, all of course making WONDERFUL PRETENSIONS and PROMISES, and posting Nothing placards to enlighten the people of New Orleans and of the South! Citizens and strangers are invited to visit the College and judge for themselves.
Stock.—If, as is expected, the citizens in favor of Southern practical, subscribe as liberally to this home institution as they ever have to that of others, the Agricultural and Mechanical Departments will be at once put in operation, and the whole placed on a firm basis, to stand for ages as a permanent institution of the South, and under the direction of the Stockholders themselves and the Trustees appointed by the Legislature. The Charter is perpetual. RUFUS DOLBEAR,

The San Antonio Female College offers the best facilities for the education of young ladies. The institution has been commenced on a sure basis; the best men of the community are engaged in the enterprise, and ample accommodations will soon be provided in the way of buildings. The course of instruction is extensive and thorough, and all the teachers are well qualified for their work. Dr. and Mrs. Cross had large experience, and been connected with some of the best institutions in the United States. Prof. Fabricus-Brinow is a native German, of extensive scholastic acquirements, with polished manners and pleasing address. Miss Anderson enjoys a well earned reputation as an instructress, who, in courtesy, industry and fidelity, has seldom been surpassed. Mr. Grossman is a German musician of high character, an excellent performer, and a most skilful and successful teacher. Other assistants will be employed, as the number and advancement of pupils shall require. dec21-3m

HUNTSVILLE FEMALE COLLEGE, HUNTSVILLE North Alabama.
REV. A. B. ERWIN, L. D., Principal.
This Establishment offers the following inducements to Southern patronage.
1. Huntsville is the nearest mountain location to the South and Southwest; and is proverbially healthful. The social elegance and beautiful scenery to be found here, are great auxiliaries in the formation of character.
2. The edifice is large and elegant—supplied with gas-light; and water in the greatest abundance by pipes, from a mammoth Spring in the town. It is 164 by 52 feet, three stories high, and well furnished.
3. The domestic arrangements are such as to secure not only comfort, but the social and domestic training of the pupils. Frugality, politeness and grace, as well as the virtues of the heart, are habitually cultivated.
4. The facilities of instruction are unsurpassed. There are fifteen teachers and attaches, some of whom are distinguished educators. The large patronage, from among the best families of nine of the Southern States, attest the good will of the institution.
5. Arrangements are made to accommodate Southern pupils during the Summer Vacation, and to furnish them with such instructions in the extra branches as may be desired. Pupils received at any time.
Apply for a circular to Rev. A. B. ERWIN, D.D.,

COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE, BATON ROUGE.
The Exercises of this Institution will be resumed on the 12th of October next.
The Principal intends to spare neither labor nor expense to make the school in its Educational Facilities and its moral influences, equal to the best in the country.
As the number of pupils is limited, it is desirable that applications be made as early as possible.
Parents are earnestly advised of the importance of having their children at School as promptly as possible. The loss of a few days at the beginning, often proves a serious disadvantage to the pupils, and greatly increases the labor of the teachers for the whole session.
For information and Circulars, apply to Rev. J. R. WALKER, New Orleans; Rev. C. G. VARNEY, Monroe; T. P. CLINTON, Esq., St. Joseph; Rev. J. A. IVY, Alexandria; Rev. R. B. SUMAT, Mansfield; or to MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF THE ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

The Missionary Society of the Alabama Conference held its twenty-seventh anniversary in the Methodist Church of Eufaula, on Saturday night, Dec. 3d, 1859.

The meeting was called to order by the President, the Rev. J. J. Hutchinson, and prayer was offered by the Rev. C. Taylor, M.D.

The reports of the Secretary and Treasurer were read and adopted, and an excellent, forcible address was delivered by the Rev. W. J. Sasnett, D.D.

The following resolution, offered with a few remarks, by the Rev. John Matthews, was then adopted:

Resolved, That in view of the increasing demands of the missionary cause upon the liberality of the Church, and of the abundance with which our people have been blessed of God, we will endeavor to raise a sum not less than forty thousand dollars for the missionary treasury during the ensuing year.

The following resolution, offered with some remarks, by the Rev. A. S. Andrews, was then adopted:

Resolved, That in view of the openings of Providence for missionary undertakings in Central and South America, the Missionary Society of the Alabama Conference is pleased to learn that the parent Board is making arrangements for the establishment of a mission in that part of the world; and would respectfully suggest to the Bishop the propriety of sending some member of the Alabama Conference to make a visit to Central and South America to initiate this great undertaking.

On motion of the Rev. J. T. Heard—

Resolved, That should the Church establish a mission in those regions, this Society, in behalf of the Alabama Conference, pledge that body to raise, over and above its present missionary contributions, the money necessary to sustain and carry forward said mission.

The Society then adjourned with the benediction by the President.

Thos. O. Summers,
Secretary.

Eufaula, Ala., Dec. 3, 1859.

Report of the Alabama Conference Missionary Society.

At the last session of the Alabama Conference fifty-one missions were recognized within its bounds. From the reports of the missionaries we condense the following interesting items:

1. Mobile German mission was served by Carl Herwig, who reports 10 members and 5 probationers. He thinks it should be continued.

2. Little Zion colored mission, Mobile, was served by John B. Baldwin, who reports 293 members, 72 probationers, 112 catechumens, 22 adults and 38 children baptized; $300 received; $3,000 subscribed for the building of a new church. It is prosperous.

3. Maurilla mission was served by S. Briggs, who reports 89 white members, 23 probationers, 90 Sunday-school scholars. It is self-supporting.

4. Arcola colored mission was served by J. Williamson, who reports 5 white members, 242 colored members and 8 probationers.

5. Dayton colored mission was served by T. S. Abernathy, sen., who reports 9 appointments, 400 hearers, 69 members, 44 probationers, 100 children, besides the adults, catechized; $480 received out of $600 assessed. It is prosperous.

6. Union Town colored mission was served by J. W. McCann, who reports 13 plantations and one white congregation, baptized 120 children and 6 adults, 206 members, 20 colored and 8 white probationers; $600 received. The mission is in a hopeful state, though some of the plantations have passed into new hands, and the appointments on them will be discontinued.

7. South Cane Brake colored mission was served by J. C. Huckabee. It is a new field, and contains 10 preaching places, 4 of which at churches, 1 at a schoolhouse, and the rest on plantations; members, 49; probationers, 39; nearly 1000 preached to, 150 children catechized, 24 adults and 35 children baptized; $601 35 received. It is promising.

8. Prairie Bluff colored mission was supplied by Jas. Beverly, who reports 3 white congregations, which it is proposed to separate from the colored portion of the work, which numbers 6 plantations, with 6 white and 64 colored members, 123 catechumens; $420 received. The owners and overseers, with their families, attend worship, and are favorable to the mission.

9. Barryton mission was supplied by Wm. M. Williams, who reports 250 hearers, 54 white members, and 18 probationers, 6 colored members and 10 probationers, 8 adults and 13 children baptized; $28 25 received.

10. Boligee colored mission was served by E. Phillips, in connection with Trinity station; he reports 5 appointments, 3 plantations, about 450 preached to, 50 catechized, 50 members, 25 probationers; $70 received, and more expected. It should be continued.

11. Eutaw colored mission was served by J. M. Patton, who reports in this new field 5 appointments, 52 members, 500 preached to; $200 received. It is proposed to make it self-sustaining; the chapel system, if carried out, it is thought, would promote this end.

12. Cooksville colored mission was served, in connection with Cooksville circuit, by C. Strider, who reports 14 appointments, 49 members, 236 probationers, 271 joined this year, 1447 preached to, and all catechized; $559 75 received. It is prosperous.

13. Columbus colored mission was served by G. Shoeffer, who reports 1 congregation in Columbus, Miss. It is supported by the Sunday-school Society of that place. It is flourishing, has nearly doubled its membership in the last two years, and the piety of the members has greatly increased; 277 members, 50 probationers, 100 catechized in Sunday-school.

14. Plymouth colored mission was supplied by E. Williams, who reports 5 appointments, 305 members, besides 40 or 50 Baptists on one plantation, 36 adults and 14 infants baptized. It is prosperous.

15. Yorkville colored mission was supplied by Wm. B. Owings, who reports 102 members, 62 probationers, 23 infants and 5 adults baptized, 150 catechized, 600 preached to. The colored people contributed $15 83. It is promising.

16. Plum Creek colored mission was served by E. Callaway, who reports 5 appointments, 324 members, 103 probationers, 18 children and 16 adults baptized; $264 received. It is in good condition.

17. Prairie Hill colored mission was served by J. W. F. Tolnad, who reports 25 members, 195 probationers, 175 catechumens, 1000 preached to; $235 received. It is promising and may be enlarged.

18. Greensboro colored mission was supplied by J. Du Bois, who reports 4 appointments; 350 hearers; one neat chapel, and another will be ready next year; $200 received.

19. German Creek colored mission was served by A. R. Ramey, who reports 15 plantations, 12 appointments, 1200 preached to, 233 members, 12 probationers, 45 baptized, all are catechized; $450 received. Its prospects are good.

20. Prairie Creek colored mission was served by H. Urquhart, who reports 15 preaching places, 500 members, 75 probationers, 18 children and 32 adults baptized, $240 received on the mission, and more is expected.—Chapels are much needed.

21. Cahaba mission was supplied by R. W. Coon, who reports 165 white members, 75 probationers, 25 children and 11 adults baptized; $40 received.

22. Warrior mission was supplied by J. Sibert, who reports 14 preaching places, 262 white and 7 colored members, 56 probationers, 3 Sunday-schools; $80 received.

23. Winston mission was supplied by P. J. Walker, who reports 14 appointments, 307 white members, 115 probationers, 28 adults and 14 infants baptized, 5 Sunday-schools, 172 scholars; $81 received.

24. Pikeville mission was served by D. S. McDonald, who reports 282 members, 103 probationers, 10 Sunday-schools, 216 scholars, 63 teachers; $102 65 received.

25. Coosa mission was supplied by E. Patton, who reports 13 appointments, 120 white members, 16 probationers, 1 colored member, 2 probationers, 12 adults and 17 infants baptized.

26. Cross Plains mission was supplied by T. Spann, who reports 10 appointments, 292 white members, 21 probationers, 15 colored members and 70 probationers; $53 50 received. It is prosperous.

27. Marble Valley mission was served in connection with Fayetteville, and is so reported.

28. Arbacoochee mission was served by C. S. D. Lassiter, who reports 320 white members and 175 probationers, 6 colored members and 7 probationers; 268 Sunday school scholars; $95 received.

29. Dudeville colored mission was supplied by B. F. Blow; it reports 200 members, 50 probationers.

30. Cahaba colored mission was served by G. Garrett, who reports 4 preaching places, 8 white members, 23 colored members and 18 probationers; 4 adults and 8 children baptized, about 60 catechized. Some of the patrons are zealous in its support, and have paid $310. It is not considered prosperous.

31. Shelby Coal-mine mission was supplied by J. T. Dulley, who reports 63 white and 3 colored members; $120 80 received.

32. Montgomery colored mission was served by C. N. McLeod, who reports 547 members, 58 probationers, 40 children and 10 adults baptized; the colored people paid the missionary $500; there is one Sunday-school, with 40 scholars.

33. Catoma colored mission was served by J. W. Brown, who reports it prosperous on the chapel system; about 400 preached to, 45 members, 5 probationers, besides 7 white members.

34. Calcebo colored mission was supplied by Dow Perry, who reports 4 appointments, filled on Sunday afternoons; some of them are very full; 333 members, 70 probationers, 30 adults and 15 children baptized, 100 children catechized, 800 attend preaching; $133 50 received.

35. Uchee colored mission was served by M. E. Butt, who reports 291 members, 71 probationers, 200 catechumens; $371 50 received.

36. Otho colored mission was served by L. Patterson, who makes no report. The mission is to be merged into the Clayton circuit.

37. Glenville colored mission was served by F. H. Wardlaw, who reports 10 appointments, 436 members, 34 probationers, 30 adults and 25 children baptized, 275 catechumens; $160 received on the mission, $19 60 of which was from the colored people. It is prosperous, and its continuance is desired.

38. Villula colored mission was served by J. W. Jordan, who reports 279 members, 28 probationers, 200 catechumens, 12 appointments, 10 of which are desired to be continued; $505 received, $5 of which being from the blacks.

39. Barbour colored mission was supplied by J. L. Oliver, who reports 10 appointments, 200 members, 36 probationers, 239 catechized, 11 adults and 30 children baptized; $166 90 received, $6 10 being paid by the colored people. It is prosperous.

40. Channenuggee colored mission was supplied by G. W. Carter, who reports 428 members, 17 probationers, 168 catechumens.

41. Perote colored mission was supplied by H. W. Barker, who reports 145 members, 40 probationers, 80 catechized, 500 preached to, 30 adults and 29 children baptized; $151 65 received, of which $16 65 was paid by the colored people.

42. Newton mission was served half the year by W. P. H. Conaerly, and the other half supplied by H. Metcalf. There are 15 appointments, 241 white members, 31 probationers, 1 colored member and 22 probationers, 1 Sunday-school, 12 scholars; $176 75 received.

43. St. Andrew's Bay mission was supplied by B. F. Briton, who reports 16 white members, 19 probationers, 6 colored probationers, 30 Sunday-school scholars; $35 received.

44. Walton mission was supplied by J. Lassiter, who reports 146 white members, 28 probationers, 15 colored members, 10 probationers; $61 received.

45. Yellow River mission was served by C. F. Quellmalz, who reports 105 white and 2 colored members, 2 Sunday-schools; $88 received.

46. Pensacola mission station was served by W. K. Norton, who reports 60 white members, 12 probationers, 45 colored members and 4 probationers, 1 Sunday-school, 25 scholars; $293 35 received. The church has been repaired, and a parsonage will speedily be finished. It will soon support itself.

47. Escambia mission was supplied by S. A. Jones, who reports 171 white members, 107 probationers, 5 Sunday-schools; $225 received.

48. Big Swamp colored mission was served by Asa Skinner, who reports 13 appointments, 15 plantations, 241 members, 90 probationers, 351 children catechized, 56 adults and 70 children baptized, 1100 preached to; $741 55 received, $17 85 being from the colored people. It is prosperous. Other planters are asking for mission work.

49. Pleasant Hill colored mission was served by J. L. Sampey, who reports 7 appointments, 115 members, 25 probationers, 175 catechumens, 21 adults and 7 children baptized; $267 50 received.

50. Ash Creek colored mission was served by P. R. McCrary, who reports 9 appointments, embracing 900 colored people, 130 catechumens, 76 children and 21 adults baptized, 131 received into the church; $246 50 received. This is to be enlarged. The patrons desire its continuance.

51. Claiborne colored mission was served in connection with Mouroeville circuit, by B. G. Fleming; he reports 3 preaching places, 282 members, 51 probationers received the past year, 61 baptized; $185 received.

It affords us great satisfaction to survey the operations of the Conference among our colored population. What a field for evangelical enterprise! How desirable that it should be cultivated on the most enlarged scale!—What a vast amount of zeal, and prudence, and patience, is necessary for this great work! It is to be regretted that our colored missions have not been placed under such a general superintendency as might secure greater harmony and efficiency of operation, and more widespread results, than we have hitherto realized. There are yet thousands of slaves in Alabama for whose spiritual welfare the most meagre provision (if any) has been made; and the inquiry is pertinent, whether or not the responsibility of caring for their souls does not devolve upon our communion.

It is not our present intention to note the general interests of the missionary cause; they are not much altered since last we gave them a hurried survey. Our parent society has recently dispatched two beloved brethren—Messrs. Wood and Allen—to strengthen our force in China, where the bow of promise may be seen in the cloud which has for so many centuries hung like a funeral pall over that populous empire. We have one excellent man preparing for the Japan mission, whose the prospect, though inviting, is not at present very encouraging. We are projecting a mission to Central and South America, and we hope the ground will soon be broken in that important field. But on these and kindred points we cannot now speak particularly.

The duty of the Church in reference to the conversion of the world is so plainly set forth in the Holy Scriptures that it is difficult to conceive how it ever could have been overlooked or mistaken. The command is: "Go, disciple all nations," "Preach the gospel to every creature." Then is the actual work in the field, which is the world. But as the sinews of war must be furnished, the Church must "bring forward on their journey" those who go forth "taking nothing of the Gentiles," and support them in their work among the heathen, and thus "be fellow-helpers to the truth." These points are so clear, these duties are so natural, so reasonable, that there is scarcely any need of inspiration to enforce them. But there is another duty which is of a somewhat different complexion—the duty of praying for the conversion of the world. This is not less clearly enforced than the other: "Prayer also shall be made for him," says the Psalmist—that is, for the prosperity of the Messiah's cause. "Let the people praise thee, O God; let all the people praise thee." These petitions are put into our daily prayer, "Thy kingdom come; thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven." And again, we are commanded, "Pray ye the Lord of the harvest, that He will send laborers into His harvest;" "Pray for us," says the apostle, "that the word of the Lord may have free course, and be glorified."

Now, at first sight, there does not seem to be any reason why we should pray for the conversion of the world. In this great enterprize several parties are involved. There is first, God himself. He surely does not need our prayers to induce him to do what his own wisdom knows how to perform, what his power is able to effect, and what his goodness wishes to accomplish.—There is nothing that he desires so much to see effected as the salvation of the world. Then there is the Church—that is, ourselves; is it reasonable that we should pray God that we may discharge our duty? Then, again, there is a third party, the heathen who are to be converted. They cannot be converted either by God or by the Church, or by both united, without their own concurrence and co-operation. It may be reasonable enough to interest them to do their duty, but why pray God that they may do it? This is the very thing God, by us, commands them to do. Prayer, therefore, for the conversion of the world seems to be out of the question.—And yet nothing is clearer than that the Scriptures make it our duty to pray for this object; there must, therefore, be a grand necessity, a satisfactory reason for it, whether we can discover it or not.

It is very obvious that we cannot comprehend the philosophy of this duty in all its bearings. In regard to the objective efficacy of our prayers for the conversion of the world, we can only say it may be proper for God to grant certain things in answer to our prayers, which it may not be proper for him to bestow if we do not pray for them. In this respect, prayer for the conversion of the world is in the same category with all other intercessory prayers. When our own benefit is the object of prayer, it is easy to see that God may withhold it if we do not pray for it, particularly if he has said, "For these things will I be inquired of to do it for them;" "Ask, and ye shall receive; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you." But when another's benefit is the object, is it merciful, is it just, that he should be deprived of the blessing which he is capable of receiving, because we may not be disposed to pray for it? Can God consistently withhold his grace from the heathen, because the Church may be indisposed to pray for it? Suppose we answer in the affirmative, it might not be difficult to find analogies to favor this view. Providence wishes to enlighten the ignorant, to relieve the poor, to comfort the distressed, through our instrumentality; but God cannot force us to perform our duty in cases of this sort, and we may and frequently do neglect to perform it; and, as a consequence, the ignorant remain unenlightened, the poor unrelieved, and the distressed unconforted. Who is to blame? We are, beyond question. But, in this matter, is there unrighteousness with God? God forbid! The law of his nature and the relation which he sustains to his creatures, make it necessary that he should so act toward every one that, on the whole, existence to him shall be better than non-existence, better for him to have been born than not to have been born, unless by his own personal fault he makes it otherwise. All over and above this, may be made to depend upon contingencies into which shall enter the free agency of others as well as that of the party immediately concerned. If we do not choose to perform our duty in the premises, we may be substituted by others; as Mordecai said to Esther, "If thou altogether holdest thy peace at this time, then shall their enlargement and deliverance arise from another quarter, but thou and thy father's house shall be destroyed." Despite our uncharitable and criminal neglect, God can make the immortal existence of the heathen a blessing (though their rank in the scale of moral being may be comparatively low), provided they do not wilfully cross the gracious purposes of Heaven toward them. It is very certain that their invincible ignorance, and the evils necessarily resulting from it, will never procure their damnation. "This is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil." The heathen will be held responsible for the measure of light which they have received, and not for that which they would have received if the Church had done its duty. But if the Church were to do its duty, how much more happy might the heathen be, both in this world and in that which is to come! That they might be more miserable, through their perverse misimprovement of increased advantages, is also certain, this being the unavoidable countervailing consideration. The ways of God are equal.

So far as the subjective efficacy of our prayers for the conversion of the world is concerned, the case is much more potent to our comprehension. Nothing has a greater tendency to increase our reverence for the Supreme Being than prayer. The homage involved in the act is a practical recognition of the sovereign laws of God. If we pray, "Hallowed be thy name," we shall be induced to "sanctify the Lord God in our hearts, and to let him be our fear and to let him be our dread." If we pray, "Thy kingdom come," we shall be interested in its progress; we shall labor for its advancement; we shall endeavor to remove all hindrances to its development; we shall mourn over its reverses; we shall rejoice in its successes. If we pray, "Thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven," we shall cause our will to be subjected to his; we shall endeavor to ascertain how the angels do his commandments, hearkening unto the voice of his word; and we shall do all in our power to induce every child of man to imitate their holy example. Nothing is so well adapted to keep alive our charities and sympathies for the heathen as prayer for them. We cannot pray for them without contributing of our means for their enlightenment. We cannot pray for them without making ourselves, in person or proxy, the medium of communicating to them the blessings for which we pray. Can we who have the lamp of life pray that they may have it too, and then make no effort to give it to them? Are not our prayers commanded for this very thing, to keep alive and intensify our interest in the conversion of the heathen?—And if so, verily it is not in vain that we pray, though we may have to answer our own prayers.

This is what is especially needed at the present time. We must pray more, and more earnestly, in order that, by the reflex influence of our prayers, we may prove "steadfast, immoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord."—that our efforts may not be so languid, but earnest and zealous; not so fitful and spasmodic, but constant and cresciye; not dependent upon signs and wonders and external tokens of success, as if the kingdom of God were to come with observation, but upon the sure word of prophecy and of promise, which is the incentive of prayer and basis of faith. Let us, therefore, familiarize ourselves with the wants and woes of the world; let us "survey the wondrous cross" provided for all our race in the glorious gospel of the blessed God; let us recognize more fully and feel more sensitively the fraternity of our race, the mutual interests and responsibilities of the members of the great family of man; and to further all these ends, as well as to be furthered by them in return, let us prolong and intensify the prayer, "Let the whole earth be filled with his glory. Amen, and amen."

EAST TEXAS CONFERENCE.

Editor Advocate:

Dear Bro.—Knowing the deep solicitude you feel in the success and prosperity of the Conference with which you affiliated during your sojourn in Texas, and that the eyes and hearts of many of your readers are hopefully turned to the great west, I feel a pleasure in forwarding to your columns a few items in regard to our late session that may be of some interest both to yourself and many readers.

The Conference met in Palestine on the 30th ult., and after one of the most harmonious and prosperous sessions that it has ever been my pleasure to witness, adjourned on the 6th inst., at ten o'clock, P. M.

The Bishop not having arrived, the Rev. J. B. Tullis was elected President, and discharged the responsible duties of the office much to the pleasure of the body.

Bishop Pierce arrived on the second day, but was so enfeebled by protracted sickness, travel, and exposure, as to confine him to his room and bed most of the time. He is but the shred of himself. May his valuable life be spared, and his wasting health speedily restored. For this the Conference pledged itself as a body, by resolution, to pray. Let all the people say, Amen.

While some of the older Conferences are retrograding in their Missionary movements, (a fact much to be regretted) I am happy to say that the East Texas Conference is witnessing a decided improvement. The collections were much larger than at any former session, and the Missionary fire is stimulating the zeal not only of the preachers, but of large portions of the laity. The Anniversary was held an Monday night, and notwithstanding the intensely cold atmosphere, the falling sleet, the ground covered in snow to the depth of three inches, the congregation was good; and after a stirring address by Rev. J. E. Carnes and some pungent appeals by Rev. J. W. Fields, a collection was made under a variety of propositions, which in all, as I afterward learned, amounted to about $600. You will soon see the Treasurer's report.

The cause of Education occupied a prominent place in their deliberations. The committee to whom that subject was referred made an elaborate report, which was unanimously adopted by the Conference and ordered to be published, I bespeak for it a place in your columns. It is with no little pleasure that we announce the resuscitation of the Fowler Institute, under the indefatigable labours of its present able and deservedly popular principal, Rev. N. W. Burks.

Also, the transfer of the McKenzie Institute to the Conference. The grounds, with the college buildings, are estimated at $65,000. It is the most prosperous school in the State, numbering from 250 to 300 pupils. The Conference received the transfer with the deepest emotions of gratitude to the munificent donor, and appointed a committee to obtain a charter for a college at present session of the Legislature. It will hereafter be known as the McKenzie College of the East Texas Conference. The Rev. J. W. P. McKenzie was appointed President of the Institution. As a disciplinarian and instructor of youth, he has not a superior in the South.

The McKenzie College is destined to take a proud stand among the literary institutions of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. I will not, however, forestall the report of the committee.

There is a cheering improvement in the finances of the Conference in every department, and in church membership of about 1000.

Nearly all the preachers were present, and answered to their names. None had died during the year. At the close they received their appointments, not with a dogged submission, but in the spirit of a prowess more sublime than that which animated the spirit of Napoleon on the field of Waterloo.

The East Texas Conference is moving forward with a steady step to an enviable destiny. She will now compare favorably with some of her elder sisters. I have never been associated with a nobler band of self-sacrificing standard-bearers in the cause of the Redeemer.

Bishop Pierce stationed about eighty preachers. The next Conference will be held at Jefferson. If life is spared, we shall be happy to greet our old friend and brother, the Editor of the New Orleans Christian Advocate, at Jefferson, next fall, in annual session.

POSITION OF THE ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

To the Editor:

What a wonderfully controlling power is habit! In a thousand things we do so and so, and consider that about the way to do, simply because we have heretofore floated along about in that current, and so we settle down in that way of doing. The scale on which we conduct our ecclesiastical finances, is fixed more by habit than by any other one thing. We do one year about as we did the year before, simply from the circumstance that we did so last year, and we regard that about right, as a matter of course.

Instead of this, we should sometimes ignore the past, and look directly to the proprieties and necessities of the case, and work up to that.

Again, a habit once fixed is never broken off but by an effort. The mere gliding along as usual, and improving gradually, by little, will oftentimes not do at all. Labor is exhausted, and nothing is effected. A bold stroke is necessary; a higher platform must be ascended at once. And then, in a large country, or large community, this must begin somewhere. A few men can think out a measure as well as a thousand, and sometimes better.

One man in Alabama began to think about our publishing interests; and his thinking went up regularly and officially to the Grand Conference; and there it met some co-working or compounding propositions, all of which were wrought by the Grand Conference into a system. And Alabama led off in the practical working.

A hundred thousand dollars? Never—never, cried a few who had been accustomed to reason from the past rather than from the present absolute indications and necessities. And then it was thought—very improperly thought—that to raise $100,000 in the Alabama Conference, in cash and notes, in one year, would so impoverish the Church and the country in that region, that all other interests would suffer, if not go to ruin.

But the sequel proves otherwise. Ninety thousand dollars have been raised for this purpose in the past year, and at least twenty thousand to forty thousand more would have been subscribed but for the illness, almost the whole year, of Dr. Hamilton, one of the agents, and no one is injured. The country is not impoverished, the Church is not injured. But, on the contrary, it is now a matter of certainty that no one single thing has ever occurred in the Alabama Conference which has given so much vigor and healthful tone to everything ecclesiastical in that Conference before, in all probability.

Let us see. The income in cotton alone, in the bounds of the Alabama Conference, may be safely set down at 100,000 bales—say sixteen millions. One fourth part of that, and more, is in our Church or in pretty near affinity with it. Say four millions a year, as the income in cotton alone, of what might be called the Methodism of Alabama. The income in other things is quite as much. Now, a Christian people, professing what we claim to profess, devoted to the propagation of the measures and principles we profess, with an annual income of eight millions or the half, or the quarter of it, would not, I should think, be assessed beyond the measure of sacrifice and self-denial recommended and enjoined in the scriptures, by an annual appropriation of one or two hundred thousand dollars, for an enterprise so great and so necessary as the building up of the great publishing interests of the Southern Church.

What has been done has ruined nobody in Alabama. No, nor would it be at all likely to ruin any one if the ecclesiastical expenditure were extended on and on, until it would meet the divine assessment.

These things have probably done more good out of the Alabama Conference than in it. They are setting the fashion.

She intends to keep on, and on, and on. It is a double or reflex operation. It operates well at home, and well abroad. It stimulates and loosens up everything. It improves the educational instincts; it improves the Sunday School operations; it improves the missionary funds; it improves the ministerial support; it improves the whole round of ecclesiastical finances. Let it go on. Give Dr. Neely an open sea and a fair chance. His labors will elevate the Alabama Conference, and the Alabama Conference will, instrumentally and incidentally, in the hands of Providence, improve the Church.

Let every man say, God speed! Let the Lord's money go the right way, and let the Church rise in its strength and beauty, let croakers and gain-sayers stand aside a little, and let those wicked men who would affect to regard the Church as something little, see that she is great.

Yours Truly, R. Andrew, Fin. Sec.

A REMARKABLE CONVERSION.

BY A MEMBER OF THE ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

In addition to the established proofs of Christianity, new and striking evidences of its truth are being constantly furnished by its effects. Under its power the oldest and hardest transgressors are still made to bow; and experience shows that, when their hearts are once submitted to the gospel, they are as easily and as thoroughly changed as the youngest could be. I propose to illustrate this by a narrative of what has come under my own observation, in two remarkable instances, within the last few years. And to make the impression more vivid, I shall give the names and dates connected with this case.

The first is that of William McCarty, who still lives in my native town, Elyton, Alabama. He was a laboring man, of about fifty years of age, had been most of his life a small farmer, but had also kept a grocery and a sort of confectionary shop. He was remarkable for obduracy and bluntness of character, and had also the reputation of being close in his dealings, though strictly honest. At that period of his life to which I wish to invite particular attention, he had the misfortune to lose his leg, by means of an ulcer, which rendered an amputation necessary.

Being old and rather poor, his misfortune excited the sympathy of several friends, who visited him, and desired to have some religious conversation with him; but so rough and repulsive was his manner, that they felt forbidden to approach the subject. Just as he was getting about from his long confinement, some one happened to remark to him that the next Sunday was the circuit preacher's last day at Elyton, and he expressed his intention to go out and hear him, though he had not been to preaching before in four years. At the appointed time he hobbled into Church, an object of surprise and sympathy for all who were present. From that sermon he was evidently convicted, and was seen in the congregation both at the afternoon and night services. The meeting was protracted next day, and still he came, evidently becoming more and more concerned. So likewise on Tuesday and on Thursday night, the door of the Church being opened for the reception of members, the writer of this sketch approached Mr. McCarty, and invited him to join the Church, but was so roughly repulsed as to regret having made the proposition. During the following day and night he was still present, giving fixed attention, but his hard heart still refused to accept the salvation which was purchased by the blood of the Lord Jesus Christ. Not a tear did he shed, not a word did he utter, to encourage us to hope that he was going to yield to the offers of mercy. But, at last, on Thursday night, as he afterwards told us, he determined to resist no more, but resolved that if another opportunity of coming forward was offered, he would accept of it. Accordingly the next morning, at prayer-meeting, he was found in his accustomed place, and when the signal was given for penitents to come forward, he rose and hobbled upon his wooden leg or crutch to the front seat, and sank down upon it in a transport of feeling. O what a thrill of joy shot through that little assembly of Christians, when this obdurate sinner came as a penitent to the Cross of Christ! It was not long till all were engaged in the most fervent entreaties for the Divine mercy to be sent down upon his soul, and when the petition was ended, his heart seemed to be completely broken, and his hardened features were covered with both smiles and tears. But it was some hours before he was able to express intelligibly his feelings, and such was the natural sinister expression of his face, that it was impossible to tell whether he was happy or miserable; but at last he revealed the glad news that Christ had taken away his sins, and for days continued in broken and strange expressions to tell of his feelings.

When the news went out that old Billy McCarty had been converted, it seemed like some strange and onheard of thing had happened in the community. The wisest sinner could not account for it, but they dared not question his sincerity, nor do ought to cause his faith to waver. And there he lives yet, for the last seven years, a pious and godly man. He still pursues his humble business of baking and selling cakes, but maintains an irreproachable name for honesty and piety.

There is one change in his character which is perhaps more remarkable than any other. It is that he has become a remarkably liberal man. At his house, though poor, he entertains more religious company than any family in the village. He gives on all occasions liberally to the support of the gospel and to all benevolent enterprizes. He has thus become, in all respects, the very opposite of what he was at fifty years of age, and who that knows the fixedness of the purposes and habits of old age, will doubt that this mighty change was wrought by the power of God.

CHRISTIANITY IN CITIES.

Now, as at all past periods, the great battle of Christianity and of the Church is in the large towns. Those central seats of human activity and life are the fulcrum by which she would move the world. The leaven that would leaven the whole lump, must be planted in the very center of the mass. Wherever man is, there Christianity, the religion of man fallows, and the cities are pre-eminently the haunts and the rallying points of man. They constitute the very backbone and spinal cord of the social system of the world, through which, therefore, every intellectual and moral influence that is to tell upon the happiness and welfare of the race must circulate. Here, then, in this thronging, teeming place of concourse, the heavenly wisdom ever lifts her voice. Incarnate love still beholds the city and weeps over it; and the same instinct, caught from his inspiration, which led the missionary apostle straight to the Antiochs, the Corinths, and the Romes of the old world still directs the eyes of the Christian philantropists to the Londons, the Manchesters, and the Glasgows of the new. The course of ages has only tended to enhance the importance of this principle. If the city has always been the master-position in the battlefield of faith, it is pre-eminently so now. —North British Review.

HOW MUSIC IS MADE UP.

Taylor, of the Chicago Journal, has a most beautiful thought about music. He says: "It is a curious thought that the great translators of the dialect of Heaven—the Mozarts and Handels, and Johns of all time—have caught their notes from the hammers of Tubal Cain, or the murmur of running streams, or the winds sighing among the reeds, or the songs of singing birds; that should there be a Bird Convention, upon a summer's day, by a flowing river, near a ringing forge; and some master-piece that has rolled a tide of melody through mighty minsters, were performed, its author would be pronounced a faithful listener—only this and nothing more. How the robin would claim its warble, and the brown thrasher recognize its own; the bell-note, Robert O'Lincoln would catch up and repeat, and the quail whistle back its little share of the song. The soft sighing winds would echo a tone, now and then; the stream through the reeds murmur on with its own; the hammers beat out the battle-like strain, and the rain on the roof wash away a whole bar of 'the score.'

So, when the Anthem was ended, it would all be drifted, like the down of the thistle, back to Nature and Labor again. The lark would go up with a carol, and the little ground sparrow fly away with a note, and the music be scattered abroad."

THE RIVER JORDAN.

A correspondent of the Utica Herald thus describes the River Jordan:

"A line of green low forest trees betrayed the course of the sacred river through the plain. So deep is its channel and so thick is the forest that skirts its banks that I rode within twenty yards of it before I caught the first gleam of its waters. I was agreeably disappointed. I had heard the Jordan described as an insipid muddy stream. Whether it was the contrast with the desolation around, or my fancy that made its green banks as beautiful I know not; but it did seem at that moment of its revelation to my longing eyes, the perfection of calm and loneliness. It is hardly as wide as the Mohawk at Utica, but far more rapid and impassioned in its flow. Indeed, of all the rivers I have ever seen, the Jordan has the fiercest current. Its water is by no means clear, but it as little deserves the name of muddy. At the place where I first saw it, tradition assigns the baptism of our Saviour, and also the miraculous crossing of the children of Israel on their entrance into the promise land. Like a true pilgrim I bathed in its waters and picked a few pebbles from its banks as tokens of remembrance of the most familiar river in the world. Three miles below the spot where I now stand, the noble river, itself the very emblem of life, suddenly throws itself on the putrid bosom of the Dead Sea.

Unconscious Influence.—The very handling of the nursery is significant, and the petulance, the passion, the gentleness, the tranquillity indicated by it, are all reproduced in the child. His soul is a purely perceptive nature, and that for a considerable period, without choice or selection. A little further on he begins voluntarily to copy every thing he sees. Voice, manner, gait—everything which the eye sees—the mimic instinct delights to act over. And thus we have a whole generation of future men receiving from us their very beginnings, and the deepest impulses of their life and immortality. They watch us every moment—in the family, before the hearth, and at the table; and when we are meaning them no good or evil, when we are conscious of exerting no influence over them, they are drawing from us impressions and molds of habit, which, if wrong, no heavenly discipline can wholly remove; or, if right, no kind of association utterly dissipate. Now it may be doubted, I think, whether, in all the active influence of our lives, we do as much to shape the destiny of our fellow-men as we do in this single article of unconscious influence over children.

Fear Not.—Should I be asked, What is the grand remedy against undue fear of every possible kind? I answer, in one word, Communion with God. "He," says Dr. Owen, "who would be little in temptation, must be much in prayer." Ply the mercy seat. Eye the blood of Christ. Cry mightily to the spirit of [illegible]. To which I add, wait at the footstool in holy stillness of soul; sink into nothing before the uncreated Majesty. If He shines within, you will fear nothing from without. What made the martyrs fearless? Their souls were with Christ—Jesus lifted up the beams of his love upon them, and they smiled at all the fires which man could kindle.—Topiady.

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1859.

ACCOUNTS—NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

All parties interested in the Advocate—Editor, Preachers, and Subscribers—are interested in avoiding confusion in accounts.

Those well acquainted with the credit system in the newspaper business know full well that, under that system, confusion in accounts never can, never will, never can be avoided.—Uncertain mails, unavoidable oversights to agents or clerks, forgetfulness in subscribers and others, and the wearying, vexatious details of this business over all others, render it impossible. We have tried, for years, and know.

To have the subscription begin and end with the year, and to pay, if not in advance, at least once a year, is the nearest approach to a remedy that we can devise,—and this is our plan.

Immediately after the Conferences, all the accounts will be made out to January, 1861, without reference to time of commencement, or time last paid to; and they will be sent to each subscriber who has not paid to January, 1861.

If all our subscribers and agents will patiently co-operate with us, this difficulty about accounts will be forever settled during the coming year. After that, when January, 1861, comes, $2 more will be due, and so on.

Will our brethren and friends, when they receive these accounts, immediately remit the money to the office, or pay to the preacher, taking a receipt? If any think the account incorrect, let him inform us, pleasantly, without quarreling. We never quarrel, though we have more cause than others.

The volume of the Advocate will hereafter begin and end with the year; and it is very desirable that subscriptions should conform to the same rule.

Therefore, new subscribers, who do not begin with the year, will please send, not two dollars, but an amount sufficient to pay for the paper till the end of the year, at the rate of Four Cents a Week.

Then, every subscriber will know, without being informed, that at the beginning of the year is the time to remit the subscription money.

And let us have scores, hundreds, thousands of new subscribers with which to begin the New Volume, January 1st, 1860.—We intend, if Providence smile on us, to make a better paper next year than ever before. Arrangements are made, and being made, for greatly increasing its attractions.—Some new writers, of the first order, will begin with the year. The paper is flatteringly approved now—we intend to merit higher approbation.

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

This body met at Franklin, on Wednesday, Dec. 14th. Having been detained on our return from the Alabama, Conference, we did not reach Franklin until Monday night. Reaching New Orleans on Saturday morning, we intended to run over that day, but the steamer was delayed by a "norther," and the train on the Opelousas railroad was gone when we reached the city, so we spent the Sabbath at home.

Franklin is reached, from New Orleans, by taking the Opelousas railway to Berwick's Bay, as though you were going to Texas by "the inside route." Having gone over the road many times while a resident of the "Lone Star State," we felt wonderfully as if we were going to Texas when we started this time. To make it seem "more so," we met on the train many old Texas acquaintances returning home; and when we arrived at Berwick, there, as in our Texas times, lay the Texas steamer, steaming up, and about to be off. We took a long and tender look over the waste of waters towards Galveston, with her clean streets, white cottages, and green bowers of orange, lemon and citron. Perhaps we shall ride on that beach again one of these days. We shall never forget that we lived there—about twenty years compressed into four. Men living in Texas are exceedingly old for their age. May the blessing of God abide with the Church there, and especially upon the Texas Christian Advocate.

Bishop Andrew did not reach the Louisiana Conference at the commencement of the session. Rev. J. C. Keener, D.D., was elected President, pro tem., and occupied the chair for two days before the Bishop arrived. On taking his seat, Dr. Keener made, as we are informed, a feeling and very happy address. He said in substance that it had been his earnest desire to be entirely free from all burdens and responsibilities connected with the Conference, except those of a simple pastor. He had desired especially to be free from the duties of the Chair and the Council. They had given him the highest evidence of their confidence. He had the consolation of knowing that this high trust had been utterly unsought. He alluded to the success of the Conference in developing their peculiarly difficult field. Much of this he attributed to the faith and zeal of the transfers from other Conferences. Not aware of the peculiar difficulties of the country, they had come here with a faith and zeal above that of the rest of us, but which the rest of us ought to have had.

From all that we heard, and from all that we saw, we are inclined to believe that the Louisiana Conference has never been blessed with a more harmonious and pleasant session. It was delightful to behold. This Conference has in charge a territory of almost unbounded fertility and wealth. When fully developed (for it is yet in its infancy) it will contain more wealth, and be more completely representative of the highest Southern society, than any other region of the same size. A Conference of great power—power of mind, spirit, and character—is needed for its spiritual development. We are happy to believe that this thought is increasingly appreciated by the members of the Louisiana Conference, and that it is exerting an educational power upon their minds. In this, the formative age of the Church in this country, it is no light thing to be a member of the Louisiana Conference.

We were present too short a time, and have seen too little of the Conference documents, to speak fully of the proceedings of the session. At another time we shall say more. Our old Texas friend, Daniel Dennett, Esq., editor of the Franklin Banner, whom we were glad to meet, gives his impressions of the Conference, part of which we transfer to our columns. We are pleased especially with the just tribute he pays to our beloved Bishop Andrew, who presided and preached, as he does every where, with a wisdom, ability, and unction but seldom equalled:

"For nearly two weeks our village has been overflowing with a lively interest in the doings of the Methodist Episcopal Conference, which has been in session in this place, and in sermons abounding in eloquence and power, preached to full houses by day and by night. We have been attentive observers and patient listeners, both at the sessions of the Conference, and at the church, and we wish briefly to state our views upon what we have seen and heard.

"These have evidently show to best advantage in their Conference room, which is their legislative hall. With their venerable old Bishop Andrew in the chair, and the members actively engaged in dispatching the business of the church, they appear to be a zealous, resolute, talented and dignified body of men. They allow no windy speeches, no "long yarns," no talking against time, no log rolling, no swapping votes. They proceed intelligently, and in a business-like manner—do more legislating in one day than our State legislature accomplishes in a week; and they will finish up their year's business in complete order in about a week. They regulate their schools, colleges, book concern, newspaper, their numerous churches, their presiding elders, circuit preachers, and subordinate officers, their missionary and Sabbath school interests, examine the character and pass judgment on the merits of each preacher and officer, and praise, censure, or punish as they may deem holding each to a rigid account for his stewardship during the past year. They also attend to a numerous train of smaller items connected with their church which come up before them, and to settle, and regulate all of these matters as they should be, it requires no ordinary amount of talent, business capacity, experience and foresight, united with all the virtues that the human heart is capable of. In our humble judgment, the members of this conference, as a body, reflect much credit upon the church and the State to which they belong. We were never Methodists, and never expect to be, and therefore no allowance is to be made for sectarian partialities in these opinions of their merits.

"On no former occasion were better sermons ever preached in Franklin than have been preached in the last two weeks. Dr. Keener on several occasions addressed large audiences in his clear, lucid style; he held every eye and every mind chained to, his person and his subject, as he presented the religion of Christ to their view, robed in a garb of surpassing loveliness and beauty. Dr. Walker, in his soul-stirring style, made his hearers feel that there is an irresistible power in divine truth, and as he pointed the way to heaven and immortal glory, the language of the entire audience seemed silently and cordially to endorse the several positions so ably maintained by the eloquent speaker. The Rev. Mr. Parker also chained all eyes, and charmed the ears of the multitude, by his calm and dignified eloquence, and by the force of his reasoning. The Rev. Mr. Suratt, more eccentric than any that preceded him, possessing many peculiarities in his manner and style, awakened a lively interest, and was listened to by a crowded house with marked attention. The Rev. Dr. Avery preached the "conference sermon." He is a man of mind and power. He showed clearly how ministers of the gospel of even moderate attainments, if they be but zealous and honest in their efforts, may accomplish a vast amount of good.

The Rev. Dr. Taylor, who has been a missionary to China, and is now acting as a general agent for the Sabbath Schools South, gave a discourse on Sabbath Schools which was full of interest. He showed with great force, the importance of correct early training. Every parent and child in St. Mary should have heard him. It was one of the most practical and important discourses preached during the week.

"Dr. Taylor became acquainted with the Chinese language so as to be able to preach to the Chinese during his stay as a missionary among them, and he repeated the Lord's prayer in that dialect to the audience. No one could listen to his discourse without being pleased with the man, and edified by his words.

"On Sunday, Bishop Andrew preached in the Methodist Church to an audience too numerous to be seated in the house. In his discourse he held up the Apostle Paul as a model preacher of the gospel, and called special attention to the strong points in his character, his unbending honesty, his strong faith, his firm resolution, and his self-sacrificing devotion to the cause of Christ, which indeed him to say—"that bonds and afflictions abide me. But none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy."

"The whole discourse of the Bishop was replete with the language of practical piety. The venerable old man spoke feelingly, for he has been in the ministry as a laborer longer by ten years than Paul preached, and he evidently felt that the time is at hand when he will be able to repeat the language of his venerable predecessor, "I have fought a good fight—I have finished my course." None can listen to the Bishop without feeling impressed with the fact that he is one of the solid men of the times, and that he is worthy of the high position he occupies in the Church, and of the sacred place that is kindly given him in the hearts of his people.

"Other discourses were preached during the week by men of marked ability, but we are utterly unable to give them a special notice in this place. We must close by saying that the meetings were all interesting, and we have no doubt that their general effect upon the people and the parish will prove salutary in the extreme. We have no doubt the Bible, preachers of the gospel, and the Sabbath day will be more respected than they have heretofore been, and that these men have laid the foundation for a fine progressive movement in our parish in future. In their meetings there was no wild excitement, but there was a feeling in all hearts that was deeper and more lasting than that produced by excitement—it was feeling of respect for religion and for its able defenders. The fruits of their labors were not seen around the altar, but they will be found in the minds and hearts of the people in succeeding years. They laid, in those meetings, a broad, and deep, and a solid foundation for a superstructure which will in after years be gradually reared—a superstructure which will do credit to our people who build it, and to those who established its foundation.

"The reports of the Methodist Literary Institutions South are encouraging. The colleges are all prosperous, the high schools multiplying. These are becoming the strong arm of the Church for wielding a good influence, Methodist preachers are everywhere recommended to organize schools.

"Centenary College.—The condition of this College is flourishing. More than two hundred scholars are in attendance, which is more than double the number of the previous year.

"A professorship of natural sciences has been created in this college, to which has been added Agricultural Chemistry. They have nine professors. The moral and religious tone of this institution is becoming more elevated, and the standard of scholarship is becoming higher than heretofore. The institution is now able to educate free of charge the sons of Methodist ministers, and to extend favors to indigent young men striving to obtain an education. The endowment fund has been increased $9000 the present year.

"Homer College.—The condition of this College is prosperous. It is out of debt, and the endowment fund amounts to $24,000. They expect to raise this fund to 50,000 the coming year. Seventy-five pupils are in attendance, and there are prospects of increasing members.

"Pierce and Paine College.—This College succeeds finely—$63,808 53 have been subscribed and paid for the enterprise. The finances of the institution have been prudently managed.

"Mansfield Female College.—The reports of this institution for the most part are gratifying. It has more than one hundred pupils, and prospects of new additions.

"Baton Rouge Collegiate Institute.—Professor W. H N Magruder is at the head of this institution. It has an enviable reputation, and is in a flourishing condition.

"Female Seminary at Baton Rouge.—Mrs. Read is at the head of this seminary. The committee report—

"Resolved, That our confidence is unabated in the ability of Mrs. Read as a teacher of young ladies, and we recommend her school to all our friends, as an excellent place for the instruction of their daughters, and where they may receive a finished education."

CHRISTMAS.

Returning so recently from our Conference tour, Christmas was upon us before we could get (editorially) ready for it. Before this paper reaches our readers, their festivities for the season will have nearly closed. If not too late, we wish them all "a merry Christmas!" May they all live to see the happy return of many such! Let Christmas be kept by Christian people for ever. Governed by christian principle and moderation, its good old customs, and its joyousness, are good for the health of body and soul, both for young and old. We are glad to see that our brother of the Nashville Christian Advocate puts in a word for the negroes in regard to Christmas, especially in view of the fact that John Brownism may militate against their Christmas enjoyments, as abolitionism has always done against every interest of the blacks. Guard against incendiaries, but let the negroes have Christmas, by all means. The loss of it will be a calamity for which no after benefit will compensate. It is not only custom, but it is right. They make us and our country rich; let us make them happy.

LETTERS FROM KENTUCKY—No. I.

The introduction and progress of Methodism in what has been called the "dark and bloody ground," but which may now in truth be styled the "garden of the world," are incidents well worthy the attentive study of the wisest and most thoughtful christian philosopher.

Only a few years, comparatively speaking, have gone by since this beautiful land was an unbroken wilderness. Here, less than a century ago, the war-whoop of the savage and the scream of the panther mingled in wild confusion.

But, as Providence has directed the star of empire to move westward, it was not long until this region of beauty and fertility was discovered and occupied by the Anglo-Saxon; and now, where once roamed the red man of the forest, and the wild beast of the woods, civilization is found in a high state of perfection, and our beautiful temples erected to God, and dedicated to his holy service, may be seen on every hand; and with the return of each sacred day of rest, the songs and prayers of devout worshipers ascend like pure incense to the hill of Zion.

It was not, however, without opposition truly formidable that our fathers succeeded in planting, and their sons in perpetuating this pure form of Christianity in this section of our great country.

At an early day our Baptist friends entered, and gained strong footing in almost every portion of this inviting field. The doctrines promulgated by them among the people were strongly Calvinistic, the direct tendency of which, wherever preached, is to produce feelings of intolerance; and then in every direction and on almost all occasions, they made the ceaseless, tireless cry of water, water, affirming with the authority of an oracle that immersion alone was valid baptism.

By this course they succeeded but too well in preparing the way for one of the greatest and most dangerous heresies of the age—a heresy which has done more to sap the foundation of spiritual christianity, and to foist upon the people a pseudo religion, devoid of life and power, than all the combined influences, in the way of false teaching, ever brought to bear upon the population of this highly favored State. And if our Baptist friends have not, long ere this, been made to rue the stress they put upon immersion, they have at least shared largely, more so by far than any of the sister denominations, in the evils following in the wake of this abnormal christianity. In many sections of the country whole Baptist societies, except mere fragments, went headlong into this self-styled reformation; occasionally members of the Methodist and Presbyterian churches were beguiled into the new order of things, and as is usually the case with those who make a change in their ecclesiastical relations, these converts to the new theory went out among their neighbors thoroughly saturated with a zeal never felt before—a zeal ungoverned and ungulded by knowledge—and for a few years it really seemed that everything must bend and succumb to the dictum of the new apostle.

The doctrines, too, taught by this new sect, were so palatable to unrenewed human nature, and the way to heaven was made so easy, that the whole country seemed for a time to be upon the very point of a complete revolution in matters of religion. Immersion, as the condition of pardon, constituted the great central, all controlling idea of this new theology. The direct agency of the Holy Ghost in the regeneration of the soul was ignored; the inaction of religion hooted at, and the altar of prayer stigmatized as the "pouting block." The divine call to the ministry being discarded, many of their converts rushed thoughtlessly into the pulpit, and labored to bring all proper "spiritual" influence into perfect ridicule by some such irreverent blasphemous expressions as the following: "it is time to pay our respects to that little gentleman called the Holy Ghost."

With an effrontery second only to the impious claims of Roman Catholicism, their clique assumes to itself the exclusive right of being called the Christian Church. They profess great abhorrence for all creeds, and feign to be wonderfully indignant if you should presume to call them a "sect," and yet the Ethiopian is no more certainly known by the color of his skin, or the leopard by his spots, than are they by their sectarian peculiarities. Indeed it is only necessary to hear a Campbellite utter a few of his cant phrases, or even to whine, in order to know who he is; and yet, strange as it may seem, a goodly portion of this fair heritage was brought to a greater or less extent under the influence of this new religion. At this, however, we will not wonder if we but remember the unaccountable propensity that exists in the genus homo to substitute the form for the power of godliness. But in the very face of this mighty tide of error, in addition to the ordinary drawbacks to the spread of a pure Christianity, such men as Lindsay, Ray, Phillips, Stamper, Bascom, Kavanaugh, and others stood square up, full breasted to the storm, and contended earnestly, amid sneers and ridicule, that piety has to do with the heart as well as with the head—proclaiming fearlessly the great vital truth of Protestant Christianity, justification by faith only. Although it may look like arrogating to ourselves more than is due, yet we give it as our deliberate judgment, that the labors of the Methodist ministry has been the great instrument in the providence of God, in saving this portion of the American Union from the labyrinths of infidelity.

From the first introduction of Methodism into these parts, although constant drafts have been made upon her by the ceaseless tide of emigration to the distant west, she has not only maintained her footing, but moved steadily forward, gaining strength at every step.

Taking the entire State of Kentucky, in which there are two conferences, and small portions of the State belonging to two others, we now number the rise of fifty thousand members. Within the bounds of our own (Kentucky) Conference, which closed its "thirty ninth" session in September, we show a nett increase of over eight hundred during the previous year.

Looking at what, under God, she has accomplished in the past, and knowing that her condition and prospects were never so promising as at the present time, her friends, still confiding in the God of their fathers, we are sure have nothing to fear for the future. On the contrary they have abundant reason to "thank God and take courage." Methodism, be assured, Mr. Editor, yes, Southern Methodism, has an existence, and possesses an influence which is deeply felt even in this "hot-bed" of Campbellism.

If this hasty scroll should find a place in your excellent paper, we intend, in a future number, to lay before your numerous readers some of the elements of her present power, and some of the praiseworthy enterprizes which are just now being fairly initiated among us.

Northern Kentucky.

Dec. 15, 1859.

The Minutes of Conferences.—The Book Editor will be greatly obliged if the Secretaries of the Missouri, St. Louis, Kansas, Louisiana, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, East Texas, Onachita, and Holston Conferences, will forward as soon as possible the Minutes of their respective Conferences, as it is desirable to publish the General Minutes without delay. The Minutes of other Conferences have been received, only some of them have not the elders undorscored in the appointments: the editor will thank the Secretaries of the Louisville and Western Virginia Conferences for lists of the appointments with the elders italicized.

"Northern Kentucky" writes to suit us—short, pointed, earnest, elegant. Our readers will read the letters with interest. We vouch for it, he will give us no trash.

OUR CHINA MISSIONARIES IN NEW YORK.

The Christian Advocate and Journal says: One of the most interesting meetings we have attended for a long time was held in St. Paul's Church on Monday evening, the 5th instant. It was called for the purpose of taking leave of the Rev. Messrs. Wood and Allen, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, whose destination is Shanghai, China. They were accompanied by the Rev. Dr. Schon, missionary Secretary of the Church, South. The foreign missionaries of the two bodies keep clear of our domestic broils, and meet only as Methodists; the entertainment of our missionaries by those of the South, at Shanghai, was an example honorable to the missionary world. The venerable Dr. Bangs presided on the present occasion. The exercises were opened by an anthem, and prayer by Bishop Janes. After prayer Dr. Schon administered the ordinance of baptism, and the infant child of Mr. and Mrs. Allen was solemnly dedicated to God. The scene was quite impressive. Dr. Bangs then made some remarks appropriate to the occasion of the meeting. In alluding to the organization of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, he stated that there were only three persons living who participated in that organization—Joshua Soule, senior Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, Dr. Luhan Clarke, of the New York East Conference, and himself. He remarked that the first mission established by the Church was in New Orleans. The society met with opposition, and its early efforts secured but little sympathy. On the establishment of the Liberia mission the first favorable impulse was given to the society, and the interest of the Church was still further increased by the establishment of the mission in Oregon among the Flathead Indians. He rejoiced that he was permitted to see the day in which from these beginnings the work of God had spread over the earth, North, South, East and West.

After singing the 976th hymn Dr. Durbin addressed the meeting. He alluded to his interviews and labors with his brother secretary in other years in the West, and brought up many pleasant reminiscences of the past. He remarked that he could not see why the missionary platform might not be the platform of union for all denominations, but more especially for the great Methodist family throughout the world. Among the missionaries representing the different denominations in heathen lands there are, said he, no divisions, they are all one in spirit as they are one in faith and labor.

Doctor M'Clintock remarked that St. Paul's Church was granted cheerfully and joyfully for the occasion which had called them together, and that they met their brethren in cheerful welcome and would give them an affectionate farewell. He knew that all present had come with the kindest and most fraternal feelings. The theme of the missionary platform he regarded as one of the grandest that could be conceived of, as on that platform all who loved the Lord Jesus could stand in an undivided faith and undissembled love. He had met in Berlin a venerable minister who had been a missionary and had become acquainted with Methodism through the Wesleyan missionaries of India, and though, said the doctor, the German ministers are learned and pious, he found none who had so much catholicity of feeling as this missionary. Addressing the young missionaries before him, he said these young men will meet Robert Maclay, the sweet-spirited and talented missionary at Foh Chau, his beloved pupil of other years, who had himself met with the kindest reception from the missionaries of the Church, South.

The missionaries were then introduced separately by Dr. Schon to the audience, and in turn related their Christian experience and call to the ministry, and their impressions in relation to a special call to missionary work. They manifested a fine missionary spirit, and their remarks were well received.

Dr. Schon made the concluding address. He remarked that he rejoiced to meet his brethren on the common platform of Methodism. He conceived of nothing more ennobling and elevating to the Church than the union of the Missionary Society. In alluding to the address which had preceded, he remarked that the meeting had taken very happily the form of an experience meeting. The statements of the venerable president, Dr. Bangs, whom he had known and loved from his youth, and his allusions to that dear, venerated man of God, Bishop Soule, and the remarks of Dr. Durbin, with whom he had toiled side by side at the camp-meetings and missionary meetings in the distant west, and the learned and eloquent Dr. M'Clintock, and the presence of the venerable Francis Hall and others whom he recognized on the platform, all had inspired him with the most grateful and joyous emotions. As General Secretary of the American Bible Society for the West, years ago—an institution the most noble and godlike, dispensing its blessing everywhere—he had learned more fully to estimate the value of Christian unity, and he saw through these great benevolent catholic institutions of the Church the final glorious triumph of the Church of Jesus in all lands. The address was eloquent throughout, but our space compels us to abridge. The exercises were all unusually interesting.

TO OUR FRIENDS.

We wish to remind our brethren and friends, in the ministry and laity, in the Church and out of it, that now is the time to subscribe for the Advocate, and to get others to subscribe. We are happy to know that the paper receives general favor. We feel assured that we shall be able, with the blessing of God, to make it still more valuable and interesting during next year. We intend to make it the interest and pleasure of all classes to read the Advocate—Methodists, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Baptists, planters, farmers, merchants, lawyers, politicians, physicians, merchants, teachers, men, women and children.

The Missionary Committee of the Methodist Episcopal Church North, has just made the annual appropriations for missions. The total amount is $283,659, of which $104,159 is for Foreign Missions. The balance is for Home Missions, and for salaries of secretaries and incidental expenses. The cost of conducting the Missionary Department is about $15,000. This includes all incidental expenses.

Post Office Lists.—We very earnestly and urgently request of every preacher in the Conferences patronizing this paper, to send us, as soon as possible, a list of the Post Offices within the bounds of his charge. Let none fail to write because they are at well known stations. Clerks are not as familiar with these things as preachers, and they are rigidly guided by what is written, and not at all by memory.

Extra Paper.—Next week the first paper of the volume of the Advocate for 1860 will appear. We shall increase the edition for the benefit of those who may hereafter subscribe, and who may wish to commence with the year. We hope soon to hear from many such. Let all the extra papers be called for as soon as possible. We cannot keep them long. "First come first served."

Preachers' Papers.—The Advocate is sent gratis to the preachers of the patronizing Conferences, and to preachers of other Conferences who act as agents for it; to preachers of other Conferences who do not act as agents, it will be sent for $1 50 per annum.

Change of Post Office.—Our brethren in the ministry, in the several Conferences, who wish their papers changed from their last year's Post Office to a new one for the ensuing year, will please write to us, giving the name of both offices.

PASTORAL ADDRESS OF THE ALABAMA ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

Dearly Beloved Brethren: In the providence of God we are once more in conference assembled for council and work; and it seemeth good to us, ere we depart to occupy the different fields of labor which may be assigned us as your pastors, to speak to you, as with one voice, of such things as we deem of much importance to the whole flock "over whom the Holy Ghost hath made us overseers."

And here it may be well for us answer to a question which, if it never arose in your mind spontaneously, may have been thrust at you by some who do not love our Zion; namely, by what authority we claim to exercise with you and over you the Pastoral function? To this, with all gravity, and under a sense of our certain accountability to God for every word and work, we answer first: By virtue of your call, your election, and continued approval. For the time was when each one of us claimed no more than the blessings of a common salvation—that we had been quickened into life, and raised by the power of God, through faith, and thereby were sitting together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus with those who do show the exceeding riches of His grace. While thus rejoicing in the great deliverance wrought for us and in us, and while laboring in the common toils incident to those who have willingly entered the vineyard of the Lord, we felt a new fire start up in our hearts, and you saw, if not with your visual, at least by your spiritual perceptions, upon each of us "tongues of fire." And by your advice, or that of your fathers, by your counsels, prayers, and votes, you have thrust us out, and bid us to take part in this great Ministry.—Now, how far this is in keeping with the spirit and practice of the apostolic churches, we submit to your pious sense and judgment when you have read the words following, to wit: "Now there were in the church that was at Antioch certain prophets and teachers, as Barnabas, and Simeon that was called Niger, and Lucius of Cyrene, and Manaen which had been brought up with Herod the tetrach, and Saul. And as they ministered to the Lord and fasted, the Holy Ghost said, Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them. And when they had fasted and prayed, and laid their hands on them, they sent them away."—Acts xiii, 1, 2, 3.

Our second answer to those who would know our authority, is in the words of the Apostle Paul: "Not of man, neither by man, but by Jesus Christ and God the Father, who raised him from the dead."—Gal. i, 1. That is, we claim to be called and sent of God, and what is said above of your action and your voice in the premises, was but the putting forth of that function of every true evangelical church, "to try the spirits whether they be of God." If, therefore, in any or all of us there are the evidences that we have "grace"—the grace of salvation from outward and inward sin,—a clear perception of God's method of saving sinners through faith, and "a ready utterance" in making this known, together with fruit—the awakening and conversion of souls under our ministrations,—we are vindicated in the words of the Apostle once more: "Do we begin again to commend ourselves? or need we, as some others, epistles of commendation from you? Ye are our epistle, written in our hearts, known and read of all men. Forasmuch as ye are manifestly declared to be the epistle of Christ ministered by us, written not with ink, but with the spirit of the living God; not in tables of stone, but in the fleshly tables of the heart."

With this Divine call, we have gone forth to the preaching of the Gospel, under your approval and former votes, and continue to this day to hold our places in the general pastorate—the Church—from year to year, by your approval; not by formal votes expressed since we went from your societies and quarterly conferences, but by the votes of our peers, who diligently inquire concerning each one, in his order and by name, if he hath done his work well and acceptable among the people. We thus, by the voice of the Spirit and the bride—those who say to the thirsty world, Come to the waters of life—we are, by the same authority, shepherds, and care for and feed the flock, both old and young. We are watchmen, and from the walls of Zion warn the people when the sword cometh. We are overseers or superintendents of the work, and must see that the grand superstructure be fitly framed, built upon the true foundation, and of materials that will abide the day of His coming—gold, silver, precious stones; not wood, hay, and stubble. Who is sufficient for these things? Only those who have the treasure in earthen vessels, which treasure shows forth "the excellency of the power to be of God, and not of man."

This, dear brethren, is the Methodistic view of the Gospel Ministry, its call, and the source of its authority. Methodism is, in doctrine, well nigh a unit all over the world. It is, nevertheless, divided into several jurisdictions, such as the Wesleyan in Great Britain, the Methodist E. Church North and South in the United States. These jurisdictions are connectional and not congregational, and therefore never can, under the present constitution of the Church, be composed of numberless independencies called churches. These connectional jurisdictions are, however, for the convenience of all concerned, divided into Conferences, Districts, Circuits, Missions, and Stations, but these all make up a common field of labor, to be served in turn by a common pastorate, both alike under a general superintendency. This superintendency is exercised among us by men who are called Bishops. These are chosen, from time to time, from among the elders of the travelling preachers, and so chosen on account of their age, experience, wisdom, and piety. Their duties are chiefly to travel at large through the connection, preside in the annual conferences, and make the appointments of the preachers for the year ensuing. To do this effectively and justly to all parties, they must be well advised of the condition of every part and portion of the work, and also of the temporal condition and ministerial capability of each preacher. And, then, in the exercise of the episcopal function he should be untrammelled. This cannot be if the preachers, who have solemnly given their consent, in their admission into full connection in the Conference, and in their ordination vows, to be equals, nevertheless set up exclusive claims to the best places; nor can it be if particular circuits and stations assert their claim to choose their own preacher, and ask the bishop to sanction their choice. Such a course on the part of the preacher is highly selfish, and of course unkind to the mass of his laboring, suffering brethren, and argues the want of that grace which would live and let live." On the other hand, for particular pastoral charges to assume the right of choosing their pastor, is also highly selfish, an implied censure or contempt of all other pastors, and a dishonoring distrust of the bishop, of God's providence and promise to make even the seemingly "weak things of this world confound the mighty." The whole constitution, as well as the past history of the Church, are alike palpable and plain in their condemnation of such selfishness, as having shown in the end, when gratified, that it was not for the best to all parties interested. Hence, dear brethren, while we grant that in other communions it may be admissable for a congregation to choose its pastor, we beg you rest satisfied in the persuasion that bishops, with their constitutional advisers, men who know you, know the work and the preachers, and will, out of their number, fill your pulpits, from time to time, with such ministers as, by the blessing of God and your hearty co-operation, will do good and in general only good. From all this you will see that the perpetuation of Methodism and its efficient itinerant ministry, is mainly with you; for you will readily perceive that if any considerable number of pastoral charges, in any conference, do, in effect, choose their pastors, then the pastors may and must choose their fields of labor; then follows congregationalism, and the episcopacy and the itineracy must go down together.

The deadliest foe to the name and economy of the Methodist Episcopal Church could not devise or put in operation any plan so certain to work the destruction of the church as that above named. Therefore, dear brethren, be content to abide by that old proverb which exhorts us to "let well enough alone." Once more, before we leave this subject. Our past history shows that the preachers who have surrendered their right to choose place for themselves, have stipulated only for a general provisional remuneration, and this in words and figures which will not allow of a sum above a reasonable support. And, also, our history shows that our people, in asking the services of a minister, have not felt bound to promise anything more than such a support. But let us get away from this system of demand and supply, and then follows the temptation to offer and receive large money considerations; and rival places may bid and be overbid, until the gospel, in some men's mouths, may rise and fall like other things of barter and trade; all of which is in conflict with and an outrage upon the religion of Him "who was meek and lowly in heart."

Perhaps we ought to have said above, that there may be cases in which peculiar circumstances may, for a time, so narrow the field of the best itinerant as to make him seem to choose his place. And, likewise, circumstances may seem to impel the people of some localities to ask for the services of a particular minister. These exceptions to a wholesome general rule are never reprehensible, if they do not materially interfere with the appointing power and the good of the general work.

On the subject of ministerial support we have but few words to say, and these only to call your attention to a fact which you all know and feel, but perhaps all have not known and felt it in its application to us, as we do of necessity. The fact is this, namely: that almost everything that enters into and makes up a part of human support and comfort has, within the last ten years, advanced in price from one to two hundred per cent; so that eight hundred dollars was as good a support then as fifteen or eighteen hundred would be now. A word to the wise, and good ought to be sufficient!

And now, beloved brethren, having shown you that we are righteously "your servants for Jesus' sake," and not as triers of positions that belong not to us, but have, by your consent and the Divine call, become your spiritual advisers, suffer the word of exhortation. In our judgment no one lives well who does not live for heaven. And none can consistently claim to be living for heaven who does not live by rule or law. The great rule or law of action is found in the Bible—the whole Bible! This rule is susceptible of division and subdivision applicable to every condition and phase of human thought and action; and we dare affirm, no better epitomized transcript was ever made by human hands than Mr. Wesley's "General Rules" of the United Societies, which make, by the adoption of our fathers, an important part of the constitution of our church.

Christianity, by the attraction of affinity, appropriates to itself, by this powerful inherent law, all who have put on Christ, and who "make no provision for the flesh in its affections and lusts." Hence a union of all who are likeminded in every place. And the object and end of all such united societies is to help each other to work out their salvation. To do this there must be meeting together, there must be worship of Almighty God, there must be supervision and the word of exhortation. Hence the origin and the never-ending necessity of class-meetings.

These thus associated have the right, under God, to prescribe the condition on which they admit others into their brotherhood; and with us that only condition is, "a desire to flee the wrath to come and be saved from their sins." This desire, while it lives under the quickening, guiding power of the Holy Ghost, will show itself itself, in three particulars, to wit:

First. In a harmless and sin-renouncing life.

Secondly. In a charitable or good-doing life.

Thirdly. In an obedient or cross-bearing life.

Hence, a man who desires to flee the wrath to come and be saved from his sins, cannot, ought not to continue in the Methodist Church, who is profane, a drunkard, or even a tippler of drams, a brawler, a mischief-maker, a worldly-minded overreacher, a cheat, a self-indulgent, extravagant and vain pleasure seeker. If this is not sufficiently intelligible as to our meaning, we beg you read the "General Rules," and then search the Scriptures, and see whether these things be so. And then, brethren, having fought your way through, against the powers of darkness, to the point at which you can and do reasonce sin, then opening your eyes to the condition of the souls and bodies of men, can a real christian and a true member of the church be "at ease in Zion?" What! an idler in the vineyard of the Lord! a drone in the great store-house of sweetness and perfume! If there be truth in God's word, the Judge will say in the day of reckoning, "Take the talent from him, and give it to him who hath ten talents." "Work while it is day, for the night cometh when no man can work," and "what thy hand findeth to do, do with all thy might." Never allow thy anxious, Cain-like soul to ask, "Am I my brother's keeper?"

What shall we say to those who fail to attend public worship, neglect family religion, private devotion, and the solemn ordinances of the church—Baptism and the Lord's Supper? Sin, in difference, or neglect of the plainest duties of the religious life, is, one or all of them, so incompatible with an earnest "desire to be saved," that, after suitable forbearance and admonition, all such ought to be excluded from the church.

And this brings us to another important matter about which we desire to speak plainly but affectionately, and in the fear of God. We mean the Administration of Discipline. All men of common intelligence, especially all who admit the authority of the Bible, readily allow that all associate bodies ought to have the right to rid themselves of unworthy members. This supposes the existence of a rule or rules by which to determine unworthiness, and also, jurisdiction competent to apply these rules to individual cases. In both these respects our church is amply provided, and yet we are much embarrassed in the matter of administration. This embarrassment arises first in connection as pastors, lest, in the performance of a duty for Christ and the purity of His kingdom, we suffer persecution. And secondly from the timidity and tenderness with which the membership shrink from this duty. Thus, often between the two, the vineyard is neither pruned nor digged; in consequence of which we have worthless grapes in excess, as the result of the vintage. The proper and only remedy for all this, is for all concerned, especially for the older members of the societies to stand firmly by every faithful pastor and defend him from the malice of fallen members, and the malevolent hate of those "who are without." Many pious, humble parents, who in all things walk uprightly themselves, are unable, from the fondness of a creature's love, to see that their sons and daughters are "lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God;" hence any attempt on the part of the pastor or the spiritual members of the church to rebuke the evil and put it away, is so repugnant to such unwise parents, that, in deference to them, the evil with all its influence, is endured, and the offender not cut off. When this state of things prevails, we have reason to cry "Men of God! come to the help of the Lord against the mighty!" All parties must amend or the glory will soon depart from us as a people. For what need is there that we preach "Holiness," or publish volumes on "Christian Perfection," if we cannot enforce a practical Godliness! By "practical Godliness" we mean humble piety before God—such as searching the Scriptures, secret prayer, daily family worship, and conscientious attendance on all the means of grace, the ministry of the word, and the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. A neglect of any of these is highly culpable, and persevered in, merits in most instances expulsion. Simply from the fact that it shows such a deadness to God, and indifference to the soul's salvation as to be positive proof that such persons are not more deeply convinced of sin, are not more desirous "to flee the wrath to come, and to be saved from their sins," are not now led by the Spirit of the Saviour; "and if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his."

The rest of the Sabbath is of perpetual obligation; but how many Christian families "remember" the day "to keep it holy" that anticipate and prepare for it? No man prepares to keep the Sabbath holy, who simply abstains from his regular week-day labor. He who allows himself, his children or his servants to gather and cut wood, hunt or drive stock, go to market so as to return home on Sabbath, and to go upon pleasure visits on the Lord's day, does not remember to keep it holy, and thus sins against God. In these days of extravagance and worldly-mindedness, Christians should always observe the Sabbath, both in the fear of God and the love of souls. Who can estimate the magnitude or measure the extent of that evil which originates from the example of church members who do not keep God's holy day aright? Let us then, dear brethren, in this respect, "shun the very appearance of evil."

There are many particulars which we would like to present for your consideration, but neither time nor space will allow. We must, however, remind you that, if we read the signs of the times aright, the harvest of the world is ripe. Many great and effectual doors are open to us, into which the Spirit bids us "go and preach the Gospel." To do this we need men, and the means to feed them. The Lord of the harvest will call and send forth more laborers in answer to the prayers of an earnest spiritual church. Any lack of laborers is proof of backsliding in the churches, and ought to be the occasion of humiliation, prayer, and amendment. But a calling and thrusting out of laborers is not enough. These must be fed and clothed while they cultivate Immanuel's lands; and this is done, not by miracle, but by Christian benevolence. The Gospel cannot be preached in "the regions beyond" without money; and if a missionary has it not of his own, some of the Lord's stewards have, and if they withhold the needful supply, we submit

EDITORIAL NOTICES.

ADVERTISING IN THE ADVOCATE.

The business public are slowly learning that the Advocate is the GREAT ADVERTISING PAPER OF THE SOUTH AND WEST. Advertisements in it are more valuable than in any half dozen other papers.

1.—It has the largest circulation west of Charleston, and South of Cincinnati; larger than any other two weeklies in New Orleans, and is increasing rapidly—will, in a few years, double its present circulation.

2.—Of medium size, and not crowded with advertisements, an advertisement is not lost in it, but can be easily found.

3.—In our "Editorial Notices," which we give to every advertisement, we specify the page and column on which an advertisement may be found. We seek to make every advertisement valuable to the advertiser and to the paper.

4.—The circulation is spread out over Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, principally; Georgia, Florida, Tennessee, Kentucky, Arkansas, partially.

5.—It is the only weekly of large and widely spread circulation in the great and growing metropolis of the South.

KENNER ACADAMY.—On this page, fifth column, will be found the advertisement of this institution. It is only a little more than a half hour's run from the city by railroad. It is a delightful place, with a beautiful view of the Mississippi river, and is handsomely adorned with private residences. For a village residence, with the advantages of being convenient to the city, on the railroad, and on the banks of the Mississippi, we do not know its superior. Game of all the most approved kinds, is near at hand, in every direction.

Of the school, we feel warranted in saying that, short of the highest collegiate course, nothing better is to be found in the country. For thoroughness in classical and scientific culture, and for facilities for acquiring the modern languages, it is a school of the first order.

EAST ALABAMA MALE COLLEGE.—In the sixth column of this page will be found the new advertisement of this institution, which opened its first session in October last. It is believed they will soon have one hundred students in the college proper, besides a large number in the preparatory department. The prosperity of this new college is truly gratifying.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.—The January number is advertised in the sixth column of this page. The table of contents will show that this number will fully satisfy the numerous readers of this great American Magazine.

RHEUMATISM AND GOUT.—Our old friend, I. P. DuBose, of Moldie, adverises, on this page, fifth column, the Anti-Afibritic Wine as the most effectual cure for the above diseases. Try it. It is for sale at Wright's.

SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE.

The Seventy-second Session—Character and Number of young men received—The dead—Conference Love-feast—The Lord's Supper—Statistics, etc.

MR. EDITOR:—The statistics of our Conference present a most gratifying increase in every department. Eighteen young men were admitted on trial. A liner-looking set of men has never entered our body. Several of them were graduates of Wofford College, and but for moneyed embarrassments, entailed by the struggle for an education, several others would have been admitted. Two were re-admitted. During the year there has been an increase of twenty-three local preachers. There was an increase of one thousand one hundred and ninety whites in full connection, and nine on probation, and an increase of fifteen hundred and twenty-seven colored in full membership, and three hundred and sixteen on probation, making a total increase of three thousand and forty-two.

Three preachers died during the year. James L. Hella, one of our oldest members, and who from age and infirmities had been on the superannuated list for years. He bears the honorable distinction of having led the way in preaching to the blacks in South Carolina. This he did in 1819, by preaching on the Springfield and Brook-Green plantations of Messrs. Robert Wellburs and Major Ward. He showed his devotion to this holy cause by spending his strength and worldly substance in its promotion; and when his will was opened, it was found that he had bequeathed nearly his entire estate to the same hallowed interest. He was killed by being thrown from his buggy.

William J. Jackson was another of our aged and infirm ministers, and had been for a long time on the list of superannuated preachers. His memoir says, "Just before his spirit fled, the announcement of his triumph was, 'Glory to God, I am going to heaven!'"

Joshua T. DuBose, the third who has fallen, was quite a young man. Early after receiving his appointment for the year, he was attacked by a throat and lung disease, which soon bore him away. His message by a brother minister who closed his eyes in death was, "Tell all the brethren of the Conference that I preached as long as I could, and now that I can preach no longer, I die at my work. My Savior is an all-sufficient savior."

An impressive event occurred during the session. John W. Cooke, a young man who had renounced the practice of law to enter the ministry, was taken sick the afternoon on which he reached Greenville. He grew worse rapidly. Sunday morning, being the love-feast, and while the ministers were talking in raptures of the love of God in their souls, a message came from him that he was dying, and that he begged our prayers that he might endure his sufferings patiently, am have a safe transit to the eternal shore; and while the congregation united in solemn prayer in his behalf, his sanctified spirit took its flight from earth.

A remarkable spirituality prevaded the entire session. Our venerable Bishop (Early) seemed to have renewed his youth. The daily prayer-meetings in the Conference-room, at half-past eight in the morning, were attended by crowds, and were marked by great unction and power. On Sunday morning the love-feast was in occasion of gracious refreshing. The power of the Holy Ghost descended upon the preachers and the people; several professed conversion, and one, an elderly man and the head of a large family, joined the Church.

The sacramental occasion on Monday night witnessed a renewal of the Divine presence and blessing, and several were added to the Church: and I am sure none who witnessed the closing scene of the session—the tears of rejoicing, and the prayers of power and faith after the appointments were announced—will ever forget it.

Thus passed the seventy-second session of the South Carolina Conference. God grant that its annual conventions may ever thus be seasons of grace and comfort and Divine power!

We raised for missions the past year $27,105 58, and for Sunday-school purposes $2770 93.—Nashville Christian Advocate.

METHODISTS AND METHODIST PROTESTANTS.

The document below speaks for itself. It was unanimously adopted by the Alabama Conference. Rev. C. D. Oliver was elected the "messenger," as required by the resolution. Similar action was had at the Virginia Conference, and cordially responded to by the Methodist Protestant Conference of that State. The two churches ought to be re-united, and should, mutually, make all the concessions they consistently can to accomplish it.

The fellowship of the saints of all Evangelical Churches is a matter devoutly to be wished for, because it is not only taught in the word of God, but consonant with the Spirit of Christianity, and important to the promotion of Christ's cause throughout the earth. While as a Church we cherish a fraternal regard for all our sister churches, which are endeavoring to spread Scriptural holiness over these lands, yet it is natural for us to feel a more tender affection for that branch of the general Church which is known as the Methodist Protestant Church, and to desire to effect a close Christian intercourse and brotherly communion, such as shall be alike honorable to themselves and to us. We rejoice to know that the causes of strife and mutual distrust are fast disappearing from each church, and that the ministry and members of each are becoming more harmonious in their spirit, and pleasant in their intercourse. One of the leading ministers of that church in Virginia expresses himself in the following language:

"Fraternal intercourse between God's people of all denominations, is not only pleasant and desirable, but the teachings of the Bible justify the conclusion that it is also a Christian duty. Having the same views of Bible truth with our Methodist Episcopal brothers, living in the enjoyment of the same means of grace, and claiming a common right to all that is glorious in its first history, it seems especially desirable that the relation between that church and our own should be fraternal and effectionate. The indications appear to be such as to justify the hope, that the time for the establishment of this intercourse is near, if it is not already come."

We do not ask of them a concession of rights or a compromise of principle, but we seek to encourage an inter-communion which shall be mutually advantageous, for the enlarging and strengthening of our common Methodism. Allied as we are in origin, history, church order and economy, and above all, in the doctrines of the Gospel, may we not willingly take the initiative in laying down the basis for a closer Christian union between our churches?

And with a view to this,

Resolved, That this body appoint one of its members as a messenger to attend the next annual Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church of Alabama, to bear to the brethren of said Conference, and through them to that Church, our kindest Christian regards and brotherly congratulations.

C. D. OLIVER,
A. G. MCCARTY.

For the New Orleans Christian Advocate

DR. J. B. COUSINS.

I see in the Advocate of the 23d ult., the obituary of Dr. J. B. Cousins, of Chocktaw county, Alabama. And as his conversion is a proof of the saving power of the holy scriptures, read without note or comment, by your permission, I will give it to your readers, in substance as I received it from him two years since, while I was his pastor.

When a young man, he shipped as a passenger (I believe to South America,) on board a vessel commanded by a Christian Captain. The voyage was long. After reading all the books he had carried with him, he went to the Captain's library in quest of something to help to kill time. But finding it made up of religious books, he was ready to turn away, when he resolved to give the Bible a critical reading, and decide for himself upon its claims to Divinity. He had not read long before the Holy Spirit sealed the truth to his heart. He believed the book divine—felt its divinity. He saw himself a sinner—felt his sins and bowed his soul in prayer.

He walked the ship's deck by night, and gazed upon the bright worlds the reflectors of the glory of God, and felt that the hand that made them was lifted in anger to fall on his guilty soul.

When he listened to the anthem of nature, as it came up from the ever-singing waters, he felt himself in the presence at an offended God. It was there the cry came from the depth of his soul for freedom from sin, and a refuge from the gathering wrath of God. There was no minister near to lead him to Christ, he was alone with his offended God—yet not alone; that book that taught him that he was a sinner, and the Holy Spirit who enabled him to feel his sins, were with him.

With the thunders from Sinai reverberating in his ears, he again turned to his instructor, the Bible. He felt it was true, and by its truth he was condemned. He began the effort to retrace his steps. He was alone: paralled by the world surrounded by "old ocean's melancholly wall," struggling with the powers of darkness for immortality. That book that showed him his sins, pointed him to the Saviour. To Jesus he went with a broken and contrite heart, and the words of truth set him free. From that time till the time of his decease, he loved the Bible as the instrument in the hands of God in securing his salvation. He is now at rest.—His obituary has been published.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, December 26, 1859.

We condense the following statement from the New Orleans Price Current of the 24th instant:—

The past week has not been a period of very general activity, the movement in our leading staple, Cotton, having been seriously obstructed by the operation of the "buyers Resolutions," recently adopted and subscribed to by a number of buyers, and which were to take effect on Monday, the 19th inst. Advices from the West, also, of freezing rivers, has had some effect on the demand for Sugar, and prices have given way under increased receipts. The same has been the case with Molasses, while the various articles of Western Produce, though in moderate demand, have acquired more firmness, in view of a probable interruption of supplies. In Tobacco there is still no movement of consequence, though occasional limited lots are taken mostly on private terms.

COTTON.—With respect to prices, we have to remark that a good deal of irregularity has prevailed during the greater part of the week; and within the past few days a decline of an ¼ to ½ cent has been established, the greatest reductions being in the lower grades. Under all the circumstances, the market may be considered to have been remarkably well sustained, factors having to contend against large receipts, adverse European advices, advancing freights, declining exchanges and "Buyers' Resolutions."

The receipts at this port since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas,) are 929,896 bales, against 760,428 bales to same date last year, and the increase in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 253,238 bales.

TO THE READERS OF THE ADVOCATE.

DR. MORTIMORE, of Louisville, Ky., has made arrangements to spend the winter in New Orleans, and has taken rooms at No. 9 Camp street, opposite the City Hotel.

DR. M. gives his sole attention to the treatment of Rheumatism in all its various forms; also Sciatica, Neuralgia, Paralysis, Disease of the Kidney and Spine, Dyspepsia (Indigestion), General Debility, and Nervous affections.

Probably no other physician of the present day has had such unbounded success in the treatment of the above complaints. He has, by personal treatment and the use of his remedies, furnished by him through the agency of physicians and druggists, cured over twenty thousand cases of Rheumatism alone; many of these had visited the various springs, both in this country and Europe, and had been treated and given up as hopeless, incurable cripples; yet, after all others failed, he has restored the use of their limbs and perfect health.

Dr. M. prepares his own remedies, united to each case, on examination of patients; when inconvenient to visit him, they can write to him, giving history and description of their affliction. He will return answer with his terms of treatment, &c.

REV. W. P. BARTON.—NARROW ESCAPE.

Goodrich's Landing, La., Dec. 14, '59.

Dear Brethren: On the 13th instant, after much stir, I got my family (wife and three children, six, four and two years old) on board the Daniel Bloss. We embarked, with our all of baggage, books, and household furniture, for our appointment—Greenville, Miss. After we left Vicksburg, I had such feelings (little or I am addicted to superstition) as I never experienced before. In twenty years I have never felt an anxious thought in traveling on steamboats till I started on this trip. I felt so when I embraced my little ones before they retired, I would fall on my knees and return thanks to God if my little family reached Greenville in safety. It was a premonition of what awaited us. At 11 o'clock, p.m., as the boat was trying to effect a landing at this place, she swung against a stump twenty yards above the wharf, went through her rotten old hull without the least hesitancy she began to sink. I aroused my wife, and hurried her out without a moment to dress herself. I handed the two eldest children, one under each of my arms, and left my wife to bring the babe; intending we should all share the same fate; poor little things, how they were affrighted at being snatched from their midnight slumbers, in the midst of confusion—windows crashing, furniture tumbling, affrighted women and children screaming, and men running every way. Our calamity reached the climax when, mid-way the gents' cabin, the boat careened so fast, my wife fell with the babe. That was the trying moment. To share the same fate, be it what it might, was my only fond purpose. What now? The two oldest children must take their feet, and I must help wife and babe off the floor. Just in this trying moment, as I put my screaming children on the floor, Brother E. F. Mullins, as an angel of God, came to my kid's while he assisted my wife, I tried to comfort my little Emily (six years old) by telling her our Heavenly Father could save us in our danger. Her child-like faith was in exercise, and while we waited a moment for a chance to get into the yawl, she fell on her knees and cried with importunity, "Oh, my Heavenly Father, save me! Oh, my Heavenly Father, save!! The mate snatched her up and handed her into the yawl, and she was saved; and all were saved, except some deck passengers, and possibly a few who jumped over in their affright. That was no doubt the only earnest prayer from a kneeling body, and earnest trusting heart, offered by any one of the hundreds on that sinking craft. Who will say that prayer did not avail with God? Who can say how much was effected by it? Thank God our children learn to pray. After I got my wife, and, as some said, all my children on shore, I had such fear that one of the little flock remained, that I got brother Mullins to go out and see if all were on shore, while I continued my search on the boat. I soon found my little Amelia in the arms of a noble hearted watchman named Waller, who had her on deck, well wrapped in a quilt, sitting on the deck, waiting the next chance to see her safely in her mother's arms. Noble man! said he, "I will see her safe, or die in the attempt." Noble spirit, may God ever be a friend to him in his need! After the passengers were safe, the hands went to work to save all the baggage etc. on the boiler deck; most of the baggage was saved, but in a damaged condition; my own was much damaged. My great loss, my almost irreparable loss, is my library, which now lies 10 feet under water; all my goods are a total loss, hundreds of dollars would not repair me loss; but thank God I feel to shed tears of gratitude we are all alive. I write on the top of a box, on the river bank, waiting another boat to take us to Greenville.

Ever and truly,

W. P. BARTON.

Poetry.

THE TWO WORLDS.

Two worlds there are. To one our eyes we strain—
Whose magic joys we shall not see again:
Bright haze of morning veils its glimmering shore.
Ah! truly breathed we there
Intoxicating air—
Glad were our hearts in that sweet realm of Nevermore.

The lover there drank her delicious breath
Whose love has yielded since to change or death:
The mother kissed her child whose days are o'er.
Alas! too soon have fled
The irreclaimable dead:
We see them—visions strange—and the Nevermore.

The merry song some maiden used to sing—
The brown brown hair that once was wont to cling
To temples long clay-cold: to the very core
They strike our weary hearts,
As some vexed memory starts,
From that long-faded land—the realm of Nevermore.

It is perpetual summer there. But here
Sadly we may remember rivers clear,
And parabella quivering on the meadow-floor:
For brighter is
For tenderer hearts and truer
People that happy land—the realm of Nevermore.

Upon the frontier of this shadowy land
We, pilgrims of eternal sorrow, stand:
What realm lies forward, with its happier store
Of forests green and deep,
Of valleys hushed in sleep,
And lakes most peaceful? 'Tis the land of Evermore.

Very far off its marble cities seem—
Very far off—beyond our sensual dream—
Its woods, unrefined by the wild wind's roar:
Yet does the turbulent surge
Howl on its very verge.
One moment—and we breathe within the Evermore.

They whom we loved and lost so long ago
Dwell in those cities far from mortal woe—
Haunt those fresh woodlands, whence sweet carolings soar.
Eternal peace have they:
God wipes their tears away:
They drink that river of life which flows for Evermore.

Thither we hasten through these regions dim,
But lo! the wide wings of the seraphim
Shine in the sunset. On that joyous shore
Our lightened hearts shall know
The life of long ago:
The sorrow-burdened passed shall fade for Evermore.

Children's Column.

COUSIN JONATHAN.

BY CORA LYNN.

Before a bright fire, in a handsomely furnished drawing-room, two persons stood one evening—a young and very lovely girl, with a merry glance and smile; she was dressed in something soft and white, that floated round her like a mist; and in her sun-brown hair nestled a half-blown rose.

Her companion was a man, past the prime of young manhood; and, perhaps, the first impression his appearance gave was that of awkwardness only. Short and ungracefully, yet powerfully made, with features far from regular, it would be difficult to describe him as other than a plain man, some five-and-forty years of age. Yet he had one charm—a voice of wonderful richness and depth; soft and gentle too, then speaking to his fair companion.

"I hope you will enjoy it as much as you expect, Alice."

"I hope I shall; but, cousin, why are you not going with us?"

"You will not miss me, and I have letters to write this evening; besides, what should an old fellow like me do at a ball?"

Alice turned round and gave me a very saucy little look out of her brown eyes.

"What a silly thing you are, Cousin Jonathan!"

At that moment, a tall, hearty-looking old gentleman entered the room, evidently enjoying some joke, much to his own satisfaction. He carried a parcel in his hand.

"See, Miss Alice, here's a queer sort of a thing come for you; can you imagine what it is? I'm sure I can't."

She unfolded the silver paper, and brought to light an exquisite bouquet of hot-house flowers.

"Oh! how lovely! how very lovely! But who can have sent them!"

She glanced at her cousin as she spoke, laughing.

"Not Jonathan, I'm sure," said her father; "he's old enough to have more sense."

"Did you send them?" persisted Alice, moving nearer to him, and her voice faltering a little.

"I no; is it likely? See, here is a card in the paper."

She took it up and read aloud; "With Capt. Ray's compliments."

"Very polite—very proper—very kind," said her father, rubbing his hands—"very much so indeed."

Cousin Jonathan had moved away.

Mr. Braybrook took his daughter's hand, and turning her deliberately round, examined her with great apparent satisfaction.

"Not bad, not bad, it Jonathan?" said he, appealing to their quiet companion.

That gentleman was reading a letter, and looking up for a moment, replied: "Certainly not, sir."

He bent over the paper again but any one near might have seen it tremble in his hand.

Alice grew very rosy, and drew up her slender figure to its full height.

"Pray, papa, don't ask Mr. Waring to admire poor me, you disturb him from his letter; and, besides—I'm sure it does not—I don't——"

"My opinion can be of no value, I know," said the cousin, with another glance from his occupation.

"Never mind him, Puss," added Mr. Braybrook, as he thought he saw Alice's lip quiver, "these old bachelors always are cross and ill-tempered."

"The carriage is at the door," cried the footman entering very opportunely.

Mr. Braybrook left the room, and Alice's maid came in with a warm cloak of white and cherry colored silk.

"Good-night," said the little lady. Then this charming affair was properly put on, and a black lace veil was thrown over her head.

Mr. Waring looked up. She stood beside him, holding out a tiny white-gloved hand. He took it, saying: "Good-night; I hope your 'first ball' will be a merry one, Alice."

The hand lingered in his.

"If you were only coming, Cousin Jonathan——"

He interrupted her quickly, almost harshly.

"But I'm not, so good-night."

"My dear little cousin, will you take a word of advice from one who really has your good at heart?"

She neither spoke, nor yet withdrew her hand.

"You have no mother to watch over you, dear Alice, and are placed in what I know must be a very, very trying position. I am sure you always wish to do right; but it is very hard to escape from the unkind remarks of the world. You are very young, very lovely; many envy you—many censure you——"

He paused a moment, and Alice hid her face upon the arm of the sofa.

"Do you think me presuming, dear Alice, in speaking thus: we are old friends—we shall always be friends, shall we not?"

Her fingers closed on his.

"Remember that you have much to answer for, many responsibilities. Above all take care that you do not make others unhappy, or trifle with affection, which, if true, is more priceless than all the wealth of the world! You know what I mean, Alice?"

"Yes."

"Do not raise hopes unless you mean to fulfill them!"

She was sobbing in a low, subdued manner, that went to his heart.

"You are not angry with me, Alice?"

Angry with him! If he could only read her heart!

"We old bachelors are privileged persons, you know—nay, you must not sob in this way. I only wanted to give you a word of caution before I go!"

"Go!" cried Alice, springing to her feet—Oh! are you going to leave me?"

He was not prepared for this. He hardly dared trust himself to look upon her as she stood there with clasped hands and quivering lips.

"Yes, I am going back to Lescombe; I have been here too long!" he added, half to himself—but she heard the words.

"Too long! Then you have been dull, lonely with us—and now you are going! Oh! what shall I—what shall we do without you?"

"Nay, Alice, you will not miss me; it is not as though I were a young man, and could be more companionable to you; besides my people at Lescombe want me; and—but Alice, Alice, do not cry, I cannot bear it, 'dear child——'"

That word recalled her to herself. It was better to hear it, though, from him. Yes, he thought of her as a child; and she, she had dared to love him, not as a child loves, but as a woman; and he poured out her unlove years in the river, and perhaps she knew that it was so—perhaps he scorned her for it.

She dashed the tear-drops from her eyes, struggled to stay the sobs that nearly choked her, and sat down by his side.

"Tell me about Lescombe."

Lescombe was his home—the manor-house of a country village. He told her of his tenantry, how poor some of them were; of the efforts he had made, and was making, to improve their condition; of the schools he had built, and the new parsonage than in progress; of how he visited among them, and tried to win their confidence and love; and, as he spoke so earnestly and truthfully of all this, his homely face to her seemed beautiful, with a higher beauty than that of mere form, and she felt, as she had often felt before, that to be his wife would be the happiest lot on earth, and one of which she was unworthy.

Mr. Waring was in reality but a distant connection of her father's; but Alice had known him since she was a little child, and the name of "Cousin Jonathan," given to him then, had been retained in after-years. She had always looked upon him as her friend, but unconsciously had learnt at last to love him as a woman loves but once. The very fact of his being so many years older than herself, had, for a time, blinded her as to the real nature of her feelings; but when she met that love from others, which from him she would have given all the world to possess, she knew how it was, and bitter, very bitter, were the pangs of wounded pride and hopeless love in her young heart.

"When do you leave us?" asked Alice as she rose to quit the room.

"To-morrow," he replied, without looking at her.

That night they had no engagement. Alice made tea for them in the drawing-room.

"My darling, are you not well?" said Mr. Braybrook, taking her hand in his.

Mr. Waring looked earnestly at her for a moment. A bright crimsoned spot burnt on each cheek, but there was a livid circle round her eyes, and her lips were almost colorless. A strange thought came over him—it thought that made his pulse bound wildly and his hand tremble.

Could it be so? He tried to put the thought from him. He dared not dwell upon it.

The footman entered: "Captain Ray is in the library."

"Why did you not show him in here?" asked old Braybrook sharply.

"He asked to see you alone, sir."

Alice had risen and walked to the fire place, where she stood holding the mantle shelf with both hands; but Mr. Warlog had caught a glimpse of her face as she passed—it was deadly pale. Her father left the room.

There was a dead silence.

"She knew of this, hence her agitation," thought Mr. Waring, as he covered his eyes with his hand, to shut out the sight of her from before him.

The silence continued unbroken, and he felt his self-control deserting him.

"Alice, I shall go to my room—I have letters to see to—and, I might be in the way."

She turned to him—such a mute expression of anguish on her face that he uttered an exclamation of horror and surprise. She stretched out her hand to him, as though in wild entreaty. He sprang to her side, clasping hands like death, so cold, so lifeless.

"Alice, darling, do not look in that way; all will be well; you will be happy—you must be. God bless you and him!"

He hurried from her presence, feeling unable to bear it even one moment longer.

* * * * * * * *

The morning came—the morning fraught with fearful interest to Alice Braybrook—the day that must part her from Mr. Waring, and decide the fate of Captain Ray, for Alice had petitioned time to think. She came down to the breakfast-room looking like a living statue, so calm, so pale. Mr. Braybrook was not yet down, but a figure stood in the deep bay window.

"Good morning, Cousin Jonathan."

He started, and turned at her voice.

"I have a beautiful morning for my journey."

"Very. What time do you go?"

"In an hour."

"Then I must give you your breakfast."

"You shall; but first I have a word to say to you. Nay, Alice, do not look afraid, it is no lecture this time—only to tell you how deeply, how fervently I pray that the lot in life you have chosen may be a happy one."

He had meant to be very calm, but his voice faltered, and, unknowingly, he almost crushed her delicate hands, as he held them in his own. She raised her calm sad eyes to his face.

"And you care this much about me, Cousin Jonathan?"

"Care, Alice!"

"I did not think you cared so much; I am very, very glad."

She spoke so low, it was almost a whisper; but suddenly clasping her hands, and holding one of his to her heart, she went on to speak vehemently, passionately; all her assumed calmness gone.

"I know that to you, so noble, so true, so good, I seem but as a weak and erring child; but do not think—oh! never think that all your kindness can be by me forgotten; or that my heart is not full of gratitude for every gentle word you ever spoke; and more than all, for telling me when I was wrong, which no one else has ever done."

She would have spoken more, but something in his face arrested her. His voice sounded hoarse and unnatural.

"Alice, hush! you know not what you do."

A change came over her. She dropped his hand, and with both her own pressed tightly down upon her breast, as though to stay its beating, stood gazing upon him with wondering eyes and parted lips, from which all shade of color had faded.

He pressed his hand across his forehead, and turned from her.

"Alice, leave me! in mercy leave me!"

But she stood as though rooted to the ground.

"Would to God I loved her less!" burst from him like a groan.

She heard it, and her lips moved, her arms were stretched out to him; one uncertain step forward, and she fell senseless at his feet.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.

TWO YEARS SINCE, THE UNDERSIGNED OPENED HIS OFFICE at No. 33 Camp-street, for the sale of these Machines, which, at that time, were but little known in this city, and the result is truly astonishing. both as to the number sold and the unexampled success of the Machine, in nearly every instance. For over $175,000 worth of these Machines sold by the undersigned, not one letter of complaint was received during the past summer, and the repairs on these do not amount to ten dollars, although some of them have been used five years. Their sale at this time in this city is five times greater than it has been heretofore at this season of the year.

Probably more than $100,000 have already been paid in this city for Sewing Machines that were either entirely worthless, or which have cost the users the trouble and expense to keep them running that they were worth. The universal success of Singer's Machine has brought conviction to the minds of the public that it is far cheaper to buy a good article at a fair price than to listen to the thousand and one tales of men who deal in Sewing Machines that are MADE TO SELL AND NOT TO USE, and who, as soon as one humbug is proved up, bring on another.

It is universally known that Singer's Sewing Machines make the most approved stitch that human ingenuity has ever invented, and there is no longer room for cavil, as nine-tenths of the clothing and shoes sold in this city are made on these machines.

Our competitors in the Sewing Machine trade generally acknowledge that Singer's Machines are superior for manufacturing purposes, but say they are not adapted to fine sewing. This, however, is a mere pretense, and the undersigned challenges the world to produce a Sewing Machine equal to Singer's 12 inch Manufacturing Machine for fine sewing; or to produce samples of work equal to those done at 33 Camp street on that Machine, which also sews leather with equal facility with any kind of thread or silk.

Singer's Manufacturing Machines, when adjusted by the undersigned, with recent great improvements, will sew with a fine needle at full speed through from twenty to thirty thicknesses of Lowell cotton, with thread No 150 or 200, without breaking it, making a perfect stitch, the same on both sides of the fabric.

Many persons who have known and even used Singer's Machines for years in New York are astonished to find that the Manufacturing Machines here are superior for fine work, to that shown above the room at 33 Camp street, where every machine is particularly adjusted for the sewing, the mystery is solved.

All persons who have any doubts of the capacity of Singer's Machines for fine work, can have them removed by sending materials for a garment of any kind to 33 Camp street to be made.

Any person who will carefully compare the sewing done at 33 Camp street, with that sold by S. N. Moody, at 100 Canal street, will be at a loss to account for his certificate.

The public will please bear in mind that Singer's Machines are sold upon a trial if desired, with any and all other machines, and of the trials that have been made to this city, in nineteen cases out of twenty they have been kept and the others returned.

The largest and most fashionable Dress-Making establishments in this city use Singer's Machines, and several have bought them the past week, some of whom formerly used Wheeler & Wilson's Machines.

It is not contended that Singer's is the only good Sewing machine, as many who use Wheeler & Wilson's and Grover & Baker's Machines are pleased with them, but a general success like that of Singer's Machines cannot be shown, nor has it been attempted.

I M SINGER & CO., having established the reputation of their Machines above all others at points of the civilized world, and having gained the first Premium at the World's Fair in Paris, and also at the Sales of all the principal Manufacturers in the United States, have very wisely resolved not to contend at fairs for premiums, as it has been proved that committees, interested directly or indirectly have frequently awarded the first premium to worthless Sewing Machines when in competition with the best. The undersigned offers One Hundred Dollars Reward for proof that I. M. SINGER & CO. have, for the reason stated, contended, or authorized an agent to contend, for a premium in the last two years. A few of Singer & Co.'s agents have entered their machines without their knowledge, and have generally been successful.

The First Premium, a Gold Medal,

Was awarded this fall to SINGER'S MACHINES at the State Fair in New Jersey; also at the late Fair in Memphis, Tenn; also a few days since, the FIRST PREMIUM was awarded to SINGER'S MACHINE by the State Agricultural Society of Virginia, at Richmond, over seven competitors, among which were Wheeler & Wilson and Grover & Baker.

Singer's Machines were not represented at the late Fair at the American Institute in New York, or at the New York State Fair, neither did their Agent at St. Louis contend for the Premium this fall.

HUNTSVILLE FEMALE COLLEGE, HUNTSVILLE, North Alabama.

REV. A. R. ERWIN, D. D., Principal.

This Establishment offers the following inducements to Southern patronage.

1. Huntsville is the nearest mountain location to the South and Southwest; and is proverbially healthful. The social elegance and beautiful scenery to be found here, are great auxiliaries in the formation of character.

2. The edifice is large and elegant—supplied with gas-light; and water in the greatest abundance by pipes, from a mammoth Spring in the town. It is 164 by 52 feet, three stories high, and well furnished.

3. The domestic arrangements are such as to secure not only comfort, but the social and domestic training of the pupils. Frugality, politeness and grace, as well as the virtues of the heart, are habitually cultivated.

4. The facilities of instruction are unsurpassed. There are fifteen teachers and attaches, some of whom are distinguished educators. The large patronage, from among the best families of nine of the Southern States, attest the good-will of the Institution.

5. Arrangements are made to accommodate Southern pupils during the summer Vacation, and to furnish them with such instruction in the extra branches as may be desired. Pupils received at any time.

THUTH OMNIPOTENT.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by the Hon. A. W. Vasey, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of North Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, one that ought to go home to those in whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

CONSERVATIVE OFFICE,
Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858.

Messrs. Wright & Co.—As the testimonial in reference to your preparations may prove beneficial to you, I inclose the following, published at my request, in the "Conservative" of the 21st inst.

Col. Vasser was formerly associate editor of the "Conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity.

Respectfully, J. W. VESEY.

[For the Conservative.]

Communicated. ABERDEEN, Aug. 19th, 1858.

DEAR VESEY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untimely sorrow in many a happy household.

On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 15 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sovereign remedy against this terrible enemy of children, I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly, by the acquiescence of my family Physician.

In the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, save in quantity, being afraid to give the amount of prescription. I was unable to detect any impression occasioned
